H. C., Winthrop, Minn.—The small dark spots you have noticed on the iris of your eyes are due probably to some veinous defect and mean nothing to worry about. Your sight is good and your general health is good and these spots are no more than small specks that might occur on any other part of your body. Only a doctor who can examine them can tell definitely, and some day when you are talking casually to a doctor friend, ask him to look at them and say what he thinks about them. Don't try any self-curing on them and if you can't help but worry about them, go to a doctor and get reliable information and proper treatment, if treatment is really needed, which I doubt.

Troubled, Santa Rosa, Cal.—A swollen great toe with pain and the same condition of finger joints usually indicates a gouty condition, gout being akin to rheumatism and while said to be the result of high living, it is not always so. As you are not given to rich food and alcoholic drinks, perhaps your trouble is not gouty, and we suggest that you have a physician make an examination and learn what is to be treated before there is any treatment.

H. B., Dayton, Ohio.—There is no safe way to reduce a large nose, we suppose, or the late J. P. Morgan of New York, with millions of dollars at his command, would have done as much for his which was noticeably prominent. If a nose becomes large from disease there is some chance to reduce it if taken in time, but if nature made it that way, the safest plan is to leave it as it was made.

Black Eyes, Glennville, Ga.—The hurting you complain of behind the eyes is probably due to strain on them. You may need glasses. Do you wear glasses? Perhaps they do not fit your eyes. You should have your eyes examined and fitted with the proper glasses. Don't go to a shop where glasses are sold and try to fit them yourself. You cannot do it properly. Possibly the measles may have something to do with it, but only a physician making an examination could say definitely.

R. C. A., Faunsdale, Ala.—Pellagra is no easy disease to cure, and when it has become firmly established and is aggravated by other conditions, it is practically incurable. We think your physician is doing about as well as could be expected and you must not be discouraged beeause improvement is slow, but stick to it and keep your spirits up, helping the doctor all you can by your resolution to get well and by your patience under distressing circumstances. Are you careful about what you eat and does your doctor attend carefully to that? Your occupation as carpenter has nothing to do with it.

Mrs. F. M., Wasco, Cal.—The doctor who was inclined to make fun of the red spots on your face and told you you thought too much of your beauty is not a very careful physician, or you are magnifying your symptoms to us. But he is not the only physician who makes fun of such spots and a so-called "Beauty Doctor" takes the case and through ignorance of causes makes a bad matter much worse. Not every COMFORT woman or girl who has red spots on her face requires the attention of a physician instead of a Beauty Doctor, or self-applied cosmetics, but where the spots continue for a year or more, the wise woman will stop her home treatment and get proper medical advice. The cause of these red spots very often lies much deeper than the skin and that should be discovered and removed. Ordinary care of the skin and thorough cleanliness, with some attention to diet and digestion will usually effect proper results, but when they do not, a physician should be consulted and he should be a physician who knows better than to try to laugh the spots away.

Puzzled, Crowell, Texas.—The only indication of insanity in the symptoms you report as shown by your sister is that she thinks it is a sin to joke. A truly sane person considers humor, even of a poor sort, as most healthful to the spirit. Seriously, the trouble with you and your sister is that you don't like each other and you are willing to say or think most anything of each other. It is a common failing in thousands of families and the only cure for it is to get the true Christian spirit into your hearts and forgive and forget. She is no crazier than you are and both of you would be good women and loving sisters if you looked to the Lord for cure, instead of looking for it in lunatic asylums.

Miss L. P., Osage City, Kans.—The usual symptom of a tumor is a swelling. There are internal tumors, however, which make no sign until they are past cure. At the same time there are more swellings on various parts of the body which are not tumors, than are, though many people imagine any swelling which they cannot account for to be a tumor. Go to a doctor with it and let him make an examination.

A. J. H., Thompsonville, Mich.—The simplest and best remedy for bleeding gums is to go to a dentist and get his advice and treatment. Most people have defective teeth and one reason for it is that most people think that the teeth can take care of themselves and they will not go to a dentist until necessity drives them to him. Then it hurts and it costs money. Both of which may be avoided by going to him in time.

M. G. S., Beech Creek, Ky.—The only advice to be given by us in the treatment of consumption is to give the patient plenty of nourishing and digestible food and fresh air to breathe, day and night, hot weather and cold. Sleep in the open, or with the window open, and in a room alone to prevent contagion. Live outdoors as much as possible and if possible in a climate which is dry, as in Arizona, New Mexico or the high lands of North Carolina. The Great White Plague, however, cannot be mastered by mere advice in print. You must get advice and treatment from a physician who realizes what tuberculosis means, and will do his best with it which is not a great deal.

A Thorn Among Roses

Olive, and her passionate appeal and efforts to compel him to make her his wife. All this came to him like a revelation, and pointed to her as the possible author of this diabolical plot and irreparable wrong.

And yet, no one had ever dreamed that she had ever given birth to a child; if she had, and his suspicions were correct, she certainly had been very cunning in concealing the fact and in executing her schemes.

Olive did not look like her, but, ah! and now more light was thrown upon the mystery—she did resemble her father, Robert Ingraham, and that explained how they had been able to trace a faint likeness to Alice, who had also resembled her mother's family—the Ingrahams.

All this flashed through the man's mind with the rapidity of lightning, and he began to understand how they had all been duped; how ingeniously Imogen had plotted and carried out her stratagem to foist her child upon him and Judge Ashburton, and thus establish her as the heiress of Castleview and the old gentleman's fortune besides; while she had also secured a luxurious home for herself during all these years, and the privilege of living with and rearing her own daughter. Oh, it was indeed a clever but a most devilish plot, and the man grew stern and bitter, as it became clearer to him, and he thought of his own darling thrust upon the care of strangers and deprived of the luxuries and privileges of her rightful position and the love which belonged to her.

Comfort's League of Cousins

absolutely no future. Her one hope is marriage, and as the man in the city earns but little more than he needs to support himself, and as he can get all the female society he wants for the asking, he steers clear of matrimony. We are hoping when women get a vote that the lot of the female worker, the lot of all workers for that matter, will be improved. God knows there is room for improvement, and until the improvement comes, unless you can dispense with stomach, health, friends, happiness, comfort and I might also add, decency and virtue, stay in the country where you were born. There at least you will be among friends and won't have to go without breakfast, nor depend on charity when you are sick. Now after this warning remember, if you come, you come at your peril.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a 15-month subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

Millions of people who never gave a cent for any worthy cause in their lives and who have wads of money stowed away that would choke a cow, have gazed monthly at these lists, hardened their hearts, and passed by. Ask yourself whether you are one of these tight wads. If you are here's your chance to put yourself right with God and your conscience. You are your brother's keeper and some day you're going to be judged on that basis. Heaven be merciful to the tight wads in that day. Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie's Poems the Funniest She Ever Read

So says Miss Fanny Rice, 3E. 124th St., New York, and she thinks "So Did I" which nightly makes hundreds of people explode with laughter, the funniest of all Uncle Charlie's funny poems. You can secure a copy of this lovely volume of screamingly funny verse, bound in ribbed lilac silk cloth, with gold leaf top and beautiful autumn leaf inside lining, containing within its covers the best of Uncle Charlie's life work (a touching sketch of his life and several pictures of himself before and after his invalidism) for only four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at twenty five cents each. Here is the ideal present for both young and old. Don't deprive the young folks of a volume that will keep them and all the rest of the family happy for the rest of their lives. Work for it today.

Uncle Charlie's Songs Are Just the Thing for a Summer Night

When you sit on the veranda after a hard day's work, Uncle Charlie's songs, soft, dreamy and melodious, or cute, funny and catchy, will bring joy to the heart and rest to weary limbs. Why deprive yourselves of these melodic gems, songs for every and all occasions, full music for voice and piano, a handsome music folio with splendid pictures of Uncle Charlie, when two subscriptions to COMFORT at twenty-five cents each will secure these songs, the very things you have been looking for. Poems and song book both free for a club of six. Work for them today.

A DOG BEGGAR.—For the license of Bubbles, a dog owned by E. W. Burns, former proprietor of Hotel Ramsdell, Warren, Mass., 200 cents were paid to the town clerk. Bubbles collected the cents himself from traveling salesmen and other guests in the hotel. He is a Boston bull terrier, six years old. Bubbles will not be satisfied unless he is given a cent. At all times he will refuse silver. When a cent is thrown to him, he grabs it in his teeth and runs to a corner of a room, and then returns for more. At the beginning of the year, Mr. Burns' son began to save the cents received by Bubbles.

SALMON CHEAPER THAN MEAT.—Canned Salmon is cheaper than meats, according to the U. S. bureau of fisheries. This bureau has issued a bulletin telling why and giving a number of good tested recipes. Copies of the bulletin may be obtained on application to the Commissioner of Fisheries, Washington, D. C.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Apply to the hair twice a week until it becomes the desired shade. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and removes dandruff. It is excellent for falling hair and will make harsh hair soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off. —Advertisement.

NEW EDITION Uncle Charlie's Story Book

51st Birthday Souvenir

A Beautiful New Edition of Uncle Charlie's Story Book is now offered as a souvenir of his fifty-first birthday which occurred September 25th. This splendid book of 157 pages printed in good, clear type on fine paper, was gotten up by Uncle Charlie regardless of trouble and expense as a worthy memorial of his fiftieth birthday a year ago.

Besides six unique stories, a dramatic sketch and personal memoirs and thrilling incidents of his remarkable life, all from his inspired pen, there are chapters by "Billy the Goat" and Maria which throw interesting side lights on his character and let you into the mysteries of his daily life. Illustrated with new pictures of him and Maria and Billy.

The immense popularity of this book has exhausted the previous editions and this handsome new edition has been printed to meet the continued large demand for it.

This edition is limited, so this may be your last chance to obtain a copy. Every home should have one.

FREE Premium Offer

It is bound in two styles, both handsome and either good enough. One in heavy, fancy opal blue paper covers known as "cloth of gold paper," will be sent post-paid as a free premium for a club of two new subscription to COMFORT at 25 cents each, 50 cents in all, or for your own one-year subscription renewal at 25 cents and one other 25-cent subscription,—send 50 cents in all.

The other, beautifully bound in lilac silk with stiff covers, will be sent post-paid as a free premium for a club of four subscriptions at 25 cents each, one dollar in all, or for your own one-year subscription or renewal at 25 cents and three other 25-cent subscriptions, —send one dollar in all.

This offer holds good while the supply of books holds out.

Probably this is the last edition that will ever be printed.

BE QUICK and secure a copy while they last.

These are the best and most costly premiums that we give for such size clubs.

Six Wheel Chairs in May

284 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

Here we are again sending out six wheel chairs in the month of May to let six more poor, unfortunate cripples out into the glorious spring air and sunshine. That makes 26 wheel chairs that we have sent out in the first five months of the present year, and it beats our record for any consecutive five months of any previous year. It is a splendid showing, but even that does not satisfy me while I know that there are so many other shut-ins suffering for want of a COMFORT wheel chair. So let us all boost together and try our very best to make the June record beat that of May. We can do it if we will, and therefore we ought to.

Following are the names of the recipients of the six May wheel chairs. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Carl Willis Bair, Lipscomb, Texas, 212; Mrs. Nannie Craig, Milton, Ky., 125; Leonard Rhodus, Sumner, Okla., 112; Mrs. Martha E. Willyard, Hartford, Kans., 108; Jessie Johns, R. R. 2, Calhoun, Ga., 90; Mrs. Suda Catnam, Salt Springs, Ark., 88.

Carl Willis Bair is fourteen years old and has been a cripple from birth. As he can use his hands and arms he will be able to wheel himself about in his new chair which he expects to enjoy very much. Mrs. Geo. P. Weaver sent 185 subscriptions for him, her sister Miss Mittie Hill sent 15 and Miss Alice Cowardin sent 12, all since the middle of January.

Alice Craig sent the 125 subscriptions all in one bunch for Mrs. Nannie Craig's chair, but has not yet sent me a description of this lady for whom she has earned the chair.

Leonard Rhodus is fourteen years old and has never walked. His legs have been crippled since he had infantile paralysis when a baby. He lives with, and is dependent on his widowed mother who has three other children to support, which she accomplishes by keeping a little lunch room. She writes that her crippled boy is intelligent, has a very fine voice and sings well for one who has had no training, and she laments her inability to have his voice cultivated under a good teacher. Here is a chance for some wealthy person to help this brave woman to educate her crippled boy so that he may become self-supporting. The wheel chair will be a great help to the boy and to his mother who has to care for him.

Mrs. Willyard is 63 years old, and for 20 years has suffered severely from rheumatism which has stiffened her arms at the elbows and drawn her legs up into a sitting posture so that she is completely crippled and has not walked for ten years. She hopes to find some little relief in her weeel chair.

Jessie Johns is a five-year-old child crippled from birth by spinal trouble.

Mrs. Catnam is forty years of age, and hopelessly crippled in her left leg which is drawn up in a sitting posture and is shrunken to mere skin and bone. Her daughter Lizzie gives me the information.

It is coming hot weather very soon when the shut-ins who have no wheel chair will suffer more intensely from their enforced confinement. Bear this in mind and get at least a few subscriptions to help our Wheel-Chair Club to send out a goodly number of chairs in June for their relief.

The month's Roll of honor and a few letters of thanks follows.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some worthy, destitute, crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

Just Delighted with Her Wheel Chair

BUFFALO, ILL.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

The chair arrived in fine condition. It is certainly a fine chair, much nicer than I ever hoped it would be. I am just delighted with it, and wish to thank you and Mr. Gannett very heartily, also Miss Pharis, who procured the subscriptions for me. I hope a great many more unfortunate people may receive one of these fine chairs. Very respectfully and gratefully yours,

MRS. MATTIE PEMBERTON.

COMFORT Wheel Chair Is Great Help to Crippled Boy and His Mother also.

OWENSBORO, KY.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

The wheel chair for my boy, Fitzhugh, arrived in good condition, and we are more than pleased with it. My dear boy enjoys it very much and it is such a help to me, as now I can wheel him around instead of having to carry him. I want to thank you and all kind friends who helped us get this chair. My boy has been a cripple since birth and was seventeen years old on the 29th of last March, and never has walked a step.

Very gratefully yours, MRS. K. K. JOHNSTON.

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

NOW comes the rosy month of June, my dears, and all the world's a-bloom and nothing but ourselves, my dears, can shadow it in gloom, which is not only poetry, but is the truth as well, and it is for each of us to say whether we will have our June a month of roses or a month of thorns. As for me, I prefer roses and hope you are all the same as I, but I am almost sure some of you will insist on having thorns. Anyway, this is June and June is the merry month and let us be merry who can. I'm going to do my merry act by getting to work. Now what do you think of that?

The first letter is from Worried of Hastings, Pa., and no wonder she is worried for she has had five proposals all of which she has declined, and now the one she wants wants her and she is only eighteen and under promise to herself not to marry until she is nineteen. Isn't that dreadful, girls? Still, I think it will be better for her to wait and if she takes my advice she will wait.

Bunnie, Holtville, Cal.—The young man had a right to lose his temper when he had asked you to go out with him and you kept him waiting till your girl friend joined you, whom he had not asked. You owe him an apology much more than he owes you one.

Brown Eyes, Oto, Ia.—Having made the widower wait a year without answering his letter, it would hardly be proper to do do so now that he has returned. If he is somewhat shy, you should tell him some kind of a story to restore his courage. But why bring him back, if you don't want him? P. S. You should spell better when you use a typewriter, and please don't call me "Aunt" Marion. I'm not aunt, yet.

Somebody's Girl, Grove City, Pa.—You should be glad you didn't send him your picture, now that he has quit writing and apparently forgotten you. They do that way very often and you should not want to get him back, or he will treat you the same way again. Do you like that kind of treatment so well you want to have more of it? Forget him.

O. C. T., Prairie City, Ill.—Go right ahead being Cinderella to your older sisters and being a nice girl to everybody else, and some day the prince will come out of the schoolhouse and claim you as his own. You are just seventeen now and Princes, who teach school in disguise, don't let everybody know who is their choice, and besides they choose a girl who is old enough to marry.

R. C. G., Indiana Villa, Pa.—Your "fair face and stately figure" will be "a curse" to you by and by, if they are not now, unless you stop thinking about them and devote your thoughts to the happiness of other people. That will make for your own happiness as well and you will be as popular as you are now beautiful. Don't you think you are just a little bit conceited for a farmer's daughter who must toil for her daily bread, as you say you do?

Dimples, Shiner, Texas.—You say you pay no attention to the gossips, yet you write me a letter to tell me how it worries you. Now is that consistent? It isn't, and you should really pay no attention to it. Gossip always is epidemic in small towns and you should be immune against it by not thinking about it and particularly not recognizing its existence by talking about it to your friends. As to the stranger you have been writing to, do you know whether he has a wife or not, or has never been in jail, or on the way there? If you meet him at all, you should meet him at your own house, or with friends who know him and will introduce him properly and vouch for him.

Lonesome, Altus, Okla.—As you have said you would not marry until you are twenty-one, the wise course is to keep your word to yourself. By that time the young man, who has nothing now except the promise of a situation, will have proved if he is able to support a wife, and your parents will look more kindly upon your marrying. Why look for trouble when it is so sure to look for you?

Cross-eyed, Paducah, Ky.—Of course, marry the one you don't love because he swears he loves you so that he will give up the two sweethearts he now has, if you will take him. The other one is too steady and reliable for a mettlesome girl like you.

Despondent, Lundy, Cal.—If he is worth anything you might sue him for breach of promise and get a money balm for your wounded heart. But as you want him back, notwithstanding the heartless and cruel way he has treated you and would treat you again, I suppose you would not care to have him punished as he deserves. My dear, for cases like yours, there is no help. You must suffer for your own weakness and lack of self-respect.

Sad Heart, Dorchester, Nebr.—As you can never be happy without him, and though he is a nice young man your parents don't want him, suppose you cheer up and wait until you are of age and can do as you please. Girls do that quite often and sometimes very happily, but not always. Still, accidents happen even in the best regulated marriages.

L. L., Bidwell, O.—I suppose you had a right to object to your fiance going with another girl, but you should not have gone at him in the hammer-and-tongs style. There's time enough for that after you are married. Now you have driven him away and really I don't know how you can get him back. You should have thought of getting him back before you drove him off. If he doesn't ask to be restored to your esteem, you may conclude he is congratulating himself on having been let go so easily. Maybe he went with the other girl just to produce this result.

Jane, Fairmouth, W. Va.—One of the queer things in a young man's make-up, my dear, is the silly notion that he must kiss every girl he meets, no matter whether she wants him to or not. Some of them have it worse than others, and I don't believe there is any cure for it. My advice to you is to tell this one very positively that you are not to be kissed by him, and if he insists that you are, then you will decline to see him except in the company of others.

Three Beauties, Oak Mills, Kans.—If you are so pestered by beaus in Kansas that your condition is distressing, suppose you migrate to Massachusetts where you can't catch a beau unless you have a net and all the nets are spoken for months ahead.

Tiyu, Thorp, Wis.—No wonder you don't have any attentive young men and not many friends of any kind. You hold yourself to be so much better than everybody else that nobody wants to come around for fear of contaminating you. Some young men are undesirable as acquaintances and some girls are the same, but the majority of people are quite as correct in their sentiments and actions as you are and when you believe that and make an effort to assist the good in making the rest and yourself better and happier, you will never again feel like writing such a letter to me as calls for this answer. Try it for a year or two and see what the results are.

Blue Eyes, Spurger, Texas.—Don't have any sweetheart at all if you can't have one that is not always fussing with you, and of all things don't take for a husband the one you fuss with as your sweetheart. And still you want to win this fusser back! My, my!

Danish Blue, Kenmare, N. Dak.—As your letters have gone astray before and you do not know but that another has, you might write again to find out. At the same time, if he has not heard from you, don't you think if he cared very much he would write to you to know what was the matter? Why do so many of you girls insist on thinking that nobody is to blame except yourselves?

There, my dears, your questions are all answered, even some that you sent to the Etiquette Edtior instead of Cousin Marion, though why you should have sent them to him instead of to me, I don't know, seeing that etiquet'e has nothing whatever to do with the heart. Anyway, your questions are answered, except the very silly ones and all you have to do now is to take my advice. The good Lord watch over us all, heart, soul and body. By, by.

COUSIN MARION.

THIN FOR YEARS—"GAINS 22 POUNDS IN 23 DAYS"

Remarkable Experience of F. Gagnon. Builds Up Weight Wonderfully.

"I was all run down to the very bottom," writes F. Gagnon. "I had to quit work, I was so weak. Now, thanks to Sargol, I look like a new man. I gained 22 pounds in 23 days."

"Sargol has put 10 pounds on me in 14 days," states W. D. Roberts. "It has made me sleep well, enjoy what I ate and enabled me to work with interest and pleasure."

"I weighed 132 pounds when I commenced taking Sargol. After taking 20 days I weighed 144 pounds. Sargol is the most wonderful preparation for flesh building I have ever seen," declares D. Martin, and J. Meier adds: "For the past twenty years I have taken medicine every day for indigestion and got thinner every year. I took Sargol for forty days and feel better than I have felt in twenty years. My weight has increased from 150 to 170 pounds."

When hundreds of men and women—and there are hundreds with more coming every day—living in every nook and corner of this broad land voluntarily testify to weight increases ranging all the way from 10 to 35 pounds given them by Sargol, you must admit, Mr. and Mrs. and Miss Thin Reader, that there must be something in this Sargol method of flesh building after all.

Hadn't you better look into it, just as thousands of others have done? Many thin folks say: "I'd give most anything to put on a little extra weight," but when some one suggests a way they exclaim, "Not a chance. Nothing will make me plump. I'm built to stay thin." Until you have tried Sargol, you do not and cannot know that this is true.

Sargol has put pounds of healthy "stay there" flesh on hundreds who doubted, and in spite of their doubts. You don't have to believe in Sargol to grow plump from its use. You just take it and watch weight pile up, hollows vanish and your figure round out to pleasing and normal proportions. You weigh yourself when you begin and again when you finish and you let the scales tell the story.

Sargol is just a tiny concentrated tablet. You take one with every meal. It mixes with the food you eat for the purpose of separating all of its flesh producing ingredients. It prepares these fat making elements in an easily assimilated form, which the blood can readily absorb and carry all over your body. Plump, well-developed persons don't need Sargol to produce this result. Their assimilative machinery performs its functions without aid. But thin folks' assimilative organs do not. This fatty portion of their food now goes to waste through their bodies like unburned coal through an open grate. A few days' test of Sargol in your case will surely prove whether or not this is true of you. Isn't it worth trying?

Plump, well developed men and women attract attention at the beach as well as in the city.

if you kept them in a clean, airy, light box stall and fed them small quantities of milk often at first and gradually increased the amount and lengthened the intervals between feeds. Instead of feeding cottonseed meal feed a mixture of oatmeal (screened), bran, cornmeal and flaxseed meal. If calves show any signs of indigestion lessen the feed and add an ounce of lime-water to each pint of milk fed daily.

MILO MAIZE.—Would milo maize be a profitable crop to raise in Tennessee? What is the usual yield per acre? What effect has it on the soil? When and how should it be planted to mature the grain? What is its feeding and what its market value? Does it withstand wet and dry weather? G. L. C., Friendship, Tenn.

A.—See article on Milo Maize in February COMFORT. It would not likely be a profitable crop for Tennessee since it is better adapted to regions of light rainfall. Corn is a better paying crop in your state. Milo does not improve the soil. See article above referred to for answers to the rest of your questions.

Rheumatism

A Home Cure Given by One Who Had It

In the spring of 1893 I was attacked by muscular and inflammatory rheumatism. I suffered as only those who have it know, for over three years. I tried remedy after remedy, and doctor after doctor but such relief as I received was only temporary. Finally I found a remedy that cured me completely, and it has never returned. I have given it to a number who were terribly afflicted and even bed-ridden with rheumatism and it effected a cure in every case.

I want every sufferer from any form of rheumatic trouble to try this marvelous healing power. Don't send a cent; simply mail your name and address and I will send it free to try. After you have used it and it has proven itself to be that long-looked-for means of curing your rheumatism, you may send the price of it, one dollar, but, understand, I do not want your money unless you are perfectly satisfied to send it. Isn't that fair? Why suffer any longer when positive relief is thus offered you free. Don't delay. Write today.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Many Thanks, Garner, Ia.—The best form is to say: "The Smyths send their kindest regards," and "Give my kindest regards to——." It is correct in introducing to say: "Miss S., this is my cousin, Harry B." It is not correct to say to a gentleman who thanks you for a dance: "You are welcome." If anyone offers you anything at table on a dish, you may take the dish and ask the person to take some first or ask the person to help himself first. It is better, however, when a dish is going around the table for each person to help himself and then pass it on without saying anything. One may miss his share by being foolishly polite, and passing things regardless. A gentleman meeting two ladies who may not be acquainted with each other, or may, without his knowledge, may ask if they are acquainted when he sees they do not greet each other. In asking he should say: "Miss A., do you know Miss B.," or words to that effect, no set rule of language being followed for informal introductions.

E. M. B., Clinton, Wis.—If the young man can give you a good reason for asking you to town to the show and then leaving you with others while he went with his sister and her friend, you should accept his apology and continue your friendship. He went home with you all right and did all he could to make it pleasant for you. You may count pretty safely on the young man who will not neglect his sister. It is proper to say to your escort after bringing you home from a show or other entertainment to which he has taken you: "Thank you very much. I enjoyed a very pleasant evening." But don't say it as though you were reading it out of a book.

Blue Bell, Coulee, N. Dak.—You introduce a minister, or your sister-in-law, just as you would introduce anyone else, except you should say: "The Reverend So-and-so," and "My sister-in-law, Mrs. or Miss ——." Some brief explanation as to who the persons are whom you are introducing always helps strangers in starting their acquaintance.

Dolly, Hosford, Fla.—It is scarcely good form for a lady to wave her hand at a gentleman walking on the street with his best girl, but it may be done if she wants to embarrass the gentleman and make the other girl jealous, which no lady ever does.

Brown Eyes, Roanoke, Va.—Your letter was answered. Still, we will reply again in order to rub in a great truth, which is that a young man's vanity as a lady-killer is one of his most sensitive points and when a girl slights him and snubs him it hurts worse than running him through a threshing-machine. But it is excellent treatment for him and we earnestly urge it upon young ladies to treat every young man of this kind in the threshing-machine manner.

Miss M. W., Adrian, Minn.—Courtesy is never wasted, no matter how small the occasion. It is good to thank the clerk in the store for the change, or for his attention in serving you, if there is no change to hand back. The thoughtfulness of others implied in these small courtesies counts for more than when it would be actually impolite not to extend them on greater occasions.

B. C. L.—Portsmouth, Ohio.—Though the accepted rule is that two years should elapse after the death of husband or wife before the survivor marries again, there are circumstances when this rule may be disregarded. This is particularly true in cases where small children are left who need a woman's care and they must be separated from the father in order to receive it. Of course, a man should not marry again simply to have a woman to look after his children, but if in a decent time he finds a good woman whom he loves and who will be his wife, it is better for all concerned that he should not wait two years, which is only a customary, not a legal, period.

Ruth, Tyler, Ala.—It is proper for a lady to ask to have a gentleman introduced to her whom she wishes to meet. It is not proper for a gentleman to press his shoulder against the lady's when he is standing near her and she may use any measures she wishes to prevent it. If he is really a gentleman he will not persist after she has told him she does not like it. Show him this answer if he offends again.

N. M. Girl, Oscuro, N. M.—It is not proper for the gentleman to hold the lady too tight while dancing with her, and the sure cure for it is to decline to dance with a man of that kind—there are plenty of them—and let everybody know why you decline.

Nineteen, Belt, Mont.—When a father drinks and imposes on a daughter, as some fathers do, utterly regardless of the duty of parents to children, we believe she is fully justified in leaving home and making her own living. She would not have to work as hard, as you do, and would not only be paid for it, but would receive the respect and consideration a good and industrious girl should have. As you are not risking the temptations of the city, but propose to work in the country at what you are capable of doing, we do not hesitate to advise you to go out for yourself. And don't marry until you are very sure you will better your condition in every way.

Dorothy, Auburn, Maine.—Beware of the attentions of the elderly man, particularly as he is married. That kind of men never mean girls any good and we are almost inclined to say that girls who permit their attentions are really inviting any trouble that may come to them, and deserve whatever they may get. As to the young man, as he has told you that he loves you and you think as much of him, you may tell him so and settle the matter. But don't fall desperately in love wth him and spoil everything as silly girls often do, though you do not write like one of the silly kind.

pale, handsome face, with its strange, wan and weary look, so very strange upon the face of careless, light-hearted Sir Cyril.

Then he drew a chair to the table and seated himself.

"I'm glad to hear you are quite well, Sir Cyril. Candidly, you are not looking at all yourself——"

"And who the devil would?" said Cyril, with a mingled haughtiness and impatience so strange and uncommon to him that Mr. Burdon could not help staring. "You forget that your confounded clerk has been at my heels for the last three days, badgering me to get on, get on, and reach here. What on earth do you want with me? I thought, when I was here last, that I'd done with lawyers—that I had nothing left for the law to trouble itself about."

"So did I, Sir Cyril," replied Mr. Burdon, dryly, but still respectfully, "but it seems we were mistaken. Will you not take a seat?—and let me offer you——"

"Nothing," said Cyril, dropping into a chair; then he leaned his head upon his hand for a moment, and Mr. Burdon sat too astonished to proceed to business.

"See here, Burdon," said Cyril, looking up suddenly, and frowning across the table, "I have come over to England very much against my will, and to this place, which I would have avoided, if I could have fought against a strange kind of impulse and attraction, and I am anxious to leave it again as quickly as possible. I don't wish to offend, but, there—there," and with a movement of his hand he swept away whatever explanation he was about to give. "Your time is too valuable to waste on me; you have wasted quite enough already, Heaven knows! Now, what is this business?"

As he spoke he made a palpable attempt to give his attention, and succeeded in doing so—after a fashion.

Mr. Burdon bit his lip, puzzled and curious, but he knew the More peculiarities and idiosyncracies too well to trifle with them, and proceeded to obey his client's direct injunctions.

"Well, Sir Cyril, I am quite ready; I hope I have never been dilatory where your interests are concerned. It was your interest that forced me to send my man for you, and I think you will be more ready to pardon me for the liberty after you have found my reasons for so doing than you appear to be now!"

Cyril, whose good humor no amount of ill luck and trouble could altogether destroy, looked up without the frown, and with a smile which was, however, very different from his old, light-hearted one.

"Forgive me, Burdon," he said; as you see, I am rather knocked up—a good deal of traveling, and—that sort of thing; I am a little out of sorts, too; in fact, as you said, not quite myself. I know you mean well, you always have meant well to me and mine. Don't think I am ungrateful—don't think anything about me today; in fact, try, after I am gone, to forget that you have seen me. I shall leave England again tonight," he added, gloomily.

Mr. Burdon smiled with complacent satisfaction.

"I think not, Sir Cyril; I think not!" he said. "I've news that is good enough to keep most men at home, and I don't think even you will turn your back on it."

"Good news!" said Cyril, abstractedly, and with a grim smile.

"Judge for yourself," said Mr. Burdon, and he took up from the table the deed which he had brought with him.

Cyril put up his hand wearily.

"For Heaven's sake, Burdon, spare me! Tell me what you have to tell in plain English."

Mr. Burdon laughed.

"You are like my other client—the other party to the deed. Well, Sir Cyril, what do you say to a large fortune—another fortune?" he added, with a slight emphasis.

Cyril looked up with a faint expression of interest.

"Is that it?" he said, nodding his head absently. "Then, why on earth didn't you write and tell me, or let your man tell me, instead of dragging me from one corner of the earth to the other?"

Mr. Burdon certainly bore his burden well, for though he leaned back in his chair and gave vent to one or two ejaculations, they were not profane.

"Come, come!" he said, "is this fair, Sir Cyril? How was I to know that you had suddenly grown indifferent to money and all its advantages? Besides, there are conditions to be complied with before you can claim——"

OIL GUSHER EXPECTED WHEN DRILL PIERCES BIG ANTI-CLINE

Oklahoma Oil Sage Makes Lucky Find In Surface Formations Almost Invariably Overlaying Vast Oil Pools

FATE SEEMS TO FAVOR CONWAY—HAS NEVER FAILED—3000 ACRES LEASED

Millions Being Made In Oklahoma Oil Fields—Stampede For Leases Sure To Follow If Big Strike Is Made—Small Investors Profit Big.

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA., June 1st.—After promoting two highly successful oil companies in the Oklahoma fields, R. M. Conway, the man whose remarkable success has attracted attention throughout the State, is now organizing a new Company to drill on 3,000 Acres of leases, he has located on and around a Monster Anti-Cline in Stephens County, Oklahoma.

A little more than six months ago, Conway sold out the Conway-Russell Oil Company, after it had been operating only eighteen months, during which time he had paid 40 per cent dividends. Every dollar invested in its stock brought six dollars in return. The Alert Oil Company, another of Conway's projects, was so successful in sixty days, that its stock brought $2 for $1.

Immediately upon the culmination of his first two successful operations, Conway began casting about for new fields to conquer. That was just after the new Healdton field had been opened and roaring gushers were pouring out as high as 5,000 barrels a day from single wells. Conway searched every portion of the state for the right sort of territory and in company with an expert geologist, was looking over the lay of the land in Stephens County, when they discovered "The Big Anti-Cline."

To the average inexperienced eye it would appear to be nothing more than a long ridge, with a pronounced dome, but to the experienced knowledge of Conway and his geologist, it meant that a vast oil pool was almost certain to underlie it. The Anti-Cline was a huge one, being two miles wide and six miles long and the formation had the ear marks which experienced oil men know to be almost certain indication of oil.

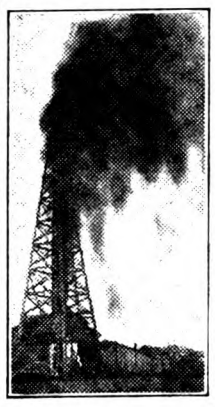
TWO PROBABLE BIG OIL LINES CROSS ANTI-CLINE.

The fact that the Anti-Cline was such a perfect specimen would have been enough, but after carefully tracing out its formations, it was found to be almost exactly of the crossing of two apparent oil lines. A straight line from the Petrolia fields of Texas passes directly through the Anti-Cline and through the Wann Pool, the Osage Pool, the Cushing, Bartlesville and Hope Pools and terminates in the rich fields around Coffeyville, Kansas. Another line beginning at Ardmore, Okla., passes through the Healdton and Loco fields through this big Anti-Cline, the Lawton field, terminating at Willow, Oklahoma.

Nearly all geological indications—the crossing of these big supposed oil lines—and oil seepage traces in springs, wells and streams, all pointed so strongly to the probability of a big new oil strike, that Conway immediately contracted for 3,000 Acres of leases on and around the Big Anti-Cline and at once took steps to organize a new development Company.

The prospects for opening another sensational oil field are very bright and regarding it Mr. Conway says; "Anyone with the slightest conception of what the oil business in Oklahoma pays, when a big strike is made must realize it offers the greatest opportunity for moderate speculation existing in the United States today."

LEASES BRING FABULOUS PRICES.



We have only to recount the remarkable prices paid for leases in some of the newer Oklahoma fields to realize this. In the Paden-Prague field, where the first wildcat well was brought in only a few months ago, leases sold from $50 to $250 per acre. At Healdton leases brought from $100.00 to $1000 per acre. $50 to $1,000 was paid in the Cushing field and $1000 per acre was paid just recently when the new Robinson pool was opened near Muskogee.

"We have most the geological indications, existing in any of the fields already developed. I propose to organize this new Company on a scale sufficiently large, to make a thorough test of our holdings, and yet not so large as to reduce the proportion of each investor's profit in case we strike it rich. The Company has a capital stock of $25,000 fully paid and non-assessable.

CO-OPERATIVE DEVELOPMENT SAFEST.

It is my plan to place the stock among as many people as possible. If we strike it big, even a $10 to $50 block of stock may make its owner big money. If we get only a dry hole, no one will suffer from the loss of so trifling a sum.

"I have never been and never will be associated with any questionable proposition. There will be no stories of men and women losing the savings of a lifetime in any Company of mine. The co-operative plan of developing good prospective oil leases has been tried out and proven the most feasible. It is simply a matter of a number of people, each pooling a small sum in chance to make handsome profits for all. Anyone coming into this company does so with his eyes wide open, knowing that if we strike it rich we all make big money, and that if we get a dry hole we all lose a few dollars apiece. Surely there can be nothing that savors of a blue-sky or stock-jobbing scheme about that."

"We have every reason to believe we are sure to strike it rich, yet no man can say it for a certainty. It's just a fair, square, honest business proposition for a limited number of people who have the courage to risk a few dollars on a very probable opportunity to reap immeuse wealth. Everybody shares and shares alike, according to the amount of stock he holds."

MILLIONS FROM LEASES POSSIBLE.

One big well will insure us a tremendous return, for this Company, unlike most Companies, has 3,000 acres of leases to sell at big prices as soon as oil is struck. The real value of this investment lies in our great acreage. There hasn't been an instance in Oklahoma during the last two years, where leases in a new field of any importance near a wild cat well, have sold for less than $100 per acre; generally they bring from $100 to $1,000 and some even up to $5,000 per acre.

"Suppose we were to sell our acreage for only $20.00 per acre—that would mean $60,000 to say nothing of our profits from Oil. At $50 per acre we could sell for $150,000; and if we were to get $100 per acre (the most conservative estimate for really good proven acreage) we would get $300,000. There is practically no limit to the possibilities for profit if we should strike a gusher."

84 PER CENT. OKLAHOMA WELLS SUCCESSFUL.

Out of all Oil Wells drilled in Oklahoma last year, better than 84 per cent. have been producers and this average include the rankest wild-cat drillings in the State. Our chance for striking oil are not only better than 84 out of 100, but the chances are, strike it big. The history of Oklahoma's oil development, proves that the men who have made the big fortunes are the ones who pioneered in unproven fields and took a chance. Those who wait till someone else takes the risk and brings in the gushing wells which send the price of leases skyward, never get very far.

INDIVIDUAL RISK IS SMALL.

However it takes great nerve and unnecessary risk for one individual to attempt such undertakings alone, but in company like this no one can lose much and everyone has a chance for phenomenal profits. Even a moderate success will mean great profits for even the smallest investor. I have already made two remarkable successes in the oil business. Every investor who banked on my judgment before, made big profits. I firmly believe that every investor who goes into this Company with me, will reap handsomely for I expect this Company to overshadow my other undertakings from fifty to a hundred per cent. With such overwhelming odds in our favor—with such tremendous profits possible if we win—with the percentage of failures so low—and my past record so remarkable—it is hardly reasonable to believe we will not strike it rich. How any man or woman with a spark of ambition in his veins can hesitate to invest so little as $10 or $50 in a proposition of such gigantic possibilities is beyond me."

Mr. Conway urges every one who wants shares to send in their subscriptions on the very first mail. If you have any questions to ask, send your money with them, if you want to be sure of your stock. Your money will be held for ten days until all your questions have been answered satisfactorily. If any investor isn't thoroughly satisfied and glad he got in, then the money will be returned within 10 days. Idle funds are worthless unless you put them to work. Savings bank interest is trifling. Every man or woman who can possibly spare $10 to $50 or more should get hold of some of this stock before the allotment is oversold. The first mail is none too quick to get your subscription in to Mr. Conway, 1412 Colcord Bldg., Oklahoma City. It will be best to decide what you want right now and get it into the mail at the earliest hour today.

Trifling Events That Have Caused Great Wars

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

OPINIONS differ as to whether the dispute which led to the present terrible war in Europe were sufficient to justify the loss of blood and treasure, but so many great wars have been caused by such trivial incidents.

There are many historical facts to prove how slight a cause may throw great nations into a state of most terrific warfare.

Louis VII of France visited the royal barber and plunged two nations—France and England—into intermittent warfare which lasted three hundred years. According to the story, the archbishop of Rouen persuaded the King to remove his beard, in common with his subjects. The act led to so much friction with the queen that at last Louis divorced her, to become a few months later the wife of Henry VII of England. From this marriage centuries of bloodshed may be said to have followed.

In an iron case in the tower of the cathedral of Modena, Italy, a bucket may be seen today, that was the cause of a terrible war nine hundred years ago. Some soldiers of Modena, in a mischievous mood stole a bucket from a public well in Bologna and refused to return it. The states were rivals and very jealous of each other and the soldiers at once engaged in a desperate fight. This spark kindled a fire of war which devastated a large part of Europe and led to the imprisonment for life of the King of Sardinia, son of the German emperor.

A broken teapot started a war in China over two hundred and fifty years ago which cost over a million lives. The teapot was the cherished possession of a high dignitary who was in great favor with the emperor. When traveling through a lawless province in the northeast of China, some of his retinue were intercepted by a band of robbers, and among the spoils the teapot was found and contemptuously thrown on the ground and broken. The loss was at once reported to the emperor, a force of soldiers was sent out and a long and terrible war was the result.

Only three men are said to have ever known the exact nature of the troubles which led to two great wars in Schleswig-Holstein. Two of them died before the wars broke out and the third had quite forgotten what the trouble was all about.

The manipulation of a telegram by Count Bismarck, sent France and Prussia flying at each other in 1870. The French ambassador went to Ems, where Emperor William I was at the time to ask him not to approve the ambition of Prince Leopold to become the king of Spain.

The King refused to give a definite answer, but the prince's candidacy was withdrawn. A report of this conference was submitted by telegram to Count Bismarck, then Prussia's foreign minister, with authority to publish it. Bismarck altered the text, making the report unfavorable to France and at once the international war followed with all its horrors.

Bismarck is said to have confessed this alteration many years later.

The war of the Spanish succession, in which the great Duke of Marlborough played a brilliant part, was said to be the outcome of a glass of water at the Tuileries in Paris.

One of the court ladies had expressed a wish for a glass of water in the hearing of the British and Spanish ambassadors, each hastening to get it for her. They both returned to find the fair lady gone and dancing with a French statesman. The English diplomat accidentally, it is thought, ran against the Spaniard and upset the glass he was carrying. This ridiculous incident inflamed the jealousies of the nations and war was the outcome.

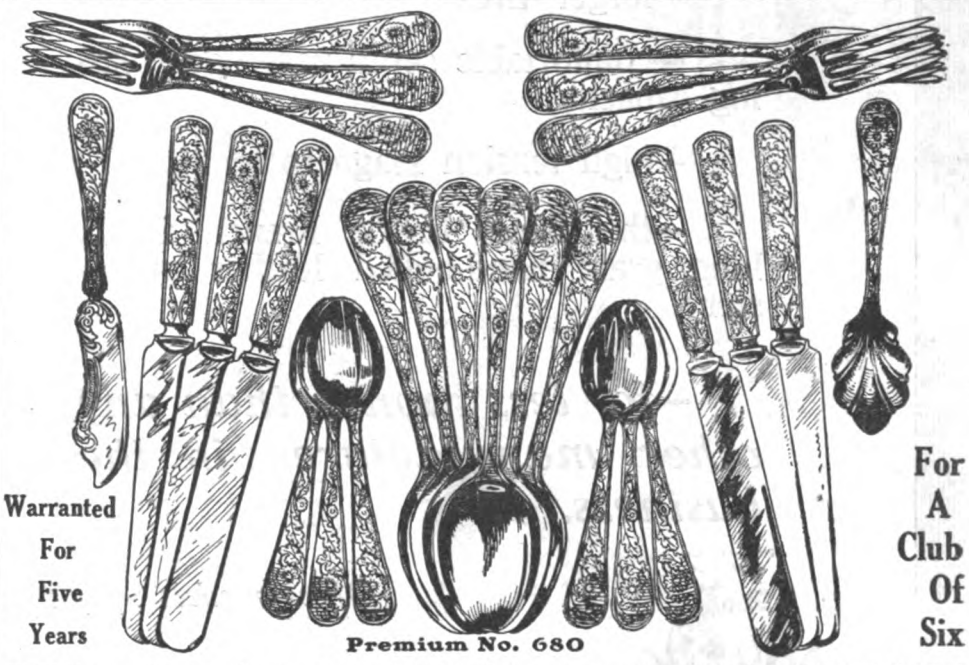
According to his own confession, the Seven Years War was largely due to the vanity of Frederick the Great in wanting to see his name figure largely in the gazettes.

The Sepoys believed that cartridges served out to them were greased with fat of animals unclean alike both to the Hindu and Mohammedan, thus causing the Indian mutiny.

The Turko-Russian war was said to have started by the hammer with which a Herzegovian blacksmith killed a tax collector who had insulted his daughter.

The stealing of a lace petticoat, belonging to a Castilian lady by a Moor led to many years of the most terrible fighting between the Spaniards and the Moors.

Borrowing a tobacco pipe and failing to return it led to a civil war which lasted for many years between the rival races in Pamirs and Afghanistan.



Over a dispute as to the relative attractions of snails and vipers as food, fifty years of fighting was started between Pisa and Milan.

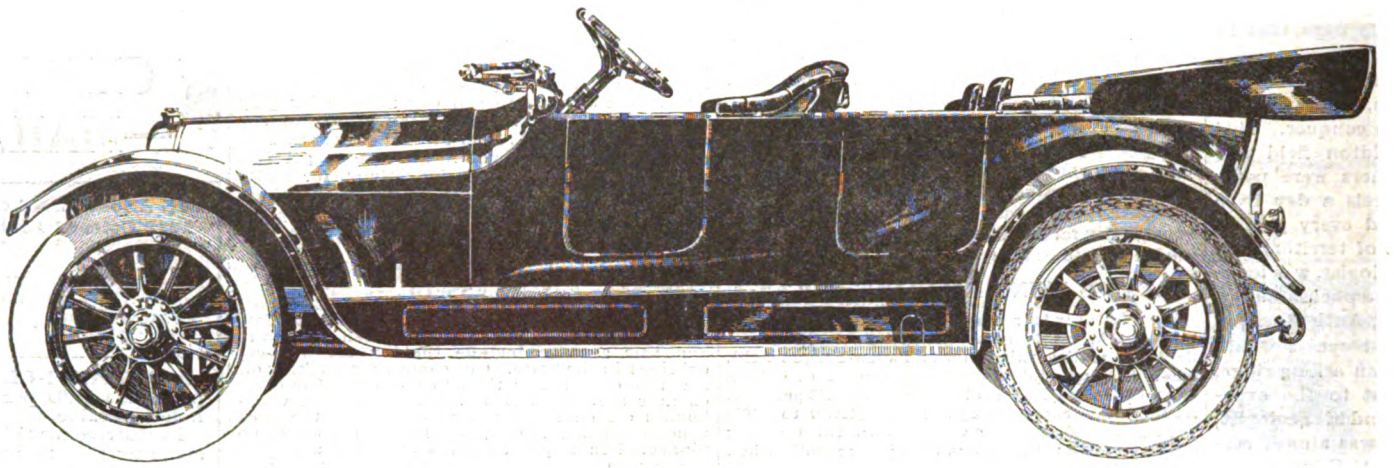
26-Piece Daisy Silver Set

Warranted For Five Years

For A Club Of Six

Premium No. 680

WE have in the past made many fine premium offers of silverware to readers of COMFORT, but this is the first time we have ever been able to offer a complete silver set in return for such a small club of subscriptions. And please don't think because we are giving away this splendid set on such liberal terms that it is the ordinary cheap silverware which is plated on a brass base and consequently changes color and has that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. This Set which we offer you here is silver plated on a white metal base therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will never show signs of tarnish or wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use the handles are handsomely embossed and decorated with the beautiful Daisy design which is now so popular and the blades of the knives and bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have ever offered, in fact we are so sure that it will please and satisfy all who accept our offer we are going to guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this beautiful 26-Piece Daisy Silver Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special



Club Offer. For a club of six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, you will receive this 26-Piece Daisy Silver Set Free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 680. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

The Turn of the Wheel

By Anna S. Ells

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

SUDDENLY the music ceased for her. She sat very erect, gazing over the sea of heads at the opposite box. Could it be her husband who was sitting there with an unknown woman of surpassing beauty beside him? Only as the queenly head moved could she catch a glimpse of the handsome face of the man beyond.

Forgetting her own prominence, she leaned forward, every nerve tense. The woman moved and she saw him distinctly. The blood rushed blindingly to her eyes; she caught her breath, and leaned back. It was not her husband.

Again she heard the call of the violin, the sob of the 'cello, but thought was intent on the past.

"Another turn of the wheel." That was what Tracy had said that evening when she came down to dinner dressed for the theater, and his face had looked sad and far away as he said it. She had wondered what he meant.

Again the music thrilled her, and remembrance slipped aside; but when, during the next intermission, she again caught a glimpse of the unknown man, it returned. She wondered what Tracy was really doing. What did he do so many evenings when he absented himself from her gay gatherings?

"I am going to run down to the office for a little while."

It was always the same explanation. Now what did "office" stand for? Business was all right; even Tracy owned that. She was of this world, and knew that "office" and "business" could cover many things, but Tracy—dear old dignified, honest Tracy—she could not believe that he had followed the light footsteps of the many. Still——

The play was good. She watched the honest man turn into a rogue, the happy bride grow sad and watchful, the giddy lovers with their amusing courtship—and through it all ran the persistent query, "What is Tracy really doing tonight?"

Not realizing that she had formed any resolution, she rose, whispered a word to her sister who shared the box, and slipped out into the deserted foyer, got her wrap and, still half dazed, left the theater. Out in the sweet night air, her mind cleared. She knew what she intended doing. No, she did not want her car; when the play was over, send it home. She hailed a taxicab and gave a down-town address. This reached, she dismissed the taxi, and looked around. How strange it all looked in the brilliant, artificial light. For a moment she was puzzled, then turned to the left. She remembered now, although many months had passed since she had been there. Around that corner, five doors to the right, and she entered the huge office building. How well she remembered going through the small side door and up the back elevators one evening with Tracy when they were going somewhere together. He had forgotten something, and she had thought it such fun to go with him to his office en route. Going together! Ah yes, but that was long ago. She was going alone now to see if Tracy really spent long, lonely evenings in his office, and if so why.

She thought the elevator boy looked at her oddly as she asked for Tracy's floor. Suddenly she remembered her rich evening gown, and drew her cloak closer.

The boy looked at her and actually grinned in a friendly, "I understand" way. She stiffened, and asked with considerable emphasis, correctly placed.

"Is my husband in his office tonight?"

"Sure thing," replied the knowing one. "He pegs away there most nights, but you're the first 'wife' ever asked for him."

Flushing hotly at the insinuation, she stepped into the hall and cast furtive glances up and down its well-lighted lengths. Then she turned to the left and silently reached his door. There was a dim light in the outer offices, a slightly brighter one in Tracy's private office, and a brilliant one in a little room beyond where she had never been. Odd that her heart should beat so furiously! She was only calling on her own husband, but the episode flavored of adventure. She was a very beautiful woman as she stood hesitating. What secret lay hidden behind the intervening glass of that nearly closed door? There was no sound of voices. She knew he was smoking, but no sound broke the stillness.

"Another turn of the wheel!" What could he have meant?

She laid her gloved hand against the door; silently it swung open to her touch.

At an old-fashioned, spindle-legged table sat her husband in a worn Morris chair. On the table was an old style, big bowled lamp with a green shade, although the electrics overhead lighted the room. He wore a shabby house coat, and frayed slippers; he smoked a well-colored pipe. A geranium and a heliotrope blossomed at the window; an old pointer dog lay curled on the gay rug at his feet. On the walls were old-time pictures, and on the table beside him was a picture of their one child, the boy who had died five years ago. How well she remembered scoffing at the shabby ensemble of what had been his mother's room, and declaring the house too small to store them longer. She had sold them to a dealer in old furniture; how did they come to be here?

The dog raised an inquiring nose. Quickly she closed the door and retreated through the dim offices, down the long hall, home.

She knew now where Tracy spent his evenings, but "Another turn of the wheel?" In a flash came the answer: "That separates your life and mine."

For long hours she sought the solution to the problem. How she detested the old, worn-out furniture that meant so much to him; how he detested the pomp and glitter she loved.

She shivered at the thought of long evenings spent in silent contemplation of each other and a book; he loathed the gay parties and theaters, the dinners and dances that made life worth living for her. Worth living! Was life worth living if Tracy's life were separated from hers. "The turn of the wheel!" He realized then that they were drifting apart. Why, drifting apart—she and Tracy? Losing Tracy! It would be like losing the rudder of her life boat. Society was fun, great fun, but Tracy was everything. She could look out at the world with Tracy, but without him? A feeling of fear stole over her. Oh, it must not be; Tracy must not drift away from her. "The turn of the wheel?" Well, usually a wheel could turn both ways.

Two weeks later Tracy Dent returned to the city from a business trip into the far West. He missed the thrill of expectation as he neared home. He had not wired the hour of his arrival; what was the use? Probably Marcia was receiving or being received. Involuntarily he sighed.

He did not hasten home. He went to his office first, and, business attended to, started to enter the room beyond. But no; he would come back in the evening. He would tell old John to bring the dog over as usual. This was the only real home he had; his warmest welcome would be from his old pointer dog. He had little aside from the bills to remind him that he was not still a bachelor. Still, there was the picture of the boy, and his memory. He wondered if the boy had lived——

"I have been doing a little refurnishing while you were away, Tracy. Come and see the result."

Tracy looked up questioningly. There was an odd little catch in Marcia's voice, a—why it almost seemed as though she was embarrassed. Perhaps the bills were unusually high. Never mind. Let her have her gewgaws. It was only another turn of the wheel. Still, he tried to be bright and interested as he followed her down the long hall.

It was one of those good, old-fashioned houses, built when there was still room for living, and rich in its old mahogany doors and casements. Modern art had done its best to smother the grand old lines of plenty; hand carving smiled grimly at brocade and delicate satins and generously lent a dignified richness to their daintiness.

Back of the great drawing-room in front, were double parlors, separated by sliding mahogany doors. When these were opened the two rooms were almost one; each communicated with the hall. Through the first, where her desk and books, her favorite chair and sewing table were, the long, low couch on which she rested, all the intimate, loved things of a woman's living-room, she led him to the room beyond.

There was an old-fashioned, spindle-legged table, and a worn Morris chair. On the table stood an old style, big-bowled lamp with a green shade. Against the wall was a gay, tapestry couch; at the window bloomed a geranium and a heliotrope. Over the chairback lay a shabby house coat. An old pointer dog lay curled on the gay rug, his nose resting on his master's frayed slippers. From the mantel the face of their boy looked down.

Tracy looked, and gave a long, low, pleased whistle. It was his dear, old-time way of greeting her surprises. The dog rose slowly, and rubbed against his knee.

"It is the last turn of the wheel, Tracy, the very last turn. I couldn't stand it—to— I——"

Tracy's arms opened wide.

"There, there, little girl. Don't you mind, dearie. It's all right. I didn't stand it very well myself."

"It seemed like running away from everything I had to hold on to, Tracy, when I found how much you cared."

Both hands had a firm hold on his coat lapels, and a very sweet, earnest face looked into his.

He stooped to kiss it before he replied, holding her close to his heart:

"But you have run back to me, Marcia, dear wife. You ran back so hard that you have bumped right into my heart to stay."

Oh, the comfort of his strong arms!

"To think Tracy, that I nearly gave up the very best thing life ever gave me for such trivial amusement. I know now that I was not happy, only excited. But, darling, I am excited now. I've got you back! Oh, Tracy, I've got my husband back!"

He gathered her up in his strong, loving arms, and together they sat in the worn Morris chair. Her arm lay around his neck against the shabby house coat. The old dog lay content at their feet. The face of their boy looked happily down from its silver frame.

The last turn of the wheel had brought them home and love—the supreme good.

SEVEN GOOD STORIES

all complete in

Mid-Summer Short-Story COMFORT

will make our August number an intellectual treat to all who appreciate and enjoy good, bright, clean fiction that touches the heart, stirs the emotions and lifts the thoughts and aspirations out of the dull routine of humdrum life.

August Stories

"AL FRESCO,—A Mid-Summer Night Fantasy," written in Joseph F. Novak's best style, carries the reader through a wild flight of imagination to the surprising consequences of the hero's airy dance with the mysterious "Moon Lady." With startling title page illustration.

"HER MOMENT." In every life there is a supreme moment on the turn of which hangs destiny. This thrilling story tells the rash adventure by which a girl, who had scorned hers, retrieved herself in the eyes of her lover.

"THE FATE OF THE FLEUR-DE-LIS," a pretty story that tells the hard struggle of the ambitious girl who had her own way to make and the remarkable incident that shaped her career.

"BETTER THAN A FAIRY," a human interest story founded on mother love that goes to the heart of the reader.

"HER VACATION AMUSEMENT" tells the havoc of hearts wrought by the city girl who flirted for her amusement during her summer vacation in the country.

"THE WHITE ROSE," a charming little romance that tells how Cupid handled a delicate and difficult situation through the language of flowers.

"ROSEMARY," the forlorn little cherub whose search for heaven discovered an earthly paradise with a flesh-and-blood angel in it that needed only love for her glorification.

The Useful Eucalyptus

By C. B. Irvine

ALTHOUGH there are approximately 2000 varieties of eucalyptus trees, the endeavor to grow them with profit on a commercial scale has not proven a very great success in California. The trees do well there and adapt themselves to various altitudes and all manner of climate, from sea level to altitudes that experience frost during every month of the year. For purposes of fuel it pays to raise them on cheap land that is unsuited to other crops, but the failure of the eucalyptus boom which was so vigorously promoted three or four years ago is read in the rapidity with which one eucalyptus colony crowds another over the wall of financial difficulty. In a comprehensive bulletin the State Agricultural college of California sounded a warning note when the promoting corporations first became busy and promised immense profits. This note gave assurance that growing eucalyptus on a commercial scale had passed the experimental stage and would yield a satisfactory revenue, but it was insisted that the profits to be derived from eucalyptus in the future would be found in hard wood lumber for wagon work, farm and other implements, railroad, coach and house finishings, furniture, ties, telephone poles and bridge timbers.

Trees of this variety were planted in California as early as 1860, being first set out as a curiosity, but by reason of their rapid growth and as ornamental trees and for windbreaks the planting soon became general. The cost of cutting the trees into wood for use as fuel being about 50 per cent of the value of the fuel, it will be seen that the profit from this source is small, even though five-year-old trees may be relied upon to yield anywhere from 50 to 80 cords per acre.

The leaves and twigs of the tree, when distilled, produce an oil which has great medicinal properties and is used quite extensively. This oil, a non-irritant antiseptic, can be used externally or internally without the slightest injury.

Eucalyptus, a genus of trees of the myrtaceæ family, was introduced into California from Australia and its rapidity of growth and thrift and hardiness under conditions unfavorable to most cultivated plants convinced timber economists to look upon it as a future source of hardwood timber supply.

The blossoms are much frequented by bees and are rated as being splendid yielders of nectar. The seed pods, strung on stout twine, are much used in the construction of unique portieres.

Thrift and the Movies

"The American people dislike to be told that they are not thrifty; but they are in the extreme. They know how to make money, but they do not know how to spend it or to save it."—L. P. Behrens, President California Bankers' Association.

The moving-picture theater is to be used as an agency to direct thought toward thrift.

As part of its campaign of education to offset extravagance and inculcate the more sensible ideas of thrift, the Savings Bank Section of the American Bankers Association has adopted a two-reel moving picture film, the story for which was written under the direction of the association.

The film is called "The Reward of Thrift," and is a product of the Vitagraph Company of America. It cost several thousand dollars to create.

The play portrays the fortunes of a thrifty structural iron worker and his wife and little daughter, and how thrift during prosperity tides over adversity. There is a "bad man," too, who is finally converted to thrift by the hero, despite the fact this man once attempted the hero's life.

Actual scenes of work on a steel framed skyscraper and in caissons under compressed air are shown, as well as actual scenes in the school savings bank, the real savings bank, where a forger is arrested by means of the finger print method of identification, and the Building and Loan association, all presented in a dramatic setting which grips the attention and leaves the desired impression.

Do not fail to see "The Reward of Thrift" when it is presented in any motion picture theater in your neighborhood. It will interest you and benefit you immensely.

If you are a parent, take your son and your daughter to see this strong object lesson which is just what the rising generation needs in these times.

T. D. MACGREGOR.

EDITORIAL

THOUGHTS THAT BREATHE AND WORDS THAT BURN

"Made in U. S. A."

WHEN celebrating this, the one hundred and thirty-ninth anniversary of the political independence of the United States, let us bear in mind that our country, great as it has grown, has never attained industrial independence and is still wofully distant from that goal, as has been demonstrated to our cost by the conditions suddenly thrust upon us by the present European war.

Although our country possesses the greatest natural resources in the world and has become one of the largest manufacturing nations and an extensive exporter of manufactures, our industrial and commercial development has been so specialized that we are absolutely dependent on foreign lands for very many necessary raw materials and finished products which we could and should produce for ourselves.

With the report of the opening shot last summer the prices of foreign-made goods in our markets jumped, some a hundred and others two to five hundred per cent, in anticipation of the supply being curtailed or cut off by the havoc and turmoil incident to war. The list comprises drugs, necessary for medicinal purposes, and paints, oils, dyes, chemicals and a host of other materials indispensable to the operation of many of our important industries which have been embarrassed by the increased cost and now face a shortage of these commodities likely to cripple, or even suspend their activities.

For instance, American cotton, woolen and silk manufacturers depend on Europe for their dyes; the war has stopped importation and it is estimated that the present stock of dyes in this country will be exhausted by the first of August. The prospect of being able to run their mills beyond that date depends on the sudden ending of the war, of which there is no present indication, or on the success of the efforts of certain enterprising Americans who have recently undertaken to make dyes here.

Numerous other American industries are similarly, if not so acutely, handicapped by a shortage of material for the supply of which they rely on Europe.

The American manufacturers of cameras and optical goods have heretofore imported their lenses, but since the war has cut off the foreign supply they have been forced to begin making lenses here.

The losses to our industries and commerce through the practical embargo of the war have been severe, but they will be compensated many times over by the incalculable benefit that will accrue to the entire country in the immediate future and through all time by the establishment, under pressure of present necessity, of a legicn of new industries to make here the great variety of products for which we have hitherto depended on Europe and paid hundreds of millions of dollars annually to foreign labor and foreign capitalists.

These vast sums will be kept at home and paid to our own people instead of going abroad. The new industries will extend the field of employment for American labor and of investment for American capital, enlarge the home market for our agricultural and industrial products, stimulate trade and promote prosperity generally, and carry the nation a long way on the road to industrial and commercial independence which is essential to its welfare.

While seeking foreign markets for their wares American manufacturers should not forget that their home market is the largest and best in the world and must not be neglected in the smallest detail. Their best hope of successfully competing abroad depends on their ability to fully satisfy the demands of the home market. The finished product of one industry becomes the raw material of another, as we have instanced with dyes in the textile industry and lenses for making cameras and optical goods. Nearly every industry is dependent on one or more others for its raw material or for a market for its finished product; each is a link in an endless chain the breaking of which affects all more or less disastrously. So far as we are dependent on the products of foreign countries our industrial and commercial prosperity is precarious and subject to depressing influences beyond our control. It behooves our manufacturers to see to it that every article that possibly can shall be produced in the United States; and in this they should have the encouragement of the government and the help of the people.

"Made in U. S. A" is the slogan of a movement which has many followers and is growing rapidly. It means patronize home industry and keep the money that you spend in circulation in this country instead of sending it abroad through buying imported goods. Every man, woman and child in the United States should understand that it is a patriotic duty, as well as serving self interest, to help sustain this movement by always giving American-made goods the preference.

Dual Allegiance Incompatible with American Citizenship

THE hostile attitude of a large element of our foreign-born citizens toward our government, as manifested by their disloyal utterances relative to certain issues arising out of the European war, is a matter of such grave concern that it has called forth a public rebuke from President Wilson. He reminded them that, having voluntarily become American citizens, they owe allegiance to the United States even as against the interests of their native countries.

Allegiance is the obligation of fidelity and obedience that an individual owes his government, in return for the protection he receives. Allegiance goes with citizenship. The laws of the United States do not permit dual citizenship or dual allegiance; a person who claims citizenship in any other country or acknowledges allegience to any other government cannot at the same time be a citizen of the United States. By our naturalization law immigrants from foreign lands who come to this country to remain as permanent residents, after residing here a certain length of time, are permitted to become American citizens, but as a part of the naturalization proceedings they have to go into court and take a solemn oath of allegiance to the United States and swear that they forever renounce all allegiance, duty and obligation to every other government and especially renounce their allegiance to the government of their native land.

Recent developments have disclosed the astonishing and alarming fact that, despite the obligation of their oaths, many naturalized citizens who came from certain of the countries now engaged in war, while remaining here and claiming and exercising the rights of American citizenship make open boast of their allegiance to their native country and are disloyal to our government with respect to its efforts to protect its rights and those of our citizens.

This goes to show, what COMFORT has often asserted, that our immigration and naturalization laws are too lax and need to be reformed so to exclude undersirable aliens not only from citizenship but also from the country. We have no prejudice against foreigners as foreigners or as naturalized citizens; many of our best citizens are foreign-born; it is only the undesirables that we object to. We have too many native-born undesirables, but we cannot get rid of them; they are an unavoidable evil, here to stay, which makes it the more imperative to take care that that element shall not be increased by troublesome accessions from abroad.

We welcome the sober, industrious European emigrant seeking a home in America with the honest intention of remaining here permanently and becoming a loyal American citizen, and we want no other kind. We object to the admission into this country of Chinese, Japanese and other Asiatics because their civilization and racial characteristics are so different from those of our people that they do not mix well with us, but continuing their own peculiar ways of life, remain always a strange people with strange gods, and disdaining our institutions, they set up laws of their own in defiance of our laws, and lastly they always preserve their allegiance to the land of their birth, which is enough to prove them hopelessly unfit material for American citizenship.

On the same principle even the most highly civilized and intelligent emigrant from Europe, if he comes here with the intention of remaining an alien among us, selfishly absorbing what he can from the advantages which our country affords without identifying himself with its destiny, is undesirable, and worse yet if he also takes on American citizenship to exercise its privileges unpatriotically for his personal benefit or in the interest of his native country to which he still gives his allegiance in violation of his oath and duty as a citizen.

No country can safely tolerate among its population, much less among its citizens, any considerable element whose allegiance is doubtful or whose loyalty cannot be depended on under all circumstances and in every crisis.

Of our population thirteen millions were born in Europe, most of them in the ten countries now engaged in the great war which our government is trying to keep out of by maintaining a strictly neutral course. If all these people were as disloyal to the United States and as partizan in their speech and activities in favor of the interests of the countries from which they emigrated as some are, we should have bitter strife and turmoil at home and could hardly avoid being drawn into the awful conflict that is devastating Europe.

We expect our foreign-born citizens to cherish an affection for the land of their birth and to be properly interested in its welfare, but as they have left voluntarily and come here to enjoy the better conditions that prevail in America they must recognize that, for their own good as well as for the general welfare, they owe undivided allegiance and loyalty to the land of their adoption—our country which is also theirs.

Cause of Secretary of State Bryan's Sudden Resignation

THE unexpected announcement, on June eighth, of the sudden resignation of Secretary of State Bryan aroused world-wide interest because of the great question of foreign policy that caused his withdrawal from the Cabinet.

It resulted from a disagreement between Mr. Bryan and President Wilson as to the terms of the diplomatic note which our government was preparing to send to the German government demanding indemnity for the destruction of the lives of more than a hundred American citizens through the persistent sinking, by German submarines, of merchant ships of the United States and other nations while engaged in peaceful commerce on the high seas.

Stated briefly, the point of difference was that Mr. Bryan insisted on the adoption of his peace-at-any-price policy, even at the sacrifice of our national honor, while the President and the other members of the Cabinet stood firm for peace with honor and the rights of our government and protection of the lives of our peaceful citizens.

It would require a large volume to detail the development of the situation but this is the sum and essential substance of it.

Last February, in reply to Germany's proclamation that ships of commerce traversing any part of a large expanse of ocean surrounding the British isles would be subject to attack by German submarine torpedo boats, our government protested against such threatened action as an inhuman, unlawful and unprecedented method of warfare, and gave notice that if the practise should result in the destruction of the lives or property of American citizens the German government would be held responsible and the United States would take such action as might be necessary to protect the rights of our citizens on the seas.

Since then the German submarines have made a practise of sinking the peaceful ships of all nations indiscriminately, including the United States; whereby more than a hundred American citizens, including many women and children, have been wantonly and cruelly killed within the last few weeks. President Wilson and the rest of his Cabinet insisted on sending the German government a polite but firm demand for payment of indemnity for this, and for a guarantee that the practise would not be repeated. This was the demand to which Mr. Bryan objected on the ground that, although it contained no threat or hint of war, he feared it might possibly lead to war, and therefore he resigned. Mr. Bryan agrees with President Wilson that Germany's action in this matter has been inhuman and cannot be justified; he agrees that our government is right in its claims, but objects to demanding our rights for fear it may possibly lead to war.

The press and the people in all sections are almost unamimous in their expression of enthusiastic approval of the President's course in this matter.

The course that Mr. Bryan urged quite likely might lead to war, for it would permit Germany to continue the inhuman slaughter of innocent American citizens until our people would rise and force our government to declare war, as they did when the Maine was blown up.

The firm stand of the President sustained by a solid Cabinet and a united people will convince Germany that it is unwise to go too far in violating the rights of our government and its citizens—and so we shall have peace with honor, and our rights respected.

Teutons' Faith in An Old Legend

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

Out of the past comes a legend a thousand years old to claim the attention of the Germans throughout the world.

The tradition, devoutly believed by the German peasantry, and respected by all Teutons, had its inception after the death of the emperor Frederick Barbarossa in the holy land.

It is truly felt that now in Germany's great need, Barbarossa, by many considered the greatest military ruler the Germans ever had, will rise from his tomb in some fabled castle in the Black Forest and lead them out of their difficulties.

Frederick Barbarossa was the son of Frederick, Duke of Suabia and was born in 1121. On the death of his uncle, Conrad III, Frederick was crowned at Aixla-Chapelle. His earliest dream was the subjugation of Italy and so shortly after receiving the imperial crown, he began the invasion of that country. To more fully impress the people of his successes he had himself crowned at Pavia in 1155, with the famous iron crown of Lombardy. Then pressing on to Rome he had himself crowned again by Pope Adrian IV.

Thus, early in his reign he had gone far toward reducing the provinces of Italy. But no sooner had he returned to Germany, than the people began to revolt, so Frederick hurried back to subdue them afresh. But pestilence came, and taking advantage of Barbarossa's weakened army, he was driven north of the Danube. But recruiting another army, Barbarossa again invaded Italy, meeting however, with great defeat.

Then came the turn in his life. Repentant for so much that he had done against the papal seat, Barbarossa took the cross and raising an army of 150,000 paladins, set out for the Holy Land. Meeting the Grecian emperor, he overcame him in a great battle.

Then he met the king of Syria and overcame him.

Then he succeeded in subduing numerous wild tribes until his followers felt confident that having won so far into Palestine, it would be possible to take the Holy City itself from the Saracens.

Barbarossa was now in the land of Alexander the Great, and the people were greatly incensed at the successes of the invader, so that he was obliged to fight very hard to hold his position.

On the banks of a rushing river, the Kaltkadnus in Syria, he met the enemy in a terrible battle and while trying to ford the river, he pressed his charger into the flood and attempted to swim but the current was too swift and Barbarossa, now an old man, was drowned.

His fame had now become so great that the people declined to believe the report of his death. Pilgrims returning to the fatherland told of it, but still the people refused to believe. The more reliable reports of his death brought by men who fought with him were disbelieved, for it seemed impossible that so great a ruler could be gone. Famed throughout the dominion for his justice to the common people he was their beloved emperor. So, out of their devotion to their idol, they formed the basis of the legend which has been handed down from one generation to another.

Barbarossa was not dead, but sleeping, they said. Weary of conquering, he had retired to a secret castle in the Black Forest of Silesia, and had laid himself down on a catafalque, which night and day, year in and year out, century in and century out, was to be guarded by dwarfs and elves. There he was to rest until the hour of Germany's greatest need should arrive. Then at a touch from the wand of the king of elves, Barbarossa would rise and sally forth at the head of a ghostly troop to lead the Germans to the greatest victory of their history and to enduring liberty and national supremacy.

The first sign of his coming would be the glow of his flaming red beard over the land, they said.

Those of the German people who have a strain of Slavic blood in their veins have the strongest faith in this legend. The peasantry of Austria and Hungary believe the tradition implicitly and attribute to Barbarossa all the weird wisdom that only a Slavic people can conceive.

It is said that the more ignorant peasantry look for the coming of Barbarossa in person, but the more enlightened, will see in any great Military leader who may lead the armies of the empire to successful victories, the reincarnation of their warrior idol, Frederick Barbarossa.

Spies

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

DURING recent years, while Europe was becoming an armed camp the suspicion of spies has been constantly increasing and justly so. Now that the present terrible warfare is going on the countries of Europe have the greatest fear of spies,—for at the present time Europe is spy crazy. Everyone is suspicioned or suspicious.

It is decidedly dangerous even to look like a spy, act like a spy, or be unable to prove that you are not a spy.

A man who is in a position to give information concerning guns and trenches, the weakness or strength of an enemy is considered a most valuable asset.

A spy is a most dangerous person. But the most useful type of all spies is the international courtesan, whose achievements will never be known. These are a curious, cosmopolitan company, displaying no national idiosyncrasy, and it would be difficult for an observer to ascribe to them any particular abiding place. They will appear everywhere, expensively gowned and accompanied by people of recognized social position.

Then there is the humbler spy who gathers information wherever and whenever he can, people in the more obscure walks of life, hair dressers, waiters, maids and as an instance a governess from Germany who had lived fourteen years in an official English family, the fact only having been disclosed recently that she was a spy, working there solely for valuable information.

"The great Frederick is reported to have said," I have one cook and a hundred spies."

It is a very real and a very grave situation. For years swams of international spies, among them famous actresses and men of repute, have been in the pay of European powers.

If in London, Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Petrograd, or Brussels one has no assurance but that the handsomely gowned woman who sits near in the theater or the striking looking man one meets in the hotels or on the street is not a spy.

New York City is said to be filled today with spies and secret agents of the warring nations. Several attempts more or less successful, have been made to steal valuable documents from diplomats, papers they were known to have. It is said that probably not a single member of the consulate staffs of Great Britain, France, Russia, or Germany in New York goes anywhere without a shadow on his or her trail. Women secret agents are used a great deal in New York.

A number of attempts were made by women to obtain places as nurses on board the Red Cross ships as volunteers, who were really spies.

A week before Japan declared war upon Germany there were approximately 6500 Japanese scattered about the German empire—scattered about as they are in the universities and workshops of our own United States today. The day on which Japan issued its ultimatum there were not seventy-five Japanese in the whole of Germany. Some significant word had passed between them, gone from school to school and from workshop to workshop and the Japanese had vanished from Germany, the Germans know not how. How many of these people were acting in the capacity of spies, who knows?

The city of Brussels is now carefully watched by spies. Some estimates place the number at 5000. No one is allowed to ride a bicycle for it has been discovered that the riders, after leaving the city, give information to the enemy.

Recent information is to the effect that two enlisted men in Kitchener's new army, stationed at Codford, have been proved to be German spies, and have been "dealt with" by the military authorities. Copies of letters relating to the movements, and proposed movements of troops were found in their possession.

At Bethlehem, Pa., where an order for war materials, amounting to $50,000,000, is being filled, the Bethlehem Steel Company has organized a strict guard about all the sections of its plant to guard against any possibility of spies or others entering the mills or tampering with the machinery.

Building up Capital

"By thrift is meant simply that way of living which systematically transfers a portion of one's income to one's capital. It is not inconsistent with generosity; it is not a synonym of niggardliness."—Dr. Shailer Mathews.

A Pennsylvania girl has won the prize that the American Society for Thrift recently offered for the best definition of Thrift. "Thrift," she wrote, "is management of your affairs in such a manner that the value of your possessions is constantly being increased."

The girl has come pretty close to hitting the nail on the head, and in simple language she has told the secret of how to create personal capital.

This would be a discouraging world for the man compelled to start life without financial resources if it were not possible for him to create capital for himself.

Every man has the glorious privilege of work, and not the least of the rewards of labor is the satisfaction of producing something, and turning part of one's earnings into capital.

Don't misunderstand the meaning of the word capital. It isn't necessarily a big sum acquired at one stroke of fortune. in most cases it is the big aggregate of little sums, saved by slow degrees.

Money begets money, but those without it sometimes complain against those who have it, forgetting that every great fortune was born of hardship and sacrifice on the part of the present possessor or somebody not very far back.

Such persons also seem to overlook the fact that by hard work and thrift they themselves can build up the nucleus of a fortune and put themselves in a position to enjoy the earning power of money.

Will you be able to live on your savings when you reach the time of life when you ought to retire from active work?

Do you realize what you must do now to be able, later on, to live on your capital? For the average man the only way to reach that happy state is to save systematically a portion of his income week by week or month by month.

Banks exist for the express purpose of helping people save and care for their money.

T. D. MacGregor.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to print letters requesting patterns, quilt pieces, etc., for the purpose of, or with the expectation of receiving the equivalent in return, for this is not an exchange column.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, Care COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

THE well-dressed woman is not always the one who has a well-filled pocketbook and wardrobe at her command, but in nine cases out of ten, the woman who is limited to a certain amount of money but who spends that judiciously and takes care of her clothes. Therein lies the whole secret. The most expensive suit will look shabby and ordinary if not taken care of. This applies to our every-day suits and dresses which should be shaken, preferably in the open air, and brushed before hanging up. The coat should be placed on a coat hanger before being brushed as the weight is then properly distributed and the coat is not stretched out of proportion. Brush the skirt by holding it by the waist and brushing down in long strokes.

Hats should always be thoroughly brushed before being put away, not forgetting the ribbon and flowers.

Perhaps of most importance, and certainly what is most quickly noticed, is the care or lack of care given shoes. The effect of an otherwise perfect costume is spoiled by neglected footwear. Lasting-trees are not as expensive as at one time and should be regarded as a necessity rather than a luxury for a shoe that is properly "treed" will wear a longer time and look better than one that is not.

The woman who pays attention to detail, makes bags of muslin, or similar material, large enough to slip over a hanger and hold light colored dresses that would otherwise fade or become soiled.

There are many other ideas that will suggest themselves to the woman who wants to look her best—and who does not?—and she will benefit the other sisters by sending them in.—Ed.

CAMDEN, TENN.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for many years and have always enjoyed the Sisters' Corner most of all, although I read it from cover to cover and think it all good.

If the majority of voters had the high ideals and good principles that Mr. Gannett and Uncle Charlie possess, we would have better times, in various ways all over our United States.

We all love Uncle Charlie for the sunshine and happiness he brings to the poor shut-ins. He is always pleading for help for poor helpless people, when he never asks, or expects anything for himself, and I doubt if anyone suffers more than he does.

I suggest that COMFORT sisters give him a "silver shower" on his birthday, which comes Sept. 25, to show him our appreciation of his noble, unselfish work. How glad we would all be to know he had received as much as some of the shut-ins do. I am sure he would tell us all about it in COMFORT. Don't forget it please.

This is my first visit among COMFORT sisters and I hope I will receive a welcome and can give some helps that will benefit someone.

I am a farmer's wife and have lived on the farm all my life. I am sure I could not be contented in the city, with no fruit garden or chickens. I like to gather my own fresh vegetables and fruit and store away a good supply for winter use and have chickens and fresh eggs to use the year round without a cent of cost and always have some to sell which keeps us farmers' wives in pin money. I am sixty-two years "young" and was married when I was but fifteen. I have two girls and one boy, all married and in homes of their own and each one has just one child and they are all girls. One granddaughter is married and she has one girl.

Farming is the chief industry here. This is a poor man's country. Land is cheap and a great deal of it is worn out, but industrious people who practise economy can always have plenty.

Visitors who come here from the wealthier states, say we have more good things to eat than they do but they can't see where it comes from.

Now comes my appeal. My mother is eighty-five years of age and is very feeble. She lives with her youngest son and his wife and they live in the country with but few near neighbors, consequently she gets very lonely. She has not been away from home in several years. Now, for a surprise on her birthday, which comes August 20th, I want to ask the COMFORT band of readers to give her a card and letter shower on that day. There is nothing that would give her more pleasure than to receive a lot of bright, cheerful letters and cards from far and near. She has a number of relatives scattered over several different states whom she has not heard from in years. Should any of them chance to see this please write to her. Her address is Mrs. Lydia Presson, Camden, R. R. 2, Tenn. All her relatives who can will be at her home on her birthday and give her a birthday dinner and in the afternoon we intend to have her photograph taken with my oldest daughter and her daughter and granddaughter and myself, so you see there will be five generations in the picture and all grown and married but one—the little great great granddaughter. Mother reared a family of six children, all boys except myself and I am the only one who can visit her often. I live within two miles of her and try to go to see her every week. She has been a member of the M. E. church since she was a young girl.

With love to all,

MRS. N. A. MCKELVEY, Camden, R. R. 1, Tenn.

Mrs. McKelvey. Your suggestion of a "silver shower" for Uncle Charlie on his birthday voices the sentiments of many COMFORT readers. Each summer Mr. Gannett receives numerous letters urging him to request, through COMFORT, contributions for a birthday present to Uncle Charlie. Mr. Gannett rejects all such proposals, because Uncle Charlie asks nothing for himself except what he earns by the work of his brain and pen and from the sale of his books, and will not permit anybody to solicit donations for him. However, very many of his admiring friends write him

Comfort's Sisters' Recipes

WASHINGTON CREAM PIE.—Two tablespoons butter, one egg, one cup milk, one half teaspoon vanilla, one cup sugar, one and one half cups flour, two teaspoons baking powder. Cream butter and sugar, add egg unbeaten; mix well and beat; add milk and flour alternately. Bake in two layers.

FILLING.—One cup milk, one half cup sugar, one egg, one tablespoon flour moistened in a little milk. Heat milk in a double boiler, add flour; beat sugar and egg until light and add. Mix well and cook fifteen minutes. Cool and spread between layers.

MRS. CHARLES E. PARKS, Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y.

BLACKBERRIES AND CREAM.—Simmer together a pint of ripe blackberries and a pint of water. Do not stir. The berries should be tender in ten minutes. Mix four tablespoons of corn-starch with a little cold water and stir in carefully, being careful not to break the fruit; add one half cup sugar and when cool pour into a glass dish. Serve ice cold with whipped cream. This is an economical dessert and pleasing to the eye as well as taste.

GINGER PUDDING.—One cup sugar, one cup flour, one cup suet, one tablespoon ground ginger, and a pinch of salt. Mix all together dry. Boil or steam two hours. Could double this recipe if desired and cook three hours. Serve with maple syrup or any other syrup liked. Cover tight when cooking. Good tin pail serves the purpose.

HOME-MADE BREAD PUDDINGS.—Grate stale bread, after drying it thoroughly. To three tablespoons of the crumbs, add one pint of cold milk, three eggs beaten with four tablespoons of sugar, two tablespoons of cocoanut, one half teaspoon of vanilla. Soak ten minutes, then fill cups nearly full, stand in a pan of boiling water and set in a moderate oven until the pudding is firm in the center. Five minutes before removing draw the pan toward the front of the oven and spread grated sweet chocolate over the tops; then leave in the oven until the chocolate melts. Let the puddings become cool, but not cold, before serving.

MISS E. CARTER, 442 Franklin Ave., Brooklyn, N. Y.

BAKED BANANA.—Peal the bananas, cut lengthwise into halves, place in a baking pan, sprinkle with sugar and lemon juice and bake in a hot oven ten minutes.—Ed.

CREAM PIE.—Dissolve one heaping tablespoon of corn-starch in a little cold milk, and add to one pint of boiling milk. Beat together one egg, pinch of salt, two tablespoons sugar, and stir into the boiling milk; take the milk off the stove and, stirring briskly, place on the stove again, and let boil until thick and smooth. Flavor as desired. When cold pour into a crust which has been baked in a deep tin. Use only one crust. This is a cheap and good pie.

MRS. JOHN BRYANT, Bluefield, W. Va.

BERRY DESSERT.—Make a rich biscuit dough of two cups flour, four teaspoons baking powder, one cup sour milk, pinch soda, one half cup sugar, half cup butter, one and one half cup berries, any kind. Dough should be quite soft. Bake in muffin tins and serve with whipped egg and cream for sauce, flavored if desired.

EGGS SURPRISE.—Take out the peaches from a can and add to one pint of the peach syrup, the juice of one lemon and one half cup sugar, heat; dissolve two level tablespoons gelatine in one half cup cold water and turn into the hot juice, stirring until dissolved. Take out one half cup and cool remainder. Beat whites of three eggs until quite stiff, and when the syrup begins to thicken, beat it into the whites until thick; place by spoonfuls into cold dishes and a half peach, pit side down, on each, set away to cool until wanted.

PINEAPPLE PIE.—Beat one half cup butter, one cup sugar and yolks of three eggs to a cream, and add one can crushed pineapple. Dissolve one tablespoon of corn-starch in cup sweet cream and add to pineapple. Mix thoroughly. Beat the whites of the eggs until stiff and fold in lightly. Bake with bottom crust only in moderate oven. MRS. MAGGIE WINSOR, Lakeland, Kans.

VANILLA BLANC-MANGE.—Six tablespoons corn-starch, three quarters cup granulated sugar, one quart milk, two eggs, one half teaspoon vanilla. Moisten corn-starch in eight tablespoons of milk; scald the remainder and cook fifteen minutes. Beat sugar and eggs together until light and add; cook two minutes, take from fire and add vanilla. Pour in to mold and cool. Serve ice cold with cream.

BAKED TAPIOCA CUSTARD.—Soak two thirds of a cup of tapico in one cup of milk for one hour. Scald the remainder of one quart of milk and add moistened tapioca. Cook twenty minutes. Add one teaspoon of butter, a pinch of salt, and one egg beaten well, with one half cup of sugar. Bake with custard sauce or with cream. Flavor with vanilla or nutmeg.

MRS. CHARLES E. PARKS, Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y.

SWEETHEART PUDDING.—One small can peaches, butter size of egg, one cup flour, one half cup sugar, orange extract, one half cup milk. Cream butter and sugar, add well-beaten egg, milk, and mix well. Then add flour and extract to suit taste; beat until smooth. Pour over peaches sliced, and mix well. Bake in moderate oven about one hour. Serve with whipped cream.

MARY REYNOLDS, Corsackie, N. Y.

SUBSTITUTE FOR WHIPPED CREAM.—In hot weather when cream is so hard to save, you will find marshmallow whip an inexpensive and tempting substitute. Beat the white of one egg and half cup of sugar lightly together, then add one grated apple and vanilla flavoring. Whip until light and feathery. Serve on fruit, gelatine, or cake the same as the whipped cream.

ETHEL H. LATOURETTE, White House Station, N. J.

FRESH FRUIT BREAKFAST LOAF.—Cut two large oranges, three bananas and two apples into small pieces, as for salad. Make a dressing of yolks of two eggs, one teaspoon of sugar, one teaspoon of flour, butter size of an egg, and one tablespoon of orange juice; mix these ingredients together until smooth, then add one half cup of water; boil until thickness of cream. When cool add to fruit, also whites of eggs, which have been beaten stiff, and to which has been added two tablespoons of sugar; then add sufficient flour into which two teaspoons of baking powder has been added to make a very thick mixture; bake (original.)

MRS. CHARLES TAGGS, Beatty, Nev.

FRUIT PUNCH.—Boil three cups each of sugar and water together five minutes. Cool. Add a small pineapple, grated, to two cups of water and boil twenty minutes. Strain and add the juice of six oranges and four lemons, a cup of fresh tea and sugar syrup, a cup of strawberry or any fruit juice and enough water to make a gallon. Serve ice cold.

BELLE CHADBOURNE, Augusta, Maine.

POLISH RAISED FRITTERS.—Two pounds flour, one cake compressed yeast, one large cup sugar, two well-beaten eggs, two tablespoons butter or lard, one and one quarter pints lukewarm milk, a little salt. Beat briskly several minutes. Raise to double bulk. Form in balls size of an egg. Let it rise fifteen to twenty minutes, on floured board in warm room. Drop in smoking hot fat, as for doughnuts. Brown well, turning once. Roll in powdered or granulated sugar. These may be varied by adding fillings of chopped dates, figs, apples, bananas, nuts or raisins, citron or preserves. The filling should be added before the last raising.

MRS. GRIFFITH RYAN, Los Angeles, Cal.

MEXICAN CHILLI.—One quart lean beef, cut into bits. Cover with cold water, let come to a boil and skim. Then add three tablespoons of chilli powder, one small onion, chopped fine, and one cup of lard. Salt to taste. Put into granite kettle and cook slowly till done. Serve while hot.

HOT TAMALES.—Cook three pounds of beef, use about one third fat; when done run through a food chopper with one small onion, then add enough chilli powder to make your meat a light red, and mix good with spoon, adding salt. Scald one pint corn meal with the meat broth, salting your dough, cut the shocks at each end and scald with hot water and spread meal on half of butt end little thicker than knife blade. Place the roll of meat on the meal and seal up, folding shock back. Place bowl in stew bucket. Bottom side up and stand tamales around it and boil slowly two hours.

CANNED SWEET POTATOES.—In canning sweet potatoes prepare a rich syrup of sugar and water in a kettle; in another kettle boil the potatoes till tender, after first peeling them. Take out, slice any size. Put in tin cans and pour the sugar syrup over them and seal.

LILA MCALISTER, Stephenville, Texas.

NAVY BEAN CROQUETTES.—One cup cold navy beans, mashed fine. Season with salt and pepper; add small onion, two eggs, cracker crumbs or flour to thicken, and fry in cakes.

PEA SALAD.—Drain one can of peas, two cups shredded cabbage, one half pound cream cheese, chopped, one half cup chopped nuts; mix with mayonnaise dressing. Salt and pepper to taste. MRS. LIZZIE LAWLEY.

FRIED TURNIPS.—Slice the same as you would potatoes and use the same amount of fat as you would to fry potatoes; put the turnips in the fat, sprinkle with sugar, salt and pepper and pour water on them, just enough to keep them steaming until done; then let fry dry and brown a little.

EMMA RUFF, Goose Bill, Mont.

CHICKEN LOAF WITH PEAS.—Dissolve a teaspoon of gelatine in a cup of chicken stock. When the mixture begins to set, beat until frothy and add three quarters of a cup of heavy cream, which has been beaten stiff, then add a cup and a half of chicken cut in dice. Season with pepper and salt and put into a pan with a large funnel. When molded, turn out on a platter lined with lettuce leaves and fill the center with seasoned, cooked peas. Serve with salad dressing.

CHICKEN LOAF WITH PEAS.

BELLE CHADBOURNE, Augusta, Maine.

RICE AND APPLE PUDDING.—Two cups hot boiled rice, five peeled, sliced apples, one cup raisins. Mix in a baking dish, add a little water or milk and bake about twenty minutes.

MOLASSES RICE PUDDING.—Two cups cooked rice, two cups milk, one half teaspoon salt, one third cup molasses, mix ingredients; pour into buttered dish and bake about fifteen minutes in slow oven.

MRS. ARY E. DAY, 1858 W. Chicago Ave., Chicago, Ill.

CARROT PUDDING.—One cup grated carrots, raw, one cup grated potato, raw, one cup raisins, one cup flour, butter size of an egg, two small teaspoons soda and one of baking powder, one spoon nutmeg and cinnamon. Steam three hours.

MRS. W. ROUX, Cloverdale, Cal.

BISCUIT PUDDING.—Pour enough hot water to cover twelve large biscuits and let stand until soft. Mash fine and add one cup sugar, one half cup butter, yolks of three eggs and flavor. Bake twenty minutes in a moderate oven. Dot the top with jelly and use the whites with one quarter cup sugar for icing.

MRS. C. H. WOODARD, Como, Tenn.

RASPBERRY WHIP.—Beat together with wire whisk, one cup of powdered sugar, white of one egg, one and one quarter cups raspberries for one half hour. Hollow out sponge cake and fill with above whip and decorate with whipped cream and whole raspberries.

MRS. BULAH ZIEGLER, Arnold, Kans.

STUFFED POTATOES.—Bake the potatoes, cut off a small piece at one end and scoop out the inside. Mix this with butter, a little grated cheese, pepper and salt and the yolk of one egg. Refill the skins, cover, and bake for ten minutes.

FLOATING ISLAND OF FRESH STRAWBERRIES.—Crush one pint of ripe strawberries and sweeten to taste. Beat the whites of four eggs to a stiff froth and gradually mix in half a cup of powdered sugar and sufficient of the strained juice from the berries to color and flavor; then beat again until the meringue will stand alone. Meanwhile prepare a boiled custard from one pint of milk, the yolks of the eggs, a pinch of salt and half a cup of sugar. Cook the custard over hot water until well thickened, do not let it boil, flavor with a little vanilla extract and when cool pour into a glass dish. Place carefully over the custard a layer of the crushed berries and drop the strawberry meringue or frosting in peaks on top of fruit. Place on ice to chill thoroughly before serving.

LILLIAN CARSTENS, Deep River, Conn.

FLAVORING EXTRACT. (Requested.)—Here is the way to make extract of orange: Take fresh orange peel, that which has just been removed from the fruit and clean off as much of the white inside of the peel as is possible, throwing away the scrapings of the white part; cut up the outer peel into very small pieces, about the size of a pea. Weigh out one ounce of these bits of peel, and put them into a bottle with four ounces of 95 per cent alcohol. Stopper the bottle tightly, and set the bottle by for a week, shaking it vigorously three or four times every day. At the end of seven days fit a piece of filter paper to a glass funnel. Get the paper and funnel at a drug-store, and ask the druggist to show you how to fit the paper to the funnel. Filter the contents of the bottle through the funnel, and the fluid that comes through will be a first-class extract of orange, much better and purer than you can get at the store. Don't use wood alcohol, but get the 95 per cent pure kind at the drug-store. Use four ounces of alcohol to each ounce of peel. Make Lemon Extract in the same way, using lemon peel, with the same proportions of peel and alcohol. And filter after a week but don't use the same bottle. Take one bottle for lemon and one bottle for orange. Label each bottle one for orange and one for lemon and so on. And use each bottle only for making its own kind of extract. Make Vanilla Extract in the same way, if you want a strong and pure extract, but vanilla costs at wholesale from three to six dollars a pound. But you can use more alcohol, say about six to one. Get the powdered bean. Pure extract of vanilla costs eight dollars a quart retail, twenty-five cents an ounce.

ECONOMICAL CAKE.—One cup sugar, one cup water, one cup raisins, one half cup lard, one quarter teaspoon grated nutmeg, one quarter teaspoon salt, one teaspoon cloves, one teaspoon cinnamon. Put these ingredients in a saucepan and boil together for three minutes. Let get cold, add two cups of flour into which has been sifted one half teaspoon of baking powder, also a teaspoon of soda dissolved in a little hot water; stir well and add one half cup of walnut meats. Bake in a loaf tin in a slow oven.

This Meal for 3c

Prepared by a Famous French Chef

A meal of Van Camp's will cost, on the average, about 3 cents per person. It is as nutritious as a meal of meat. And it is, if you wish, a complete meal in itself.

It comes to you ready, with the fresh oven flavor. Even the sauce is baked into it. Serve it hot or cold.

It is welcomed by all, and all will pronounce it the most likable dish of its kind.

Not Like Yours

Van Camp's isn't like your home-baked beans, or like other kinds you know. It's a delicacy, prepared by master chefs, baked in new-style ovens.

No beans are hard, none mushy, none crisp. All are whole and mellow.

It doesn't tax digestion. It gets hours of baking in a humid heat, impossible at home. And a wondrous sauce gives to every bean delicious tang and zest.

All the faults you know in old-time Pork and Beans are completely wiped out in Van Camp's.

VAN CAMP'S
PORK & BEANS BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

Also Baked Without the Sauce

10, 15 and 20 Cents Per Can

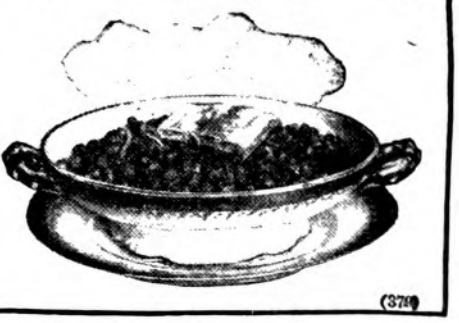
These are some things that Van Camp's has done:



It has made a homely dish a dainty. It has multiplied the use of Baked Beans. It has made them digestible.

To a million homes it has brought ready-cooked meals, ready for instant serving.

It has changed the meaning of Baked Beans. Our national dish in this form has a unique appeal.

Let it help you out this summer. It means less cooking, better meals, a likable, nutritious, inexpensive dish. You will serve it so often when you find it out that you'll buy it by the dozen. Try serving it tonight.

Buy a can of Van Camp's Beans to try. If you do not find them the best you ever ate, your grocer will refund your money.

THE ROLLING STONE

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

By Hapsburg Liebe

AT the gate he stopped, his fingers arrested in their movement with the latch, and looked haggardly toward the lamp that stood just beyond the curtains. It was his home, the home he hadn't seen for two very long months; still he dreaded to go in—to face the wife and baby with the intelligence that he had not only been unable to get work, but that he had walked many miles to save paying railroad fares. He was a bookkeeper, was Laramie Ford; he had the drifting habit; he was beginning to be a rolling stone, always searching for and never finding an ideal position. Already he was being looked upon by those who knew him as undependable. His one consolation now was that living in the village, Carterton, set in the foothills of the Smokies, did not cost so much, comparatively.

With a frown and a shake of his head, he opened the gate and walked slowly past the nodding touchmenots and coxcomb to the front door. His rap was answered immediately, for Angela knew his footstep. He kissed them both hungrily; his Angela, a slim, fair young woman with wonderfully patient eyes and lips; Toddles, his chubby girl baby, just learning to walk.

And as he entered the cozy sitting-room, he saw something that filled his face with pain. It was a sewing-machine. He looked from it to his wife.

Angela turned the lamp a bit higher, and forced a smile. "Mrs. Johnston didn't need it—the sewing-machine—and I borrowed it from her, Larry. Yes, I've been taking in sewing; and I've been making about two dollars a week since you left. You don't care, Larry?"

Ford couldn't say that he did, nor that he didn't. So, he told himself, he had taken this woman from a good, comfortable home, to put her at a machine, there to dull her sweet, violet eyes and grow stooped and unhandsome with toil. He——

"Toddles can talk, Larry," Angela was saying, proudly. "That is, she can say three words."

But Ford appeared not to hear. "This is a hard world, Angela," he blurted, still holding his crowing baby tightly. "It's all unfair. All—all unfair. I was let out of my place here, and old Elberts was kept; I with a family, and Elberts with none to support but himself. They said I was too—er, exacting; also that they feared I was not steady. Then, the people I've met while on the hunt for a place; they're all unfair. They wanted too many references; they even looked at me as if they were afraid I would carry away something. Angela, I almost wish I had been spared the trouble of living. I am angry at myself, angry at everything on earth but you. I wonder, Angela, if there is a straightout good man in the world!"

Angela tried to comfort him, to soothe him, to clarify his view of life, to make him see that life was a vastly interesting performance for all its hills and hollows. But Laramie Ford was bitter as gall. He was standing in his own light; he was a good man deep down; but he had misguided himself.

Late that night, Ford rose, lighted a lamp, and went to a little desk across the room from his bed. In his mind he had repeated over and over again the word "Incontestable." He drew from a large envelope his life insurance policy—it was incontestable, now. But—how could he do it? His fingers trembling, he replaced it, frowned, blew out the light, and felt his way back to bed, a very dangerous germ in his mind.

The next morning a thing in the papers caught his eye. It said that a notorious mountain outlaw, called "Red" Absalom Dew from his bright red hair and beard, was at large in the mountains not far from Carterton, and that the state would pay five hundred dollars for his capture, dead or alive. So Laramie Ford, in a fit of desperation, declared to himself that he would bring home the much needed five hundred dollars, or put himself in a place that would cause his wife to get five thousand, the amount of his life insurance policy.

Angela was not told the true mission that took her husband, armed with a repeating rifle and carrying a pair of handcuffs in a rear trousers pocket, into the fastnesses of the Smokies the next day. He was going out to look at some timber, he explained to Angela, with a view to obtaining an option on it and selling it at a profit when the timber markets opened again. This latter was really one object of his trip—he had made it an object in order to have an excuse for going into the mountains. Laramie Ford detested an outright lie.

Just before sundown Ford reached the top of Hemlock Ridge, a low mountain that runs parallel with the great Blackfern for several miles. There he turned northward, and began to pick his way along the rugged crest, making little speed because of the many stones and boulders and thick copses of scrub. He had forgotten the outlaw for the moment; he was thinking, and bitterly, of his failure to provide for Angela, and, now and then, whispering an imprecation on the world for being heartless, money mad, and without true virtue. He was that pitiable thing, a good man amuck.

As he stepped cautiously into an open space, he glanced, quite by accident, down the long, tree-covered slope to his right—and saw, a hundred yards from him, a huge, red-haired, red-bearded man in corduroys, sitting silent and motionless on a stone, a repeating rifle across his knees. It was Red Absalom Dew, and his back was toward Laramie Ford.

Ford awakened to the situation immediately. He drew back into cover of the scrub, instinctively cocking his rifle. Hurriedly he began to make a wide detour, thinking to come upon the outlaw at close range, and still under cover. In carrying out his plan, he found himself suddenly standing on a little cliff, with an almost straight drop of some twenty feet below him. Chagrined, he knelt silently, watching the desperado with eyes that did not waver for a second, wondering if he could get down the little precipice without a telltale noise. There were convenient ledges, but to make the descent he would have to be off his guard—and he knew that a man quicker with a rifle than Red Absalom Dew had never lived. Then a thrilling sentence flashed through his mind——

"Dead or alive!" from the reward notice.

He was a fair shot, was Ford. From his point of vantage he could kill Red Absalom Dew without the latter knowing even who had fired the shot. His temples throbbed with blood as the idea matured. It would take Angela from the sewing-machine; it would provide for long, perhaps until he could get another position—a good position. And the law was behind him; he would not have to suffer for the deed; he would be but ridding the country of a daring desperado, and the people would look upon him with admiration and thank him. His temples still throbbing, he raised his rifle. But his hands shook so badly that he could not take a good aim; and he knew that one's aim had best be perfect when he shot at Red Absalom Dew. It was not fear, as fear is usually defined; he hated to take life, to take something that God gave and that God only could give back, law or no law, money or no money.

He would retreat, go around the little cliff, and steal upon the outlaw from another direction; then he would command him to drop his rifle, come forward, and put his wrists within the irons. He started—when a loose stone rolled under his foot; he reeled, lost his balance and fell, clutching at the empty air, to a copse of ivy and rattleweed. After striking heavily, he turned slightly, writhed spasmodically in dull pain, and sank into a dark abyss of nothingness.

Red Absalom Dew had leaped to his feet at the crashing sound. He stood straight as a sapling, huge, gaunt, his rifle ready and his keen, cold blue eyes scintilating as they quickly searched the surrounding forest and boulders. For a moment he did not move, except for his head, which turned that he might see about him; then he began to walk carefully toward the silent figure that lay among the ivy and stones and rattleweed.

Arriving beneath the little precipice, he set his rifle down with a look of concern, and for a few seconds pulled thoughtfully at his fiery, straggling beard.

"Town man," he told himself. "Town man. Ain't used to climbin' around. Hunter, I reckon. Ought to carry a shotgun; town men can't shoot a rifle. Hands like a woman's. Combs his hair reg'lar. Carries his rifle cocked—foolish."

He put his gun on the stones beside him, kneeling before the man who had been hunting him for the reward. Almost tenderly he turned Ford over, and saw that a deep cut in the back of his head was bleeding badly. After binding the wound with a wide blue handkerchief, he picked the inert figure up in his big arms, threw it across his shoulder, and went far out on the mountain to a deep, dark cove hemmed in by cliffs, and to a hut of his own building. He had carried his burden of a man and two rifles with apparent ease; and so well did he know every foot of the ground that he hadn't stumbled once, even though darkness had fallen.

Laramie Ford lay for two days in a fever from the wound on his head. Red Absalom Dew and an old woman sat by him day and night, watching him patiently and anxiously, pouring herb draughts of the old woman's brewing down his throat. Sometimes Ford would have to be held to the bed to prevent his injuring himself by reason of his delirious mind. And never did Red Absalom Dew fail to be there to hold him.

So with the doctoring of the old woman and the great vigilance of the outlaw, Laramie Ford grew well quickly.

Red Absalom Dew sat on a log near the hut, basking in the warm sunshine, a long-stemmed pipe in his mouth, his ever ready, ever near repeating rifle across his knee. Ford, finding that he could walk, stepped out of the hut and sat down beside the big outlaw.

"Feelin' better, I see," remarked Dew, his face like that of a statue, cold, hard. "I thought at first that you was goin' to make a die of it. Fever in the head. Old woman broke it up with yerbs and things. She ain't any kin to me; she's jest an old woman that always liked me."

It was Red Absalom Dew, and his back was toward Laramie Ford.

He reeled, lost his balance, and fell.

"You swore, Mister," Dew reminded. "I'll hold you to your oath"

Ford nodded. He was fighting a fight with himself. Could he take this man to Carterton and surrender him to the law after what he had done? Had he not had Angela to think of, he would not have entertained the idea for a moment. But he had Angela to think of; and, he ruminated, it was but the way of the faithless world—to betray, to lie, to repay kindness with a wound. He would take Dew only because it was for Angela's sake. The first time he found Dew without a rifle at hand, he would promptly cover him, iron him, take him to Carterton, and claim the five hundred dollars.

"You was huntin' I reckon, when you fell," Dew was saying, dreamily. And, as Ford made no reply, he continued in his slow, drawling manner: "I'm Red Absalom Dew, the bad man."

Ford found his voice, but he did not tell his name in return for the desperado's confidence. He said a thing he did not intend to say: "Why are you a bad man?"

Absalom Dew laughed lowly, and, it seemed, only in his throat. "Me?" he said. "Me? Mister, when a man gets started down hill he finds it harder and harder to stop. Things happen all along that gives him a shove; and the downhill gets steeper and steeper for the rollin' stone until it can't stop, and goes on over the brink."

Ford was silent, and Dew resumed: "Now, I was a pretty fair sort of a man to begin with. I wasn't satisfied with workin' because I could never find the right job. I got the idea that the world was down on me, and went to driftin'; then to doin' things that hurt my conscience. After a while I was accused of doin' a thing I didn't do, which was laid at my door on account o' my reputation. Then I got bad, and shot a man to keep him from shootin' me; but I didn't kill him; I shot him in the shoulder a-purpose. All the same I got credit for attempt to kill. I broke jail. Later, a man was killed and robbed, and it was blamed on me. It's got so now that everything that's done without anybody seein' it done is packed right off onto Red Absalom Dew.

"Three men has been close after me to get the reward. I shot 'em in the shoulders to keep 'em from killin' me—when I could just as easy 'ave shot 'em dead. Still, I don't get no credit for that. They said my sights was queered, I guess, Mister, it takes a lot of bad insides to kill a man, even to save your own life. Whatever else I am, I ain't got no sech insides as that, Mister."

Again Ford found his resolve to capture Red Absalom Dew on the verge of wavering. Still, there was Angela, bending over the sewing-machine. It seemed that he could think of no other thing.

"But I'm afraid they're goin' to force me to kill somebody yet." Dew ran on, frowning at the thought and unconsciously thumbing the heavy hammer of his rifle. "You see, Mister, my reputation is bad. But sometimes I think I'd better go right in and give up, jest to keep from killin' somebody and puttin' blood on my hands and soul."

And still again did Laramie Ford fight a battle with himself. And still again did Angela's image come before him. He seemed to see her bending, her shoulders drooping and her eyes dull and filled with pain, before the sewing-machine.

"That old sayin' that a rollin' stone gathers no moss ain't so," Dew went on, as if speaking to himself in the solitudes that he knew so well. "Mister, a rollin' stone gathers moss every foot. But the moss, Mister, will wrap it up and overcome it, don't matter how much good was in the stone at first. I'm about overcome with the moss I've picked up in the steep downhill of my life. And it's mighty bad moss that the rollin' stone picks up, Mister."

The day ended, and a cool darkness wrapped the mountains in a blanket of absolute and utter silence. Ford sat at the frugal evening meal of potatoes, corncake and coffee, and ate as a man eats when he feels that he is going to betray a benefactor and a friend, as a man eats when he feels that he shall strike the hand that has fed and cared for him. Dew also ate without speaking, except to ask his guest, now and then, if he would have more coffee, potatoes, or bread. And while he ate, his rifle lay across his lap, as usual.

Laramie Ford lay for long after he had gone to his crude bed, wondering whether or not his wife had begun to worry about his absence. Whatever he did, he must do quickly, he knew. After an hour's deliberation, he decided to steal from his bed when Dew's breathing told that he slept, and slip the irons on his wrists. Daylight would see him back in Carterton if he succeeded; if he failed—well, there was the five thousand-dollar life insurance policy, and it was incontestable.

But he did not carry out his intended attempt to handcuff Red Absalom Dew. Just when he was on the point of creeping from his bed, he was surprised to see Dew, who slept across the room, rise in the semi-darkness, dimly outlined against a paneless window. Dew came toward him, reached him, pinned his hands to his chest with a mighty strength, felt for the handcuffs, found them and snapped them on his wrists. Then he drew the helpless Ford to a sitting posture.

"What—what do you mean, man?" Ford gasped in astonishment, instinctively wrenching at the cold iron of the manacles.

Absalom Dew lighted a tallow candle that set on a shelf on a level with his shoulders, and turned back to Ford, his eyes glittering even in the shadow, his bearded jaw set grimly, his hands clenched hard and quivering. He stooped, then, and picked up from the earthen floor his slouch hat, which he pulled low on his forehead with a savage jerk.

"What do I mean?" he repeated, his voice telling of some great emotion, thrilling with some strange, indescribable tone. What do I mean? Mister, wait and you'll see what I mean! Me and you is goin' to take a little journey, Mister, and we're goin' to start right now."

"A journey," Ford breathed—"where?"

"Don't matter where. It's enough to tell you that we're goin' to take it; and that the last part of it will be made with you blindfolded. You oughtn't to be afraid o' me, Mister; we're both rollin' stones. And you're goin' to gather some moss of another kind, now!"

"But——"

"Never mind," Dew interrupted, taking Ford by the arm. "Go along with me, or I'll carry you. Which will it be, walk, or carry?"

"Walk," Ford chose. "If I've got to go with you, I presume I am able to carry myself."

Dew picked up his rifle, also the rifle belonging to Ford, and together they passed out at the low doorway of the hut into the starlit night. With the outlaw in the lead, they began to make their way down the silent cove, walking carefully, Dew now and then calling out a warning concerning a fallen tree or a stone that came in their path. When they had reached the valley lying between the long ridge and the great Blackfern Mountain, they turned into it, going at a pace that made Ford breathe hard.

"Hurry, Mister!" Dew kept saying. "Hurry!"

As the pair went down the lonely and dark valley, Laramie Ford found his mind especially fruitful of thought, despite the haste of his going. It was not that he was afraid; fear—together with wonder concerning the mission of the journey—was a thing far from his mind. His thoughts were of himself. He realized that he was a rolling stone, as Dew had said—but he did not stop to ask himself how Dew had known. Yes, he had been a rolling stone; he had not been willing to bear with the imperfections of life; he had wanted the ideal state of things, a perfected system, with no irregularities. He had forgotten that all of earth is earthy; and incomplete, unsatisfactory and irregular because of that very earthiness. And his forgetting had resulted in his being discontended with his lot and bitter, which had caused him to wander from place to place in search of ideal conditions, a business Arcady, a search as futile as that of Ponce de Leon for the fabled fountain of youth. He was beginning to gather moss of the sort spoken of by the outlaw, Red Absalom Dew. Would the time come when he would be overwhelmed by that moss and sent down—down—over the terrible brink? He wondered. Truly, this strange, bold man had taught him a great lesson. If only someone other than Angela would have a little of faith in him! Yes, if only one person would start him on the right road by putting a little of faith in him—only one—only one! If——

"I'll have to blindfold you here, Mister."

As the outlaw turned upon him, Ford stopped and stood still as the giant poplar tree to his right. But—what was Dew going to do with him? For the first time Ford felt strangely afraid.

"Why are you going to blindfold me, Dew?"

"Never mind why," said Dew, producing the same wide blue handkerchief that had been used to bind Ford's wound a few days before. "Sometime—and that mighty soon, Mister—you'll know it all, and you'll understand why I'm careful about this."

"But what are you going to do with me?" Ford erupted, unable to hold in. "If you'll only leave that blindfold off, I'll appreciate it very much. I'm powerless, with my hands ironed like this. You have both rifles."

"Well," replied Absalom Dew, dreamily, as if it had escaped his lips involuntarily, "if I left the blindfold off, so's you could see where I'm goin' to take you, you 'd be mighty hard to take. In fact, you might not be took, Mister, at all!"

This aroused Ford's curiosity; also, it made him half angry at his mysterious companion.

"See here——"

"Cut it, Mister!" Red Absalom Dew broke in, rather harshly. "Cut it! Come with me. Walk right aside o' me—that way. Now, let's hurry."

Laramie Ford thought of the five thousand dollars, and he decided that he did not want to die at all, since he had seen light concerning himself. Would Dew kill him? Were the officers after them, even then? Of course Dew had discovered that he was there for the purpose of gathering in five hundred dollars of the state's money! However he walked on, making no murmur, over hills, through ravines, stumbling now and then. Many times he would have fallen had not Dew's strong right arm caught him.

After several hours, hours that were days in length to Ford because of his torturing thoughts, they arrived at a fence. Ford obeyed his huge companion and waited until the click of a latch told that a gate had been opened. They passed through and paused.

"Now, you be quiet and listen to me, Mister," Dew whispered, his bearded mouth close to Ford's ear. "Do you feel somethin' cold against your forehead?"

"Yes," Ford gasped, realizing what the chilly circle meant.

"Mister," Dew went on, still in a whisper, "I've got a pistol against your forehead. Will you swear to do what I tell you to do?"

"But what do you want me to do?" Ford asked, his low voice hoarse and shaken.

"I've never broke my word, Mister, whatever I've been," said Dew, paying no heed to Ford's question. "I won't ask you to commit any unlawful deed. Will you swear?" The revolver's muzzle went a little harder against the pallid forehead.

Ford began to protest, but Dew clapped a hand over his mouth.

"Ssssh!" the outlaw cautioned. "Mister—you swear!"

Ford raised his hands. His consolation was that he would not be asked to break a law.

"I solemnly swear," he said.

"Good for you," whispered Red Absalom, taking down the revolver and shoving it behind Ford's belt. "You went out into the mountains to arrest me and get the reward to keep your wife and baby while you was out of a job, didn't you?"

Ford admitted it.

"Mister," Dew continued, "you've got the rollin' stone habit, although it ain't carried you as far's it's carried me. I want you to stop. You'll begin to gather moss that you cain't get rid of, pretty soon. Then it'll be too late to stop, Mister; the ground will be too steep, Mister, there's nothin' perfect in this world. You've got to buck up against the world, at the same time makin' allowances for things. You've got to smile when it's policy to smile—when you can do it without bein' an out and out hypocrite. You've got to look over other people's shortcomin's, or they won't look over yours, Mister. I found out these things when it was too late. I'd done picked up the moss, you see. I'm tired of bein' an outlaw, and I'm goin' to quit it before I bloody my hands and soul. You need the reward money for your Angela. I had an Angela once—there was one letter too many in her name, Mister—by God—and I let her wear out her life over a sewin'-machine, like you're doin' your Angela. Now, Mister, quit driftin'; allow for the earth of earth; save your Angela.

"Mister, we're standin' now in the sheriff's front yard, in Carterton. I'm goin' to take the handcuffs off o' you and put 'm onto me; then you're goin' to turn me up and get the reward money for your Angela. I would 'ave give myself up to you in the mountains, but I knowed you wouldn't turn me up after you'd broke my bread—because I knowed you was too good a man yet. Here, take the guns and cover me."

He had removed the blindfold and the handcuffs while he talked. Ford, pale in the dim light of early dawn, took the two rifles by the barrels, and Red Absalom Dew snapped the manacles about his own wrists. At this Laramie Ford almost broke down.

"You swore, Mister," Dew reminded. "I'll hold you to your oath as an honorable man—and for God's sake don't start down hill again! I guess I'd better explain how I knowed all about you; you talked your head off in the fever of your hurt."

Then Red Absalom Dew, huge, gaunt, proud that he had pointed out to another rolling stone the error of the steep downhill before it was too late, happy in the thought that he had saved a woman with a letter too many in her name, went up to the sheriff's door and rapped with his manacled hands.

A Famine in Dyes Threatened by War

By C. L. Chapman

IF the war continues much longer the colored clothes worn by men and women will be only a memory, for all the gayly colored stuffs will be replaced by either uncolored fabrics or by those colored with vegetable dyes. These are not so enduring nor so bright.

Some dyes are manufactured in the United States and it is probable that the difficulty may be met in some way.

Germany has absolute supremacy in the manufacture of the so-called aniline dyes. These are made from coal tar. German coal produces a higher quality of coal tar than does American coal. In Germany scientists are hired for life to do nothing but experiment, and even if for years they meet with no new discovery, they work right on. Universities provide courses, covering six, seven or eight years to prepare a man for this work.

German supremacy is based on thoroughness and persistency. Americans demand quick results. It has taken the German plants from fifty to sixty years to develop their supremacy and this would indeed be a severe handicap to a new industry but it does not seem possible that our dependence upon foreign chemists and chemical works is so abject as to thwart our taking advantage of this chance.

But it is contended that we cannot produce the dyes, as many of the ingredients come from foreign sources, yet on the other hand some chemists declare that the United States can meet the emergency with little delay. Then again German patents become a question.

There are no plants in this country fitted to undertake the wholesale production of colors needed, moreover it takes time to establish a fully equipped chemical plant and there are secrets to be found out that would take years of research work; however our chemists can produce most of the colors and the color shades, but the problem is can they be produced in commercial quantities and at a reasonable expense.

Lack of dyes does not affect the textile industries alone, though that would be the most serious consequence as thousands of workmen would be thrown out of employment; the leather industry, paints and printing inks, all would feel the necessity of completely suspending.

The candy business will be somewhat handicapped, bleached white or undyed hosiery will prevail and wrapping paper, shoes, wall papers, in fact papers of all kinds, will be affected.

People will be dressed in the somber colors of several generations ago, all the bright colors will go if the war is prolonged and so the present offers a great opportunity to America to satisfy that part of the world's demand for colored cloths which have hitherto been met by the mills of Germany, France and England, and to produce the dyes to obtain the best results.

MILLION MORE TO BENEFIT.—Postmaster General Burleson announced that very soon the rural free mail delivery service would be extended to 1,000,000 new patrons without increasing the present cost. He said that this would be accomplished by a readjustment of rural routes and the use of motor cars.

IN this country there are millions of child slaves. I won't go into details as to how many other varieties of slaves there are, but I believe even the most willful twentieth century barbarian, the most indifferent human "bean" and inhuman troglodyte, ought to haul down the star spangled banner this Fourth of July and hide his head in shame when he realizes that he is responsible for this awful crime of child slavery. Many of you who will read this are sons of the men who shouldered a gun to abolish black slavery. Fifty years after the death of Abraham Lincoln we complacently tolerate an evil more horrible than that which eventually cost the great emancipator his life.

According to Professor Charles H. Bushnell of Washington, D. C., crime in this country costs us six billion dollars a year, that is six times more than it costs to run the entire government of this nation, a sum that would build twelve Panama Canals, a sum that would run the governments of the U. S., Germany, France and Great Britain, with all the enormous drain for battleships and armies for a whole year in time of peace.

Now comes Owen R. Lovejoy, Secretary of the National Child Labor Committee, who informs us that in the Federal report on the condition of women and children wage earners in the United States, figures proved conclusively that child labor creates an environment which encourages misbehavior. Sixty-two per cent of habitual child criminals in the United States are victims of child labor. In order that a few inhuman wretches, both in the North and South, may spin the lives of children into profit, the nation is compelled to pay twenty-nine million dollars annually for relief work amongst these poor wretched unfortunates. Mr. Lovejoy says: "Greed for underpaid child labor has raised the death rate in industry in this country to an appalling degree." And think of it, oh you who rejoice on the Fourth of July, what our children have to pay for the luxury of being born under the star spangled banner, the banner of the free, for more young lives are sacrificed in industry in this country than in any other country in the world.

That's abstract talk, now for a little concrete example. Two hundred and fifty-nine poor wretches went to their death in the horrible Cherry Mine disaster; and that disaster was all due to the thoughtlessness of two children, who if this were a civilized, respectable, decent, Christian country, would have been in school. Mr. Lovejoy remarks bitterly: "Efficiency has become the incubator in which all our theories of modern industry are hatched, and yet we tolerate a system of labor which forces all wages down to the level of a child's wage. It simply means that when women and children are brought in with their labor force to compete against the labor of men, the whole family together earns no more than the father would earn if they were not allowed to enter the field against him. In the Southern cotton mills children of ten and twelve years are employed in direct competition with their fathers. There is only one result. At the age of fifty statistics show a man is only earning nine cents an hour. Poor, little, half fed specimens of humanity. They managed to scrape together a few weeks' schooling out of every year. They are dirty and ragged and frequently suffer from loss of memory." A little nine-year-old girl when questioned by Mr. Lovejoy said: "I don't play, I gotta work. I get up to work at four o'clock in the morning. I go to bed at nine o'clock."

At the last sitting of Congress, that well-paid and over-fed body, which you elect to look after the interests of big business—of course you wouldn't have sense enough to elect anyone to look after your own interests—could have knocked this whole, horrible child labor business on the head by passing the Palmer Owen bill. This bill excludes from inter-state commerce all goods produced by the labor of children under the age of fourteen. Mr. Lovejoy says: "This bill was defeated by sly politicians who took the opportunity to keep their own pockets full of ill-gotten gains for one year more."

Before me is a newspaper clipping. It says: "Children get less care than animals." The American Humane Association met at Atlantic City, N. J. last year and that body reported that societies for the care of children had decreased during the previous twelve months, from 313 to 307, while societies devoted to the protection of animals increased from 185 to 191. The number of children cared for by the societies last year was 191,194, as compared to 177,747 during the previous year. The number of animals that received attention by the societites devoted to them jumped from two and a half million to over six millions. It appears that the societies that are looking after animals are very energetic in securing the enforcement of laws protecting animals, but the organizations that have the welfare of children at heart are inactive. President Stillman stated that: "Political influences are being exerted against us whenever we conflict with the powerful forces using children in mills and factories." The "powerful influences" is the invisible government that runs this country.

The State Legislature of Iowa was recently asked to appropriate $25,000 for child study and child betterment. I need hardly tell you that it didn't do it. The lawmakers just scoffed at the idea of spending money for children and right away appropriated $25,000 for a building in which to display fat sheep during fair week once a year only. The most valuable crop of any nation is its children, but the average human still believes it is hogs or sheep, and hog thinking leads to hog living, hog ethics, hog morality and a six billion dollar crime, and a two billion dollar booze bill yearly, and the Lord only knows what.

There are millions of people who think that women should not vote. Let me bring this fact to the notice of those who hold such opinions and think that men who by the way are wholly and entirely to blame for child slavery, should solely attend to the affairs of the nation. In 1900, the Federal census shows that child labor had increased 56 per cent. Little-girl workers increased 65 per cent. These little-girl workers, if any of them are unlucky enough to reach maturity, will become the mothers of the race, and can you imagine what kind of a race they will produce? I will tell you. It will be a race of weedy, undersized, hollow-eyed, mentally deficient, criminally disposed inefficients, which will prey upon society, and fill prisons, hospitals, poorhouses and other institutions. "This," says George H. Hall, Secretary of the Child Labor Committee, "is the preparation we are giving to the future mothers of our land."

When you get your flag out on the Fourth of July, please remember that in double line of march the people in the U. S. who can neither read nor write would extend over a distance of 1567 miles. Marching at the rate of 25 miles a day it would take two months for them to pass a given point for there are over five millions of them. If you had to stand for two months and watch that horrible army of ignorance go by you wouldn't have much heart to sing the Star Spangled Banner, on the Fourth of July, especially if you knew that child slavery was responsible for a good half of our illiteracy.

But suppose all the states abolished child labor by law, little good would come of it unless you, the people insist on the proper enforcement of the law. People think when laws are passed that evils are abolished. They usually are if the Federal Government is back of the law, but state laws have little terror for the big business interests. The National Child Labor Committee says: "In Arkansas the legislature very nearly repealed the Child Labor law which the people put on the statute books last September through the initiative. Failure on the part of the people to insist that the law which they enacted, be kept and adequately enforced, will probably result in its repeal in the next legislature. Better child labor legislation in North Carolina was successfully blocked by the cotton manufacturers. They had expressed themselves as favorable to an inspection bill which would provide for the enforcement of the present law, but when it came to a vote they defeated that bill as well as one to improve the present law. Sentiment throughout the state favored protection of children, but there will be no improvement in the law until the people elect a legislature that will do their will instead of the will of the cotton manufacturers.

Once more you see it comes back to you. You go through the farce or rather the tragedy of electing your democratic and republican political pin heads, too many of them without ideals, conscience or honor and too often without honesty. You know beforehand that such men will betray you. You know they have no more interest in the masses of the people than a chicken has in the ten commandments. They will protect their children, but your little ones they would sell at so much a pound as if they were beans or pork. Directly they get to the State or National Capitol, you are forgotten and the law-making power with which you have invested them is handed over by them to the big interests who convert your children's blood into dollars.

Ex-President Huerta of Mexico says that a hundred thousand outlaws control absolutely sixteen millions of people in Mexico. What is true of Mexico is true in a sense of the United States, and with less excuse, for there the people are ignorant and have no means of stopping oppression except by force of arms. There too, there are few newspapers and scarcely anyone who can read. Here we know wrong exists, here we have the power to right wrong, here e have tens of thousands of churches and tens of thousands of salaried ministers, and in spite of it all we let the outlaws run our business, enslave and exploit our children and raise not a finger to stop it. The political boss is in the saddle, and the opinion of you held by the political boss (and an ex-President of the United States is willing to testify to the fact) is that you, the people of the United States are unfit to rule. Unfit to rule, so the boss rules you. What about Independence Day now? These are some comforting reflections for the Glorious Fourth. The facts I have placed before you in this article will show you how wantonly and wickedly indifferent the masses of the people are to their own interests. Thanks to this indifference the struggle for existence gets harder and harder every year, and how do the people express their resentment when conditions become unbearable? They turn Bill Democrat out of office and put Jim Republican in, knowing full well from years of bitter experience that one is as bad as the other and both are useless and hopeless. The church in a sense is as guilty as the legislatures as regards child slavery, for I'll wager not one in ten thousand of you ever heard a sermon preached against this hideous crime. The pulpit rails at wrong in the abstract, but dares not attack it in the concrete. Before Christ came a child had no more rights than a dog. But what did Jesus say of these little ones: "Suffer the little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not: for of such is the Kingdom of God. Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones; for I say unto you, that in heaven their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in Heaven." And is there anything more terrible than the threat Christ aimed at those who harm these little ones and coin their blood into automobiles, yachts, vast estates and titled husbands for pampered daughters. It was of these the Master said: "It were better for them that a millstone were hanged about their necks and they were drowned in the depths of the sea." Remember these words of the Christ. Call your neighbors together. Read this article to them. Discuss child slavery and ask yourself this question: What have I ever done to abolish this evil? Then go down on your knees and ask heaven to give you strength to play a gallant part in converting the United States into a really civilized country, where oppression, exploitation, graft and child slavery are unknown, and men may learn to do unto others as they would have others do unto them.

There is only one argument for child slavery. It is the hog argument of the brutal employer who in his quest for tainted money is ready to coin the blood of children into dollars. Do you think it is right to take little boys and girls, drag them from their beds in the early morning hours and make them stand over dangerous, whirling machines all through the long day and sometimes through the long night, until their every bit of strength and energy is sapped from their pitiful, under nourished bodies? Do you think it is right to rob them of the joys of childhood, of education, of everything that makes life worth living so that the fat child slaver may grow rich out of their stunted bodies.

The national government will not allow anyone to spread smallpox, yellow fever or bubonic plague, but this traffic in children which it permits is worse then pestilence, or as one writer remarks: "This diabolical traffic also endangers their souls." How dare anyone with a spark of real patriotism in his or her bosom unfurl such a glorious flag as the stars and stripes over a land that tolerates child slavery? If you hang out your banners hang out a banner of black as well. Put the banner of the free and the banner of the pirate as close together as you can get them. If I had my way I would never let one be displayed without the other. Once on a time people were always expecting a sign from heaven. They wanted to be assured that Providence was really taking an interest in them. Crepe on Old Glory is the sign that I would give to the American people to try and shame them into abolishing the foulest stain that was ever laid at the door of any people. If you men only had the decency to give women a vote this hideous evil would have been abolished long ago. What men won't do, women must.

If you haven't a set of Uncle Charlie's three wonderful books your home is not complete and you are not equipped for the full enjoyment of life. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers. All can be had free as premiums; the Book of Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers for a club of only two subscriptions. See full particulars at the end of this department. These three books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues.

Now for the letters.

CHANDLER, OKLA.

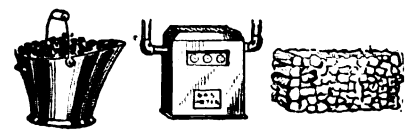
DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Will you make room in your chicken coop for a boy from the Mistletoe state?

Now Uncle Charlie, if you will please be kind enough to put Billy the Goat out in the back yard with a wagon load of tin cans and buckbats to chew on, I will hop upon your lap for a quiet little chat. Well my dear uncle, I see that Congress, that high and mighty body of men we pay to make our laws, has had up for their honorable discussion the army and navy. Also two others, namely; national prohibition and woman's suffrage. And like Congress most always does when there are real live questions up for discussion, they vote them all down.

For years Uncle, you have been a true champion of a strong army and navy. You have constantly declared that we were not prepared for an emergency and it seems that the late investigations have borne out your statements.

One thing more, and what do you think of giving the Philippines their freedom? I for one am dead against it, for if we are to maintain our place as a nation, we must have colonies and markets. We are just getting to have a foreign policy, and I think one of the first things to do is to put the Philippines on a paying basis if possible and, then use them in a way that will be helpful to ourselves and the Filipinos.



Well Uncle, my letter is getting long, so I will close. With love to all the cousins, WILLIE K. CLARK.

It is quite refreshing, Willie, to get a letter in my mail from one who takes an interest in world affairs. Nearly all the letters I get are what I call back door letters. All the people write about as a rule are the things that concern their own immediate family, whether there are three boys or two girls and what is raised in their vicinity. They never can see and don't want to see beyond the rail fence at the back door. Don't expect people to look out at the front door, they might see something if they did, that is if the tomato cans were not too plentifully distributed to obscure their vision. Excuse me for being sarcastic once in a while, won't you? but honestly, I get so discouraged at the terrible mental darkness that befogs the average human mind. Of course nothing is ever going to happen for the better in this world until that mental fog clears away. Here's one boy in Oklahoma actually peeping out beyond the back fence rail, letting his eyes sweep, not only over this vast continent but away almost to the other end of the world. He is thinking world thoughts instead of backyard thoughts, and if you only knew what exhilaration is in that kind of thought you'd try it yourself. Now, Willie, as to the Philippines and our foreign policy. It is an old saying that "Some are born great, some achieve greatness and some have greatness thrust upon them." Some nations achieve empires and some have empires thrust upon them. In the natural course of events we should not have acquired the Philippines nor Porto Rico nor the Hawaiian Islands. They however just came our way, and we couldn't very well do anything else but appropriate them. They are part of the white man's burden. We as a people would be very well content to let other nations carry this burden, let others bear the expense and responsibility, and sneak in at their heels commercially and get rich on their sacrifices, but it wasn't thus to be. It used to look to our forefathers on account of those big stretches of water on either side of us as though we could be a hermit nation, protected from attack by nature, and with no need for armies, navies, soldiers and sailors. But science has annihilated distance and our water protection amounts to little. We are now as near to Europe and Asia, for all practical purposes, as though our continents joined. There are no isolated portions of the world any more, and in a few years we shall be able to have our breakfast in New York and a late dinner in London, and all on the same day. The hundred mile an hour airship is here already. The boundary lines of nations will soon be wiped out. Good thing, too, for narrow nationalism, hyphenated citizenship and racial hatred (sure signs of a petty three-cent mind and a withered soul) must pass away ere we can have world-wide brotherhood. There is certainly no limit to what science and invention can do. It doesn't matter how much a man may have in his brain, nor how much lead in his shoes, in a few years he is going to be pushed out of his rut, dragged out of the deep canyons of his sloth, yanked up and shoved on and forced to fit himself into a new scheme of things that will make his eyeballs crack, his headpiece whirl and his feet jiggle with delight. Just now all men's brains and energies are turned in the direction of destruction. Selfishness prompts every action. The machine that can destroy life will fetch ten times as much money as any implement one can devise to sustain life. Science however is going to make war impossible, and then we shall come to our senses and the era of humanity will dawn in place of the era of greed, hate, stupidity and murder. This will be the era of construction, the dawning of a real civilization. Science is all ready at this moment to jolt us forward to a plane of living which ordinarily we could not attain in a hundred years. Some of us are ready to make the trip, but the vast majority of humanity is not. We've got to wait for our hyphenated citizens, poor, deluded, dull-witted king and nobility worshiping fanatics, to get over the inherited stupidity of hundreds of years of royal boot licking, and all sorts of other reactionary human elements to wake up before we can go forward. We have done some good work in the Philippines. After centuries of fiendish exploitation by Spain, we have started the Filipinos along the high road of progress, and to scuttle out now would be a dirty and cowardly act. A great drama is to be played in the Pacific and Japan and the United States will be the two principal figures on that mighty stage. We might drop a part of the white man's burden by sneaking off the stage and letting Japan be the whole show. That would possibly save us bloodshed and treasure, that too would be the easiest way, but directly we step out of the Philippines, Japan will step in, and though I admire the Jap, admire his art, energy and initiative, courage and patriotism, I think we are capable of giving the world a higher grade of civilization than he is, and if he gets into the Philippines it won't be long before he will be swarming over Australia and New Zealand, and those two splendid democracies—the most progressive in the world—must be allowed to develop along white lines. The Filipinos are not capable of self government yet. Leave them to themselves and they would give Mexico cards and spades at raising hades. Perhaps in a generation we shall be able to withdraw, but we should not allow any inferior race to walk in, undo our good work and exploit them. Japan is already at Formosa, a vast island north of the Philippines and can get to Manila in a few hours steaming. I know it seems preposterous that we should have to spend one American life for what the majority of people who read this article will contemptuously call a bunch of bare backed Asiatics. To be truthful I should have said something a little worse than that. (By the way we have a very ill-bred habit of when you let Fels-Naptha Soap do the hard part of your washing for you.

Fuel—

No necessity for a hot fire, because the clothes don't need to be boiled.

Clothes—

Your clothes last twice as long when washed with Fels-Naptha because they are not weakened by boiling, nor worn out by hard rubbing.

Doctor's Bills—

You don't need to waste your strength, strain your back, fill your lungs full of steam, or get a cold by going out into the air when you are overheated from working near a hot fire.

Time—

The Fels-Naptha way of washing takes less than half as long as the old wash-boiler way.

Labor—

Fels-Naptha takes half of the work and all of the drudgery out of washday.

Aren't these savings worth while? Just buy Fels-Naptha and do your next wash and soap and water cleaning with its help. Follow the directions—they lead to ease and pleasure.

The Country Woman's Vacation

By Mrs. Ira Jipson

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

USUALLY the summer months are the hardest on the country woman. All the city friends and relatives plan a visit to the farm. Of course you can't blame them, but it is hard on the women folks. During the haying and harvest time the men must have help, but the women can't always get it, and by the time the harvest is over, the poor woman is worn out and worked harder than at any other time of the year. It is no wonder they all shun the farm. If the men folks would only provide some extra help, a little rest and recreation, life would be worth living on the ranch or farm.

This is how we solved the problem, and spent two summers. We lived in an ideal place at the foot of a range of mountains; there were several mountain streams that flowed through our place and they were all stocked with fish. The meadows were grand; wild flowers grew in abundance. The first summer was my first experience at farm work. It was all work and no play. There was no time for sewing, reading, visiting nor hardly time to go to town, about six miles away, to do our trading. I was thoroughly disgusted, with never a minute for myself,—just cook, eat and wash dishes, along with the other routine of housework, with milk to tend, churning, cheese to make and numerous other things to do.

One Sunday morning I announced at breakfast that there would be no warm dinner as I was going to have a day off and the men could get themselves a lunch at noon. They were all amazed, but said nothing.

I took the children and our lunch and went over into the meadows. I had never fished in my life but I fixed up a line and thought I'd try my luck. I didn't catch a single fish, but I had a good rest there by that little brook. We started back as the sun went down behind the peak. When we came to the gate I could hear the rattle of pans and the fire burning briskly. Hubby was getting supper and left the hired men to tend the chores.

"Well, how many fish have you got for supper?" he asked.

"None, I never caught one. I was too tired to roam up and down the stream much; I only wanted a rest from this constant grind," I said no more but let him get the whole meal, while I sat and looked on. During the meal some of the men folks said they would like to go fishing. So decided to go the following Sunday and not work. So all went. The children picked flowers and I took my book. What a rest! it seemed like heaven there in that velvety nook. The men folks caught enough fish to last for several days. So the rest of the summer was spent just that way, working week days and a restful picnic each Sunday.

But the second year the place didn't hold the charm it had before. So I suggested one Sunday morning, we hitch up the teams and all go to the dam to fish and spend the day, which was some fifteen miles away. They all agreed, so we took our lunch and spent the day. It poured down rain, but we got into our old wraps and took shelter in an old building which leaked like a sieve, but we were none the worse for our experience. My husband caught the largest fish that had been hooked in the county, that summer. My brother-in-law had a mania for swimming, so they voted it the best day we'd spent that summer and we would go the next Sunday.

I proposed we go to some other place. It is the change of scenery that we all need for recreation, and that is why we all had such a good time. If we went every time to that same place it would lose its charm, as did our own place. So every week we went to a different one, sometimes into the foothills and camped out over night.

They all agreed it was the best summer they had ever spent and I felt the same.

When fall came the men planned to go deer hunting. The children and I wanted to go. My brother-in-law said he couldn't see what we women folks wanted to go for, we would spoil the hunt for them. The men decided to take their families along, and go to an old homestead which belonged to one of the men in the party. The place was about thirty-five miles off in a lonely spot among the hills. We women could stop off there and let the men go on into the hills after game.

There were five women and eight children in the party which numbered twenty-five in all. After a pleasant drive we reached our destination at a log cabin with two big rooms, furnished with a batching outfit. After the teams were all cared for we enjoyed one of the most delightful evenings I ever spent. Each one had to tell a good story, speak a piece, sing a song, tell a riddle, etc., as the entire party sat there around that warm fire until long after midnight. Then the men made their beds in the hay lofts and wagon beds, while the women and children slept in the cabin. The next morning, about three o'clock, the men left us so to be on the hills at daybreak. To kill time while they were gone we explored the homestead. There was a nice garden and big potato patch, all fenced, which was watered from a flowing spring. We made ourselves at home. That evening we played the phonograph which one of the women had brought, and my sister played her violin, and we all sang and performed as we had done the evening before.

In the night I was awakened by our little boy who had a bad spell of croup. I had to render out bacon grease and mix it with coal oil to rub on him. This worked like a charm, and good luck that it did, for I could think of nothing else that we had at hand. So the next evening I doped him up before we retired. Our beds were made on the floor and proved very hard too, even harder than the ground and wagon-beds although we had plenty of hay under us.

In the night we were aroused from our slumbers by the dog barking, the horses running, and coyotes howling. We were all afraid to go out and see what was the matter. The men had taken all the guns except a little twenty-two rifle which was left in a shed just outside the door. I don't suppose one of us could have shot if we'd had a dozen guns. Lois was so frightened that when a mule passed the window she thought sure it was a bear. We all laughed at her and tacked up a quilt to the window before she could be contented to lie down. She begged us not to tell the men, but it was too good to keep.

The men didn't have such an easy time of it either. They found a swarm of bees in an old hollow tree, and decided to get the honey. When they returned the next day my brother-in-law's face was swollen to twice its normal size and he was suffering terribly. The rest of them were stung more or less. But we worked over him, putting on everything we had with us that we thought would ease the pain. His eyes finally swelled shut and we decided to go home by the way of town and get a doctor to attend him. We started home with neither deer nor honey, but a sick lot of men folks. The laugh didn't all come on Lois.

But the night the horses were running so, one of them fell over a bank, got tangled in a rope, and there he lay next morning with his neck broken.

So the hunting trip wasn't such a success as they had planned. But the next time they go, they will keep to the deer trail and let the bees have the honey.

Country women do as we did and mix in a little recreation along with your work—the farm will run a day without you once in a while—and see if life won't be sweeter. You will be younger and feel and look younger for it. Why the city folks think we are jakes is that we seem old, tired and worn out, which we really become in a very short time for lack of rest, recreation and change of scene.

When Baby Has Spasms

By Dr. Leonard Keene Hirshberg

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

BABIES are as God made them and oftentimes as put by Don Quixote a great deal worse. In the matter of the health of babies, experience keeps a dear school for mothers, but parents will learn usually in no other, and scarce in that. Those who are trained; who labor for years and who know, can give accurate advice, but they can never compel conduct. It is better to have an unpleasant direction that will keep life and health in the body, than to await the lessons of sad and bitter experience. Long experience may make even a mother a sage, but it is usually at too great a cost.

Many failings lean to successes, but errors with respect to infants, lead like sorrow to the grave There are a legion of seemingly little ailments in infants that should be but are not, taken seriously by mothers, and there are an equal number of malicious maladies taken saliently, which need give the loving parent little or no concern. Measles is a distemper, responsible for more deaths and disasters than most parents realize. Yet it is as lightly regarded as a breath. Spasms or fits likewise should be given close study by mothers and medical men, yet they are often totally disregarded at great cost to the little one's health.

The inciting causes of spasms or fits in babies are as many as there are names for fairies. Moreover, a spasm in a child may come on like the explosion of an automobile exhaust, or it may begin with the eyes staring, the eyeball rigid or rolling loosely like a ship in a storm, a twitching, a series of jerks at the corners of the mouth.

The tongue may be bitten, the mouth may froth, or the little tacker may vomit and then become unconscious. A drowsy, deep sleep usually follows a momentary loss of consciousness. Hours may elapse before this coma-like sleep passes away.

Obviously, these attacks in a child are not to be given home treatment. Notwithstanding, many foolish neighbors and friends are forever suggesting teas, herbs, rubbings and a whole army corps of measures to "cure" the particular spasms. When in an hour, two hours, or many hours the spell has passed away these eternal busybodies pat themselves metaphorically on the back and go on their heinous way recommending the nauseous useless, or often dangerous potions which had nothing to do with the child's reawakening.

Unluckily, if a medical man with a proper training, fails to step in and take a hand in the matter, the spasms may reappear oftener and oftener and oftener until they become an established habit or epilepsy. Fortunately, much can be done to forestall such a dire state of affairs. A fit taken in time saves ninety and nine.

Almost any abnormal disturbance of the even tenor of an infant's life may incite one of these spasms or seizures. A severe "cold" or one of childhood's contagious maladies such as pneumonia, scarletina, diphtheria, whooping cough, acute arthritis, as well as scurvy, rickets, and an over-loaded stomach may be at the bottom of the first seizure. Drink, imbibed in by either parent before the birth of a child, is the worst of all the causes. Women, wrongly counselled to drink beer and other liquors, before they become mothers, have been thus later on innocently the cause of spasms in the child.

"Petit mal" and "grand mal" are names given to these epileptic fits, if they settle upon a child as an offense often repeated. The type of spasm, however, due to faulty food or excess of victuals, is not prone to become chronic. Indeed, it may be asserted with truthful optimism that nine times in ten sane treatment of the first fit by an alert medical man, should commonly lead to its undoing and cure for all future time.

Should no physician be within immediate hailing distance and a spasm appears, a hot mustard foot bath should be given to the child forthwith. Massage of the wrists, arms and nape of the neck for an interval of five or ten minutes can also be carried out. Then dry and wrap the child in hot blankets, put it to bed with a hot water bottle to the feet and a cloth wet with vinegar or alcohol to the head. Care must be taken not to burn the child or otherwise injure it in these rough and ready procedures.

Simultaneously while awaiting the doctor and without exposure to the less heated air, give the child an injection to move the bowels. In infants under two years of age two teaspoonfuls of Castor oil should also be given. If the child is not unconscious, it may also be made to vomit by inserting the finger into the throat.

Many spasms or fits that become chronic and remain for many years can be prevented, if appropriate treatment is patiently continued, after it has been begun by an alert physician. The duty of mothers is to prevent spasms by intelligent and regular feedings, and the insistence of a liberal amount of sleep. Many children with spasms could have been saved the disorder they suffer as well as the worry they cause others, if the parents had held to the rule of a six o'clock sleeping hour.

The fallacy and superstition still entrenched that "worms," "teething," and "nervousness" cause spasms in part and parcel with the delusion that anything connected with the number seven is lucky and of magic import. Spasms arise in children not by inheritance or by "bad luck," but by the derelictions of loving parents. If infants are put to bed at six o'clock in the evening, fed only what the doctor suggests, kept away from all who have contagious ailments, and given the amount of sunlight, fresh air, and play commensurate with their ages, they should all escape fifty-six of the fifty-seven varieties of spasms and only one in ten thousand need have any type whatsoever. Then will all your children like olive plants, thrive merrily around your table.

ONLY TWO-HEADED SNAKE.—Harry Travers of Kalamazoo, Mich., owns what is said to be the only two-headed rattlesnake in existence. Travers was able to keep the snake alive for many weeks after it was captured, but overfeeding is believed to have caused its death. The snake would eat with both heads, which were perfectly formed. The strange reptile was captured by George Brewer while he was husking corn near Gull Lake. Brewer traded his prize find to Travers for a horse. The Kalamazoo man kept the snake alive until quite recently, and he now has the body in alcohol.

PET PIGEON MOTHER OF CHICKS.—Miss Mayme McElligott of Redondo Beach, Cal., breeder of fancy pigeons, was surprised to find that a pet pigeon was mothering seven wee chickens hatched from bantam eggs. The pigeon stole a march on her mistress recently, and a diligent search failed to locate her nest. Finally she proudly brought forth her young brood from a discarded oven located in the granary. This is the first time that a pigeon has been known to hatch a brood of chickens, according to local fanciers.

a birthday letter, which he appreciates highly as he has often told you, and some also enclose a small gift of money which, needless to say, is very welcome, and is about the only kind of a present that is useful to him in his situation. There is no reason why our readers should not send Uncle Charlie a birthday gift, if they wish to, but it must be purely voluntary on their part and not on anybody's request. I hope your mother will receive many cards. It would seem that eighty-five years of usefulness deserves a reward.—Ed.

DEAR COMFORT READERS:

I am very sorry to disappoint many of you, who have written me, and failed to get an answer. Please do not misjudge me in not keeping my promise to answer all letters. So far, and it is not quite two weeks since COMFORT has been out, I have received nearly three hundred letters. Can any of you imagine what it is to answer three hundred letters and mostly requests?

I tried to answer about two hundred and to those especially, who enclosed a stamp, only about eight.

I enjoyed all letters and my heart aches for many. I shall try and do all I can, as I will keep all on a list. My best wishes to all. MRS. M. BALDWIN.

MARSHALL, R. R. 1, ILL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have had a desire for a long time to write to your charming circle, but was afraid any words that I might say would not be worthy of a place in your corner. However I shall try my luck and hope for the best.

The dear old COMFORT has been coming to our home for about ten years, and we surely could not do without it. It has always been as a friend to me. And in the past five months, the letters and poems in COMFORT'S Sisters' Corner, have cheered my heart many times, when I was sad. Since December, 1914, I have learned what it is to have a dear one absent from me, never to be seen again until God calls me home to that Great Beyond.

I sometimes feel that I have been sorely tried, but when I look 'round me and see other faces as sad, and hear of the terrible complications in Europe, and the many precious souls that are constantly leaving this world, I look up to my Father, and thank Him for His gifts, and for His Son's redeeming blood that saves us from sin, and that "we shall know each other there."

None of the sisters' letters interest me so much as those pertaining to Christianity. Dear friends are we planning for our home in that "Unknown world?"

Miss Nellie Stovall, your letter touched a responsive chord in my heart. I belong to an organized class at my Sunday school, called the "Always True Bible Class," consisting of about thirty-five boys and girls. They all take such an interest in our undertakings. We have a Young People's Alliance every Wednesday evening. We give entertainments, and lawn socials, and buy the little things we need in our Sunday school, and also use for charity the money we make at these socials.

Allow me to preach a little sermon on charity or brotherly love; some people seem to take pleasure in casting offensive speeches at someone near them, or in speaking against an absent one. If these people would only study carefully the twelfth verse of the seventh chapter of St. Matthew, I am sure none of us would be guilty of offending another, if we would take that into our hearts.

Jesus says, "A new commandment I give you, that ye love one another; as I have loved you that ye also love one another." That seems very difficult, but I believe He meant it.

My most frequent prayer is, that this world may be sanctified to His holy cause, before God comes.

I think Uncle Charlie is just grand. He will certainly get a great reward. It is not in this world we get our reward, but the next, and although Uncle Charlie is a shut-in here, he will be that much more glorified over there. "Everything works together for good to them that love God." I think that is a blessed thought. Please do not think me conceited, for I wish to live in the memory of each one of you, as one who wishes that some day every member of this circle will know each other, and converse as friends.

I will send a little verse that one of my friends gave me when my spirit was so depressed. Perhaps it may cheer another as it does me, when I recall it to my mind:

"If we could see beyond today,
As God can see;
And all the clouds should roll away,
The shadows flee,
O'er present griefs we would not fret,
Each sorrow we would soon forget,
For many joys are waiting yet
For you and me."

I live in the country, and would not like to live in the city. The country air is too pure, and the dear old summer woods appeal to me too much to ever consider the city. God's world is indeed beautiful.

How many of the sisters enjoy reading? I do. I read most all of my spare time.

With best wishes, please consider me as your friend,
MISS BLANCHE SCHAFER.

LYNN HAVEN, FLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

May I send you greetings from beautiful St. Andrews Bay. I wish you were all able to sail on its waters, walk on its white sands, smell the scent of the pines, enjoy the delightful climate, and eat some of its fine fish, and oysters in their season.

May I give my little experience through COMFORT? Some years ago I was teaching a country school in western Washington and came across a copy of COMFORT. In the shut-in column was a letter from one who had been in bed about twenty years. Being very lonely she wanted people to write to her. I wrote her a letter and received a grateful reply; have corresponded with her ever since and am thankful I could add a little ray of sunshine to her barren life, sometimes by little gifts which I knew would come good to her. I learned that the desire of her heart was for a wheel chair. Because of her gratitude to me she pieced me a silk quilt out of pieces I had sent to her, and worked it so nicely with many different stitches and designs. It was a labor of love and she would accept nothing for the work. When the quilt came to me I was teaching in western Oregon. I was born in Ohio, but love the Great West. I decided the quilt should furnish the wheel chair. I succeeded in selling tickets enough on the quilt to purchase a very fine and substantial chair which was sent to her from the factory or wholesale house through the local furniture dealer, who threw off his commission. You may know that she was more than grateful to me and to everyone who helped to get the chair. Last summer while en route from California to Florida I stopped at the little town where she lives and spent a little time with her. I found her a very sweet, refined, patient sufferer, having a home but lacking so many things either a sick or well person finds almost necessary; one whose "kin folk" as she calls them—are so busy in church work and their own affairs that they forget much of the comfort and pleasure they might give to the invalid sister.

I find this locality pleasing, and in time I feel sure it can be quite profitable as well. This is the first place I have found where one can get a home in a healthful and delightful climate at so reasonable a rate. From what I have seen of other places I judge this land will become much more valuable within a few years.

Thanking you for your patience with this long letter, I am, faithfully, Your COMFORT sister,
EMMA ALICE WILKINSON.

Emma Alice Wilkinson. I am administering your letter as a sugar-coated pill of advice to the readers of COMFORT in the hope that it will awaken them to a sense of their responsibilities toward the shut-ins. Try doing a kindness every day. Even if begun as a sort of thank offering for the many blessings of our daily life but which the shut-ins cannot enjoy, the pleasure derived will be so great that it will be continued not as a duty but as something good added to our lives. Many thanks for the dainty cards enclosed in your letter.—Ed.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Thank you for your kind advice and also thanks to the sisters for the numerous letters sent me.

I am sending cure for diabetes, requested.

Six years ago I had the disease; my brother-in-law who is a doctor, was very much worried about my condition and ordered me to drink, at least, two quarts of water, between meals, each day, more if possible, claiming that the water helped dissolve the sugar which was in the system. My diet was to consist of oxtail, turtle, bouillon and any clear soup; lemonade (no sugar), coffee, no sugar, chocolate, tea or cocoa. Fish of all kinds, salt or fresh, any meat except liver; poultry, eggs, butter, buttermilk, cream and cheese. Lettuce, tomatoes, spinach, radishes, mustard, celery, pickles, or any green vegetables. Lemons, oranges, nuts and apples, baked. No sweetmeats; brown or whole wheat bread, or white bread toasted.

For three months I kept up this diet and water drinking. In two months I was well and have never had a return of the symptoms. No medicine.

My mother also had diabetes some fifteen years ago, and was treated practically the same, with good results. Only in her case she has never been able to discontinue her diet for any length of time, without returning symptoms.

In any case you should see a doctor as every case varies somewhat. MRS. ROSE SMITH.

IUKA, ILL.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

This is my third attempt to join your charming circle. Isn't our corner just the dearest, coziest place in all the world? Sisters, I, for one, could not do without dear old COMFORT. It is read by our family from cover to cover. I like the stories best of all and the best one that has been printed, to my notion, was "Faithful Shirley." I wonder if it could still be had in book form for securing subscriptions?

I am a lover of books and all good reading; also a great lover of all kinds of poultry. I have a flock of ninety-five hens, mostly Barred Plymouth Rocks. They are as healthy as can be. I give them carbolic acid every few weeks, twenty drops in a gallon of sweet milk, will keep them healthy. I also keep peroxide of hydrogen and if a case of roup develops I swab their throats with it.

Lime and louse killer are my remedies for lice. Dust the hen thoroughly when you set her, then again just before the eggs pip. When the baby chicks are two days old, grease the hen good and dust with the powder, and rub each little chick's head with grease, meat frylings are best as they are slightly salt. Sometimes if the lice are numerous, a second application will be needed, but very seldom.

My little boy of fourteen years raises Indian Runner ducks.

Am not considered good looking but try to live as our Savior would have us live.

I have a small son of fourteen years, named Roscoe, our pride and joy, and the best husband in the world. We met with misfortune last November as our home and most everything we had was destroyed by fire. So we are starting at the bottom round of the ladder again now. I am not very strong and would be glad to receive reading matter from the sisters.

Our home is in Marion county, near Iuka, Ill. We have good churches, good schools, R. F. D. Route and telephones. The soil here is good, will raise most anything. We have good neighbors and friends here.

Coal oil is the best remedy I have found for burns. Saturate a cloth with it and wrap around the injured part; then put a dry cloth over that to exclude air and it will pain you but a few minutes longer.

Sisters, do not hang up your pans and cooking vessels with the bottoms all black. If it is necessary to put them next to the fire, take a meat rine or a little grease and grease the bottoms well and then have a good scouring powder near your range and scour each time after using.

I could talk to the sisters and Mrs. Wilkinson, "God bless her," all day but am afraid I have stayed too long now, so will run home and get supper.

May God's choicest blessings rest upon each sister, Mrs. Wilkinson and Uncle Charlie is the earnest wish of your COMFORT sister, ETTA MAY BIRD.

BEEBE, ARK.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I always enjoy your letters and get much good out of them that when something especially appeals to me I want to tell you about it.

I have just finished reading a story called "Pollyanna" which has run in several papers and magazines, and it was a help and inspiration to me. I want to speak of this story. Some of you may have read it and it is for those who have not that I write.

Pollyanna is a little orphan girl whose father had been a poor mission preacher. The salary being insufficient to properly board and clothe him and his family, they received barrels of clothing, etc., from the well-to-do churches in the East. One Christmas when a barrel arrived little Pollyanna was wishing so hard for a doll—instead the only thing that it contained outside of clothes, for a child, was a pair of crutches. The little girl very naturally cried and her father in trying to console her started what they called the "Glad Game." She said, "Why papa, I don't see anything about that to be glad about," and he answered, "You can be glad you don't need them." So it was with everything—always they were glad whatever happened. After her father's death she came East to live with a sour old aunt who cared very little for children. This aunt was rich and had nice things but she put this

How Modern Household Conveniences Pay

By Mary Hamilton Talbott

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"I'VE tried a lot of new-fangled labor savers," said my old neighbor to me when I was starting the business of housekeeping, "and I tell you they don't pay, they are more bother than they are worth."

This was rather discouraging as I was depending a good bit on the many conveniences I had read about to give me time to live up to the ideal expressed by a prominent and progressive woman when she said, "We housewives must subordinate the work of keeping house to the business of living. We cannot get the most out of life or give our children the training they should get from us if we are bound by the daily renewed tasks that sap our strength and take all our time." But while I was pondering whether my neighbor, with thirty years' experience or the modern woman was right, I met Mrs. Jones, and when I got to know her better and know her home, run without a servant, I found out the fallacy of my old neighbor's remark. Mrs. Jones said, when I asked her, "Do modern conveniences really pay?"

"They sure do. When my Martha got impossible and I found she must go I was trying to fit my back to the burden of housework again when along came a man selling a vacuum cleaner. I felt I could not afford to buy it but he talked me into it and that vacuum cleaner proved my salvation. I began to realize that the inventive mind of men and women were giving us things that not only would take the place of the hired girl who each year is becoming more out of the question to the woman who is wrestling with the increased cost of everything and the stationary salary, but lessens our worries. The vacuum did my cleaning and saved my back. Then a patent washing machine cut down my laundry expenses and gave a day worker time to clean out my kitchen pantry after the washing was done. I believe my mangle is as much of a time and labor saver as the washing machine, and to me it seems strange there are not more of them seen in private houses in this country, they are so universally used in foreign countries. If one has no power in the house, as electricity, to drive them, they are made to be worked by hand, and a cold mangle costs but $6.50. Every woman who is doing her own work should at least have laundry machinery, if it has to be bought on the installment plan.

But there is no reason why there should not be electricity in every house for light and power purposes. Not only the cities but the small towns and many of the larger villages have their public electric plants that furnish electricity for lighting and power purposes at moderate rates. There is no place where electric power is more useful than on the farm to operate machinery in the house and barns and to furnish light. To say nothing of the convenience of throwing the light on or off in house, barn or stable by a turn of the switch, there is the element of safety to be considered in doing away with the kerosene lamp and lantern which are the most common cause of destruction of farm buildings by fire. The most remote farm may have electric light and power by means of a small private electric plant of its own and produce electricity at a cost even less than the rate at which it is sold in the cities.

"When I began to talk fireless cooker my friend across the street was awfully discouraging," Mrs. Jones continued. "She said, 'Those things are fakes, I wish I had never bought mine.' But I found later her trouble was that she expected to put hastily and poorly prepared dishes into her cooker and have them emerge culinary triumphs. Of course they were nothing but failures. I later met a man who had made a comparison of a gas range, fireless cooker and a combination of the two as to the amount of gas used, labor required and the results as to appearances and palatability of food cooked for family use for one day. He said: 'The saving of gas in using the fireless cooker after starting the food on a gas stove was from five ninths to three quarters of what it cost to cook the food entirely by gas and the result was pronounced better in taste and appearance, while the labor or attention required was greatly reduced. The combination gas stove and fireless cooker effected a still greater saving. The saving in gas by use of the fireless cooker amounted in 93 days to the price of a fireless and in 231 days to the price of a combination range and cooker.

"On the farm where wood or coal takes the place of gas the economy of fuel by use of the fireless cooker is nearly if not quite as large with an equal saving of time and labor. The farm woman will use the fire that cooks the breakfast to heat the fireless cooker and the dinner meat and vegetables and place them in the cooker by the time breakfast is ready; there they may be left without further care or attention and with no fear of scorching or over-cooking until dinner time when they will be found hot, perfectly cooked and ready to be served. Meanwhile she may give her undivided attention to other matters about the house or garden or may spend the forenoon at a neighbor's or in going to market.

"I have heard more than one woman say that these larger conveniences are so expensive, they cost more than a girl. Have you ever thought over this with a pencil and paper handy for a few figures. For instance, a girl's wages for general housework in these days range from $12 to $25 a month. Take the lowest figure $12, add to it eight dollars a month for her food and five dollars for waste and breakage and you have $25 a month or $300 a year as the cost of your servant. Then see what you can buy for that amount. My vacuum cleaner was $85, my range $50, kitchen cabinet $25, dish-washing machine $16, clothes washing machine, hand power, and the mangle $20, which makes in all $196. This leaves $104 of a servant's cost for investment in the little devices that help work along. The $10 I invested in a wheel-tray saved me enough time to join the Parents' League at the school my children attend and we are working toward better amusements, libraries, playgrounds, sanitation and safety regulations, also for less crowded conditions in our schools.

"In buying anything which is real machinery one must exercise care and buy only those of good construction, buy them with the feeling that you could show them unhesitatingly to a scrutinizing engineer who looks for efficiency and excellence of construction. Then remember you don't feel at home with even a knife having a different handle from the one you are accustomed to using when you first buy it, and you may be a couple of weeks before you really feel that a bread mixer is a real success. So many women buy labor-saving devices and cast them aside before they have mastered them."

In order to reduce the amount of work in the home it is important to buy materials in as nearly usable form as possible. The old idea of making things at home, regardless of cost, nutritive value, or anything else, because it is extravagant to buy canned or otherwise prepared food should be obsolete now, but facts hardly point that way. So many women reject these conveniences as representing the ultimatum of waste and shiftlessness, yet the prosaic truth of the matter is that bread and biscuit, beans and soup, and scores of other things, are prepared in a more appetizing and digestible form in factories than in nine-tenths of the kitchens of the land. In the modern bakery business, for instance, there is only one kind of luck, the mood of the cook, the oven that won't heat properly, the "light-hand" or other superstitions have no place, the output of the machines may lack the fascinating irregularity of hand-made work, but the bread does rise, the biscuits do brown, the beans do bake and jelly does jell. And this applies especially to the crackers and other products of the great bakeries whose goods, put up in air-tight packages, are on sale in nearly every store in the country and are advertised in all the leading magazines and papers.

Right here let me say a few words in favor of package goods generally. When you buy tea, coffee, cereals or other food products in the original sealed packages in which they are put up by the great manufacturing or packing houses you know to a certainty just what you are getting in quantity and quality. There is no chance for short weight and never any variation in quality, and moreover the goods come to you clean and with no chance for adulteration by the middleman. When you buy bulk goods you take the storekeeper's word for the quality; you trust to his honesty for weight and purity; and as to cleanliness of handling—perhaps it is best you should not see the open boxes and barrels in which they are kept in the store exposed to dust, flies and other sources of contamination, nor know the condition of the scales or measures in which they are weighed or measured out to you, if you wish to relish such food.

One woman I know actually shuddered when I said that a certain brand of canned soup was most nourishing and economical and declared that people nowadays thought of nothing but saving work. Incidentally let me say she never thought of anything but the inside of her home, she had not advanced with her husband and children, and preferred to stay at home and look after soup making rather than the cleanliness of the store where her food was bought and the health of the workers who handled her food supply, she had no time for joining with her daughter the class on home economics, or attending the lectures which her husband enjoyed. Women who make griddle cakes for breakfast often pass by the prepared flour, which costs perhaps five cents a meal for cakes, and stand beating eggs at five cents apiece for the cakes which their families confide to each other on the sly are not half so good as Aunt Jemima's. The poor woman must get up fifteen minutes earlier in the morning and be fifteen minutes more tired at night, but see how worth while it is when they can do all the cooking and not be the victims of absurd, new-fangled ideas.

There are long lists of things which save time and money, because they do away with waste and give the greatest returns for the money expended.

One woman I know looked horrified when I suggested that it was extravagant for her to make her own jelly. She cited to me the cheapness of the raw material in comparison with what she must pay for the finished product. She forgot to add the price of a good bit of gas consumed in the slow preserving process necessary to result in clear jelly, the cost of the preserving glasses and her own nervous exhaustion from standing over a hot fire. Today the housekeeper's time is set at a larger value than it was yesterday. If my friend had crossed the threshold of the big food factory of the present day she would have discovered eye-opening conditions that make for economy and health. These food kitchens are far better equipped with appliances than most home kitchens. Capital and brains unite in food preparations impossible in the average home. The finest utensils costing thousands of dollars are used; high-priced chefs and experts in bacteriology are employed. The cost of labor, raw products and tins or glass jars is reduced to a minimum because of the enormous quantities used. Comparing these facts with the inadequate kitchen equipment oftenest found my friend would surely have seen it was not economy for her to make her own jelly, besides having no time for the rest and pleasures she should enjoy.

The argument in favor of buying jellies and canned fruits and vegetables applies to those who have to buy the raw fruits and vegetables for the purpose of canning them. Of course it is economy for those who raise their own fruits and vegetables to can the surplus that otherwise would go to waste, and for this purpose improved home-canning outfits can now be had that very much reduce the labor, and produce results superior to those attained by the old home methods.

Every woman should make it her business to study all conditions inside and outside the home which will keep her from being so tied down to her housekeeping that she has no time for the care of her husband and children; the woman who uses what the modern scientist has invented for her instead of her hands is undoubtedly the most efficient housekeeper. It is not necessary to be extravagant and buy all household helps at once but as the need arises. My friend Mrs. Jones said she would rather go without a new dress than not keep on buying things to make her housework easier so she can have some time to devote to the larger housekeeping of the outside world. One of our most prominent twentieth century housekeepers says, "That woman who is too busy washing baby's flannels to help bring pressure to bear on the legislature for the passage of a pure-wool law, who has to nurse her children through typhoid instead of seeing that the health officer tests the town water supply, who spends her time scrubbing the accumulated grime from the woodwork instead of helping enforce the anti-smoke ordinance—that woman is too busy to keep house well."

lonely little orphan girl away up in an almost bare attic room, but still she was "glad" because she had no mirror to reflect her freckles. The same with everything—every punishment had its glad side. So glad was she that it fairly radiated from her face and gladdened everyone with whom she came in contact. A cranky invalid lady was made to see the glad side when Pollyanna told her she might be blad that everybody was not an invalid like herself and glad because she still had her arms and hands and eyes. It always changed the lives of all that looked on the "glad" side.

This is enough of the story to illustrate my point. It is this: there is always a "glad" side to everything if we but search for it. Pollyanna said, "The harder it was to find the thing to be glad for the more fun the game."

Now, I am alone with two babies, my husband being in the far West at present, but I am glad my little boy and girl are here to keep me company. Sometimes I saw my own wood but I am glad I am able to do it, and sisters there are so many things I can be glad for. Let's all try the game and see how much happier we feel. If we brood over the past, ponder over the present in a dissatisfied way, or worry about the future, most any of us could get almost blue enough for the color itself to show in our faces, all of which does us no good. But just try the other and see the difference. To be glad means to be happy and if my letter is not already too long I will quote a few lines:

"Just being happy is a fine thing to do;
Looking on the bright side rather than the blue;
Sad or sunny musing is largely in the choosing,
And just being happy is a brave work and true.

"Just being happy helps other souls along;
Their burdens may be heavy; and they not strong;
And your own sky will lighten if other skies you brighten,
By just being happy with a heart full of song!"

Hoping this will help someone, I am,
Your COMFORT sister, MRS. A. P. STANLEY.

Mrs. Stanley. If your letter helps others as much as it has helped me you may be sure it will do some good. I had read "Pollyanna" some time ago but was forgetting her "glad game." There is a later book entitled "Pollyanna Grows Up" which portrays Pollyanna as a young woman, still playing her "glad game" and radiating cheer and happiness by her kind deeds. Even if we are not quite happy, in all fairness to other people we should endeavor to cultivate an outward appearance of happiness for the influence shed by a gloomy countenance is, to say the least, depressing. We can all find something to be glad about if we but try.—Ed.

TOKIO, N. DAK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Having just finished reading Mrs. Hattie D. Miller's letter I thought I would write and comment upon a topic that has interested me greatly; namely the rearing of little children.

We have been married eight years and have five children, the oldest was seven years old the first of March, the next oldest six, the next four, the next three, the next one and one half years.

Now what I wish to ask Mrs. Miller or some other experienced sister is: could a mother with so many little tots and all her own housework to do on a farm be expected to have the same patience and strength to bring up all those children as well as a mother with one or perhaps two children to divide her time between? If Mrs. Miller had four children besides her little girl she spoke of, she would have found it harder to bring her up as well as she has.

I love my children very dearly but I correct them sometimes because, I think they need it. Maybe I am mistaken. Our two oldest boys are deaf and though no worse than average children I find it necessary to punish them occasionally. Am almost of the opinion fewer children and better reared, are better than too many.

We live on an Indian Reservation, in Benson county, N. Dak., and like very well; the land is, of course, cheaper here than in the adjoining counties as it is not broken. We are on the banks of Wood Lake where we have excellent water and plenty of fish; and a good deal of wild fruit grows around the lake.

Will answer all letters enclosing stamp and would be pleased to hear from any of the sisters.

MRS. MARIE HAGGERTY.

Mrs. Haggerty. Unfortunately I cannot give you the benefit of my personal experience as my family does not number quite as many as yours, though really, five are not so very many, but I am printing your letter in hopes that it will be the means of eliciting information from mothers who can tell us their experience. You may be able to derive some help from the following poem, particularly the last verse, "do your best and trust to Heav'n."—Ed.

Training the Other Woman's Child

They all sat around in friendly chat
Discussing mostly this and that,
And a hat.

Until a neighbor's wayward lad
Was seen to act in ways quite bad
Oh, t'was sad!

One thought she knew what must be done
With every child beneath the sun,
She had none.

And ere her yarn had been quite spun
Another's theory was begun,
She had one.

The third was not so sure she knew.
But thus and so she thought she'd do.
She had two.

The next one added, "Let me see,"
These things work out so differently,
She had three.

The fifth drew on her wisdom's store
And said, "I'll have to think it o'er,"
She had four.

Then one sighed, "I don't contrive
Fixed rules for boys that are too alive."
She had five.

"I know it leaves one in a fix,
This straightening of crooked sticks."
She had six.

And one declared, "There's no rule given
But do your best and trust to Heav'n."
She had seven.

LOXLEY, ALA.

MY DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Here I come again from southern Alabama. Since my letter appeared last year the readers have asked me to write again, desiring to know more of the Sunny South.

First of all I will speak of the beautiful shade trees. The Texas umbrella is found in most every house yard; also the camphor tree; both grow very fast from seed or can be bought at the nurseries. The holly and magnolia grow wild and can be taken up and transplanted. The live oak is another pretty shade tree; some of them are covered with long gray moss, especially those found along the rivers and bays. The Yupon is another evergreen bush with red berries and is very pretty mixed in with holly for Christmas decorations.

The umbrella tree sheds its leaves in the fall, but the big bunches of seeds stay on the trees all winter. There are two species grown here but the seeds are alike on both and make very pretty beads when the outside hull is boiled and washed off. They are ribbed and hard like a nut; color light gray but can be colored any shade. There is a hole through them, all ready to string. I sent several strings of them last year to my friends in Oregon and Wisconsin and they wrote back that they thought they were very pretty. I strung them with little glass or gold beads between.

The country here in southern Alabama was originally covered with a long leaf, yellow pine, which is now mostly cut. It was controlled by cattle and sheep men who kept settlers out, but now in the last few years it is being settled up fast by Northern people. The water is pure and soft, but not cold. Most all the wells are drilled. The staple crops here are corn, sweet and Irish potatoes, upland rice, oats, sorghum, velvet and lyonbeans, cowpeas, peanuts, cotton, sugar cane and most all kinds of vegetables, fruits and nuts. Some new crops are being tried and raised here with success. The dasheen is one. It may not be new to some people but I never saw any growing until last summer. It is used as a substitute for Irish potatoes, which it does not exceed in yield of bushel, but exceeds in average food value per acre. It is a tropical plant. The bulb or tuber is the part used for food. They have better keeping qualities than the Irish potatoes.

Cassava is another new crop that is being raised here in the South and is the main food standby of Central South America and the West Indies. Cassava is the plant from which tapioca is made. It will produce more food per acre than any other crop and is equally adapted to man and beast. The roots are the parts used for food. It is grown from seed cuttings, and the seed canes are not easily kept.

Spineless cactus is another new crop which they are just beginning to grow here, but I don't think it will be a success as our common forage plants have more stock food value.

We have no snow here but some cold winds, more changeable this last year than for several years before, but it has been colder all over the United States and we have not escaped. A thin skim of ice formed several times this winter but it was not cold enough to hurt the oranges or the Japonica buds and flowers.

Our little Railroad station, Loxley, is about half way between Mobile and Pensacola, our nearest large towns. There is a railroad graded most of the way between the two towns, but the track is laid only part way from Pensacola to Loxley. Work is stopped for lack of capital. The L. and N. Railroad runs through Loxley.

The soil is a sandy loam with red or yellow clay subsoil; looks rich and mellow but lacks humus and lime so has to be fertilized. There are no stones or rocks on the land.

Very few Negroes here. No malaria or fevers. Wages are low as there are no factories or mills. We need a canning factory badly as most of our garden truck has to be shipped out.

The summer days here are an hour or so shorter and the winter days are longer than in the North. We have very little twilight.

Don't you think, sisters, we should try to cultivate the habit of contentment? They say "Contentment is riches," and if we could become like the old man in the story we would all be happier. An old man who had been taught to be content with his lot became very poor. He traded off his coat for a loaf of bread, but before he could eat it a dog came and, snatching the bread, ran away. The man was indignant at first, but soon the old feeling of contentment stole over him, and as he saw the dog vanish around the corner he exclaimed, "Well, thank God, I have my appetite left."

We didn't get Woman Suffrage last fall, but are still living in hopes. It is said that woman's place is in the home. Surely it is, but a better place to vote from has never been found. Many men fear that when women get the vote they will be defiled by the political atmosphere, but it does not work that way in the states where women are enfranchised. Women voters are responsible for a general cleaning up of the polls. They bring cleanliness instead of taking on defilement.

My letter is too long already, but I wish to say a word about our song birds, the mocking bird. It sings only in spring and summer, at night as well as day, and can imitate all the other birds even the little chicks.

Love and good luck to our dear COMFORT and COMFORT sisters. MRS. P. S. HENDRY.

HAMTRAMCK, 32 Danforth Ave., MICH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a reader of COMFORT about eight years and I think it an excellent magazine. I like to read the sisters' letters, but there is one thing I do not like and that is people describing themselves or their looks. I see no sense in it. I fear if anyone asked me to describe my looks I would have a hard task especially if I were good looking. If I were asked to do so I would refuse. I don't see how a modest woman can do it. Even a frivolous girl, if she has common sense would be afraid to overrate her personal appearance, remembering that beauty of person is fragile, virtue alone has true and everlasting dignity. It is by the soul we must judge. If that is pure then our beauty is complete; also let all the sisters remember the words in Holy writ, "Let another praise thee and not thy own lips."

To change the subject, I wish to say I am sending six of the shut-ins a little cheer. I hope many of the sisters will do the same.

Yours most sincerely, ANNIE KIRK.

Sisters. How many agree with Annie Kirk? How many are in favor of descriptions and why? Whether you agree with her or not, I hope you will follow her example in writing letters of cheer to shut-ins. It will take but little of your time and it means more to the weary sufferer than you can imagine, also send some of the "cheer that buys bread," as Uncle Charlie says.—Ed.

ELKINS, ARK.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I want to talk just a little while and although not as fluent as the others, maybe I can express my sentiments.

I certainly enjoy reading all the sisters' letters; they seem so neighborly and friendly.

Any of you that think you would like me for a pen friend, please write.

Did you ever hear anyone say, "Oh, I get so lonely and restless, and the days seem so long?" I have, but I can't fully sympathize with anyone like that, for I have seldom been that way. I can always find something to interest me. For instance, I love flowers. I can't begin to tell you how much I enjoy caring for them and watching them grow. Then I crochet.

I also take several magazines and like to read. I calling foreigners names, referring to many of them contemptuously as Chinks, Guineas, Wops, Dagoes, Geese, Kikes, Greasers, etc. The Europeans get back at us calling us Yankee pigs and swine. It is time we remembered we are all human. Names that are meant to hurt and sting only perpetuate race hatred. However we are our brother's keeper, and it isn't what we do, but what Providence has dictated in the great scheme of things that is our part to do, that we must do. We have got to play our world part and play it in a manly fashion. There is some rough and probably bloody work to be done in this world, before a lasting foundation is made for world peace and brotherhood. The workers of the world have no quarrel, but they are too ignorant to know it, and too blind to see it. They are all doing as father did, carrying large "Please Kick me" signs around, still carrying the lazy of earth on their backs, still preferring the sword to reason and common sense. We can't talk to a man with a gun in his hand, and force is the only power that amounts to a red cent in the councils of the nations. The day has not yet come when we can all live soft and easy lives- that at present is only the privilege of a few. The majority of us have to fight and fight hard for the few crusts we've got, for there are hundreds of millions of people who have only half a crust and who would think the most unsanitary shacks of the poorest paid of our workers, palatial luxury. Seventy-five per cent of the people on this planet are casting envious eyes at these United States, and we are not going to be allowed to keep what we have without a struggle. This country has developed entirely too much of late from without, and if it is ever going to amount to anything, it's got to start right now developing from within. At present we are suffering from racial indigestion. We object to the Japs coming here because we know they are a racial type we cannot absorb. This war unfortunately has taught us that there are millions of the representatives of European races that also refuse to be absorbed, men and women who are alien in thought and deed, and though born on this soil of Washington and Lincoln, are breeding another race of aliens. Here to my mind is one of the greatest dangers this nation has to confront, and just how great and just how real it is, only those who spend their lives probing beneath the surface of things realize. We need a powerful navy, enough officers to handle a force of half a million men. I am a dreamer, but I am not a fool dreamer. When I live amongst burglars I am going to keep a lock on my door and a gun under my pillow. You may never need to use the gun, but as they say out West when you do need it, you need it d—— bad. You don't have any time to go out and buy one, or manufacture one. What we've got to do in this world is to deal with conditions as they are, and not as we'd like them to be. While we are in the waters of tribulation (and we are in it up to our necks) if we don't keep on swimming we are going to sink. We have sense enough to know we need policemen in the streets of our cities. We know that without the strong arm of the law order would vanish and chaos would reign. Our army and navy play the same part in the highways of the world as a policeman does in the streets of our cities. Our voluble friend, William Jennings Bryan talks about the million men who would spring to arms in a minute between sunrise and sunset, if an enemy invaded these shores. Such talk is piffle, poppycock, slush and bunk. The man who talks like that ought not to have charge of a chicken coop, let alone the lives of a hundred million people. It has taken the British Army seven months to prepare a million men for the field. The Canadian contingent of thirty-two thousand men, most of whom were militiamen and many of whom were old soldiers, after weeks of training on this side of the water, were not allowed to go to the front until they had had an additional five months of training in England. William Jennings talks about the arms that our million patriots would spring to. Yes, and they'll be the same old arms they had seventeen years ago in our war with Spain, obsolete condemned Kragg and ossified black powder Springfields, with a kick that sends a man somersaulting to the rear several miles, every time he pulls a trigger, and knocks his shoulder off every time the gun goes bang. We have enough of these old squirt guns to kill off all the patriots that would spring to arms, but they wouldn't kill anybody else. If, until they had six months of war training, any of our million patriots tried to spring at the trained troops of an invading army they would simply spring into their graves. It takes months to make the artillery that is now used in field fighting and months more training to know how to use it properly, and when it comes to training officers it is a case not of months, but of years. I'm not talking militarism. Militarism means not the use of armed men but the worship of them. Militarism is an evil thing that will never find a congenial atmosphere for development in these United States. Events in Europe have set the clock of progress back fifty years. All our cherished ideals of "peace on earth, good will to men," have been blown to pieces at the mouth of the cannon. People who do not realize this are living in a fool's paradise. Though we are a peaceful people it was only the other day we were fighting Spain and quite recently we were fighting in Mexico. We have fought in Hawaii, in the Philippines, Central America. We nearly had a run in with Chili and we had a deuced good run in between ourselves, and during our trouble with Spain, if it had not been for the big fleet of a certain maritime nation, all Europe which cordially despises us, would have been on our backs. On an average we have had a war every twenty-five years of our national existence. No one can tell what a day may bring forth. The whole of the earth has its envious eyes upon us, for to them we look like a big, fat, helpless goose, ready for the plucking, and that at present is just about what we are, and instead of having a watchdog at the gate to see that we are not plucked, we have in Washington, a lot more geese. Heaven help us and protect us, for the Lord knows we haven't sense enough to protect ourselves. Now don't forget these international thoughts, world thoughts. To be a citizen of any particular country is all right, but it's horribly selfish to be satisfied with such narrow limitations. Be as I am, a citizen of the world, better still be a citizen of God's great universal world, of which our world and the millions of worlds around us are but an infinitesimal part. When you write your names hereafter on every and all occasions, add these initials C. U. (Citizen of the Universe). People will look at that C. U. and wonder what the deuce it means. That's your opportunity to open up and let them know. You will watch with amusement how their old troglodyte eyes will blink, just as sunshine makes an owl blink. After the bats get your idea, they will add C. U. to their own names and quit being bats and then they will make other bats blink and think. Catch the idea? Now add that C. U. to your names when you write to me, so I may know you are awake, actually alive, and that you've quit blinking and started thinking.

GILLESPIEVILLE, OHIO.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE AND COUSINS:

It is my opinion that you do not get any letters from the "Buckeye State;" or, if you do, you do not publish any of them. Which is it Uncle? As I see the other cousins describe themselves, I suppose I must do the same. I am five feet seven inches tall, weigh one hundred and eight pounds, have dark eyes, black hair, a pug nose, a complexion that varies with the weather, a score of delicate freckles, and a temper that goes from normal up to 212 degrees in less than no time. Am seventeen years old. Now, if you are not frightened to death, I will stay and chat a while.

We have taken COMFORT for several years, and we like it fine. Uncle, I like to see you give it to the little silly, weak-minded girls, who rave about their beaux. I notice some of them need their spelling books and grammar, more than they need a beau. Some of the boys are all right, and the girls can be good friends to them without making fools of themselves. I expect my letter is geting too long, but before I go, I'll tell you what I am good for. I can do all kinds of housework, milk the cows, sew, play the piano and

Help on the Movement for Nation-Wide Prohibition

In response to numerous and urgent requests from our readers COMFORT will furnish the ammunition and lead them in a campaign for a national law to banish the liquor evil.

Will you enlist in support of this cause?

It is the most vitally important issue before the American people.

It affects the general welfare, and as all, regardless of sex, are equally interested and have an equal right to be heard and exert their influence on our national law-makers, I appeal to the women as well as the men to sign and circulate these petitions.

Those who have read the series of editorials on Nation-wide Prohibition that began in February COMFORT understand the full significance of this appeal and the purpose of the petition heading which is printed below.

For the information of our new subscribers and other interested persons who have not read our previous editorials on this subject I offer the following brief explanation which may also be a help to those who circulate the petitions.

I have not space or time here and now to detail the wreck and ruin caused by the grog shops; the resulting evil is of such magnitude as to be a national calamity. The liquor habit is the greatest of all causes of crime, poverty and distress; disease, sickness, insanity and suicide follow in its wake and it blasts the innocent offspring, not only of the drunkard but of the moderate drinker, with physical, mental and moral degeneracy.

The liquor traffic is a national menace that must be abated by a national law. State prohibitory and local option laws are inadequate in scope and so difficult of enforcement as to be too largely inefficient.

For these reasons the friends of temperance have striven, thus far in vain, for the adoption of an amendment of the United States Constitution to prohibit the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquor except for medicinal and mechanical purposes and to place its manufacture and sale for these purposes under the control of the federal government.

Such a constitutional amendment is desirable and probably will be an accomplished fact some time in the future, though it will be by a hard fight and may take years to win it, because at best the process is long and complicated, affording many opportunities for successful resistance by the mighty influence of the liquor combine.

Meanwhile there is urgent need of immediate nation-wide prohibition; and there is a simple and speedy process by which it might and should be established next winter by act of Congress. It is to accomplish this that COMFORT has entered this campaign and asks your help.

Last winter Congress made a thorough-going law for nation-wide suppression of the dope evil. On the first day of March, when it took effect, the United States government assumed control of all opium and cocain in the country, so that on and after that date these habit-forming drugs and their derivitives and compounds could not and never can be imported, manufactured, kept, distributed, sold or given away in any manner or form in any part of Uncle Sam's dominions except under the very strictest government supervision and regulation.

This law is operating with complete success although the various state anti-dope laws had proved as ineffectual as the local liquor laws.

What we ask in our petitions—and the situation demands it, for the drink evil is greater even than the dope evil—is that the national government shall in like manner solve the temperance question by taking control of the manufacture, importation, keeping, distribution, sale and dispensing of alcohol and alcoholic liquors under such stringent regulations as to restrict their use to legitimate medicinal, scientific, mechanical and fuel purposes.

This does not require any constitutional amendment. It can and should be done by act of Congress at the coming session which will begin next December. Congress has the same power over liquor that it has over drugs. Will it exercise its power in the interest of temperance? Yes, if you, the people, demand it; no, if you are silent, for the liquor interests are ever active and alert.

Perhaps you wonder why our petitions ask for government prohibition and control through the instrumentality of a federal tax. This is to obviate any possible question of conflict between national authority and state rights in dealing with this matter.

The power of direct and simple prohibition or regulation of any business within a state belongs to the state legislature and not to Congress. But Congress has unlimited power to tax business. And, as the U. S. Supreme Court has declared, "power to tax is power to destroy," or it may be employed as a means of regulating the subject matter of taxation. So when Congress wishes to regulate any kind of business within the states it does so by imposing a moderate or even trifling tax and making the regulative features incidental to the assessment or collection. On a one dollar annual registration tax and a fee of one cent each for order blanks the government hung its effective control and stringent regulation of opium, cocain and other habit-forming drugs.

And when Congress wishes to exterminate a business or manufacture that it cannot directly prohibit, it accomplishes that object by the thoroughly effective means of imposing a tax so heavy as to be absolutely prohibitive. By taxing it to death Congress rid the country of the dangerous yellow phosphorous match, and the same method was employed to abolish the issue of currency by state banks.

Our petitions ask Congress to tax alcoholic liquor out of existence, except such as is produced, dispensed and used under strict government supervision and regulation for medicinal, scientific, mechanical or fuel purposes.

The government now taxes the products of the distilleries at $1.10 a gallon for proof spirits such as whiskey, brandy, rum and gin, and $2.20 a gallon for clear alcohol except such as it made and denatured under government supervision for mechanical and fuel purposes. Alcohol is denatured by adding enough poison to prevent its use as a beverage. The government also imposes a large tax on every wholesale liquor dealer and smaller taxes on retail dealers including keepers of barrooms and saloons. The manufacture of beer and wine is taxed and imported liquors have to pay.

By the simple process of raising all these taxes to a prohibitive size Congress can establish nation-wide prohibition and end the drink evil now and forever throughout the country, and by exempting, or rebating the tax on liquors and alcohol made and dispensed under government supervision for medicinal, scientific, mechanical and fuel purposes safe control can be maintained to prevent fraud and improper use.

Returning to the question of the constitutional amendment, our April editorial said:

"It appears to have been erroneously assumed by the friends of temperance that an amendment of the Constitution of the United States was necessary in order to empower Congress to prohibit, or assume control of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquor throughout the country. Therefore they have been laboring for the adoption of such an amendment, which is a slow and difficult task requiring for its accomplishment favorable action by a two thirds vote of both branches of Congress and acceptance by the legislatures of three quarters of the states.

"The resolution for a prohibitory amendment introduced and urged in the last Congress by Congressman Richmond P. Hobson of Alabama, was favored by a majority vote in both the Senate and House of Representatives but failed of a passage because it fell a little short of the requisite two thirds.

"Now here is the vital point. While it requires a two thirds vote of Congress to submit a constitutional amendment for consideration by the States, and then a long delay with the final action of the States in doubt, only a bare majority of both Senate and House (without reference to the states) is necessary to make a law that becomes immediately effective.

"It must be assumed that the senators and congressmen who voted last winter in favor of the prohibitory amendment were sincerely in favor of nation-wide prohibition and would have voted for a law designed to accomplish that object, and therefore had it been a proposed prohibitory law, instead of a constitutional amendment it would have been enacted and we should now have nation-wide prohibition.

"Let us not wait for the slow, tedious and doubtful process of a constitutional amendment, but rather let us demand that Congress, at its next session which begins in December, make a law whereby in the exercise of its taxing power the National government shall prohibit the sale of liquor for a beverage and shall assume full and effective control of the manufacture sale and distribution of alcohol and alcoholic liquors and restrict their use to mechanical and medicinal purposes."

And I concluded by asking how many of our readers would give their active support to such a campaign by circulating petitions addressed to their Congressmen and Senators if COMFORT will lead the fight and supply the ammunition.

In reply I have received a flood of letters, from every section of the country, expressing hearty approval of COMFORT'S stand, urging me to lead the movement and pledging their enthusiastic and active help in circulating the petitions which they asked me to furnish.

Therefore I have prepared the heading for the petitions and you will find one printed at the foot of this page. You can cut it out and paste it on a long sheet of writing paper so to have space for names on the paper below the printed heading. Sign your own name and then pass it round among your neighbors for their signatures. Take this copy of COMFORT along with you so you can explain to your friends just what the petition means and what the movement is designed to accomplish. Write in the name of your Congressman at the top, and after you have got all the names you can on your petition, mail it to him; any time before December it should go to his home address; after the first of December he will be in Washington attending the session of Congress, and if you wait till then it should be sent to him at the "House of Representatives," Washington, D. C. You have plenty of time between now and December to talk this up and get signers; but don't put it off; begin now and keep working until December.

I also have these petitions printed on good writing paper with plenty of blank space below the heading for names of petitioners; they are much neater, requiring no cutting or pasting, and they save you the necessity of mutilating your COMFORT. Three will be sent on request if two cent stamp is enclosed to pay postage; address COMFORT Temperance Editor, Augusta, Maine.

There is a further advantage in having three petitions to circulate at once. One each should be addressed to the two Senators from your state, and the third to the Congressman that represents your Congressional district; thus you can get each petitioner to sign all three petitions at the same time. It is quite as important to petition your two Senators as well as your Congressman. I will mail as many printed petitions as desired to all who send the necessary postage.

I thank you for your kind letters and I am touched by the many expressions of your warm personal regard. Sincerely your friend,

W. H. GANNETT.

Cut this out and paste it to the top of a sheet of writing paper

U. S. House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir:

We believe that the national welfare demands the eradication of intemperance and that, for the attainment of this end, it is the imperative duty of Congress immediately to enact a law abolishing, throughout the United States, the manufacture, importation and sale of alcohol and alcoholic liquors except for mechanical and medicinal purposes under strict regulation and control by federal authority. This can and should be done by exercising the taxing power of Congress against alcohol and alcoholic compounds in manner and form similar to the provisions of the recent federal law regulating the keeping, sale and distribution of opium, cocain and other habit-forming drugs.

Although the movement for a prohibitory amendment of the U. S. Constitution, which we also favor, is gaining ground, that process is necessarily slow and meanwhile the monstrous evils of the liquor traffic must be overcome by immediate federal legislation.

Therefore we respectfully request that you will vote for, and do your best to secure the passage of a bill to impose a prohibitive federal tax on the manufacture, importation, keeping, distribution, sale and dispensing of alcohol and alcoholic liquors except for medicinal, mechanical, scientific and fuel purposes, and establish control and strict regulation by the federal government over the manufacture, importation, keeping, distribution, sale and dispensing of alcohol and alcoholic liquors for the excepted purposes aforesaid.

play golf. So you see I am not entirely an ornament altogether.

I would like to hear from the cousins, and will answer all I can. Your niece and cousin,

BEATRICE COTTRILL. (League No. 39,420.)

Beatrice, I get hundreds of letters from Ohio, I don't however, select letters with regard to location. Geography has nothing to do with it. I have to instruct, entertain and amuse to the best of my ability and I select those letters which contain subjects or ideas which I can elaborate and use as a basis for profitable discussion. You are too tall for your weight, or rather your weight is not sufficient for your height. Be careful of your diet and masticate your food thoroughly and see if you cannot gain another ten or fifteen pounds. Watch that temper of yours. Most of you girls want to know how to remove freckles or superfluous hair. You are all deeply interested in externals. None of you however, write and ask how to remove bad tempers. When you feel your temper rising count five hundred slowly before you say an angry word. I would rather see a man drunk with liquor than a woman drunk with temper. Be temperate in all things. Turn the hose on that temper. In our old Latin text books I remember we used to be told that anger was a brief madness. It's not pleasant to know we have people around who are liable to go insane when the least thing disturbs them. A sweet-tempered girl is altogether adorable. A two-legged volcano, male or female is a nuisance not to be tolerated. Yes, girls can have boy friends without making fools of themselves if they make up their minds to do so. Boys however, as a rule are not satisfied with that kind of a deal, neither are the majority of girls. Many girls are wildly emotional. They are slush, sentiment and emotion run to seed, and it takes a strong hand and wise counsel to keep them from making idiots of themselves. Parents tug one way and boys tug the other and the boy usually has the stronger pull. Our boys and girls on the whole have entirely too much liberty. They see too much of one another. Boys are entirely too fresh, forward and flippant. One thing our grandfathers knew that their grandchildren don't know. They knew better than to puff cigarette smoke into a girl's face. If they had done it, they knew they wouldn't have lived to have done it a second time. The necessity for all women to be self supporting has brought men and women in much closer contact than was the case a generation or two ago, with the result that a lot of the safeguards that hedged a woman, have been broken down. Familiarity at times breeds more than contempt, too often it breeds degeneracy. Today I can see from my window painted and powdered, loudly clad, brazen-faced high school girls, returning home in the afternoon, with narrow-chested, blear-eyed, pasty-faced boys of eighteen, slouching along by their sides. You should hear the loud rancorous laugh of the girls as they listen to some suggestive yarn of their escorts—unlicked young cubs familiar with every form of vice and degeneracy from whiskey to the drug habit. These are the products of city life. And these, God help us, these are to be the fathers and mothers of the coming generation! ! The whole bunch wants spanking and sending to the reformatory. Ask any of the judges who have charge of juvenile courts in our cities and they will tell you if I am not right. What we want is more discipline and a higher moral tone in the home, more of it in the street, more of it in every walk of our national life. The modern father is too tired or indifferent when he comes home to bother about anything but his eats, his cigar and the evening paper. Everything is pushed onto mother, and she already has more than she can attend to with her home duties. If she tries to assert her authority, she is swept off her feet and there is no one to back her up. Pop doesn't want to be bothered and Pop doesn't care, so the girls and the hobbledehoy kids roam the streets and know more at fifteen than our grandparents did at fifty. They are old men and old women before they are out of their teens. Of childhood they know nothing and before they are of age there isn't an apple on the tree of life that they haven't tasted and cast aside. It's time someone called a halt. Some strong voices are calling a halt, some school principals are making the girls wash the rouge off their cheeks, and are washing the boys' mouths out and bolling some of the cigarette smoke out of their degenerate hides. The parents are more in need of schooling than children, and our crazy schools ought to train for life instead of business. We are sowing the wind and we will reap the whirlwind all right if we don't watch out.

EDISON JUNCTION, FLA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

This is my first letter to the COMFORT. I am four feet and seven inches tall and weigh about seventy-one pounds. I have brown eyes, black hair, and dark complexion. I am twelve years old. I have two brothers and one sister. Uncle Charlie when I was a little girl about one year old my grandpa gave me a cow, now I have six cows and I sold one for fifteen dollars and put it in the bank. I go to school at Keysville, but my school is out now. I have to walk a mile to school. I am in the sixth grade. I live out on a farm. I can cook, sweep and milk the cow. I am careful in putting in my commas because I saw what you put in the COMFORT about cooking and ironing the cow. We have got some of the prettiest little chickens you ever did see. I am busy picking strawberries, we have only a small patch, and only get about forty-seven quarts at a time. I would like to run over and take you a quart, but will have to wait till walking is better.

With love to you, HAZEL KELLEY.

Hazel, I want to thank you for your entertaining letter. You are very lucky to have such a generous grandfather. The only thing my grandpa ever gave me was a licking. The old gentleman didn't live long after it, for I was some dirty in those days, and anybody who undertook to lick me had a dark brown taste in their mouths for the rest of their lives. I read of a white man licking a colored man the other day. Some people have peculiar tastes. The Goat says he licked him with his gloves and not with his tongue. My! how relieved I am. I am glad to know that that one cow grew up to be six, but I am grieved to know that after selling it you put it in the bank. Say, Hazel that must have been some fun to have seen you putting that cow in the bank. I can see the look of astonishment on the receiving teller's face, as you poked the cow through the little grilled window. I wonder which end went through first. I'll wager all the other depositors gave a yell and beat it, scattering their money in all directions. Why didn't you deposit the money instead of the cow. I'll bet that cow felt awfully uncomfortable, locked up in the safety deposit vault all night. Probably it mistook the greenbacks for grass, and ate up all the bank's funds. Just think, too, if a man went in the next morning to draw out fifteen dollars and the paying teller pushed your cow at him over the counter. I've heard of a bull in a china shop, but I never before heard of a cow in a bank. It seems to me your act was a cowardly one. The goat informs me that he thinks you put the money in the bank and not the cow. Always write your sentences so as not to leave us in any doubt as to your meaning. I am glad you are taking such care of your punctuation. I'm glad you don't cook and iron cows, and if you'll only learn to keep them out of the bank you'll be all right. I think if you got forty-seven quarts of strawberries at a time you are doing mighty well, and you are getting more than your share. Forty-seven quarts at a time and still kicking. Strawberries are too rich for our blood. When the strawberry season arrives, Billy the Goat gets under the table and makes a noise like a strawberry, and we smack our lips and say ah! then the strawberry season is over. If we had a real live strawberry we should sell it for fifteen dollars and put it in the bank with your cow. That's the proper place to put luxuries. Luxuries are for the rich to have and the poor people to dream about. That's why we do a lot of dreaming.

This department, which is conducted by eminent specialists and experts in the various branches of agricultural science and practical, business farming, will keep our readers posted on the latest scientific discoveries and teach them the best methods of operating in order to obtain GREATER FARM PROFITS AND BETTER HOME LIVING.

Any COMFORT subscriber can have the advice of our Agricultural Staff free on questions relating to farming, live stock and dairying. The answers will be printed in this department and will be interesting and instructive to all who are concerned in farming.

Write your questions plainly on one side of the paper only; give your full name and address, and direct your letter to COMFORT'S MODERN FARMER, Augusta, Maine.

The Mare and Foal

THERE is no economy in letting the nursing mare depend upon grass alone for the sustenance of herself and foal during July and August. Neither is it good policy to let the mare graze at that time in an unshaded pasture, exposed to the tormenting attacks of flies and often deprived of free access to fresh, cool drinking water. The mare will run down in condition and become weak if so treated and her foal will suffer in consequence. It would be better to turn her out on grass at night and to keep her in a clean, well-ventilated and shaded box stall or shed during the day and there feed her cut green stuff, hay, whole oats and wheat bran. The foal also should be given a chance to eat oats and bran in addition to taking its mother's milk and eating grass and hay. We have seen many a foal stunted permanently by pasturing with its dam upon an exposed, bare-bitten field and deprived of additional feed. It does not pay to keep a mare and have her produce a foal unless the foal is by a good sire and then perfectly developed by adequate feeding and proper management and the mare must pay for her keep by work as well as the production of a foal. The small farm should be worked largely by brood mares, so fed and cared for, and then will have less loss from horses "eating their heads off" during the winter season of idleness.

Shrink in Milk

Many farmers wonder why a cow that gives twenty to forty pounds of milk in May and June falls away to ten pounds a day or less in July, August and September. These men usually depend entirely upon grass pasture to maintain such dairy cows. At first this pasture is luscious and luxuriant and cows make a big flow of milk from the feed. At that time the grass is a grateful change after dry feed and flies do not bother; but soon the effect wears off, the cow has used up all of her stored energy, flies become a torment, heat adds to the misery and the cow needs some other feed as an adjunct. It is absolutely necessary to supply cows with shade during the heated term of the year, to allow them plenty of cool, fresh water and to add some cut green feed, as a supplement to the grass which is becoming short and dry. Silage, specially put up in a separate silo, is now coming into vogue for late summer feeding; or the big silo, not emptied in winter, will supply good silage if kept carefully covered to prevent mold. If silage cannot be given, the cowman should have a patch of oats and peas, sweet corn, vetches, clover or Alfalfa, to cut and throw over the pasture fence for his cows. It is a better plan to feed it in the shed or stable in the heat of the day and then turn the cows out after nine at night. Mosquitoes do most of their biting between seven and nine. Flies torment worst in the hot sun. Cows cannot make a profit from grass grazed in the heat of the sun, or when mosquitoes are biting bad. Use the spray pump and some good fly repellant at such times. Sprinkle borax on the manure heaps and flies will lessen materially. Every cow and horse stable should be screened and darkened and nowadays one sees fly traps of mesh wire commonly in use. Don't blame the cow if she shrinks in milk flow. It commonly is the owner's fault and he is asking of the cow more than can reasonably be expected of her in the way of performance.

In Case of Colic

So-called "colic" simply means indigestion, accompanied by pain and often by collection of gas in the stomach or large intestines, or stoppage of the intestines with feed, or waste products of feed. Rarely is there anything the matter with the urinary organs. The urine will be passed when the pain subsides. Pain means cramp and cramp means temporary cessation of the motions of the bowels and of the function of the bladder. No medicine is needed for kidney or bladder trouble. The object should be to remove the offending irritating matters from the stomach and intestines, to restore the activity of the bowels and incidentally to relieve pain. Unless this is done the simple attack of colic may run into fatal inflammation of the bowels (enteritis), or the slight stoppage of function into paralysis and impaction. No irritating medicine should be given. Liniment is intended for external use only and so should not be given for colic. Medicine should be given by way of the mouth; never by way of the nostrils. Baking soda is dangerous when there is "sour stomach" and collection of gas. It effervesces in the stomach and causes more gas and the stomach is easily ruptured by such increase of pressure from gas. If a graduate veterinarian cannot be employed at once give the horse from one to two ounces of turpentine in a pint of raw linseed oil, slowly and carefully from a bottle. Do not give boiled linseed oil; it is poisonous. Rectal injections of soapy warm water are useful; but the sick horse should not be galloped. Following the oil drench, should pain persist while the veterinarian is coming, it will be safe and probably helpful to give such simpler remedies as essence of peppermint and ginger and a good dose of alcoholic stimulant in water. Hyposulphite of soda in two ounce doses may be dissolved in the water in which the stimulant is mixed, if the horse suffers from excess of gas in stomach or intestines.

Some Summer Pests

LEAF BLIGHT ON BEETS.—This disease makes its appearance during the summer and causes the tops to turn brown and die. It may be kept under control by spraying with Bordeaux mixture as soon as the disease appears and before it has made much headway. It will usually take two or three sprayings to keep it under control.

MAGGOTS IN TURNIPS, RUTABAGAS AND RADISHES.—These are the larvae of a gnat that lays its eggs on the leaves near the ground. When the eggs hatch the maggots burrow into the roots making them wormy. The use of carbon-bi-sulphide has been advocated but though it proves effectual it costs too much to be an economical method of control. Practise rotation and never plant these roots on infected fields. It is always a good plan to rotate crops even in so small a plot as the home garden.

BEAN RUST.—String beans, especially the white wax varieties, are frequently troubled with rust. This appears on the pod in the form of a small round brown spot which increases in size and spreads rapidly throughout the field. There is no practical remedy after the disease has once gotten under headway. It is carried over the winter on the seed and in the soil. Remember this when planting next year and be sure not to plant beans on infected soil. The seed should also be soaked, before planting, in a solution of the following proportions: six ounces copper carbonate, two quarts ammonia and nine gallons of water. Soak for an hour or two.

WEEVILS IN PEAS AND BEANS.—These may be destroyed in the seed but not in the field. If your peas and beans are infested this year, treat the seed with carbon bi-sulphide in the following manner. Place the seed in a tight box which can be closely covered. Put a pint of carbon-bi-sulphide in an open dish on top of the seed and close the cover. This will evaporate rapidly and kill the weevils as the fumes soak down through the seed. All lights must be kept away as carbon-bi-sulphide is very explosive. The box should be uncovered and the building thoroughly aired before any fire is brought near it.

Cabbage Pests

At this season of the year in many localities the cabbage crop is suffering from the ravages of cabbage pests. The worst of these are the root maggot, the cabbage worm, the club-root and the black-leg. Each of these is easily recognized as the name suggests.

THE ROOT MAGGOT.—This attacks the plant in the lower stem and roots. It may be kept off, however, by placing a piece of tarred paper, in which a hole and slit have been made, on the surface of the ground so that the stem comes up through the hole.

THE CABBAGE WORM.—This may be controlled in several ways. Spraying with kerosene emulsion, made as described in former issues of COMFORT'S Modern Farmer, is effective. This may be used early before the worms have worked into the head. It kills by contact. Or the worms may be poisoned with Paris green either by spraying or dusting it on the small plants and before they begin to head. Wood ashes or even road dust seem to be effective, also. The fine dust particles get into the breathing pores of the insects and literally choke them to death. All these remedies should be applied before the worms have gone into the head because they are then hard to reach.

"CLUB-root" AND "BLACK-leg."—There is no known remedy for either of these diseases. They seldom appear the first year that cabbage is grown on a field, but soon become very prevalent in the cabbage growing sections. This fact suggests the most effective control. Practise crop rotation. Don't grow cabbage two years in succession on the same piece of land. Crop rotation is the best known system of controlling all plant disease and insect pests. However, disease resistant varieties of cabbage have been recently developed from which much good may come.

Keep Cultivating the Corn

The rule used to be to quit "plowing" corn when the leaves got so high that the horses ate them as they worked and it became more and more difficult to get through the rows without breaking down the stalks. That idea is dying out in many corn growing districts. The new plan is to give one or two deep cultivations and then keep at the shallow, surface cultivation and go on cultivating, with a single horse and light cultivator, when the corn is above the horses' backs, or thereabout. Such continued, stirring cultivation will insure a crop of corn on land that might yield a failure if not so cultivated. It takes the place of much manure. It makes up for lack of rain. It helps corn to fight its enemies and survive all sorts of troubles and tribulation. It is good to see a man and his women folks so thoroughly in earnest that they are willing to hoe the corn crop hour after hour to keep down the weeds. It is important to keep down weeds, but it is far more important to keep in moisture and the horse and cultivator kept going steadily, to stir the surface soil even in hot dry weather, will do more to insure a corn crop than a regiment of women with hoes in hand. Let the women attend to the household affairs, the children, the chickens and maybe the garden; but let the boys and horses "tend the corn" without delving deeply and the profit will be greater in the long run. The time to kill corn land weeds is before the seed is planted and then before the plants are up, or large. Starting on clean, well tilled land the important thing then is to break up the surface crust after every rain and to keep stirring as often as possible until such stirring can no longer be done. The man who is satisfied with thirty bushels of ear corn per acre cannot afford to do this; anyhow he does not do it. But the man who is willing to put in the work and who does it right will change to the harvester of an eighty to one hundred bushel crop. The boys are doing this. Lots of them in boy corn clubs manage it. Some of them have far surpassed the figures we have quoted. These boys have done as they were told and so they have succeeded. Now it is up to the men to sink conceit, abandon "sot ways" and adopt new, sensible, profitable methods of corn production. Good seed, of high germination test, planted properly, at the right time, on properly prepared and fertilized soil and land then kept clean and moist by persistent cultivation, for the conservation of moisture as well as the keeping down of weeds—these are the simple rules for success. Study them and put them into practise.

Getting Alfalfa Started

If you haven't succeeded with Alfalfa try seeding it in the fall, in July in the Northern tier of states and as late as August or September farther South. First kill all the weeds by early plowing and frequent harrowing and, when you have a fine seed bed and the usual summer dry spell is about over, sow the seed.

Before sowing inoculate your field with soil from an Alfalfa field or send to the United States Department of Agriculture for inoculating material with which to treat your Alfalfa seed. Just before sowing spread ground limestone over your field at the rate of four tons per acre. Be sure to select a well-drained spot for your Alfalfa as it will not thrive on a low wet soil.

If the land is not fertile use a complete fertilizer at the rate of a half ton per acre. A mixed fertilizer from the slaughter house, composed of dried blood, ground bone and tankage, is excellent but there is nothing better than barnyard manure for this purpose if it can be had.

Some Alfalfa Troubles

BLISTER BEETLES.—This is the most annoying Alfalfa pest. It is a small black beetle about an eighth of an inch wide and half an inch long. These beetles sometimes become so numerous as to entirely strip the leaves of small plots of Alfalfa though they seldom damage large fields to this extent. The only remedy is to spray a narrow strip of Alfalfa around the field with Paris green to poison the pests. Of course care must be taken not to harvest any of the poisoned Alfalfa for food for stock.

LEAF SPOT.—Small yellow spots appear on the eaves which soon spread to cover the entire plant. This is a fungous disease and the most serious one that afflicts Alfalfa. The remedy is to clip the field as soon as the spots appear, being careful to rake up this crop and to remove it from the field no matter how small. If left on the field no good results from clipping since when the spores ripen and dry they soon spread to other plants. The new growth will probably be free from the disease.

YELLOW ALFALFA.—Why does Alfalfa turn yellow? There are several answers to this question. If the soil is low, wet or poorly drained the yellowing may be due to this cause. If the field is high, well drained and fertile the yellowing may be due either to a lack of lime, a sour soil or no inoculation. To settle this question carefully dig up a plant and examine the roots for nodules. If none are present the yellow color is doubtless due to poor inoculation. If nodules are present, test the soil with blue litmus paper. If it turns pink or red then the soil is sour, which is the cause of the poor color. The remedy for sour soil is to apply ground lime.

Yellow Alfalfa may be due to poor soil. Nitrogen gives the dark green color to plants. A lack of nitrogen may be indicated by a yellow color. A heavy coating of barnyard manure will help in this case. If manure is not to be had try dried blood or tankage or nitrate of soda. However, if the soil is properly inoculated, the Alfalfa plant can take its own nitrogen from the air and there is no need to use a nitrogenous fertilizer except on a small plot to determine just what the Alfalfa needs.

Raising Calves on Skim Milk

Many farmers believe that in order to raise good calves whole milk is necessary. Numerous experiments have shown this to be untrue. When milk is skimmed only the butter fat is removed. This is worth thirty cents or so per pound and is a rather high-priced food for stock. It may and should be replaced, however, with some cheaper form of fat food like oil meal. If five or six pounds of oil meal are added to each hundred pounds of separator skim milk it will have about the same feeding value as whole milk. If this is fed warm and sweet to young calves in the same amounts that the calf would get when running with the cow, say twenty to thirty pounds per day, the calf should thrive nearly as well as if running with the cow. It must be remembered that the calf shouldn't be put on this kind of a diet all at once but gradually changed over from one to the other by feeding but a little of the skim milk and oil meal the first day, a little more the next and so on, at the same time reducing the whole milk diet proportionately. A week or ten days is necessary for the change from one feed to the other.

COPY NATURE.—Nature intended the young animal to nurse often and take little milk after a time. Man errs by starving a calf to quickly drink a big meal of milk twice a day. Often the milk is cold, or dirty, or sour, or decomposing. Often it is drank far too fast. Sometimes it is covered with thick, grassy froth. Yet the calf "feeder" wonders why the little beast has a "fit" and dies; or contracts fatal scours; or fails to thrive and fatten; or grow up puny and upprofitable. Just as often he errs by forcing a little calf to eat much coarse hay, straw or fodder. He forgets or does not know that nature has not developed the calf's paunch (rumen) which later will be used as a storehouse for coarse roughage and out of which will go such feed to be chewed over, as "cud," until fit for digestion in the fourth stomach. Only the fourth stomach is developed in the little calf and it should take care of small amounts of milk often. Follow nature as to this.

Some Reasons for Tired Horses

A man driving a team of rather light horses was "stuck" at the bottom of a hill and told the passer-by that one of his horses, or both—he could not decide which—had "balked." The stranger happened to be a city humane officer on summer vacation and his experience led him to ask the driver if he might investigate a little. "Sure," said he; "but a good whip may be the best cure." "Youre' wrong, friend," said the agent after a quick examination; "guess you didn't notice that your axles are as dry as a bone!" Lack of grease was the trouble. The horses were not to blame and it often is so. When the horses "play out" in the field they may simply need water. The sudden stopping of sweat; the terribly hot, dry skin; the short, labored breathing; the alleged "sun stroke" often mean nothing but lack of water, and near by there is water, and nearer by there is water in the little brown jug for the man, but none for the horse. Then, too, the "playing out" or "petering out" when the horses are mowing hay, or reaping the big grain crop is not always due to the hard work or to the lack of water, or to the hot rays of the sun. It is due to blunt sickles. The knives should be made sharp before the cutting season opens and then they should be kept sharp. The man who can best keep his scythe blade sharp, with exactly the right edge for easy cutting, is the man who will cut the cleanest, widest swath and do most in the day and endure best at such work. So it is necessary to keep the mower and reaper knives sharp, and the plow bright and sharp so that it will "scour," and the disks harrow properly sharpened and set and the draft (tugs or traces) properly adjusted so as to make pulling as easy as possible. Tired horses could they speak often would say that they would not have played out had they been given a breathing spell now and then, if their harness had fitted better, if they had had more rest at noon, if they had been started earlier in the cool of the morning and worked later at night, with less of the middle day torture in the hot sun. Lastly they would have tired less quickly if not allowed to load up with unnecessary hay at noon.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming, but it is hardly reasonable to expect us to waste valuable space in answering the same questions month after month for the benefit of those who need not have asked the questions if they had read and remembered the answers which we had previously printed.

Questions and Answers

CABBAGE AND CUCUMBERS.—How should ground be prepared for successful cabbage growing? I have tried some several times, always grow thrifty but fail to head. Can you tell me how to cultivate cucumbers for a good crop? MRS. N. J. S., Jonesboro, Ark.

A.—Cabbages require a fertile, moist soil containing plenty of potash. Thrifty growing plants that fail to head may be due to two causes, poor varieties or too much nitrogen. Try adding a potash fertilizer, wood ashes for example, to a part of your patch. If these should head up you have located the cause, lack of potash. Be careful to select early and sure heading varieties. Cucumbers require an abundance of moisture and do best on sandy loam soil. Many people produce a good crop on a small scale by burying a barrel filled with holes in the ground nearly to the top and planting the cucumbers around it. By keeping the barrel filled with water the plants always have an abundant supply. Of course this method is valuable only for producing cucumbers for home use. It cannot well be applied on a commercial scale. The most important thing in the production of cucumbers is to keep the plants supplied with abundant moisture, if necessary by watering or irrigation.

MOLES.—Can you advise me how to get rid of moles that plow through the soil of my garden and destroy many vegetables and flowers?
MRS. J. R., Kissimmee, Fla.

A.—Sometimes one may by watching see the mole at work and quickly throw it out of its burrow by means of a spading fork and destroy it there and then. Otherwise one has to use mole traps to get rid of the pest. They may be bought at the hardware store or be ordered from some city firm. When too active in the garden or flower beds moles are a nuisance because of the disturbance of the soil which they cause, but on the whole they do more good than harm because they feed exclusively on bugs, grubs and worms, and it is in search of their food that they plow through the ground. They never eat plants, and if the bugs, grubs and worms were not there in the ground the moles would not bother to work through it.

HOTHOUSE LAMBS.—What is the best time to have lambs dropped for forcing for the early market?
J. F., Ohio.

A.—Bulletin 270 of the agricultural experiment station of your own state gives much useful information on the subject. You should send for a free copy. It states that lambs born in July and August and maintained on clover pasture and a small amount of grain until November 25 and then fed in the barn, were produced at a smaller cost for feed than lambs born in fall and raised in the barn during winter.

USE OF PURPLE MARTINS.—I am sure that martins help to keep off hawks from chickens but would like to know whether they are beneficial as insect destroyers. They make a great noise about the farmhouse and city visitors object to this, but we country folks get accustomed to it and I must confess that I like to see the birds come back each spring and chatter about their old building places. Do they eat June bugs, or other hurtful insects? H. F. G., Wis.

A.—Attract the martins by putting up high, many-roomed bird houses which cats will not be able to invade. These beautiful, cheery, noisy birds are a boon and a blessing to the farmer by destroying millions of mosquitoes and other small pestiferous flies. They do not eat June bugs, so far as we are aware. Their best work is in mosquito destruction; but it is true perhaps that they help to keep hawks away or tell of their presence. The guinea hen is a better guard on the hawks. It is a pity about the city folks! In the city they hear a multitude of horrid noises that would about drive farm folk crazy. The elevated trains roar past their rooms night and day adding to the rattle and jumble of a thousand trucks and autos and various other jarring sounds. The chattering of the martins should be sweet music compared with such discordant, ear-shocking disturbances.

WHAT CROP TO GROW IN YOUNG ORCHARD.—I have just planted an orchard. What crops can best be grown in a growing orchard while it is still young?
C. P. H., Mich.

A.—Of course this depends on the kind of soil in the orchard. On rather light soils, beans is an especially good crop. On heavier soils clover can be grown with profit. On very rich soils small grain may be grown for a year or two but this is not advised. It is best to plant some legume crop to keep up the fertility of the soil.

BEST FERTILIZER FOR SANDY LOAM.—What kind of fertilizer is best for sandy loam with a clay subsoil?
J. R., W. Va.

A.—There is nothing better than barnyard manure if the same can be had. Otherwise grow a legume crop, plow it under and then top dress with raw rock phosphate.

CRIMSON CLOVER ON SANDY SOIL.—Is it possible for me to get a catch of crimson clover on a sandy loam?
W. P., Va.

A.—Yes. Manure heavily. Plow under and seed to clover very early in spring with oats as a nurse crop. Cut oats about the time they start to head in order to throw all the food and moisture into the growing clover. If soil is acid ground limestone should be added.

BEAN STRAW FOR COWS.—Is bean straw a good ration for cows? MRS. K. L., Wis.

A.—That depends. The straw as threshed from field beans is of little value. However, soy bean hay, grown for the special purpose of producing feed rather than beans, if cut at the right time, just before the beans ripen, makes an excellent hay for dairy cattle.

BACTERIA IN SOIL.—What is meant by "bacteria" in the soil? J. R., Ill.

A.—The soil is filled with miscroscopic plants called "bacteria" or germs. These germs play a very important part in breaking up the soil and making its plant food available for crops.

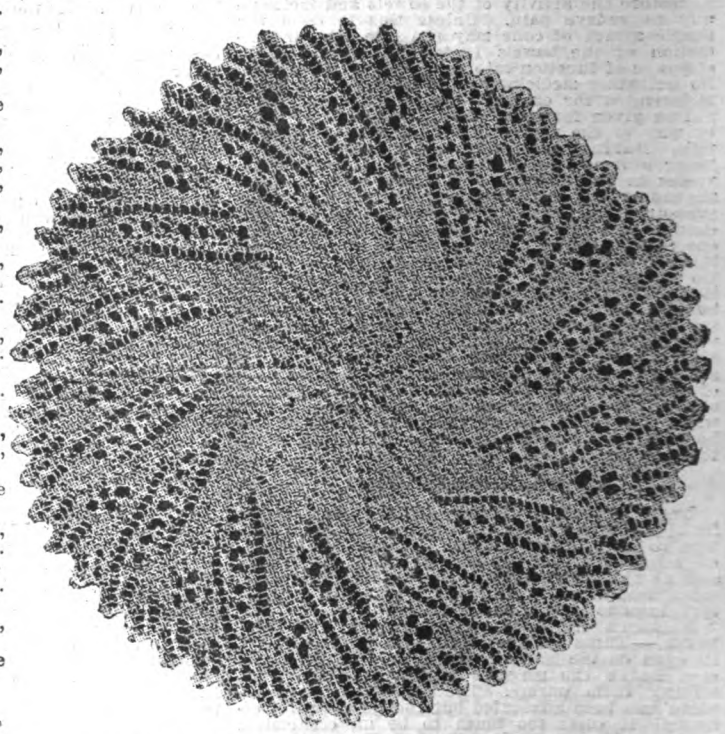
QUILT BLOCK. By Miss Anna Vogel.

Miss Vogel originated this attractive block, but writes that she will leave it for the readers to name. Patterns or samples cannot be obtained.

As designed it is to be made of three colors on white background. Green was used for the corners and turkey red for all the parts shown as black. The pieces are all cut from the colors and hemmed on to the white. This pattern is also very pretty made of red, white and blue instead of the green. Instead of the corner pieces shown diamond-shaped pieces may be substituted and the combination will be equally attractive. Made of light and dark silk and velvet this pattern makes a pretty sofa pillow cover.

If the pieces cannot be shaped exactly the idea in general can be carried out with good results.

Mrs. Mattie Noe, Novinger, Mo., requests patterns of "The Anchor," "Blazing Star" and "Sliding Rock" quilt squares. Please mail direct instead of to the Editor.



Applique Work

Applying lace to lace is an old form of fancy-work now in vogue once more. Many pieces of old lace furnish palm leaf, and other leaf as well as floral designs, that may be cut from the net ground and applied neatly to new net, or else to silk to use as dress trimming, or applied directly to the gown itself.

Very beautiful effects can be obtained by outlining creamy lace appliques with silver thread or gold thread and accentuating certain portions by French knots in the thread of silver or gold. Such pieces make lovely yokes and neck bands, or lovely vests. Coarse, heavy laces, outlined by silver or gold cords, trim tablespreads very handsomely.

Applique work is always in fashion, because it is so effective and easily managed. A beautiful cushion in satin-finish linen of grayish tint had for its decoration appliqued large scarlet urn-shaped water flowers, rising tall and stately on bold stems springing from curving, scrolly leaves. The stems and leaves are tinted in soft greens and outlined in long and short stitch in shades of green.

To applique leather, one may use a thin but strong glue, and after it has set, buttonhole the appliqued piece as closely and invisibly as possible, then outline it with a silken cord of thick strands of embroidery silk caught down by regular over-stitching in silk either matching or contrasting with the silk or leather.

THE troops composing the garrison of Amritsur paraded at seven o'clock next morning according to orders. Nothing unusual was to be observed, as the men took their places, save that the miniature army of horse, foot and artillery appeared to be more profoundly silent even than is customary at a parade of British troops.

It is the rule on the Queen's Birthday of dispensing with the routine drill, to form the troops in line, and after firing three rounds of blank cartridges, to dismiss them at once, so that they may enjoy the holiday in the manner that to each soldier seems proper. This rule was not carried out on the present occasion, to the surprise and uneasiness of the native infantry. Captain Graham by a few simple movements, so arranged the formation that the native troops were in close column of companies, the engineers in the rear and the artillery on both flanks, with the muzzles of their guns turned point blank on the restless but unsuspecting sepoys. Graham himself, together with the doctor and chaplain, fronted the native troops.

"Good! Splendid, old man," exclaimed the doctor. "I begin to believe that we have at least a fighting chance."

"Hark!" said the chaplain, "what are those cavalry trumpet notes I hear from the hills?"

Graham heard the notes, too, and as a smile of joy illumined his face, he called in a loud, firm voice:

"Attention!"

The Sepoys sprang to attention, their eyes gleaming ominously and their fingers grasping the stocks of their rifles nervously.

"Ground arms!" commanded Graham.

A movement of surprise, a murmur of disobedience ran through the ranks. The supreme moment had arrived.

"If," said Hector, throwing his eyes over the column and speaking in Hindoostanee, "you make the slightest motion unless to obey orders, the artillery on your flanks will blow you to pieces. Now hark! Listen to the trumpet-notes; reinforcements have arrived from Philour. Ground arms!"

As he spoke, the cheery notes of a bugle playing a tan ta ra rang through the morning air, and the gunners on the flanks were ready to fire and deal out destruction, when the Sepoys, like one man, stooped and placed their muskets on the ground. They were then marched outside the cantonments and their accoutrements having been taken from them, were placed as prisoners under guard.

"Mr. Caldwell," said Hector to the telegraph operator, "I see you have returned alone."

"The Philour Garrison has been butchered to a man, Captain, and the Sepoys—all infantry, are marching in this direction. I learned to play the bugle in my dull hours as an operator, and taking in the situation from the hills yonder, I thought a tune would have a good moral effect."

Hector Graham smiled and shook the operator's hand. It was the display of such courage and intelligence that saved the empire to the British in the year of our Lord, 1857.

CHAPTER III.

On the Thursday following the events narrated the Resident returned from Lahore, bringing with him a regiment of six hundred men, all Europeans excepting a troop of Sikh cavalry. On approaching the fort this detachment put out a line of skirmishers, assuming that there might be an enemy in possession, judging from the number of field-pieces they had witnessed ready for action. Great, therefore, was their surprise and pleasure when Captain Graham and his orderly met them outside the cantonments.

"Hello, Graham!" said Colonel Osborn, commander of Hector's old regiment, "what's the news?"

"All is quiet in Amritsur, Colonel."

"Sir James," said the Colonel to the Resident, who had come up, "of course you know Captain Graham, the Tiger-Slayer."

"Your native troops have remained loyal, I see," said Sir James, paying no attention to Colonel Osborne, "and Amritsur has escaped the fate of Philour, eh?"

Hector explained the situation in a few words, to which the official listened impatiently.

"You will," he said, "furnish me personally with a full and detailed report of the matter tonight at seven o'clock. I shall make the Rajah's palace my headquarters for the present. Meanwhile, order your commissariat department to provide quarters and rations for this detachment at once. I presume the road between the fort and the palace is safe?"

"Perfectly, sir," replied Hector, stung at the manner of his superior, "though I won't answer for it after tomorrow, as I learn the Philour mutineers are marching this way."

While Hector Graham is looking after the welfare of the soldiers from Lahore, let us see what Dowlah Sing, his father-in-law and the Resident's good friend, is doing at the palace. Darkness had fallen, and His Highness of Burrapore paced the veranda in a mood half impatient, half irresolute, looking at his watch at times as if expecting some one, and again halting and stamping his foot, like a man who was making up his mind to something against his will.

"I believe the dog presumes to keep me waiting," he muttered, for the twentieth time; but just then a man glided into his presence, springing, as it were, from some place unknown. This mysterious person was a man of middle age, of medium size, with a benevolent cast of countenance. He made a profound obeisance, and folding his hands before his body, and keeping his eyes on the ground, waited to be addressed.

"Roree Dhak," said the Rajah, in a low voice, "I expected you sooner."

"I did not wish to be seen, your Highness, and had to——"

"Never mind. You are a Thug, are you not?"

"Yes, your Highness; I am, the same as was my father before me."

"Thuggery is to you a means of living?"

"Yes; and it is also my religion."

"You remember that when the Ingrezi hanged or imprisoned your friends, I gave you a certificate of character."

"Your Highness saved my life."

"Good! I hope you are grateful. Have you a roomal with you?"

Roree Dhak withdrew a red silken cord from his bosom and replaced it swiftly.

"Listen, Roree Dhak. Tonight, at about nine o'clock, an officer Sahib will leave this palace for the fort."

"I hear, your Highness."

"He must never reach the fort alive."

The eyes of the Thug glistened with a savage hatred and the benevolence that appeared natural to his face gave way to an expression of deviltry terrible to see.

"Your Highness, by our benign goddess, I swear the Sahib shall die."

"Bring me any papers he may have in his possession as a sign that he is de—disposed of and claim a reward of one thousand gold rupees. But, listen; the deed must be done as near the fort as possible. Go!"

This conversation had been carried on in the audience chamber, to which the pair had withdrawn, and when it was over the Thug backed to the secret door, got behind the curtain and disappeared. Hardly had he gone when the Resident entered, dressed in a light service suit, such as is worn by officers living in India during the summer season.

"Well," he said, after the usual salutations had been exchanged, "I find that your son-in-law has covered himself with glory, and will share the honors as a hero throughout all India with Major Hodson next week."

This was said in tones of bitterest scorn and hatred.

"Next week," echoed the Rajah, in a hollow voice, "the jackals will be howling over his grave!"

"It is well, your Highness. I trust there will be no mistake. And the fellow being out of the way, I insist upon the marriage being solemnized at once."

"There shall be no delay."

"What dowry will you give with your daughter?"

"One million pounds sterling, and the domain and palace of Burrapore."

"It is a princely dowry, and well becomes the Rajah Dowlah Sing."

"In return," said the Rajah, after a pause, "I ask of your excellency to give me the papers you obtained from Delhi."

The Resident put his hand to his breast, mechanically, and hesitated.

"I shall destroy them tomorrow, after the wedding, in your presence. Business is business. Hush! Here comes Captain Graham."

"You are welcome, my brave friend," said the Rajah. "Sir James and I are about to have a glass of wine and a cigarette. Will you join us?"

"Your Highness will excuse me this time. I may avail myself of your hospitality tomorrow. Indeed, I shall, with your permission, call upon you in regard to a personal matter."

The Rajah and Resident exchanged a lightning glance, and Hector continued:

"At present I have come with a report to Sir James, and must return to the fort in haste. Colonel Osborne, now in command, under his Excellency, of course, would not be surprised at an attack from Philour before daybreak."

"Tell Colonel Osborne, Captain," said the Resident, taking the report handed him by Hector, "that I shall be down myself inside of an hour. Good night."

"Good night, your Excellency. Good night, your Highness," said Hector, saluting respectfully, "but before I go permit me to thank you for the magnificent horses you sent us."

"Ah, I am glad you like them. My daughter, the Princess, went to my summer-place at Secundra, this morning, or I would ask her to thank you once more for your gallant conduct in person."

"She has gone to Secundra, eh!" muttered Hector, as he mounted his horse. "I believe his Highness lies, and that he is conspiring with the Resident against her and me."

His pace down the avenue from the palace was slow, for he was in deep thought. As he entered a gloomy spot not far from the gate where the trees overhead interlaced, a figure advanced from the shade and Graham's horse shied.

"Stand!" he cried, drawing a pistol from his holsters and cocking it. "Not another step, or I fire!"

"It is I, sahib—Mahond."

"Ha, Mahond, my good friend, what's the matter?"

"If you will dismount," said Mahond, "I shall hold your horse. Someone in yonder glade desires to see you."

Hector Graham's heart bounded. There could be only one "someone", and, in fact, in a few seconds he was wrapped in the arms of Ajmour.

"Oh, my love, my husband!" she cried in rapture, as she kissed him again and again, "they are conspiring to separate us! But you are a gallant gentleman—a British officer—and you will not allow it!"

"No, by the heavens above us! You are my wedded wife, and there is not power enough on earth to keep me from you. But, Ajmour, your father told me he had sent you to Secundra this morning."

"No, I have been for days shut up in my apartments, watched and guarded, but Mahond kept me informed of what is going on. Mahond, the son of my ayah, effected my escape, and I was about to go down to the fort to seek the protection of my husband, when he informed me you were here."

"It is a good idea, Ajmour, and I shall take you down now and install you as mistress of my bungalow."

Ajmour uttered a cry of joy.

"But," said Hector, as he assisted her to mount a horse kept in readiness for her by Mahond, "isn't my bungalow a poor habitation for a rajah's daughter?"

"Where you are is good enough for me, and so let us depart at once before my escape is discovered."

At a signal from the Princess, Mahond led the way, and the little party was soon scouring the Amritsur road on their way to the fort.

While Hector Graham was escorting his bride to her new home the Rajah and Resident sat in the audience chamber, facing each other and smoking their cigarettes in silence, each busy with his own thoughts. The Resident despised the Rajah, but he coveted his wealth and the prestige a connection by marriage with him would bestow when one day he would go home and be made a peer of the realm not to speak about the furore the beauty of his wife would create in English society.

The Rajah, likewise, hated the Resident. This hatred was a personal one, for the official was arrogant, insolent, and almost brutal in his dealings with him—the Rajah of Burrapore, a descendent of Nadir Shah. If the rebellion now raging made much more headway, he, in common with other semi-independent princes, would join the winning side, and then woe betide Sir James Luders, were he ten times his son-in-law.

"Had these miserable wretches in Amritsur," thought the Rajah, as much nerve as their comrades of Philour—but let us wait."

"Don't you think," asked the Resident, presently, "that your messenger should be here before now with news?"

"It is surely time, your Excellency; but listen! What noise is that?"

"Volleys of musketry, by heaven! And, hark! Cannon firing from the hills. The mutineers from Philour must have arrived soone than expected and been joined by native artillery from Allambeg."

The Rajah rose from his seat and went to the window. He appeared greatly excited.

"Your Highness," said Sir James, "I must hasten to the fort at once. It would never do to have the Resident of the Punjaub sit still while fighting was going on a mile away."

"Shall I order an escort for you?"

"No, it would take time. The road between here and Amritsur is perfectly safe in your hands. I shall be here in the morning to complete our arrangemnts, for, of course, the mutineers will be beaten off."

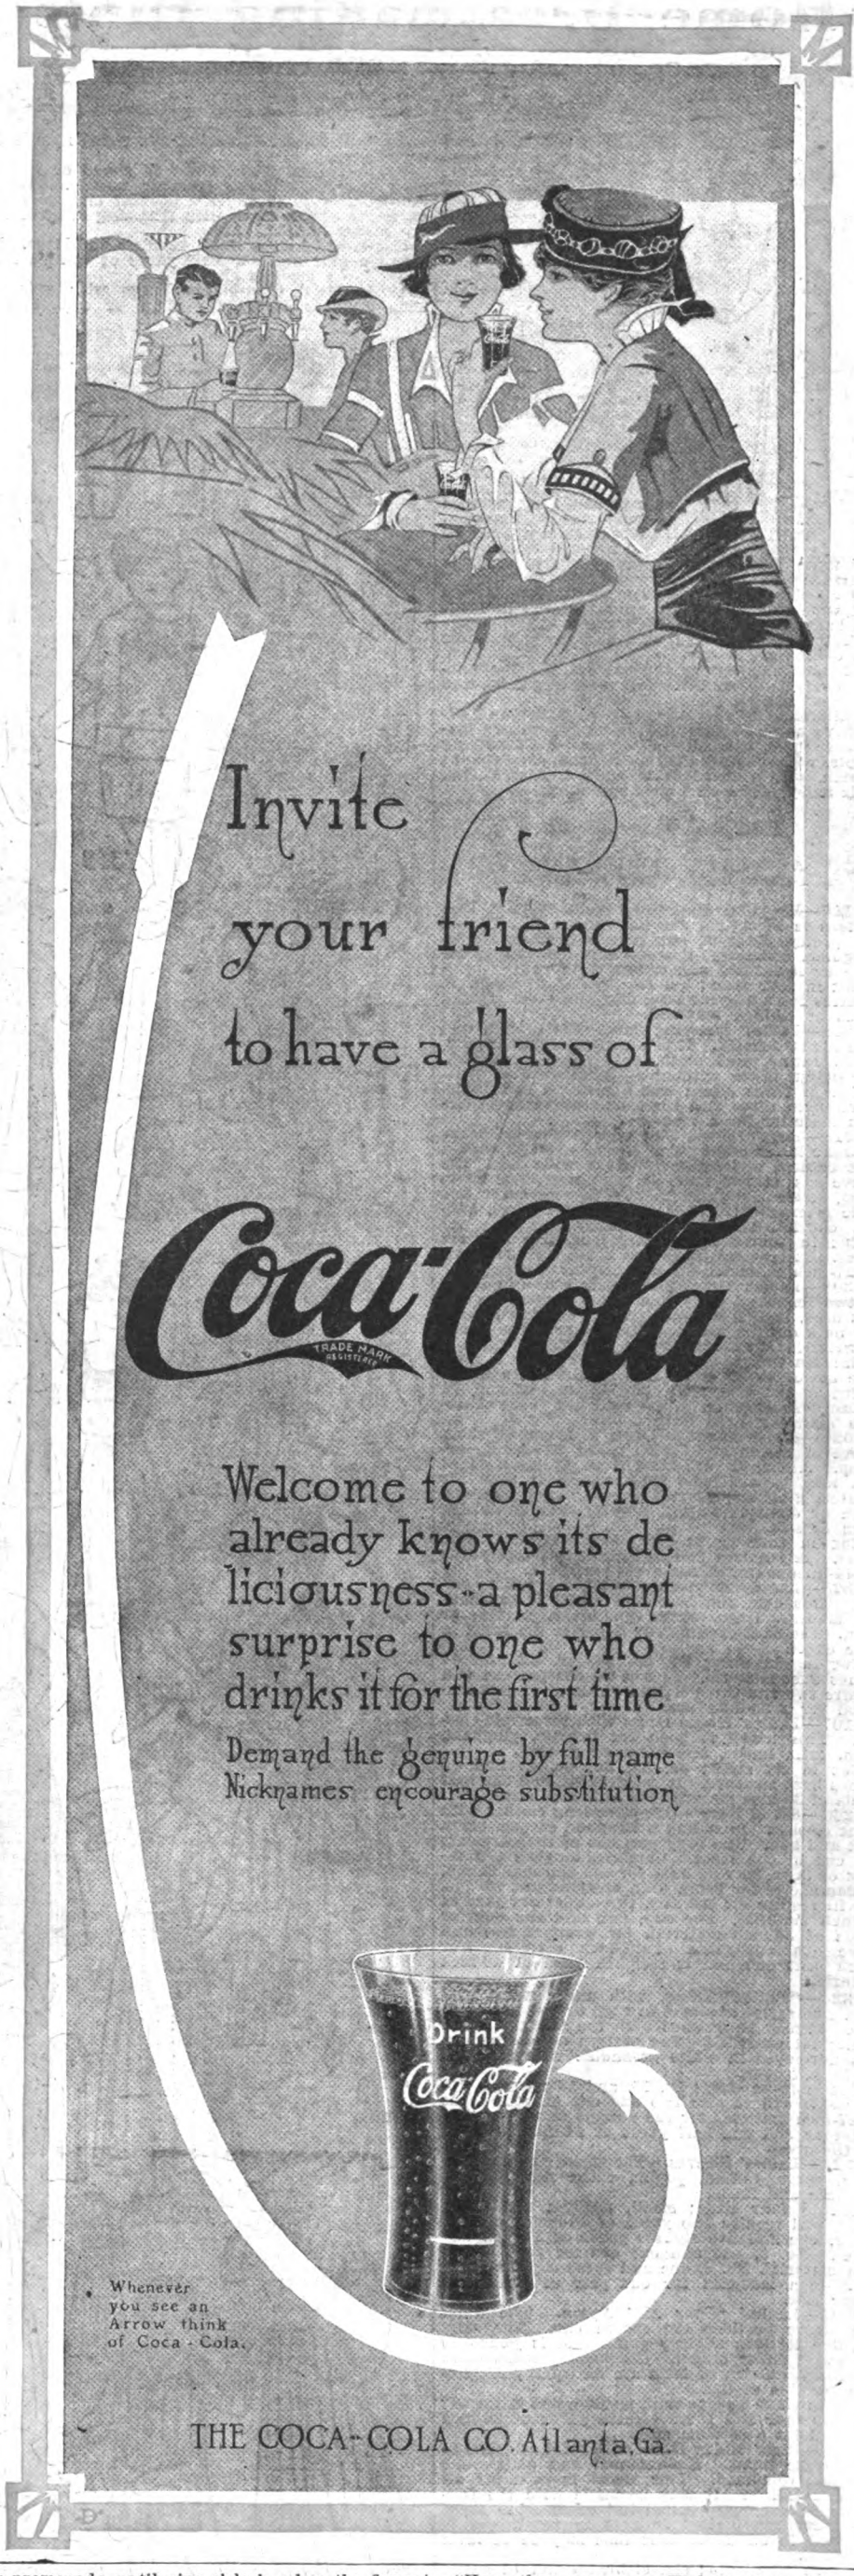
The Resident mounted and galloped furiously down the avenue, and the Rajah heaved a sigh of relief as the sound of his horse's hoofs died away in the distance. Then he grew uneasy at the unaccountable delay in the appearance of Roree Dhak.

"I hope," he soliloquized, "that the Thug has done his work. He has never failed me up to this. If there is a mishap now, I shall have to show my hand before I am ready. I am almost sorry I did not slay the dog of a Resident where he sat, and drag those terrible papers from his breast."

Meantime, the minutes flew past and the firing continued. The Rajah, chafing with impatience, as was his habit when irritated, walked rapidly up and down, this time taking the piazza for his promenade, until nine o'clock, when the figure of a man seemed to rise up out of the ground in front of him.

"It is I, Roree Dhak, your Highness," whispered the Thug, "Your enemy has perished. The great goddess Kali has been favorable."

The Rajah entered the palace, followed by the Thug.



"Where are the proofs, Roree Dhak, that you have executed your commission?"

"Here they are, your Highness," replied the Thug, placing a gold watch and a number of papers in the hands of his master.

"Go into that room, slave, and stay there till I call you."

The Thug disappeared, and Dowlah Sing examined the papers with a dubious expression of countenance. As he proceeded, his face took on a ghastly pallor, his eyes protruded almost from

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Mid-Summer Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

MANY of the new and pretty gowns are made by hand, or trimmed with hand run tucks, frills, ruchings, ruffings and exquisite embroideries.

The woman who is deft at needlework may have lovely dresses at small outlay for decoration.

One may wear anything this season providing it is becoming and chic.

For evening wear, much dark blue is used, usually in tulle relieved with some metallic trimming. Gold and silver are also used.

Shikts flare, flare with much width, and bodices are shaped more than last season. When skirts are not so constructed that they will flare, they are held out by shirred cordings or frilled petticoats worn underneath.

Some skirts are made with narrow foundations and wide overskirts that are drawn up in front and back to show the under portion.

Pretty dance frocks of embroidery, organdie and chiffon are shown.

Checked and striped taffetas are nice for summer dresses. They come in almost any color and white, and in all two-toned effects.

Children's dresses are equally quaint and attractive as those for their elders. There are suspender styles, over blouses, dresses so charmingly simple, with guimpes of crepe or lawn, dresses with French waists, and double skirts. Also ruffles, frills and flounces on waists and skirts.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH

Cambric, longcloth, nainsook or lawn may be used for the slip and flannel or flannelette for barra coat, wrapper and sacque. It will require for the sack three quarters yard of 27-inch material. For slip, two and one quarter yards of 36-inch material, for wrapper two and three quarters yards of 27-inch material. For barra coat one and one eighth yard of 40-inch material.

1323—"Junior" Dress, with under waist, and with two styles of sleeve in high or low neck outline. It may be finished with the skirt in raised or normal waistline. The pattern as here shown was developed in white grenadine with embroidery in self color.

Cut in three sizes; 12, 14, and 16 years. A 16-year size will require two and one quarter yards of 27-inch material for the guimpe or underwaist, and four and one half yards of 44-inch material for the dress.

1324—Ladies' Sleeves. The styles are good for cloth, serge, taffeta, poplin, china silk, madras, gingham and linen.

Cut in four sizes; small, medium and large. No. 1 will require two yards of 40-inch material. No. 2, one and five eighths yards of 27-inch material. No. 3, one and one quarter yard of 40-inch material. No. 4, one and three eighths yards of 27-inch material for one pair of sleeves in either size.

9994—Ladies' "Over All" Apron. The waist and sleeve portions are cut in one. The skirt has five sections slightly gored, and is joined to the waist under a belt. Gingham, percale, drill, chambrey, galatea or lawn are all equally serviceable for this design.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires four and three eighths yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1315—Girls' Middy Dress with skirt attached to a separate waist. Embroidered and plain voile are here combined. This model is good for all wash materials. It may be made with the fullness of the blouse "belted in" or in loose style. The skirt has plaited fullness in front, and is attached to an underwaist that may be of lawn or lining.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It will require three yards of 44-inch material for a 10-year size.

1307—Ladies' Corset Cover and Petticoat. This style is good for lawn, crossbar muslin, dimity, crepe, cambric, batiste or silk. The skirt may be made without the ruffle.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires three and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a medium size, without the ruffle which will require three and five eighths yards of embroidery.

9906—Ladies' Night Dress in round or square neck edge. Cambric, crossbar muslin, dimity, nainsook, crepe or silk are popular materials for garments of this kind, with trimming of embroidery edging or lace.

Cut in three sizes, small, medium and large. It requires four and one half yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1325—Girls' Over-blouse Dress with guimpe. This style is lovely for plain or embroidered linens, for cool dimity, organdie, lawn, challie, gingham or chambrey. The guimpe could be of crepe or lawn.

Cut in four sizes; four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires two and three quarters yards of 44-inch material, with one and seven eighths yards for the guimpe of 27-inch material for a 10-year size.

1320-1317—A Trim and Comfortable Combination. This comprises a smart shirt-waist made from Pattern 1320, and a stylish skirt developed from Pattern 1317. For the waist, which is cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure, crepe, taffeta, wash silk, batiste, linen, lawn or madras could be used. The skirt in covert cloth, Shepherd check, in wool or cotton material, linen, gingham, ratine, serge or voile would be suitable.

Cut in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, and 32 inches waist measure. It requires four yards of 54-inch material for a 24-inch size. The waist requires two and five eighths yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size. This calls for two separate patterns, 10c for each pattern.

1310—Ladies' Dressing or Lounging Robe. It is made with the back of the waist overlapping the fronts at the shoulders and the skirt is shirred, and finished with a deep heading.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large, and requires six and three eighths yards of 24-inch material for a medium size.

1306—Ladies' "Middy Apron" to be slipped over the head, or closed at the back. Dotted percale, with trimming of white linene is here shown. This style is also nice for gingham, jean, chambrey, lawn, sateen, or alpaca. It may be finished with or without a collar in sailor style.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires five yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1313-1256—A Pleasing Combination. The waist pattern 1313 is cut in six sizes: 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It includes the bolero. The skirt pattern 1256 is also cut in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30 and 32 inches waist measure. The skirt is circular in shape, and closes under the tuck lap in front. It may be finished in raised or normal waistline. The waist is lovely for combinations of materials, and may be made without the bolero. It requires three and one half yards of 48-inch material for bolero and skirt, and two and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for the under waist for a medium size. This calls for two separate patterns at 10c for each pattern.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires five and one half yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1327—Ladies' Costume with convertible collar, and with sleeve in either of two lengths. White or colored linen would be ideal for this style, also gingham, lawn, corduroy, ratine, crash, chambrey, poplin, voile, taffeta or serge.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six and five eighths yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1314—Child's Rompers. This style is good for galatea, linen, linene, percale, gingham or chambrey. It is cut with the waist front and body portion combined, and with back portion in two sections, waist and body.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires three and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size.

1305—Dress for Misses and small women with body lining, with long or short sleeve, and with raised or normal waistline. Light blue silk grenadine was used for this design. The shirrings are corded, and the added trimming at the neck is of soft dotted chiffon. The skirt may be finished without the heading. The waist fullness is arranged on a body lining.

Cut in four sizes; 14, 16, 17 and 18 years. It requires five yards of 36-inch material for a 14-year size.

1110—Girls' Over-blouse Dress with sleeve in either of two lengths. Plaid woolen in soft brown tones combined with tan cashmere is here portrayed. The design would develop well in other combinations.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires two and three eighths yards of 40-inch material with one and seven eighths yard for the guimpe for an eight-year size.

1319—Ladies' House Dress with or without yoke, and with sleeve in either of two lengths. Checked gingham in gray and white is here portrayed, with white linene for trimming. The sleeve is good in wrist or elbow length.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires five and three quarters yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

your answers I thought to write you in regard to a matter which has been constantly on my mind for several years. The question is this:

Do you think a gentleman loves a lady when he has been keeping company with her for several years, although he has not said one word about marriage?

I have heard that he does not intend to marry as long as his mother lives, but he has not said so much to me.

I honestly believe if I would allow other gentlemen to call, that he would be more attentive. He is a gentleman in every respect.

For fear that I will make my letter too long and by so doing it will reach the waste basket I will close.

Hope to see this in print with your opinion in regard to the above.

Very sincerely, ANXIOUS.

Anxious, my dear, I thoroughly understand your position and why your mind is troubled, and you have good reason to be troubled. I may tell you candidly I don't believe in these long winded engagements any more than I do in those rapid fire marriages. That gentleman friend of yours doubtless loves you after a fashion, but it isn't the kind of fashion that would appeal to me if I were a girl. If I were in love with a girl and able to support her, not all the fathers and mothers on earth could keep me from marrying her. No mother, precious and dear as she may be, has any right to spoil her son's life, and mother love, sweet, holy and glorious as it is, can never replace or be a satisfactory substitute for wife love in the heart of a real man. When a real mother sees her son is in love with a girl, it's up to her to say: "Now son, if you really love that girl, you marry her. I love you too well to stand in the way of your happiness, and you've no right to spoil her chances of marrying someone else by keeping her dangling around your heels on my account. I may live another twenty years and is it right for me to expect you to remain single all that time? I would be no real mother of yours if I asked you to make any such sacrifices for me. If there is any sacrifice to be made I am the one that should do it. Another thing I'm not only marring your and your sweetheart's future, but if she understands that you won't marry her until I die, I shouldn't blame her for wishing me out of the world as soon as possible, for selfish people have no right in the world anyway, and if I stand between you and her happiness, I am selfish. Bring her home and I will be a mother to her. If that is not satisfactory, start a nest of your own, but marry you must or give that girl her freedom." Now that to my idea at least is a position a real woman would take. When a man is poor and cannot do more than support himself, but is doing his level best to improve his circumstances so that he can take a wife and make her a home, then a fairly long engagement is not only excusable, but desirable, but where nothing blocks the way except an admirable, but false conception of duty to mother, that bar should be removed, and if the man won't remove it, treat him just as you would the rest of your friends. Invite others to call, and if that perfect gentleman has any real love for you, he'll be so wildly jealous the first time he hears you telling him you have another engagement and sees you later hiking off to the movies with another gink that he'll buy you a weding hoop as big as a curtain pole ring, and he'll be hauling you before a minister without giving you a chance to powder your nose or put your shoes on. When a man goes out hunting it isn't the shooting of the deer that gives him the keenest pleasure, but the excitement of the chase. When the deer is captured he forgets all about it. The excitement is over. Pretty Miss Anxious, this guy thinks he has you lashed to the mast. Whatever excitement there was in running you down has long since evaporated. He regards you as much his property as he would if

Preparing for Winter Layers

ARE you thinking of next winter's eggs? It is quite time to select a laying stock. Go carefully through the young birds, and pick out the bright, energetic-looking pullets. If possible, allow them free range, and small, clean houses which will hold fifteen or twenty without crowding. Place thirty or forty feet apart on a side-hill—the ideal condition. But if you can't have small houses on the side-hill you must contrive some place away from the older and younger birds, and make sure that it is free from vermin. Pullets must be well cared for right now or they won't make good layers next winter. It is just a waste of time and money to rear young chicks carefully and feed hens heavily in winter, if there has been an intermediate period of neglect, and unfortunately the majority of ordinary farmers do let the half-grown stock run down. By neglect, I mean carelessness in the matter of fighting vermin, supplying cool water in hot weather, and proper food. Nothing but corn, won't do for growing birds. They want, or rather must have, material to make bone and muscle. Build a good strong frame, and it is comparatively easy to get eggs in winter. If you don't believe what a difference this intermediate care makes, just try the experiment with ten healthy youngsters this season. Put them in a quarantine coop, for two weeks, and powder them every other night, then remove to a clean house. Give them free range, let them have ground oats, barley, wheat and meat scraps for breakfast. Supper, wheat or wheat and oats. Keep fresh water in clean vessels always before them in a shady place, and just watch them grow. It will, I am sure, convince you of the desirability of following my advice. About the first of October all the laying stock young and old, should be put into their permanent winter quarters, for changing fowls from one house to another often upsets them, and interferes with the egg-yield. One year, a house intended for young pullets was not finished until the end of November. Several of them had commenced to lay, but after they were moved, not an egg was found until late in December. Other years, birds from the same stock hatched at about the same time, and receiving the same care, have usually been laying regularly by the end of December, so I am positively convinced it is a mistake to delay winter housing until winter is really with us. About October 1st commence winter rations. breakfast, seven o'clock; mash made of chopped clover hay, oats and corn, ground together—two quarts of hay, to one of ground feed. Give what the birds will eat up clean every fifteen minutes, then scatter a pint of rape and meal mixed, or finely-cracked corn in the scratching material on the floor. Lunch, eleven o'clock; ground green bone or meat scraps if it is not possible to get fresh bones, cabbage or other green food, and a little more small grain, scattered as before. Supper, five o'clock; corn and oats mixed until cold weather, then omit the oats and increase the quantity of corn. Provide plenty of sand-baths (shallow boxes filled with clean, dry earth, placed in sunny parts of the house) sharp grit and clean water. A pan of skimmed milk whenever you have it to spare, but don't think milk takes the place of water. Remember if you neglect the pullets now, they won't be profitable through the winter.

One of the most difficult problems which the poultry keeper has to meet is that of keeping his poultry houses and stock reasonably free from lice, mites and other external parasites.

In keeping a poultry plant free from lice there are two points of attack; one, the birds themselves; the other, the houses, nest boxes, roosting boards, etc.

In using any kind of lice powder on the birds themselves, it should always be remembered that a single application of powder is not sufficient. When there are lice present on a bird there are always unhatched eggs of lice (nits) present, too. The proper procedure is to follow up a first application of powder with a second at an interval of four days to a week. If the birds are badly infested at the beginning it may be necessary to make still a third application. To clean the cracks and crevices of the woodwork of houses and nests of lice and vermin a liquid spray or paint is probably the most desirable form of application.

A splendid lice powder may be made at a cost of only a few cents a pound in the following way: Take three parts of gasoline and one part of crude carbolic acid; mix these together and add gradually with stirring, enough plaster of Paris to take up all the moisture. The liquid and the dry plaster should be thoroughly mixed and stirred so that the liquid will be uniformly disturbed through the mass of plaster. When enough plaster has been added the resulting mixture should be a dry, pinkish brown powder having a fairly strong carbolic odor and a rather less pronounced gasoline odor.

Do not use more plaster in mixing than is necessary to blot up the liquid. This powder is to be worked into the feathers of the birds affected with vermin. The bulk of the application should be in the fluff around the vent and on the ventral side of the body and in the fluff under the wings. Its efficiency, which is greater than that of any other lice powder known to the writer, can be very easily demonstrated by anyone to his own satisfaction. Take a bird that is covered with lice and apply the powder in the manner just described. After a lapse of about a minute, shake the bird, loosening its feathers with the fingers at the same time, over a clean piece of paper. Dead and dying lice will drop on the paper in great numbers. Anyone who will try this experiment will have no further doubt of the wonderful efficiency and value of this powder.

For a spray or paint to be applied to roosting boards, nest boxes or walls and floor of the henhouses the following preparation is used: Three parts of kerosene and one part crude carbolic acid. This is stirred up when used and may be applied with any of the hand spray pumps or with a brush.

In both of these formula it is highly important that crude carbolic acid be used instead of the purified product. Be sure and insist to the druggist on getting crude carbolic acid. It is a dark brown, dirty looking liquid, and its value depends on the fact that it contains tar oil and tar bases in addition to the pure phenol (carbolic acid.)

F. K.—I have a valuable young turkey gobbler that got sick in the early winter. He first got stiff in the legs and spends most of the time standing around alone, is drawn up and plumage is rough. His knees are too stiff to sit down easily, he tries a long time and finally comes down with great force. When walking there is a sound in the internal organs much like water shaking in a bottle. His head is pale and he has not grown since he has been ill. The droppings look healthy and his appetite is good and he is in good weight. I feed oats, millet seed and a little corn, also sour milk. There are no bruises or sores on legs and I have had no diseases among my birds. The turkey does not roam with the other birds but acts as if in pain when walking or flying. He had worms early in the fall.

A.—The gobbler must have intestinal trouble. Probably the result of inherent weakness. Such birds are dangerous to other stock and hardly ever pay for the trouble of doctoring. In justice to the rest of the birds I advise you to kill him. Worms, weak digestion and rheumatic tendencies are best cremated.

An Old Reader.—I have had a lot of trouble with my chickens. I have an incubator and have hatched a lot but have lost money. The first signs I saw of their being sick was their eyes shut and they could not open them. I have a home-made brooder; I got the plan out of COMFORT. I feed them several kinds of feed, give them a hot mash in the morning, through the day fine chick feed, corn-meal made up with buttermilk, green lettuce and onions but these are my first incubator chickens and I do not know if it is something I have given them or not.

A.—If you are using the fireless brooder with a cotton batting pad at the top the trouble may be caused by dampness unless you are careful to take the pad out every day and air it thoroughly. There is a great deal of moisture from the birds' breath during the night and it all collects in the padding above them and if it is not dried each day the atmosphere probably becomes damp and dangerous. Don't feed any mash in the morning and never feed warm food. Scatter chick feed in the litter during the day so that the chicks have to run about and hunt for it. This encourages them to take exercise and prevents them from filling their crops. About four o'clock in the afternoon give a mash made of ground oats, barley and wheat that has been moistened with scalding hot water early in the morning and allowed to steam for several hours. Just before feeding add a little hard-boiled egg which has been chopped without removing the shell, or liver which has been boiled for about ten minutes and be sure that they always have plenty of clean shop sand or fine gravel always before them.

N. H. O.—I would like to know what caused the death of one of my White Leghorns of which I have seven. They started laying in January. For about two weeks I got two to four eggs a day then they stopped laying and haven't laid any eggs since the last week in January, until the first week in March and the twelfth I found one of my pullets dead. I opened her to see if I could find out what caused her death and I found her liver to be between two and one half or three inches wide and four inches long. She looked healthy in every way, all but her comb, about in the middle of it almost as big as a pea was cracked and looked like a chapped hand cracked open. At the top of the liver was a spot about as big as a quarter that was full of little white spots. I could not find a sign of an egg in her.

A.—I cannot give you any very helpful advice about the flock of pullets because you have not told me how old they are or how you feed them. The one which died had the symptoms of the disease which in turkeys is called blackhead. Read "Poultry Farming" in COMFORT last March and write me more fully.

A. G. H.—I am a subscriber to COMFORT and should consider it a great favor if you will publish directions "Trap Nest" home-made in your next COMFORT number.

A.—I will try to oblige you by publishing instructions for making a simple "Trap Nest" within the next few months. We did publish one some time last year. Perhaps if you have your back numbers you can find it.

J. R. J.—Will you please tell me which chickens are the best layers and which are the best for table use?

A.—Leghorns are supposed to be the best layers but for a general purpose fowl I don't think there is anything as good as the White Wyandotte. They lay well all through the winter and make splendid table birds either as friers or roasters.

D. S. G.—I get much good from COMFORT Poultry Department and ask for more information. I have heard it said that Nux Vomica would kill hawks if fed to chickens if the chicks were eaten by the hawks. Is this true, if so, how should it be fed? Would it render the fowl unfit for table use while it was being fed? Is it a good remedy to feed to chicks to keep them healthy? (2) I am going to raise poultry for market and I would like to know the best breed for that purpose. I will use an incubator and brooder. I have never had any experience and it seems that some breeds are harder to raise than others.

A.—If you gave chicks sufficient of any kind of drug to kill hawks that might eat them, it would most certainly kill the chicks first. Cleanliness and good food are the best factors in keeping fowls healthy. Never use drugs unless you have to fight some disease. (2) Rhode Island Reds, Plymouth Rocks and White Wyandottes are the best general purpose fowl as they lay well and grow quickly.

F. J. W.—I have a gobbler who has a large lump under left eye, has been this way since Christmas. His eye is swollen shut and runs a little water. Have treated for roup with no success. He is healthy otherwise, eats good and is lively. None of the others have taken it. His nostrils were closed for a while with a cold. Could the lump be matter, that could not escape, and hardened? Is he fit to eat and what shall I do to cure him?

A.—I think the gobbler must have received some injury, which has caused the growth of a tumor. Open the lump with the blade of a small pocket-knife, which must be very sharp, press out any pus or hard substance that may be in it, then bathe freely with warm water and permanganate of potassium; one teaspoonful dissolved in a quart of water makes the solution so strong, that one teaspoonful of it diluted with five teaspoonfuls of water is about the right strength to use as a wash in all such cases. Keep the wound open for a few days, washing with the diluted permanganate solution every day. Keep the bird confined in a clean coop while under treatment. Personally I would not like to use the bird for food. You have not given me any idea of the hen's condition, so it is difficult to say what caused the disease, but most probably it was canker or roupy cold. In all such cases it is best to be on the safe side and treat for roup, as an ordinary cold may develop into contagious roup if not checked in the early stages.

C. A. S.—What can I do for my chickens, they have a rattling in their throat. The hens I set usually stay on the nest only about a week and then their bowels get loose. The discharge is greenish in color. I have lost none lately, but their combs look pale and they have no life. I have been puting permanganate of potash in the water, and I feed a warm mash of bran and scraps every morning. I am also going to try Epsom salts in their feed as soon as I can get some, and will also disinfect with lime.

A.—I think your hens are run down or troubled with lice or mites. Unless you have a great quantity of scraps to mix with the bran, it is a very poor food except when used in conjunction with corn or other rich fat making foods. Mash should never be fed warm and setting hens must not have mash of any kind. Give them whole corn when they come off the nest. It takes longer to adjust and sustain them for the long hours between feedings. A setting hen fed on mash or small grain, is almost sure to develop bowel trouble. You will gain nothing by putting permanganate or epsom salts in the drinking water, for your hens are underfed not overfed. Clean nests and powdering the hens before they are set, and once a week whilst they are setting, has much to do with keeping them on the nest.

T. R.—My chickens lay soft-shelled eggs, although they have plenty of grit to eat. I feed oyster-shells every day, also poultry tonic in the water. They also eat the eggs when they crush them. The chickens seem to be healthy for none of them stay on the roosts in the daytime. Please advise me.

A.—The constant use of tonics or stimulating foods or powders, irritate the egg organs and frequently cause hens to lay soft-shelled eggs. An over fat condition or worms also have the same effect: hens will usually eat eggs if they are broken, the worst of it is if they once acquire the habit they become egg eaters, and will peck hard-shelled eggs until they break them. Stop using the tonic, and feed as recommended for pullets in the beginning of this article, and keep a constant watch for eggs, so that you can remove them before they get broken.

J. A. J.—I have eight Barred Plymouth Rock hens. One by one they seem to get sick and droopy and dull. They seem to be straining often for discharge and there is a thin, mostly white, and nearly constant running discharge from the vent.

A.—You do not give me the hens' age or tell me if they have been laying, but as the discharge is white and constant, I fear it is the beginning of vent-gleet, which usually develops from an egg being broken in the egg passage and causing inflammation. Once developed it is contagious, and the whole flock may be infected. Remove the male birds at once. Examine, and if there is any sign of inflammation or sores around the vent, quarantine them and treat. The affected hens must also be confined and doctored. Fill a suitable size pail with warm water to which has been added a liberal quantity of permanganate (see answer to F. J. W.) or same strong antiseptic. Hold the bird's vent and lower body in the warm water for from fifteen to twenty minutes, then bathe and gently remove any scabs or sores. Dry on soft clean rags and annoint with an unguent of oxide of zinc ointment. Repeat treatment daily until a cure is effected. Be very careful to destroy all rags used, and wash your hands in strong disinfectant after treating birds. Personally I would use the hatchet and cremate the birds instead of doctoring.

L. G.—Will someone who has tried it tell me what success they have had, hatching turkey eggs in an incubator, and if they have to be kept warmer than hen eggs?

A.—I have for the last few years hatched most of the first eggs laid by my turkeys in incubators, but always give them to hens to brood, as they are a great deal of trouble, and don't seem to do as well when reared in brooders. Run the incubator just as you would for hens' eggs.

J. M. E.—I raise turkeys and have had a good deal of trouble with them dying with the disease called blackhead. They seem healthy, then droop and die, have a greenish yellow discharge and liver spotted. Can you tell me the cause of disease and its cure.

A.—In the March number of COMFORT I fully explained the cause of what is called blackhead in turkeys, and also gave the new cure or rather preventive. You had better refer to that as it certainly gives much more information than I possibly can in this column.

S. W.—I am writing to you for advice about my chickens, that have had some kind of a disease for about a year. Have lost about three dozen. We have about one hundred and thirty chickens. I think they caught the disease from a near neighbor, three chickens had the same disease. They have yellow droppings. Some of them are lame in one leg. Some are not sick but it is only a few days before they die. Some are sick for two and three months. All that were sick have died except one, which was sick for about three months and then got well. Some of them eat heartily and others do not eat but very little. Some of their combs are red and others are not. The hens that are two or three years old and about nine months old are the ones that get sick. I shut up some of the sick ones in a coop and gave them water with a few drops of carbolic acid in it, but it didn't do any good. I also have a hen that has been almost blind for a year, large lumps swelled under her eyes, had lumps in throat for about a week, and now there is a large lump swelled just below the throat. I saw another with her throat swelled.

A.—You don't tell me how you feed but the symptoms all point to liver complaint, over-crowding and too much heavy food. Better kill off all old hens, as it will be impossible to cure them. Those under fifteen months of age may be worth doctoring. Feed no more corn, potatoes or fattening feed of any sort. Give a light feed of wheat or oats, night and morning, all the sour milk they can drink and plenty of sharp grit and charcoal.

I. M. S.—A.—Please refer to the March issue of COMFORT and answer to J. M. E. in this number.

A. B. B.—I have four turkey hens and a young gobbler. All are about the same age except one, she being about one year old. They began laying in February, and I have set most of their eggs, but not one has hatched. This is my first trial with turkeys and I do not know anything about them. They all seem very healthy and have free range in the field and woods.

A.—Turkey eggs are generally very fertile. I cannot understand why you have had so much trouble in not hatching, unless the gobbler is too young or in poor condition.

L. C. A.—As I have been a reader for some time, I now come to you for help. All at once our chickens got sick and stopped laying. This is the way they do. Begin with a small swelling in about the center of their wattles, then keep getting larger until the swelling goes clear back to their ears and under the throat. They look very pale. The swelling is not a hard swelling as in roup, but soft as if full of air. They have free range, run to green Alfalfa clear water and feed corn. Just on a new homestead with new buildings.

A.—This is a case which I do not understand. I have never seen or heard of anything like it. Swelling, starting on the wattles and spreading down under the throat in such a way as you describe, is very puzzling. If any of our readers have had any experience of the same kind, I should be very glad to hear from them.

E. E. K.—Last fall a new disease appeared in my flock, which I had never heard of before. I had a White Leghorn hen about two years old, which was affected with a scabby rectum; she would eat and drink and seem real well, but as I could stand the offensive smell no longer, I killed her; later two of my best roosters took the disease and made rapid headway for death, but have not had any more trouble since. Will you tell me what the disease is called and what to do for it? (2) Will you explain line breeding? What is the proper age to caponize a male bird? Will a capon become broody and hatch little chicks? Please give me some advice about the ventilation in my henhouse. I house one hundred and twenty-five hens in a twenty-four by twelve-foot building, with perches the entire length of the building and one and one half feet apart.

A.—Read answer to J. A. J. Your hens and the roosters had advance vent-gleet. (2) Line breeding means carrying down through several generations one strain of blood. For example if you have an exceptionally good male bird, mate him to hens especially selected to enhance his good points, and continue to use the male progeny of such mating. Sometimes mating the pullets back to the sire, and the cockerels back to the dams for one or two seasons, to thoroughly establish the point you wish to emphasize in the strain of birds. To follow line breeding successfully you should have a great deal of scientific knowledge, and be very sure of the points you wish to perpetuate, and under all circumstances it requires common sense and great care not to allow your crossing to become inbreeding, for if you do the vigor and health are both affected. The best time to operate on male birds are when they are about three months old. Capons never get broody, but they are very quiet and if shut up in a small coop for a few days they will often accept small chicks if given to them at night, and brood them as well as any old hen. You are keeping a great many hens in a house of the dimensions you give, and I think you will find it better to take out all the windows and cover the opening with unbleached muslin.

Edna's Secret Marriage

By Charles Garvice

Copyright, 1905, by Street and Smith.
Serial rights by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Weston, old and wealthy, knowing he has but a few days to live, sends for Richard Burdon, his lawyer. Remembering a debt he owes Charles More, he revokes a will in favor of a younger brother's child and makes a new one, disposing of the lives and hearts of two, and leaves it for Mr. Burdon to carry out his bequests. The banker is found dead the next morning. Sixteen years later Sir Cyril More with wealth squandered and no aim in life, finds himself at Lucerne, Switzerland, where he meets Edna Weston, who has only Aunt Martha. Edna inquires of Sir Cyril if he knows Richard Burdon. Her father, on his death-bed charges her to go to him the first of the following September. Edna and her aunt board at the Pension, a Swiss boarding house and Sir Cyril leaves the Grand for the Pension Petre, where he gives his name to Edna and her aunt as Harold Payne. Seated in an arbor Cyril hears voices and recognizes Mr. Howley Jones, who admits being a chum of Cyril More, who has completely gone to the dogs, squandering all his money on Glitters. Edna listens and questions if he knows Sir Cyril and is it all true? He admits he has heard of him. Later Cyril meets Miss Glitters and requests her not to tell he is there. Passing on he sees Edna who has witnessed his greeting with Glitters.

A few days later, Aunt Martha, Edna, Sir Cyril and others go by train to the top of the Rigi. Returning, Cyril and Edna decide to walk down. A mist, preventing them from following the path, envelops them, and rather than have him leave her to find the path, she would rather die, Cyril clasps her in his arms, and she admits her love and promises to marry him. Without telling their secret, they go to a little Protestant church four hours' ride from Lucerne and are made one. Returning Edna realizes that Aunt Martha must be told. Coming to the Cathedral Edna recalls she has left her crepe shawl. Leaving her upon the Cathedral steps Cyril returns for it. Miss Glitters comes along and she remembers having seen Edna at the entrance of the Grand Hotel and knows she is waiting for the gentleman with whom she has seen her before. She tells Edna of his broken promises, shows her the face in the locket she wears, begs of her never to see him again and leaves her crushed with grief. Cyril returns and seeing the agony in Edna's face implores her to tell him the cause. She upbraids him for the wrong he has done. Filled with remorse he parts from her. She tries to call him back; it is too late.

Mr. Richard Burdon and Edward More, brother of Sir Cyril More, in legal consultation, learn the contents of John Weston's will and the fortune awaiting Sir Cyril More which Edward More regrets. Aunt Martha and Edna are announced. Previous to Mr. Burdon reading the will to Edna, he explains its purport, —John Weston, grateful to Sir Charles More, who saves him from financial ruin, and desirous to enrich his descendants devises the scheme of disposing of his vast wealth by the marriage of his niece Edna Weston to Sir Cyril More,—the fortune going to either Edna Weston or Sir Cyril More or to both in equal shares on one condition, that they become man and wife, leaving each free to decline or accept, without depriving the other of his or her chance of it. The choice resting with Sir Cyril, Mr. Burdon sends for him. He comes reluctantly not knowing a fortune awaits him or the conditions to which he must comply.

CYRIL made an impatient movement.

"Hadn't you better write to me, Burdon?" he said; "I leave it all to you—do what is proper in the matter, and let me go. I will send my address."

And he actually rose to go with wistful weariness which astounded and distressed the lawyer.

"Stop!" he said; "one moment, Sir Cyril. Great Heaven! you surely cannot be so indifferent—I can't let you go, Sir Cyril, until I've explained this matter; besides, I've got Miss Weston upstairs and——"

"Miss Weston!" exclaimed Cyril; "do you tell me she has anything to do with this?" and he stopped full short and stared at the bewildered face of the lawyer.

"Yes; do you know her, then?" asked Mr. Burdon.

"One question at a time," said Cyril, gravely; "you have not answered mine fully yet."

Then he sat down again and waved his hand.

"Tell me all—why don't you tell me all?"

Mr. Burdon, with a patient sigh, resumed his seat, and with a good deal less prolixity than he had indulged in up-stairs, went over the same story.

When he came to the condition he paused a little and watched his client's downcast and firmly set face with anticipatory enjoyment.

"There is only one condition, Sir Cyril—only one, and John Weston's money is yours, and that is that you marry his niece, Edna Weston."

"What!" exclaimed Cyril, springing to his feet and confronting the astonished and somewhat alarmed lawyer, with a face on which conflicting emotions struggled for expression.

"What! I—marry—Edna Weston?" and his face flushed a bright crimson that almost restored to it its old, light-hearted expression.

"That is it," said the lawyer, "and it is not a very hard condition, Sir Cyril, as you will admit when I have the pleasure and honor of introducing you. I may say, with all respect and sincerity, that a more charming, a more beautiful young girl I never saw! Ah!"—and he rubbed his hands slowly—"many a man would deem her hand alone, without all it carries with it, a fortune good enough for the gods. Sir Cyril, may I be permitted to congratulate you?"

And he turned with a congratulatory smile of the most pronounced type.

But Sir Cyril did not appear to hear him; he was lost in deepest meditation, his head resting on his hand, his lips set tight. Presently he got up and paced to and fro, and at last stopped before the lawyer, his face quite pale and stern, as if he had come to a resolution that had cost him much to arrive at.

"Burdon," he asked, in a quiet, constrained voice, "has she—Miss Weston—seen me?"

It was a strange question, and Burdon, looking hard at the haggard, resolute face, which a few months, it seemed, had been sufficient to rob of all its freshness and characteristic levity, grew more bewildered than ever.

"Has she seen you? How can I say? Ah, yes, I remember. No, certainly she has not seen you; but what has that to do with it? The choice, as I tried to explain, is with you. You propose to her, declare yourself agreeable to conform to the conditions of the deed, and in any case, whether she refuse or accept you, the money is yours. Should you refuse to do so, the money goes in its entirety to her. But of course, you will allow me to say, as an old and faithful adviser, that that is out of the question. Will you come up-stairs? One glance at her will do more to convince you of your great good fortune than any talk, legal, or otherwise. Will you come up-stairs, Sir Cyril?"

Cyril paused in his pacing, and leaned against the mantelpiece.

"No, Burdon," he said, quietly, "there is no need for that—I have made up my mind."

"Sir Cyril, I am delighted to hear it!" exclaimed Burdon, with a sigh of relief. "I—'pon my word—I said up-stairs to your brother——"

"My brother—Edward here, too!"

Mr. Burdon nodded.

"I said that you would decide at once. But come up-stairs, Sir Cyril!"

Cyril frowned.

"I think you have misunderstood me, Burdon," he said, coldly; "I have decided to decline the honor of becoming Miss Weston's suitor."

Mr. Burdon, the long-suffering, fell back in his chair and gasped for breath.

"Great Heaven!" he exclaimed. "But—Sir Cyril you cannot have understood!"

"Yes, yes!" said Cyril, with grim impatience, and a dark cloud settling on his brow.

"I understand that by consenting to marry Miss Weston I take the money with her—or without her. Well—I decline to marry her, and I relinquish any and all claims to the fortune that should in all justice be her inheritance!"

Mr. Burdon groaned, and dashed his hand upon the open deed.

"Sir Cyril! Sir Cyril!" he implored, "do consider this thing! Don't decide so hastily! Great Heaven, you are throwing away a fortune—an immense fortune!—ah! and a lovely girl, as if they were so much dirt! Take time—go abroad—the deed gives six months!"

"I do not want one month, or one week," said Cyril, with a sigh; "I have quite and finally made up my mind. I decline to fulfill the condition."

Mr. Burdon rose and pushed the deed from him, and confronted the pale, resolute face.

"Sir Cyril!" he said, "I and my father before me have been the legal advisers—the humble friends—of you and yours; we have served you faithfully and to the best of our poor ability, and you ask me to carry out such an instruction as this, to sit by and look on while a fortune slips from you—ah, and worse, to help you legally and irrecoverably to throw that fortune away from you! I can't do it!"

"I will not ask you," said Cyril, after a moment's silence, during which he walked to the table.

"Give me pen and ink."

Mr. Burdon, with a reluctant and suspicious groan, put them before him, crying:

"Don't do anything rash, Sir Cyril!"

Cyril smiled, and quietly but rapidly wrote a few lines upon a sheet of paper. This he folded and inclosed in an envelope, addressed to "Miss Edna Weston," and held it out to Burdon.

"All you have to do is to hand that to Miss Weston," he said.

Mr. Burdon took the note gingerly between his finger and thumb, and looked at it as a child might look at a dose of medicine.

"We lawyers don't like doing anything in the dark, Sir Cyril."

"What is to be done if you won't do anything in the light?" retorted Cyril. "Come, Burdon, you had better do as I wish; it will save you a world of trouble. Take my note—if you don't care to, I can send it through the post," and, with a grim smile, he took up his hat.

"Stop!" said Burdon, in despair. "I'll take it; you will wait to see if she sends any answer?"

"No answer is possible," said Cyril, "and I am in a hurry."

"In an uncommon hurry to fling away a fortune!" exclaimed Mr. Burdon, his patience quite exhausted. "Good by, Sir Cyril, if you will not listen to reason. Perhaps you will give me your address?"

"I will when I get one," said Cyril. "Good by," and he held out his hand.

As he turned to leave the room he looked up at the ceiling with a singular wistfulness, which Mr. Burdon remembered years after.

"Miss Weston is up there still?" he said.

"Yes," said Mr. Burdon, eagerly. "Will you see her?"

"No," said Cyril, shortly, and immediately disappeared.

A moment after Burdon heard a cab door shut with the usual bang, clash and the rattle of departing wheels.

He turned the letter over in his hand and looked at it with a grimace of distaste.

"I wonder what it all means—what he has said?" he muttered. "I've a great mind——" Not to give it to her, he was going to say; but Mr. Burdon, like Brutus, was an honorable man, and marched up-stairs with the letter in his hand, and anything but an amiable look upon his face.

"Well!" exclaimed Edward More, with ill-tempered curiosity, "where is he?"

"Gone!" said Mr. Burdon, almost curtly.

Edna, who sat waiting with a pale, troubled face, flushed and lowered her eyes.

"Gone!" repeated Edward More. "What for—where to?"

"That, Sir Cyril declined to inform me," said Mr. Burdon, leaning against the mantelshelf and eying the hearth rug moodily.

"Yes, he has gone, Miss Weston; and, for reasons best known to himself, refused an interview which, at least, might have paved the way to a settlement of this question."

"What's that in your hand?" asked Edward, whose eyes were sharp and nature suspicious.

"A letter," said Mr. Burdon, reluctantly, "for Miss Weston."

And he gave it to her.

"For me!" said Edna, taking it. "From——"

"Sir Cyril," nodded Mr. Burdon.

There was an intense silence of suspense.

Edna opened the envelope and read the short note and her face went from pale to red, and back to pale again. The three pairs of eyes watched her closely.

For a minute she sat with the letter in her hand; then, with a little start, she rose and held it to Mr. Burdon.

"Am I to read it?" he asked.

"Yes—aloud, if you please," she answered, in a low voice.

Mr. Burdon put up his glasses, and his voice actually quivered as he read:

"MY DEAR MISS WESTON: Mr. Burdon has informed me of your uncle's strange will, and it only remains for me to state, at once and without equivocation, that it is impossible for me to conform to the condition which is stated therein. I, therefore, withdraw any claim which I may have had, or may still have, to any part of the money accounted for by that deed; and I in no way intend to stand between the fortune and the rightful inheritor—yourself. (Signed)

"CYRIL MORE."

Edward More sprang from his chair, and stood grasping the back of it and gasping for breath.

"What!" he cried: "the idiot, the mad fool, actually refuses—yields up all claim! Then the money is hers!"

"By virtue of this little note," said Mr. Burdon, "Miss Weston, allow me to congratulate you upon the inheritance of a splendid fortune."

CHAPTER XIII.

EDNA COMES HOME.

Could it be true? It seemed so strange, so unreal, that Edna—little mountain flower, as Cyril had once lovingly called her—could scarcely persuade herself that she was awake and not dreaming, although Mr. Burdon—tall, robust and grave—and Edward More, stern, thin and irritably fidgety, looked anything but visionary. Yes, it must be true if they said so, and she, Edna, who had entered that room so poor and helpless and insignificant, would leave it rich beyond her wildest dreams, powerful, and, alas! with too many so-called friends anxiously waiting to pay their devoirs.

She looked from Aunt Martha, who was crying, to Mr. Burdon, who was beating his right hand with the letter he held in his left, with a questioning, almost terrified gaze; then suddenly her eyes grew dreamy, and a subtle change came over her face—a change that made her look sad, wistful and abstracted.

Of what was she thinking? It was a strange look for so young a girl, with all youth's innocent bloom on her, still more strange for a lady who had just heard of such an accession to wealth. Edward More stopped biting his nails to stare at her; then, as she raised her eyes and sighed, he fidgeted forward—the first to pay homage.

"Very sudden, this news, Miss Weston—takes you quite by surprise, of course; so it did me. Er—er, I think you said you were staying at Moffat's—don't you think that you would be more comfortable if you were to come and stay with us until you get settled? My wife will be delighted to receive you—she half expects you, in fact"—it was very questionable whether Mrs. Edward More was conscious of Edna's existence. "We are near town—Richmond, you know—and you shall be your own mistress. Mrs. Weston"—and he swung round sharply to Aunt Martha, who was drying her eyes furtively—"let me enlist you on my side—pray make our house your home until you are settled."

Edna hesitated for a moment only; the longing to be alone—at least, with only Aunt Martha—was too strong upon her to allow of her accepting.

"I think I would rather go back to the hotel at present, thank you," she said, gently.

Edward More nodded and frowned.

"Very good, just so, very natural, perhaps; but you will come and stay with us in a day or two, perhaps, my wife will be very much disappointed unless I take back a promise," then, too wily to force a refusal, he went on, quickly: "She will be up in town tomorrow, and will call on you; she would have come today, but was suffering from an attack of neuralgia; you will be at home tomorrow? I will come, too, if you will allow me; I may be of service—eh, Burdon?" and he turned his sharp eyes round on Mr. Burdon, who bowed assent.

Edna gave him her hand and thanked him, and Sir Cyril More's brother hurried out of the room.

Mr. Burdon, who had been writing for the last few minutes, looked up with a respectful smile.

"May I offer my services, Miss Weston? I trust there are some few things in which I may be of use to you. It has just occurred to me"—it hadn't, for he had thought of it and prepared for it early in the morning—"that you might wish o have a little change—it is so convenient in London—and I have got you some ten-pound bank notes. There they are—five hundred pounds, I think you will find," and he smoothed out a packet of crisp paper.

Edna stared and then smiled, but as Mr. Burdon appeared quite serious she took the tempting packet of stationery.

Aunt Martha gasped:

"Five hundred pounds in bank notes, my dear Edna! Why, what shall we do with it?"

"Spend it, my dear madam, spend it!" said Mr. Burdon, rubbing his hands complacently, and added, impressively:

"If you knew the extent of Miss Weston's fortune—I don't myself as yet—you would consider five hundred pounds of as little consequence as five hundred pence. I would have got you more, and will do so now, if you wish it," he said to Edna.

Edna shook her head.

"I do not know what to do with this," she said.

Mr. Burdon waved his hand slightly.

"Would you like to open an account at a bank at once? Perhaps you would? If you will, permit me to accompany you to the bank. I will pay in two thousand pounds to your account; you can then draw by check as you please; that will be the best plan, for the present, perhaps. Afterward you would like to keep a much larger amount easy to get at."

What a dream it seemed!

Edna inclined her head with a faint, puzzled smile that made her look bewitching in her ingenuous innocence.

"I will do as you advise me," she said; "I do not like to take all this money until——" and she hesitated.

Mr. Burdon smiled.

"I should feel quite pleased to advance you ten times the amount, Miss Weston; we will go to the bank, if you please," and he rang for his hat.

The bank was in Chancery Lane, and Mr. Burdon, conducting the two ladies into the manager's room, placed two thousand pounds to Edna's credit.

"You will have to sign your name in this book, so that the clerks may know your signature," he said. "Just here on this line, if you please."

Edna removed her glove and took the pen in her hand. Mr. Burdon pointed out the exact spot, and she wrote "Edna Weston."

As she raised her pen something in the name seemed to strike her, for she dropped her hand suddenly on the book, causing a blot, and turned very pale.

Mr. Burdon was ready with blotting paper and a reassuring smile.

"It is of no consequence," he said, lightly; "not the slightest; a clerk will scratch it out in a moment, Miss Weston."

When, as Edna still seemed overwhelmed by the accident—for what else could have upset her?—he took the book from before her, and in another minute a clerk had borne it away.

—Edna looked after it with a strange, wild look on her face, and seemed about to speak, but Mr. Burdon, evidently attributing her manner to overstrung nerves, interposed.

"Your cab is at the door; this has been a trying morning for you both," and, talking as they went, he escorted them through the bank offices into the street. "There is the check book," he said, handing it to Edna, "and there are the notes for a hundred pounds. I will not tire you with anything further today, but if I may call on you tomorrow——"

Edna nodded her head—she could not speak, and Mr. Burdon closed the door and the cab drove off. During the journey—not a great one—to the hotel, Aunt Martha found vent for her bewilderment in nervous exclamations and tears, but both were lost on the girl leaning back in her own corner, pale and abstracted, her small hands fast clasped together, her heart beating with painful violence.

Arrived at the old-fashioned hotel, Edna escaped to her own room, and there, alone at last, faced her position and held communion with herself. Where had she been hurried?—what had she done?

What name was it she had signed in that book at the bank? What name was it that she ought to have signed? Trembling, she threw herself on her knees beside her bed and hid her face in her hands. What right had she to the name of Edna Weston?—it had gone from her for ever! But had it? Had he not given her name back to her when he left her that afternoon in the churchyard of the old cathedral far away? Had he not yielded her again all that she had bestowed upon him—all the love of her pure, virgin heart, all the trust and truth of her young, unsullied life! Ah, but had he yielded it? Had she ceased to love him when she ceased to trust and believe in him? Where was he now—now that she was rich and powerful? He had said, with happy carelessness, that he was poor and objectless; how well she remembered it! How glad she had felt at the time that it should be so; and now she was rich, rich, immensely, cruelly rich and he——?

As she asked herself the question, the handsome face, with its light-hearted smile, rose before her like a reproachful vision. She was on the threshold of possessing a fortune that was princely in its capabilities of enjoyment and power, while he was wandering, perhaps poor, and solitary, and friendless.

"No, no," she cried, chokingly, as pride came to her aid, "not solitary, not friendless! He has other friends—fair friends—old friends, who will soon help him to forget the simple girl he deceived!"

So she strove to console herself, calling a woman's wounded pride to her aid, but it was of no avail; the handsome face still forced itself through her clasped fingers, and looked reproachfully at her.

"Oh, why—why—did we ever meet? Why did I ever see him, or he me? Why should all this misery come upon us, for he looked miserable as well as me that afternoon—miserable and wretched? Ah, perhaps he was deceiving me then; What did that woman say—that he could act like truth, that he was false—utterly false? Perhaps, while I am here torturing myself, he is amusing himself by deceiving some other poor, simple, trusting fool!"

At the bare thought, the crimson rushed to her pale face, and she sprang up, all aglow with indignation and maidenly pride.

"No! I did right. That was my name I wrote, for he gave it back to me; he took back his own. I am not his wife; he—he is not my husband! I am Edna Weston still! Perhaps," and she trembled and hid her face, "it was all a deceit; perhaps I was never, even for an hour, any other. Oh, why are men so cruel and so wicked?" and murmuring this once again, she burst into a flood of tears.

It is to be hoped that not everyone who comes into an unexpected fortune is so wretched on the day they learn the news as Edna Weston.

When Aunt Martha came to the door, knocking nervously, Edna was composed again, but very pale. Would she come down to dinner? Oh, yes. And she came down, but ate very little of the nicely arranged meal that was served in the best private room.

On that evening the two sat talking over the sudden stroke of fortune, and Aunt Martha, growing more courageous as the surprise lessened, glowed eloquently before the delight of riches, and with Edna, pale and thoughtful, beside her, promised great things.

LAMENESS.—My yearling colt is sound and all right with the exception of his stifle cap. It slips off to the outside and on at every step. It lames him when he trots or runs. Is there anything that can be done to hold the cap on or to cure the trouble? C. R.

A.—Tie the colt up short in the stable for a month or more and blister the stifle joint and around it with a mixture of one part of powdered cantharides (Spanish fly) and three parts of lard; or rub in a stimulating liniment once daily.

OVERHEATED MULE.—I have a mule that appears overheated from very little work. He does not sweat at all and pants and blows when at work. L. M. S.

A.—There seems to be no doubt that the mule must have been overheated at some time or another and that being the case he will never be able to work quite comfortably or effectively in hot weather. Work him in the cool of the morning and evening. Shade his head when at work and allow drinking water often. Put a white sheet on the body during working hours. Do not feed corn in summer.

LAMENESS.—I have a mule about six years old which has been holding her right forefoot forward for more than a year. At times she seems to be well. She first had scratches, but soon got well. She next had thrush and this lameness followed. When she stands up, or stays off the road she gets better immediately. G. B.

A.—Have oakum, pine tar and a leather pad put under a bar shoe on the lame foot; then clip the hair from the hoof-head and blister twice with a mixture of one part of powdered cantharides and three parts of lard, at an interval of two weeks.

LOCO POISONING.—I had a three-year-old mare. She was not able to lift her feet off of the ground to step over doorsill in barn. If a person was in front of her she would rear on her hind feet, paw and strike and fall over on her back, get up, walk off quivering all over. She was this way two weeks before she died. MRS. J. H. H.

A.—You have given a good description of a typical case of loco poisoning. The remedy is fifteen to twenty grains of sulphate of aluminum and permanganate of potash dissolved in water and given as a drench two or three times a day. Keep horses and other animals away from the weed, so far as that is possible.

COWS DYING.—I had a cow die a year ago last spring. In calving this spring they produce no milk. Can you tell me what to do for a cow at such a time? (2) Is there anything to put on cows' teats to keep calves from suckling? P. J. C.

A.—You do not give us any information as to the manner in which the pregnant cows are fed and managed, but it seems likely that the chief cause of trouble has been lack of nutritious and succulent or laxative feed. If the cows are well fed on mixed hay, silage or roots, oats, bran and corn and are made to take abundant exercise every day they should not experience trouble at calving time or lack milk for their calves. (2) Put a spiked halter on the calf's head so that the cow will not permit it to nurse.

BLACKLEG.—I had a calf die a few days ago. One of its hind legs was swollen from its hip to its hoof and the under side between its knee and body was cracked or scratched and bloody pus discharged. A neighbor lost one the same way last spring. J. C.

A.—You do not state the age of the calf but the symptoms indicated blackleg which is incurable, but preventable by vaccination. Better have the remaining young cattle vaccinated. Any graduate veterinarian can do the work.

LAMENESS.—I have a three-year-old mare that was kicked on front of right shoulder eighteen months ago. Part of her shoulder is swollen badly. She is lame and in walking slings her leg in. D. L. McW.

A.—A leg bone may have been fractured, in which case there will be little likelihood of recovery. If that is not the case support the mare with slings for six weeks and during that time bathe the shoulder once daily with a mild liniment, such as a mixture of half an ounce each of aqua ammonia and turpentine and a pint each of extract of witch-hazel and druggists' soap liniment.

RINGBONE.—Will you tell me through the columns of your valuable paper the best and quickest way to cure ringbone. R. S. K.

A.—If the ringbone is on a fore pastern unnerving will be necessary; if it is on a hind pastern better have it puncture-fired and blistered by a graduate veterinarian and then tie the mare up short in a stall for a six weeks' rest. If you cannot have it fired clip off the hair and blister twice a month for two months with a mixture of one dram of biniodide of mercury and one ounce of lard, the mare being kept tied up the while. This may do some good, but there is not certainty as to that, ringbone lameness being difficult to cure.

UNPROFITABLE.—I have a Jersey heifer two years old that sucks her tongue and when fed mill feed instead of eating her food she sucks it. She is very bony. Is she worth keeping? MRS. R. P. R.

A.—We cannot advise you to keep the heifer as she does not prove profitable and besides that the tongue sucking usually indicates some derangement of the digestive organs. Tuberculosis possibly is present, but the tuberculin test would have to be applied to determine that. We know of no cure for the tongue sucking, other than complete feeding and natural living.

WEAK JOINTS.—I have a three-year-old colt that has trouble with his pastern joints in his hind feet. Whenever he walks or runs they will fly out of place. It is worse when going up a hill or pulling. A. A.

A.—Commonly it is the stifle joints, at the flanks, that are affected in this way, the patella (knee cap or pan) of each joint slipping out of place and back again with a snapping noise when the colt walks or trots. Dislocation of the pastern is a much common condition. In either case treatment would consist in absolute rest and a blister applied to the weak joint, or stimulating liniment to be well rubbed in daily.

BIG HEAD.—I have a horse about five years old that had blind teeth when he was a colt. They were taken out when he was two years old. Recently one side of his nose has begun to swell and is gradually getting larger all the time.

A.—"Blind" or "wolf" teeth are harmless, never have any ill effect upon the eyes, do not cause big head (osteo-porosis) and need not be removed. The swelling possibly may be associated with cutting of molar teeth, just completed in a five-year-old, or to disease of the molar teeth, or to osteo-porosis. A graduate veterinarian will have to make an examination and determine what is wrong as one at a distance cannot make such a decision.

STIFLE LAMENESS.—I have a three-year-old mule, sixteen hands high, which I am working this year. He does not appear blemished. After standing still and I try to back him up he has some kind of a catch or cramp in both hind legs and cannot raise his feet until he has stepped forward. It is worse in the left one. I bought him last spring and have been told the mule became jangled in something and kicked until he knocked the skin off of his hind legs. Is it liable to become stringhalt? (2) What is a good remedy for lice on hogs? (3) I have a sow about one year old which won't weigh over sixty pounds. She eats well, has a good appetite but won't grow. Her excrements are always a diarrhea. L. B. E.

A.—It would appear that the stifles are affected and the kicking maybe the cause, but weakness of the muscles and ligaments of the stifle joint in fast growing colts often causes the patella (knee cap) of the stifle to slip out of place and while out the joint is locked and the leg is thrust backward. We scarcely think there is danger of stringhalt in this case, nor does it seem to be chorea (akin to St. Vitus' dance of man). It would be well to rub the stifles with stimulating liniment twice daily and if that does not suffice blister them with a mixture of one part of powdered Spanish fly and three parts of lard. (2) Use a mixture of coal tar dip according to directions given by the maker. It can be bought at any drug-store. (3) It will not pay to bother with such a sow as she is permanently stunted and possibly tubercular.

QUARTER CRACKS.—My driving horse, nine years old has quarter cracks and one of the cracks runs to the hair, and it bleeds sometimes when driving him. Is there a cure? O. L. W.

A.—Put on flat bar shoes after cutting away a small semicircular portion of the wall at the ground surface under the crack that runs to the hair. Clip the hair from the hoof-head and have a veterinarian burn a deep line across the crack at its juncture with the hair and on this as a base burn a large V in the skin of the hoof-head, the apex of the V to stand directly at the top of the crack. The V must be lightly burned, with a number of red-hot irons in turn, but on no account must it penetrate the skin. Blister the hoof-head with a fly blister and repeat every three or four weeks until sound horn fills the top of the crack.

ENLARGED JOINT.—I have a mare that was cut on one of the front feet by barbed wire. It has healed, but it caused a large joint. O. K.

A.—Swelling in the joint may be slightly decreased by bandaging every time the mare comes into the stable; but it cannot be wholly removed. Treatment other than bandaging will not be likely to do any good.

BOG SPAVIN.—I have a mare two years old that has a bunch on her left hind leg. The lump is on the front and runs through to the hock joint. E. B.

A.—Have the hock fired and blistered and then give six weeks' rest tied up in a stall, if lameness is present. Otherwise you might as well leave the condition alone. Such a mare should not be bred from as tendency to the condition is hereditary.

you were sitting inside his trunk with the lid locked. That's the way all these "puffect" gentlemen have. Now you just give that self-satisfied gink another run for his money. Give him a merry chase and you'll hear his heart thumping like a dead lamb's tail in fly time. Keep a man on the anxious seat, let him think that other people want you, and he'll be camping on the doorstep all night, treading on your heels all day, and you'll hear the machinery of his heart creaking with anxiety, making a racket like an asthmatic steer after a ten mile run. Never let any man put the branding iron on you and then turn you loose in his private pasture and say: "That's mine when I want it, and somebody can have it when I don't." No one worries about a fish after it is hooked. Never let anybody think you're hooked. There is sport in the capture but too often weariness and satiety in possession. I've been through the mill a hundred times and believe me I know what I'm talking about.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth, it costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a 15-month subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

The Girl Who Wants to Reduce

OH, how many of her there are, that girl who wants to reduce! In every mail comes plaintive little wails from the girls who lives in Idaho, and the girls who live in Maine, and the girls who live in Illinois, and the girls who live in Florida, and the girls who live in—it seems to me—every known part of the habitable globe! And their arms are too fat, and their hips are too broad, and their waists are too big, and there's a fat lump at the back of their necks, and even their legs don't come up to the desired specifications. And the one cry of each and everyone of them is, "I want to reduce!"

So that's our little stunt, this month—to reduce. Probably fat hips and abdomens are about the most serious affliction our would-be pretty girls have to undergo; so we'll consider how to make them over into just the most agreeable size.

First, let me say that fat hips and abdomens come from three reasons—lack of proper exercise, too much food or wrong kinds of food, and incorrect habits of standing.

If you rest rather heavily on your feet and let the body slump a little, the abdomen naturally sticks out in front and looks fat and heavy; but perhaps if you stand in front of your mirror and straighten the spine just as straight as ever you can, throwing the abdomen in and the seat of the body back and out, you may find that you are not half so fat as you think yourself, but that you've merely been standing in a very unlovely manner.

How about it?

Then you may be careless about your corsets, putting them on already laced and tied up. All wrong, my dears! Untie the lacings always, and loosen them before taking the corset off. When you put it on in the morning again, slip it on all untied, let the corset settle easily at the waist, then draw the corset-strings to hold the corset firmly about the abdomen, and tie. You should have another string to tie at the waist-line, but the lower string should be tied fast. Otherwise, when you draw the strings at the waist, it tends to push the flesh which belongs to the waist down below the waist-line, and gives the appearance of a fat abdomen.

Next, watch your diet, Pretty Girls! Don't eat quantities of sweet things—preserves and cakes and candies and pies—and don't eat fat meats and gravies. They all mean layers on layers of fat—not good hard flesh, but soft flabby fat—on your body, especially below your waist; and the most luscious chocolate creams or tempting dish of preserves is not worth the sacrifice of a good figure, is it?

Possibly you haven't thought of all these things in time, so we will not only have to prevent, but cure. Let us start out with a nice vigorous exercise warranted to take ever so many inches off the measurement of those too-generous hips, if you will practise it conscientiously daily for ten minutes, night and morning.

To Reduce the Abdomen

Standing with heels together, chin up, spine straight, raise the arms above the head, palms facing front and thumbs touching each other. Now, drawing in a deep breath, spring a couple of inches in the air and come down with the feet about eighteen inches apart, at the same time throwing the arms out and down and attempting to touch the floor. At first you will not be able to do this, nor until you have practised it some time; but each day your fingers will come a little nearer to the floor. Bring the arms up again, spring up, and come down with the feet together, taking a deep breath. Repeat.

This exercise will not only reduce the abdomen, but is an excellent corrective for constipation, and strengthens the muscles of the back.

Another excellent exercise which will do away with that excess fat we all dislike so much, should be practised lying on the floor.

To Strengthen All Pelvic Organs

Lie flat on the floor, on your back, with the hands clasped beneath the head, the feet resting under a bed or other heavy piece of furniture. Draw in a deep breath. Now, attempt to rise to a sitting position without the use of your hands, expelling the breath as you do so. At first, you will be surprised to find how difficult it is to lift the head even a few inches, but after continued effort you will succeed. The body should bend only at the waist. The couch keeps the feet down, and so gives the body some leverage. Each time that you sink back to the floor, draw in a deep breath; each time you rise to a sitting position, exhale as you do so.

This is a beneficial exercise for special troubles of women, as it helps to strengthen supporting ligaments and all the muscles of the abdominal region. And, of course, it exercises away the surplus fat.

Fat hips are not, however, the only too generous portion of the body we should consider, if I am to be guided by the letters from my girls. Fat arms are another subject of grievance. There are several ways to take away their superfluous inches. One particular method which is particularly effective is to grasp the upper arm with the right hand and twist the flesh as if you were pushing it around the arm. Push it as far as you can; then remove the hand, slide it down half an inch and grasp and push again. In this way go over the entire fleshy part of the arm, with much the same motion as if you were wringing a sheet just out of the washtub, and only had one hand to do it. After you have treated the left arm in this way for several minutes, use the left hand to administer the same treatment to the right arm.

An exercise which will remove surplus flesh from the arms, and give you a good healthy rounded chest is as follows:

To Reduce Fat Arms

Standing with heels together, chin up, chest out, spine straight, hold the arms on a level with the shoulders, curving them slightly in front of you and stiffening every muscle. Now without relaxing the rigidity, swing them to the right and left, respectively, in front of you. Breathe in deeply, and exhale slowly through the nose, while practising this exercise.

Don't attempt to lessen the apparent size of your arms by wearing tight sleeves. This only makes a bad condition worse, for they impede circulation and make the arms red. A reasonably loose sleeve is much more becoming.

And don't attempt to look slender by lacing the corset at the waist. This only gives a stuffed appearance, and increases the breadth of your hips.

If you will cut out the fat-producing foods and take enough exercise, you will not need reduction treatment very long. An excellent pastime for you in the meantime is to practise running in one spot until you are in a profuse perspiration. This stationary running can be practised in your bedroom, but when you are dripping with perspiration you should roll yourself in a blanket, no matter what the weather, and lie down until you are entirely rested. Every ounce of perspiration takes away some of that obnoxious surplus fat.

I hope you will all practise these exercises diligently, the coming month. If you do, you will not have so many pounds to your credit when the next month comes around. Good luck to you!

Answers to Questions

A Constant Reader.—A large abdomen is most frequently caused by overeating which has produced too much fat. A poorly fitting corset may shove the flesh down from the waist and make the abdomen look large. Always untie and loosen the lacings of the corset before taking off, and put on while unlaced, afterward drawing and tying strings across lower back and then at waist. Have three pair of garters on your corset, one garter inside each leg in front, one at the middle of each leg in front, and one at back of each leg, and fasten garters before lacing corset. Practise the exercise given below:

To Reduce the Abdomen

Lie with your back flat on the bed, arms underneath, palms down. With knees rigid, bring both legs up as far as possible, then slowly lower the first position, as if being held back by an invisible force. Inhale as legs are raised.

Bishop.—To make the bust firm, dash it night and morning with cold water, except when you are not feeling well. Also practise the exercise given below:

To Develop the Bust

Stand with heels together, toes out, head up, chest thrust forward, stomach held in. With arms outstretched at sides, on a level with the shoulders, try to have every muscle in the body tense. Then force the hands together in front of the body at full length holding the arms rigid. Now, throw the arms back as far as possible, then to the front again. Keep the hands at the shoulder level throughout. Inhale as the arms are brought back, and exhale as they come together. To make the calves of the legs larger, practise these two exercises:

To Develop the Calves

Standing with heels together, toes turned out, place your hands on the back of a chair or any other object that may be convenient. Rise on your toes; then sink to the floor, slowly bending the knees. Slowly rise to a standing position without allowing the heels to touch the floor. The object of placing your hands on the back of a chair is to help preserve your balance. Inhale when rising, exhale when squatting.

To Develop the Calves

Take a correct standing position, with hands on hips. Then slowly rise on toes, and slowly sink to the floor again. Continue this exercise until a strain is felt in the calves of the legs. Inhale when rising on toes, exhale as you lower to the floor.

Vee Bee.—If your skin is rough, chapped and feels like "dead skin," probably you have been using too much soap on the face and not rinsing it properly. Use soap on the face only at night, and then in the warm water—not rubbed on the face! Scrub thoroughly with a complexion brush, and rinse many, many times. Always rub a good cold cream into the face before applying powder, and be sure to have a good pure powder. Better drop the rouge.

A Comfort Reader.—For a too large bust, get one of the net brassieres. They are cool, but hold the bust in place; they have short sleeves, with shields. Practise the exercise given below:

To Reduce the Bust

Fasten a fully equipped pulley-weight exerciser to the wall at the height of about eight feet from the floor. Then, standing with your back to the pulley and about four or five feet away from the wall, grasp the rope ends and allow the pulley weights to pull your hands up and back as far as they will go. Now, strike out and down with considerable force, as if you were actually striking at something. Dash cold water on the bust night and morning, except when you are not feeling well. You had better begin to look after your diet, cutting out sweet things.

Lassie.—To remove superfluous hair from your lips, anoint one day with peroxide of hydrogen, the next with ammonia. This will take some months. You ask for a quick depilatory which you can use on the arms or elsewhere, whenever you do not mind the hair coming back again—as it most certainly will, and stronger than ever.

An Effective Depilatory

Sulphuret of barium, one half ounce; water, two ounces. Mix into a paste by wetting corn-starch with the solution, and apply to the offending hairs. When dry, the hairs will come away with it. If the skin is irritated, rub in a good skin food. Bear in mind that this only removes the hair temporarily, and that the roots will soon send out a new growth which will have to be burnt off again. For this reason, this depilatory must not be used on face or neck.

Elsie F.—Powder is not bad for the skin if you first apply a good cold cream and rub it into the skin thoroughly, wiping off with a soft cloth. Paint is objectionable as a matter of good taste. If used, cold cream should be first applied, the rouge, then the powder. Soda isn't exactly the thing for your teeth. Why not buy a good tooth paste? A good brushing with warm water three times a day will keep the teeth clean, with an occasional quick rubbing with a cut lemon. Using cold cream and powder before going outdoors will prevent tan and sunburn.

Sweet Sixteen.—Your writing is very good and clear, my dear. For a fleshy protuberant mole or wart, tie a silk thread tight around base. After a few days it will turn black, wither up and drop off. For the smooth moles, apply a freckle lotion, though your diet probably needs attention.

Hope.—See answer to "Sweet Sixteen." Use a cut lemon on the offending spots, and drink a glass of cool water half an hour before breakfast every morning to which the juice of half a lemon, without sugar, has been added. Drink eight to ten glasses of water a day and see that the bowels move freely every day. The exercise given to "Constant Reader" is also good for constipation.

A. A.—Sorry you can't get that ingredient for the Wrinkle Cream. Use this formula instead:

Wrinkle Lotion

Alum, thirty grains; rose-water, three ounces; almond milk (thick), three quarter ounce.

Massaging the wrinkles with cold cream will help to drive them away.

Mrs. B. C.—You do not give your weight, so I cannot tell whether you should reduce or how to advise you. You should weigh about one hundred and thirty-five pounds.

An Interested Friend.—I am giving, below, directions for making a potpourri jar, which I suppose is what you want. You can, of course, use the mixture to fill sachets.

Potpourri Jar

To fill your potpourri jar, the rose petals should not be gathered any time except in the morning when the dew is still on them. After they have been left in a cool airy place until the moisture in them has all dried, pack them in a large stone jar sprinkling salt on top, whenever you pack them, to the depth of another half inch. Gather your rose leaves every morning until the jar is full. Then let it stand for ten days more, stirring it thoroughly every morning. Your petals are now ready for the spice treatment. Take an ounce of cloves, an ounce of allspice, coarsely ground, and an ounce of stick cinnamon. Break it into as small pieces as possible with your fingers, and then mix with your petals by putting a layer of your petals into a second stone jar and then a layer of the mixed spices, alternating in this fashion until your second jar is full. The jar should now be tightly covered and let to stand in a dark place for three weeks. The petals are now ready for the final jar.

Marie D.—Electrolysis is, of course, the best way of getting rid of superfluous hair. It costs five dollars an hour, but even fifteen minutes removes quite a number of hairs. If you cannot afford this, try the French method which is effective though slow. Anoint the affected hairs with peroxide of hydrogen one day and aqua ammonia the next. If this irritates the skin, stop for a few days and rub a little cold cream into the skin; resume again.

A Girl in Despair.—It takes seven or eight months to get rid of superfluous hair by using peroxide and ammonia.

Kathleen.—Don't begin to use a dye on your hair or you will ruin it forever. Instead, massage the scalp nightly. Shampoo the hair once in two weeks and see that the scalp is kept free of dandruff. If you will pour olive oil on the scalp the night before shampooing, and tie the head up in a heavy towel, you will find the dandruff comes off easily. Brush the hair fifty to one hundred strokes every night. Probably your health is run down. Your hair always suffers if you get nervous and out of order physically. Eat three good hearty meals a day, and build yourself up. Read the answers to other members of the Pretty Girls' Club about diet and water.

Cinderella.—The probability is that you use entirely too much soap on your face. Start tonight by scrubbing the face with hot soapy water and a complexion brush; rinse many times in warm water and finally dash on cold water to close the pores. After drying, rub in a little good cold cream. Never rub soap on the washcloth or directly on the face. Always rub cold cream into the skin and then wipe off thoroughly before applying powder. Be careful that neither corsets, waistbands, collars, sleeves nor shoes are tight. In regard to your styes. Pay particular attention to your diet. Late hours and excessive fatigue usually cause them. Rub a little vaseline on the edges of the eyes at night, and wash out once a day with an eyecup and a three per cent solution of boric acid. Try not to use your eyes at night or by gaslight. Keeping the bowels open freely will help this condition.

W. B. G.—The Milk Diet, of course, would be the best thing for you, but you say you cannot take it. However, you can increase your bust measurement by exercise and the continual use of cocoa-butter. Practise the exercise given to "A Comfort Reader." Eat plenty of potatoes, rice, cereals, butter, etc., unless you are constipated. Drink eight to ten glasses of water a day and see that the bowels move freely every day. Don't eat fried foods.

A. E. D.—Your whole system needs a general building up. If you will take the Milk Diet for six weeks you will get rid of the nervous headache, hollow chest and flat bosom. It will also clear your complexion. Won't you try it? Directions were given in the July issue. Take a good dose of Castor oil every three or four weeks for the constipation. Have the druggist mix it up for you in a glass of sarsaparilla. The exercise given to "A Constant Reader" is an excellent thing to practise for constipation.

their sockets, and large drops of perspiration stood on his brow.

"Almighty Heaven!" he exclaimed, as he staggered toward the arras. "The villainous Thug has slain the Resident!"

"Slave!" he cried, in a hoarse whisper, "come forth! Whom did you slay?"

"The Resident Sahib, your Highness."

"So I see. But that was not the man I pointed out to you. The officer who preceded him was the one I wanted disposed of."

"You said it was the sahib that would ride down alone. The first officer was accompanied by your daughter, the Princess Ajmour and her servant, Mahond."

"The Princess Ajmour? Impossible, slave!"

"It is as I say, your Highness. The party rode fast, as if afraid of pursuit."

The Rajah, after telling the Thug to conceal himself, once more summoned an officer of his household.

"Tell the Princess I want to see her at once," he said; "and also her attendant, Mahond."

When alone, the Rajah resumed examination of the papers, and he heaved a profound sigh of relief as he found amongst them his dangerous correspondence with the Great Mogul. He also found an undated letter from Sir James to the Goveror-General of India, in which it was stated that Dowlah Sing, Rajah of the Burrapore, had been executed for treason, after having first been tried by court-martial.

"I have had a narrow escape," he thought, "for which Allah be praised. What will be, will be."

"Your Highness," said the officer who had been dispatched to summon Ajmour, "the Princess is not anywhere to be seen, neither is Mahond."

"Ah!" said the Rajah. "Perhaps they are on the grounds somewhere. You may go. Remain within call."

"Here, Roree Dhak, is the gold I promised you," said the Rajah to the Thug, whom he called from his concealment, "for, although you killed the wrong man, it was through an unfortunate misunderstanding that cannot be helped. Silence till death. You hear."

The Thug prostrated himself to the ground, disappearing like a snake in the grass, and the Rajah summoned the officer whom he had sent for the Princess.

"Roree Dhak has just left the palace," he said; "follow him, and have him placed in a cell where he cannot communicate with anyone without my permission."

A week later, the Calcutta Record had this item of news:

"It is cheering in these troublous times to be able to record such devoted loyalty as that manifested by Dowlah Sing, the Rajah of Burrapore. This semi-independent potentate, one of the richest in India, has not only raised and equipped ten thousand men in the Company's service, but has bestowed his daughter in marriage on Capt. Hector Graham, of the Thirteenth Native Infantry, in recognition of his heroic services in saving Amritsur from the fate of Philour. According to yesterday's issue of the Military Gazette, Captain Graham has been promoted to a majorship, and will act as Deputy Resident of the Punjaub until someone is appointed to replace the late Sir James Luders, murdered by a Thug on May the 24th. We learn from a still later dispatch that the Rajah's police captured the Thug, a desperate fanatic, known as Roree Dhak, as he was about to leave the Residency for Delhi, and had him executed on the public square of Amritsur."

And such is history.

Pair Of Turkish Towels

Premium No. 7302

For Two Subscriptions

AFTER bathing there is nothing quite so fine as a good rub down with a Turkish towel, in fact it is the best towel for all purposes, whether for the bath- or guestroom or for everyday family use in the lavatory, kitchen or pantry. They absorb the water much more readily than other towels and the thick, heavy fleece-like surface imparts to the body a delightful feeling of warmth and well-being, exhilarating the whole system and literally making one feel like "jumping over a high board fence." These towels are also great for baby's toilet as they will not hurt the tender skin. The towels we offer here are genuine Turkish towels—not the imitation kind—and are 17 inches wide and 36 inches long which is a good convenient size for all-round family use. They are of good weight, well made and finished and are in every respect equal to towels that you would willingly pay $1.00 a pair for in any store. We will make you a present of one pair of these fine Turkish towels upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 35 cents each, or one three-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you one pair (3) of these towels free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 7302.

CHAPTER XXI.

IMOGEN'S CONFESSION.

"YOU must excuse me, Mrs. Weston," Mr. Fletcher observed, as he suddenly aroused himself from the absorbing reflections which closed our last chapter, "but your question relating to an enemy awakened a startling train of thought, and I believe that I have finally got hold of a thread which will enable me to unravel this perplexing mystery; if it proves to be the right one, I will tell you later, for, of course, you are deeply interested in this matter as well as I. I have not a doubt that that dear girl in the other room is my daughter, and I feel that I owe you a great deal for your goodness and the careful attention you have bestowed upon her education; she is a little lady, of whom any father or mother has a right to be proud."

"Mr. Fletcher, you owe me nothing," Mrs. Weston responded, while tears dropped thick and fast from her eyes, "for Alice has been a dear daughter to me—she has more than repaid me for all the care and love that I have given her. You must pardon my tears," she added, and trying to smile as she wiped them away, "but, really, I find it quite a wrench to my heartstrings to think that she must be told that I am not her own mother, although I am truly glad and thankful that she can be restored to you. By the way, I have carefully preserved the extension in which she came to us, thinking that possibly it might sometime prove a clew to her identity. The girls have often questioned me about the perforations in the top, and I have allowed them to believe they were for the benefit of a pet cat that was transported in it when we moved from Dover to Col. Hamblin's estate. You are welcome to it, if it will be of any assistance to you in fathoming the secrets of the past."

"Thank you; I may require it; if I do, I will come for it. But now I must return immediately to Castleview, for I imagine the judge must be very impatient and wondering what detains me. With your permission, I will look in upon Alice a moment before I go," Mr. Fletcher remarked, as he arose. Then he paused and thoughtfully observed: "Perhaps it will be best not to mention to her the subject of our conversation until I am able to learn something more definite. But I will return this afternoon, when we will discuss the matter further."

He passed out into the sitting-room, where Alice, who was really very comfortable, was talking over the recent trial with Will and May.

She greeted Mr. Fletcher with a bright smile, which made him yearn to gather her to his heart and claim her on the spot; but he controlled the impulse and quietly observed:

"I find it is getting late, and I must go home at once; but I am coming to see you again this afternoon. Get all the rest you can, my dear, for you have had a hard tussle in my behalf during the last week, and I am more sorry than I can express to have it terminate so unfortunately for you."

He clasped her hand, then, with sudden impulse, bent down and touched his lips to her forehead in a light caress.

Alice lifted a glance of surprise to him, while a lovely flush mantled her face.

Mr. Fletcher, observing the blush, smiled.

"I will give you a more substantial expression of my gratitude later on," he said, lightly. Then, turning to Will, he inquired if he would ride to Castleview with him.

"Perhaps I ought; what do you say, Mamma Weston?" the young man questioned, and lifting an arch but appealing look to that lady.

She laughed, for she knew that he wanted her permission to remain where he was.

"Yes, I think you may as well run away for a while, for I want Alice to sleep if she can; but you also may come later," she told him.

So the gentlemen took their leave and were soon rolling over the road to Castleview, while Mr. Fletcher confided to Will what he had learned regarding Alice and what he suspected in connection with the author of the great wrong he had sustained.

The young man was amazed. He could scarcely credit what he heard or believe anything so wondrous of Imogen, as what Mr. Fletcher surmised.

The woman had always been very kind to him, especially during the years he had spent under the same roof with her at Castleview; and yet he could now recall there had been times when he had felt repelled by her.

On reaching Castleview they were met at the door by Olive, who, although she smiled on Will, had anything but a cheerful welcome home for Mr. Fletcher.

Her face wore a sour and sullen look.

"Oh, hasn't it all been just horrid, papa?" she cried, in an irritable tone, as she mechanically put her lips to be kissed.

"Why, my dear, I certainly expected to receive congratulations instead of complaints," Mr. Fletcher replied, in a disappointed tone, while he studied her face attentively, "and I am sure you will rejoice with me when I tell you that the missing papers are found—that I am honorably acquitted, and my name and reputation untarnished."

"Yes, I know that already, for William and Jack brought the news," the girl returned, but without manifesting the slightest enthusiasm. "Of course, I am glad, but the whole affair has been a dreadful mess anyway, and now, to cap the climax, Aunt Imogen is sick in bed; she was found just after breakfast in a dead faint in her room."

Mr. Fletcher sighed: he was greatly disappointed to find her so selfish and fretful.

"How is your—how is the judge?" he inquired, and involuntarily correcting the form of his speech.

"Oh, he is much better, but awfully impatient to have you come—you were a great while getting here; William and Jack came a long time ago. What kept you?" Olive inquired.

"A little matter that had to be attended to," said Mr. Fletcher, coldly adding, "but I will go directly and tell the judge the result of this morning's revelations."

He ran lightly up-stairs as he spoke, and Will would have followed, but Olive detained him.

"Well," she remarked, with a sneer, as she placed herself in his path, "so our young lawyer in petticoats has come off with flying colors. She has created quite a sensation, hasn't she?"

The young man flushed hotly and a scathing retort arose to his lips; but, putting a strong curb upon himself, he quietly responded:

"Yes, Miss Weston has certainly done herself great honor and won a signal triumph for your —Mr. Fletcher."

"Ha! ha!" the jealous girl laughed, shrilly, "I suppose she will soon be putting out her shingle and aspire to take up cudgels with the smartest lawyers of the realm."

Will's eyes flashed fire, but with icy dignity he remarked, while he looked her straight in the face:

"I think she will never have very much to do with either shingles or cudgels, Olive; but I can vouch for the fact that she will, within a short time, send out some cards, and, since they will bear the Marchmont crest, you will hereafter oblige me by speaking more respectfully of the future Lady of Leith."

He did not wait to note the effect of his words, but stepped one side and followed Mr. Fletcher up to Judge Ashburton's room. Olive turned and gazed after him in wide-eyed amazement for a moment, then, cramming her handkerchief into her mouth to stifle the scream of mingled rage and pain that leaped to her throat, she fled to her own room, and was seen no more that day.

The judge was very much better this morning, and was sitting up, partially dressed, when Mr. Fletcher entered his room. He greeted his son-in-law with affectionate cordiality, and then eagerly demanded a report of the grand finale of "the case," for no one as yet had been able to explain anything clearly to him. He was greatly astonished, and became considerably excited when he learned how Alice had effected the capture of the thief who stole the papers, and how, upon their presentation in court, they had changed the verdict of the jury and wiped out every suspicion against Mr. Fletcher.

"But how came the man to be on the balcony outside her window? What was he doing there at that hour of the morning?" the judge inquired.

Both Mr. Fletcher and Will looked puzzled.

Amid the various exciting incidents of the morning, they had not once thought to ask the how, why or the wherefore of the burglar's appearance at Castleview.

The judge's question set Mr. Fletcher to thinking, however.

He suddenly remembered that when Imogen had made her visit to him in jail she had told him that she had her suspicions as to the whereabouts of the stolen documents.

Could it be possible that she had been in league with someone to plunge him into such a precarious situation in order to either wheedle or drive him into a marriage with her?

He recalled how suddenly she had snapped back at him when he had asked her if she took them from his safe, and she had vehemently voiced the very thought that had just occurred to him, and passionately denied it.

He began to think that she had overreached herself in that instance, and that she might have been an accomplice in the robbery, that the man who was that morning arrested with the papers on his person may have paid her a secret visit to confer with her upon the matter, and so been captured after leaving her.

He could not understand why he should have adopted that mode of egress from the house if they had been in league, but the fact that, almost immediately afterward, on returning to her room, Imogen had fainted and was found unconscious, showed that she had sustained a severe shock, and he believed it had been occasioned in some way by the man now under arrest.

He mentioned these circumstances and suspicions to his companions, and, after discussing them at some length, the judge advised that he return to town as soon as practicable, seek an interview with the prisoner, and see what information he could gain from him.

After a refreshing bath, and making some change in his apparel, Mr. Fletcher again ordered the carriage and was driven back to the jail from which he had just been released.

He found the prisoner, whom he had come to visit, in a state of abject fear. He was an arrant coward where his own safety was concerned, in spite of the life he had led, and now, having been caught in the net which he had spread for another, he realized that a straightforward course would be best, and he made a clean breast of everything, from the hour that he became Imogen Ingraham's tool in Rome down to the present time, including an account of how and when he had stolen the official papers from Castleview.

It was a thrilling and terrible tale to his listener, who rebelled in every fiber of his being against the foul wrong of which he and his daughter had been the unconscious victims for so many years, while he had been harboring in his household the serpent that had thus stung him.

When the man concluded, he begged Mr. Fletcher to save him—to help him to escape conviction and transportation. He wanted to go home to America, he said, with a nervous sob, and would promise never to lift his hand to wrong anyone again if he could go free.

Mr. Fletcher pitied, while at the same time he felt an utter contempt for him. He promised to do what he could to mitigate his condition, although he did not encourage the hope that he would escape all punishment.

After leaving him he again hastened home, for he wished to see Imogen and ascertain when and how she had changed the children on board the steamer.

Reardon had told him that he could not swear that she had effected the exchange, for he had not been an eye-witness to the deed; but he had seen her go on and off the vessel, and in each instance bearing the perforated extension.

Roland Fletcher felt that everything pointed to the exchange, but he must have the confession from the woman's own lips ere he could feel perfectly sure.

He went directly to her room as soon as he entered the house. A maid answered his knock on the door.

"How is Mrs. Ingraham?" he questioned.

"She is more comfortable, sir; she has not had a 'spell' for two hours, now," the girl replied.

"Please say to her that I wish to see her," said her master, briefly.

"Yes, sir," and the maid disappeared.

She was back in a moment.

"She says come in, sir," and she stood aside to let him pass.

Mr. Fletcher motioned her to go out and then closed the door after her, after which he went on to Imogen's chamber. She was in bed, looking white and wretched. Her eyes were sunken and an expression of hopeless misery burned in their dusky depths.

The man went and stood beside her couch, looking down upon her with a gravely determined face.

"I think I may be pardoned this intrusion, in view of the present emergency," he began. "I will not weary you; I have only a question or two to ask, then I will go. I have just come from Windsor jail, and the man who, more than twenty years ago, was your tool in Rome. He has told me the whole story from beginning to end, but there is one fact upon which you alone can throw light—how and when did you succeed in changing those children on board the steamer?"

Imogen's spirit was not quite crushed; her eyes flashed and she began to bridle.

"You are assuming a great deal," she began.

"I am assuming nothing," her companion sternly interposed. "I know that Olive is not my daughter; I know that she is your child, born in Rome, January 3, 18—, and christened Helen Farquahar Ingraham on the fifteenth of the same month. More than this," he concluded, with a thrill of exceeding tenderness in his tones, "I have found my own daughter."

"What!" exclaimed the startled woman, as she sprang to her elbow, while she searched his face with terrified eyes.

"Yes, God be praised! I have found her!" said Mr. Fletcher. "I have identified her by the crosses that I tattooed upon her ankles, and which are as clear and distinct today as if they had been done but yesterday."

"Wha—where——" Imogen gasped, with white lips.

"She has hitherto been known as Alice Weston," Mr. Fletcher went on to explain. "Mrs. Weston has acknowledged to me that she is not her own child—that she was abandoned April 27, 18—, supposedly by a woman whom her husband passed in the road as he was returning to his home from Dover, and who, he believed, had left the babe on the porch of their house, in an extension, the top of which was perforated to admit air. Now, how and when did you manage to effect the exchange on that vessel? That is now the only missing link in the chain of evidence to prove the fact."

Imogen sank back, panting and weak, upon her pillow, and for a moment Mr. Fletcher thought

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

R. G., Seattle, Wash.—Now that you have your COMFORT telescope if you will get a chart of the heavens and an ordinary school text book on astronomy—you can get both probably at a second-hand book-store, very cheap—and study upon the subject until you know in a very short time what to look for in the sky at night, you will gain a great deal of most interesting and useful knowledge, not only through the glass, but by the book and chart. We are glad you are so pleased with the Excelsior. Get the book even if you don't get the chart.

H. W. C., Hunter, La.—In reply to your "Art" questions, we may say that paintings are bought by people with money to pay for them in all parts of the world, more, probably, being bought in the United States than anywhere else. We have scarcely space to print a list of buyers of paintings as they are to be found in every town in the country. Prices range from two dollars to $200,000 and more, a half a million we think being the highest price paid in this country for one painting. Letters addressed to Museum of Art, in New York, Philadelphia, Detroit, Chicago, Cincinnati, Washington, or any of the large cities would reach, as all of them have art galleries of some grade or other.

I. M. D., Burkeville, Va.—Marriage between white and colored people is prohibited and punishable in Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, North and South Carolina, Oklahoma, Oregon, Tennessee, Texas, Utah and the two Virginias. In other states it is not, though there are very few such marriages.

C. C., Brownville, N. Y.—To become a rural free delivery carrier you must be of good character, have a good English education and pass the necessary Civil Service examination. You do not receive appointment from the New York state government, but the National government, and you should write to Secretary, Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C. for detailed information.

C. A., Crawford, Texas.—The capital of Holland is The Hague, or in Dutch, Den Haag, or is Graven Hage, meaning the Count's Haw, or garden, it being originally the lodge, or dwelling, of the Counts of Holland. The name is often called Hague, but The Hague is what it should be called.

J. S. K., Paint Rock, Ala.—Some Confederate soldiers may have received discharges at the close of the Civil War, but at the last, there was no longer any government to grant such papers and naturally they could not get them. Ask some of the old Confederates in your neighborhood how about it.

Inquisitive, Ovid, N. Y.—COMFORT knows a great deal, but thus far it has not learned whether the stars and planets are inhabited or not, nor what kind of people live there, if any. Mars shows lines that resemble canals, but whether they are is not known. The reason there are no mermaids in Zoos is that there are no mermaids now living, and never existed except in fable.

V. S. S., Sloan, N. Y.—A name to be a legal name must be the one a person is known by and does business under, and it may not be the same that he was born with and christened by. Persons may have their natural names changed by law, while many without legal change are known by assumed names, especially theatrical people and authors. The post-office authorities very often decline to deliver mail to fictitious addresses, and always, unless they know good reasons why it should be delivered.

C. B., Gillen Mt., N. C.—You will find the reliable advertisers you are seeking by examining the advertising columns of COMFORT. You don't read very carefully one of the most interesting departments of COMFORT or you would not have asked the question you did. Study COMFORT's advertising columns if you want to learn valuable information. (2) Calcium carbide is made by the action of electricity on lime, but you can't make it. You can buy it in ton lots if you want that much.

S. A. B., Caldwell, Texas.—A manager's secretary usually must know stenography, though some few have duties which do not require such knowledge.

C. B. D., Fort Caswell, N. C.—So far there are no records discovered which settle definitely what people first settled in what is now America, nor whence they came, or how. The general belief is that they were of Mongolian or other Asiatic extraction. Haven't you an encyclopedia in your town from which you could get much matter in detail on the subject? If there is not, the town should buy one and place it in the public school library.

W. T. S., Macon, Georgia.—There is always a dearth of farm labor in the West during harvesting and good men can get good pay and plenty to do, but we think hardly as much as three dollars a day, unless for a few days during a pinch. We are glad you don't like work in the cities and want to get back to the farm. If you will go West and show yourself intelligent and capable, sober and industrious, you can get permanent work and before a great while, either rent or own a farm. The farmer of good habits and new methods is sure to be independent, even if he doesn't become a millionaire.

Miss H. K.—Perfumes of all kinds, very good and in price to suit all purses are so much better and cheaper than any of the home-made kind that you are wasting time and money trying to prepare your own. Fill a jar with fragrant flowers, close it and let them dry there, and you will have about the only home-made perfume worth having. (2) Borax will not cause the hair to grow. If it did, the bald-heads of this country would corner the borax market.

M. M. L., Browning, Mo.—A great many people, some among COMFORT readers, believe quite sincerely that they have the hypnotic power, and perhaps they have, but before attempting its study and practise we advise that such believers have a talk with a physician. Hypnotism is all right when practised properly by skilled hypnotists, but so many ignorant and unskilled persons have done so much harm with it that in some states legal measures are being taken to restrict its practise, as the practise of medicine is restricted. The best time to take care of yourself is before anything happens.

Mrs. W. T., Gennfast, Mich.—Not a few COMFORT readers are asking about the value of fresh water pearls and to them all we say now as before, that unless the pearls are of good size, say as large as a pea, or larger, they are of little value unless they can be supplied in large quantities.

J. E. G., Pomona, N. Y.—We are informed by a sailor of experience that linseed oil is the best thing you can use to water-proof your canvas and that it will not rot it. There are numerous preparations for water-proofing textile fabrics of all kinds, but they are complicated and expensive, as well as difficult of application to large surfaces as is your engine canvas. Tar preparation is used in making tarpaulins water-proof, but they are very stiff and hard to handle.

Perplexed, Bandon, Oregon.—Thirty-five is not at all too old to take a course in a business college, though it might be in a classical college. Take it by all means if you feel the need of it. One never gets too old to learn something.

E. B., Center Ridge, Ark.—There is no premium on a violin merely because it is old. Generally speaking a very old violin of any make is better than a new and unseasoned one, and worth more, but the violins that command big figures are only those of the famous old violin makers. Lyon & Healy of Chicago are leading authorities on old violins. Write to them.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S HOME LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

W. R. N., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a surviving widow and two children, his widow would receive a life estate in one third of his real estate and one third of the personal property absolutely, the balance going in equal shares to the children; we think the estate of the son who thereafter died would include his share of his father's estate, and if he left no widow or descendant, and left no will, would be divided between his mother and his brothers and sisters, his mother receiving a double portion; we think the debts of decedent must be paid from his estate before any share is paid to the heirs at law and next of kin; we think any person owning an interest in this real estate can compel a partition or sale of the same in the proper action brought for that purpose, but that the signature of the son's wife would be necessary to convey good title by voluntary deed of the property.

Mrs. B. D., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of Texas, we do not think that the signature of a child is necessary to the deed of real estate belonging to the father.

O. E. G., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that a married woman must survive her husband before she acquires any perfected right in his property, except that he can be compelled to support her in a manner commensurate with his means and station in life, the exact proportion of his income or the amount she would be entitled to receive from him in a separation action, and the question of the custody of the children would be determined by the court before which the action was tried; we think the wife who abandons her husband without just cause forfeits her right to such support; we think infidelity or cruelty would be considered a good reason for the wife's leaving her husband.

I. E., California.—Under the laws of Arkansas, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a man or woman, leaving no child or descendant, and leaving no will, his or her estate if the same be real estate and be ancestral and came from the father's side, will go to the line of the father's side, the half blood as well as the whole blood taking their share.

D. J. McL., North Carolina.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that your local authorities have the legal right to assess and compel the collection of road taxes, and we do not think their refusal to lay out a new road would legally excuse you from the payment of a legally assessed road tax.

R. F., New Jersey.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that a deed of conveyance of real estate to a husband and wife, naming them and describing them as such therein, creates a tenancy by the entirety, and that the whole property, upon the death of one, would become the sole property of the survivor; we think that in your state a married woman can by will bar all of her husband's interest in her estate, except his right to curtesy in her real estate, where the same exists; we think that in order to create such curtesy rights to such husband, there must be issue born alive to their union, and that, where the same exists, such curtesy to the husband consists of a life estate in all his wife's real estate if he survives her; in your state we think the wife can sell her real estate without her husband's consent, and that his curtesy right depends entirely upon the three things namely; that issue be born alive to their marriage; (2) that she dies in possession of such real estate, and (3) that he survives her.

C. H. T., Alberta.—We think that the parents are entitled to the custody and control of their minor children; we do not think that your brother has any legal right to interfere in any way with your affairs.

E. I. T., Texas.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all real or personal property owned by the wife at the time of her marriage together with all acquired thereafter by gift, devise or descent, as also the increase of such lands remains her seperate property, and she is entitled to the full management and income thereof, except that husband must join in deed of wife's real estate, and except that such of her separate property as she may voluntarily deed or give to her husband would then become his property.

M. F. M., Alabama.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all agreements affecting the title of real estate must be in writing, but that title to real estate may be acquired by undisputed possession or occupation thereof without a record title to same; and that actions for the recovery of real estate should be brought within ten years, and that action against the sureties of an administrator are limited to six years for any act of malfeasance of their principal the time being computed from the time such act is committed.

Mrs. E. B. W., Nebraska.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that a wife must survive her husband before she has any alienable rights in his property, except that he must support her. That upon his death, without a will, and provided she is the parent of all his children and there be two or more children, or one child and the issue of one or more deceased children surviving, we think, she would, after payment of debts, receive one third of both the real and personal estate and in addition thereto some small allowance from the personal property; we think this share would be reduced in case she was not the parent of all his children, and increased in case there was only one child and she was the parent of such child, or in case he left no issue.

A. L., Oklahoma.—We are of the opinion that the law prohibits the publication of a libel, either in newspapers or otherwise.

Miss C., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a married man cannot convey homestead property without his wife's signature to the deed, and that she is entitled to dower of a one third interest for life in his real estate if she survives him, and a child's part of his personal property; we do not think her right to this share of his estate can be diminished by will, but we think he can by will cut off any or all of his children as he may see fit; we think that if the man you mention has become mentally incompetent and cannot conduct his business, the courts upon notice to him, and upon the presentation of the proper papers and case, will appoint some person trustee, committee or guardian of his property.

Mrs. C. W., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving no descendants his whole estate after payment of debts would go to his surviving widow; we do not think he can, by will, diminish her share to less than dower of a one third interest for life in his real estate and a one third interest absolutely in his personal property.

Mrs. E. C., Louisiana.—Your statements are not full enough for us to form an opinion as to whether the marriage of your father and mother was a valid one, but in case it was not we are of the opinion that, under the laws of your state, natural children are called to the succession of their natural mother, when they have been duly acknowledged by her, if she has left no lawful children or descendants to the exclusion of her parents and other descendants or collaterals of lawful kindred, but that bastards, adulterous or incestuous children shall not enjoy the right of inheriting the estates of their natural father or mother, and that they are allowed alimony only.

Comfort Sisters' Corner

have heard people say, "Oh, I haven't time to fool with it." But I do as much work as any ordinary housekeeper. Have three children to care for, besides my own washing, ironing, raising chickens, and making a garden every year. I have also tacked a lot of carpet rags this spring.

We own five acres of land about one half mile from the little town of Elkins. We have a three-room house, large rooms and a porch. Have good soft water and timber close by, where my chickens run, and scratch in the leaves.

Our house stands on a high piece of ground, and it is quite a desirable place to live.

Our little town has one bank, one church, one school building, five stores, one barber shop, a lumber yard, and lots of nice dwellings. We built our house last summer.

My oldest child is a girl, Helen, seven years old, and is continually wanting to do something to help me. She irons small pieces and sweeps. She ironed today, so Tommy, my next youngest, wanted to do something to help too, so I left it to him to keep the woodbox filled; while Woodrow, three years old, amused himself making runaway horses out of my clothes pins.

I am twenty-six years old, have brown hair and blue eyes and am five feet four and one half inches tall. Maybe you know me better now.

Would like to hear from any of you,

MRS. BERTA WILSON.

Mrs. Wilson, You are, unconsciously perhaps, following the Montessori method of teaching small children, which is finding favor with many people. If Tommy rebels against being told to "sit still and be a good boy" and wants to help, that does not imply that he is stubborn but simply that he is obeying nature, the greatest of all forces. This activity should be directed into the proper channels. It is useless to try to repress it and to keep a child out of mischief, keep him busy with something interesting and at the same time instructive. Let him do the work without assistance and thus develop his powers of reasoning.—Ed.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

To stop windows from rattling, an ordinary clothespin is most effective. It must be split in halves and one half inserted on either side between the framework and the window.

When frying eggs put cold grease in cold skillet and let them heat together and there will be no sticking.

MRS. W. H. GARDINIER, 1026 Orange St., Youngstown, Ohio.

Cook a few pea pods with the peas and see how it improves the flavor.

Before pouring hot fruit into a glass dish or jar, put it on a wet cloth and place a long-handled spoon in the jar. This will prevent cracking.

Mix mustard with milk instead of water and it will keep fresh longer.

A few grains of corn-starch in the salt cellar will prevent caking.

If your cupboard is damp, place in it a small box filled with lime; this absorbs the moisture.

To take the odor of fish and onions from cooking utensils, boil a little vinegar in them after washing; then rinse thoroughly.

Remedies

HEADACHE.—Putting the feet in hot water will often cure a headache by drawing the blood from the head.

DIARRHEA.—Orange peel tea sweetened with loaf sugar and used as a drink for a few days will often effect a cure.

POISON OAK.—Chop one quart of tan oak bark and boil it in two quarts of water down to a pint; strain and it is ready for use. Wring out a cloth in the liquid and apply to the affected parts. It is also good for poison ivy. MRS. ALICE M. JAQUES, Weitchpec, Cal.

RHEUMATISM.—Take one tablespoon pure lime juice in a glass of water, three times a day.

Sister: Read My Free Offer!

I am a woman.
I know a woman's trials.
I know her need of sympathy and help.

If you, my sister, are unhappy because of ill-health, if you feel unfit for household duties, social pleasures, or daily employment, write and tell me just how you suffer, and ask for my free ten days' trial of a home treatment suited to your needs. Men cannot understand women's sufferings. What we women know from experience, we know better than any man. I want to tell you how to cure yourself at home at a cost of about 12 cents a week.

If you suffer from women's peculiar ailments causing pain in the head, back, or bowels, feeling of weight and dragging down sensation, falling or displacement of pelvic organs, causing kidney and bladder weakness or constipation and piles, painful or irregular periods, catarrhal conditions and discharges, extreme nervousness, depressed spirits, melancholy, desire to cry, fear of something evil about to happen, creeping feeling along the spine, palpitation, hot flashes, weariness, sallow complexion with dark circles under the eyes, pain in the left breast or general feeling that life is not worth living.

I INVITE YOU TO SEND TODAY FOR MY FREE TEN DAYS' TREATMENT

and learn how these ailments can be easily and surely conquered at home without the dangers and expense of an operation. When you are cured, and able to enjoy life again, you can pass the good word along to some other sufferer. My home treatment is for young or old. To Mothers of Daughters, I will explain how to overcome green sickness (chlorosis), irregularities, headaches, and lassitude in young women and restore them to plumpness and health. Tell me if you are worried about your daughter. Remember it costs you nothing to give my home treatment a ten days' trial, and does not interfere with daily work. If health is worth asking for, then accept my generous offer and write for the free treatment, including my illustrated booklet, "Women's Own Medical Adviser." I will send all in plain wrappers postpaid. To save time, you can cut out this offer, mark your feelings, and return to me. Send today, as you may not see this offer again. Address

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

J. M. N., Westfield, Wis.—Asafetida is a strong and useful stimulant in many cases and in this of epilepsy it may be what is needed, but the physician, not you, nor we, should prescribe the dose and the application after he has examined the patient and determined the proper treatment. You don't know and we can only guess at it, so both of us are incapable. (2) We cannot give addresses of inquirers.

J. A. L., Bayonne, N. J.—COMFORT readers often ask us about goiter and as often we tell them that goiter is not a disease for simple treatment. A physician must be consulted who knows the disease and can prescribe no less for its cure than for its prevention. Go to one of the hospitals in New York and be properly advised and treated. There are free clinics and you do not have to remain in the hospital.

H. R., Lothair, Mont.—There are no catarrh hospitals near you that we know of. If your case is serious you might go to the Mayo Brothers' Hospital at Rochester, Minn. The best remedy for catarrh is to get away from the climate which induces or aggravates it. Almost any change is better than to remain where you can't get rid of it.

Miss S., College Hill, Ky.—Self-treatment of moles will almost invariably make them worse, and even expert skin-specialists often fail. You must have them examined by a physician and take his advice as to attempting their removal. Sometimes they may be removed by any physician, and the right kind of a physican will not treat them unless he knows their nature and the proper treatment.

E. R., Ashley, W. Va.—As one doctor says the lump is a wen and the other says it is an enlarged gland, suppose you go to the one who pronounces it a wen and ask him to take it out, if he is sure it is a wen that may be removed. But let it remain for a wen and in the meantime massage it with your hand two or three times a day and perhaps it will be absorbed. Iodine is the usual external application, but something more is often necessary in such cases. If an operation must be performed for its removal, it will be simple and not very painful.

Miss M. F., Trenton, N. J.—You say you have rheumatism in your "limb," but do not specify which limb. There are four limbs to the body, two legs and two arms. Still rheumatism is about as bad in one as it is in the other and the worst thing about it is that there is no "sure cure" for rheumatism yet discovered by medical science. The wisest treatment is to have an examination made by a physician and get his prescription for relief remedies and his advice as to diet and care as a preventive. You say you eat everything as your digestion is perfect. Now, if you ate no meat of any kind, you would very soon find that you would be less liable to rheumatism. Diet has a very great deal to do with it and you give that no attention whatever. Again a damp climate is bad for it and you probably have that where you live. Try the hot, dry climate of Arizona for a month or two, or permanently, and see what effect that will have.

V. L. V., Ethel, W. Va.—There is no simple treatment for goiter. It is a serious disease requiring careful treatment by a physician who has had some experience with it. As you are so young and it has not been long developing, you might prevent its growth entirely by moving to some distant locality where you would have a change of drinking-water.

Mrs. M. H., Grafton, W. Va.—The "good old-fashioned remedy" doctrine has disappeared and the newer and better fashioned remedy is taking its place, but not yet as it should, for people are slow to learn. This new-fashioned remedy is prevention rather than cure. You are fifty-seven years old, and if for the past fifty years you had been taking proper care of yourself to prevent disease, instead of letting disease get you and then spending time and money for a cure, you would not be suffering now. It is too late now to make you young again, but if you will begin to exercise proper care in the food you eat and the manner of your living, you will find great relief, for your digestion is bad and the cough you have comes from that more than it does from any lung trouble. Bad digestion makes you blue, too, and the days you feel bright and well are the days when what you have eaten is properly digested. For a while substitute hot milk or cocoa for tea or coffee, eat no meat or potatoes, and try eggs, hard toast or all-wheat bread, stewed fruit, rice, raw cabbage, stewed tomatoes, boiled onions, peas or beans and never swallow a mouthful of food until it is chewed to a pulp. Drink hot water when you are thirsty, and two or three times a week, if you need a laxative, take a dose of Epsom or Glauber salts in hot water before breakfast. If you have acidity of stomach after eating, take a pinch of cooking-soda in half a glass of hot water. You might take this every morning when you get up.

Mrs. P. J. D., Hope, N. Dak.—Be careful how you handle any small growth on your face, especially if it only bothers you by its looks. Nature puts them there for some reason and interference with them will often cause serious trouble. Let a doctor look at it and if he is sure that it can be safely removed without harm, or a scar, then let him remove it.

M. C. C., Middlebury, Vt.—The pain in your back which you and so many similar sufferers think is from the kidneys—your doctor knew better—is due to some disorder of the great nerves in that part of the body, —lumbago being an aggravated form—but just what is not definitely known. A common remedy is salicylate of soda—five grain tablets three times a day—but all the neuralgia remedies are used at times. Salicylate should not be used longer than three or four days at a time as it disturbs the stomach. An excellent external application is chloroform liniment, not rubbed on, but poured on a cloth and held tight over the affected part. To prevent blistering, as soon as it begins to bite, remove the cloth for a minute to another spot and change it about. The relief is not permanent, but it is immediate. Self-treatment will answer as far as we have indicated, but if it becomes very severe a physician should be consulted. A silk belt, or bandage, wide enough to cover the small of the back and sides is often worn as a relief, and it is a protection from drafts at night.

Blue Eyes, Dunlow, W. Va.—Your sore mouth is due to bad digestion and careless eating of foods which irritate the mucous membrane. For the sores wash the mouth every hour with a solution of two drams of borax in three ounces of glycerine in same amount of water. If the sores ulcerate touch them with the point of a stick of lunar caustic. A pinch of soda in a half a glass of water two or three times a day will be of benefit.

South C., Whittier, Cal.—Leprosy is one of the oldest of diseases, having been known in Egypt 4,000 years ago. What causes it is not definitely known, and it is incurable. It is known as a "dirt disease," that is, filth favors its development. It is not a painful disease and its development is slow. The tendency is hereditary, and it is contagious; it may be contracted by contact. There are leper hospitals or colonies in some states and the cases of leprosy are becoming more numerous in the United States, the disease being brought here by Asiatic immigrants. (2) You cannot toughen your lips to prevent chapping. Use cold cream, or some soothing salve, but not glycerine. (3) The enlarged bone where the great toe and foot join is a bunion and the remedy for it is to wear shoes that are perfectly easy. Shoes that are too tight will press on it and by and by it will become serious and you will have to have a doctor.

M. S., Patagonia, Ariz.—For pimples and blackheads, press out the contents and bathe the skin in salt water. The skin should be gently massaged two or three times a day to excite circulation and the face should be washed night and morning in hot water and pure soap, Castile. Stop eating greasy and sweet food and drinking coffee.

V. J. D., Orange, Ga.—We have frequently suggested to inquirers on the subject of pellagra that they get in touch with their state boards of health and we supposed that was sufficient hint for them to inquire of county officials, or local physicians, for addresses of state officials, but it seems that more details are needed. Therefore we suggest that inquirers about pellagra who do not know where their own state officials may be found, should inquire of their county officials or local doctors who can give all needed information, which we do not have.

Marion, Tacoma, Wash.—Unless you wish to take a course of treatment from a physician, or a hair specialist, for dandruff, which may be the result of disorders beyond the scalp, about as good remedies as you can find are those to be had at drug-stores. They are better and cheaper than you can compound yourself. (2) There is no safer way of treating handkerchiefs used by a consumptive than boiling them. There are ways which are less trouble, but they are not so effective.

Pansy Blossom, Glen Allen, Va.—Like many women most of your trouble is in thinking you are sick. You are nervous because you let your nerves control you and you have that tired feeling because you will not use enough will power to throw it off. As for the itching on the body that is due to nerves, and if you will rub your skin with cocoa-butter night and morning when you have it, you will get relief. The doctor you had was treating you all right, but you were leaving it all to him instead of doing your part in getting yourself into normal condition. Call him in again, take his advice, not much of his medicine, and make a great big resolve that there is nothing much the matter and you will forget it and thank the Lord it is no worse.

she was going to faint again. But after a moment she faltered weakly:

"The stewardess left the child alone in her stateroom for a few moments when the consul's wife and her maid were about to leave the steamer. She locked the door, but left the key in it. I was on the watch in a toilet room opposite, and in less than ten minutes I had changed the children and was off the boat."

"Then Olive is your child, the Helen Farquahar Ingraham, who was christened in Rome on January 15, 18—?" briefly questioned Mr. Fletcher.

The woman did not reply, but she shrank beneath his accusing eyes as under a lash.

"Tell me!"

"Yes," but the admission was scarcely audible.

"And you remember the crosses on the child's ankles? Were they clear and distinct when you left her at John Weston's door?"

"I cannot tell; I noticed that there were some sores on her ankles the day I made the exchange, but I never thought of them again," Imogen explained, and, seeing he was bound to have the truth, "I started immediately for England, buying my ticket through to Paris, intending to drop my burden in the station at our first stopping place; but there were people in the car who were also going through, and, having seen the child with me, I dared not leave her anywhere. I could not stop over at any station, for my ticket was limited, and so I was obliged to take her all the way. I was terribly car-sick during the entire trip, and those same people, pitying me, took most of the care of the child, and that was how I never again noticed the marks you speak of. As soon as we reached Calais I took the first boat for Dover, walked a mile from the landing, and dropped the extension at a small house that stood remote from others, but I never knew who lived in it—I never wished to know. Then I went to London, where I remained for a few weeks, after which I begged Judge Ashburton to let me come home."

"Have you never known or suspected where my child has been during all these years? Have you never tried to ascertain her condition in life?" questioned Mr. Fletcher, sternly.

"No; at least not until we went to Leith last year, when one of the Weston girls took that extension there and I recognized it."

"Was it that which made you faint in the hall at Marchmont Court?"

"Yes. The shock came so suddenly I was wholly unprepared, and was gone before I realized that there was anything the matter with me."

"That is all I wish to know; and I will not weary you more; all the facts are proved, and we will discuss the subject no further at present."

Mr. Fletcher turned abruptly from her as he concluded and walked directly from the room, without heeding the cry of despair, the plea for mercy and forgiveness that burst from the wretched woman's lips, or the thin, trembling hand which she threw out to detain him.

He immediately sought the judge, to whom he rehearsed the thrilling tale, and then, unmindful of the fact that he had had no lunch, although the afternoon was waning, he hastened away to Beechcote, whither Will had already gone.

The judge would have been glad to accompany him, for he also was eager to own the brilliant and lovely girl, of whom he had become very fond and proud, as his granddaughter, but he thought it best to wait a day or two until he was stronger.

While rejoicing that the old-time mystery was at last satisfactorily explained, he was nevertheless greatly shocked to find that the woman whom, all her life, he had befriended and treated like an own daughter, should have proved so treacherous.

He was somewhat appalled, also, by the fact that Olive was her child, for, in spite of her faults, he had always been fond of the girl, and it was not easy to awake to the fact that she was not akin to him, but had always been an impostor, although an unconscious one; while, as he sat by himself, thinking over the wonderful revelations of the last few days, he was conscious of a growing sense of exultation, in view of the new relationship he sustained to Alice.

"To think of it!" he exclaimed to himself, "I have been educating my own flesh and blood, and it is no wonder that we found ourselves so en rapport with each other! I can now understand where she got her love for the law. I am half inclined to be sorry, though, that she isn't a man, for it seems a pity that the world should lose the benefit of such brilliant talents as she possesses."

Recently, the station has been in communication with the wireless station at San Diego, Cal.

WE INVITE

EVERY THIN MAN AND WOMAN HERE

Every Reader of This Magazine to Get Fat at Our Expense

Don't be the "Skeleton at the Feast" Sargol makes Puny, Peevish People Plump and Popular

This is an invitation that no thin man or woman can afford to ignore. We will tell you why. We are going to give you a wonderful discovery that helps digest the food you eat, that hundreds of letters say puts good solid flesh on people who are thin and underweight.

How can we do this? We will tell you. We have found a wonderful concentrated treatment for increasing cell growth, the very substance of which our bodies are made; for putting in the blood the red corpuscles which every thin man and woman so sadly needs—a scientific assimilative agent to strengthen the nerves and put the digestive tract in such shape that every ounce of flesh making food may give its full amount of nourishment to the blood instead of passing through the system undigested and unassimilated. Users tell of how this treatment has made indigestion and other stomach trouble quickly disappear while old dyspeptics, and many sufferers from weak nerves and lack of vitality declare in effect it has made them feel like a two year old. This new treatment, which has proved such a boon to thin people is called SARGOL. Don't forget the name S-A-R-G-O-L. Nothing so good has ever been discovered before.

Women who never appeared stylish in anything they wore because of their thinness, men underweight or lacking in nerve force or energy have, by their own testimony, been able to enjoy the pleasures of life—been fitted to fight life's battles, as never for years, through the use of "Sargol."

If you want a beautiful and well rounded figure of symmetrical proportions of which you can feel justly proud—a body full of throbbing life and energy, write The Sargol Company, 12-G. Herald Building, Binghamton, N. Y., today and we will send you, absolutely free, a 50c box of Sargol to prove all we claim. Take one with every meal and see how quickly these marvelous little concentrated tablets commence their busy, useful work of upbuilding. Many users declare they have increased their weight at the rate of one pound a day.

But you say you want proof! Well, here you are. Here are extracts from the statements of those who have tried—who have been convinced and who will swear to the virtues of this wonderful preparation.

REV. GEORGE W. DAVIS says:

"I have made a faithful trial of the Sargol treatment and must say it has brought to me new life and vigor. I have gained twenty pounds and now weigh 170 pounds, and, what is better, I have gained the days of my boyhood. It has been the turning point of my life. My health is now fine. I don't have to take any medicine at all and never want to again."

MRS. A. I. RODENHEISER writes:

"I have gained immensely since I took Sargol, for I only weighed about 106 pounds when I began using it and now I weigh 130 pounds, so really this makes twenty-four pounds. I feel stronger and am looking better than ever before, and now I carry rosy cheeks, which is something I could never say before.

"My old friends who have been used to seeing me with a thin, long face, say that I am looking better than they have ever seen me before, and father and mother are so pleased to think I have got to look so well and weigh so heavy 'for me.'"

CLAY JOHNSON says:

"Please send me another ten-day treatment. I am well pleased with Sargol. It has been the light of my life. I am getting back to my proper weight again. When I began to take Sargol I only weighed 138 pounds, and now, four weeks later, I am weighing 153 pounds and feeling fine. I don't have that stupid feeling every morning that I used to have. I feel good all the time. I want to put on about five pounds of flesh and that will be all I want."

F. GAGNON writes:

"Here is my report since taking the Sargol treatment. I am a man 67 years of age and was all run down to the very bottom. I had to quit work, as I was so weak. Now, thanks to Sargol, I look like a new man. I gained 22 pounds with 23 days' treatment. I cannot tell you how happy I feel. All my clothes are getting too tight. My face has a good color and I never was so happy in my life."

MRS. VERNIE ROUSE says:

"Sargol is certainly the grandest treatment I ever used. It has helped me greatly. I could hardly eat anything and was not able to sit up three days out of a week, with stomach trouble. I took only two boxes of Sargol and can eat anything and it don't hurt me and I have no more headache. My weight was 120 pounds and now I weigh 140 and feel better than I have for five years. I am now as fleshy as I want to be, and shall certainly recommend Sargol, for it does just exactly what you say it will do."

You may know some of these people or know somebody who knows them. We will send you their full address if you wish, so that you can find out all about Sargol and the wonders it has wrought.

Probably you are now thinking whether all this can be true. Stop it! Write us at once and we will send you absolutely free a 50c package of these wonderful tablets. No matter what the cause of your thinness is from, give Sargol a chance to make you fat. We are absolutely confident it will put good healthy flesh on you but we don't ask you to take our word for it. Simply cut the coupon below and enclose 10c in stamps to help cover the distribution expenses, and Uncle Sam's mail will bring you what you may some day say was one of the most valuable packages you ever received.

COME, EAT WITH US AT OUR EXPENSE.

This coupon entitles any thin person to one 50c. package of Sargol, the concentrated Flesh Builder (provided you have never tried it), and that 10c. is enclosed to cover postage, packing, etc. Read our advertisement printed above, and then put 10c. in stamps in letter today, with this coupon, and the full 50c. package will be sent to you by return of post. EFFECTIVE EXHIBITION.—Denver health officers recently wanted to impress on the legislature the necessity of a stringent drug law, so they arranged an "exhibit" of 20 "dope fiends" and had the governor and members of the legislature see them engaged in their favorite "dope." As a result, the governor and legislators pledged to support a measure for the drastic regulation of the drug traffic.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Apply to the hair twice a week until it becomes the desired shade. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and removes dandruff. It is excellent for falling hair and will make harsh hair soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off. —Advertisement.

Four Wheel Chairs in June

288 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The four June wheel chairs go to the following applicants. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their friends in their behalf.

Owanna Hudson, Cliffside, N. C., 160; Mr. F. L. Potts, Floresville, Texas, 105; Thelma Lucile Leeman, Kermit, Texas, 98; Mrs. Carrie Granger, Marathon, Texas, 96.

Owanna Hudson is a bright little girl seven years of age who has been paralyzed from her hips down for nearly three years. Her wheel chair will be a great source of pleasure to this patient little sufferer in enabling her to get out in the fresh air and sunshine once more, also a great help to her good mother in caring for her. This poor woman's health is breaking down in consequence of lifting her helpless daughter so much besides doing the housework and taking care of a large family. These cases of little cripples who are deprived of all the joys of childhood and cannot go to school to get an education, with nothing to look forward to in life but helplessness and dependence on others are sad and touching indeed. We have a number of them on our list. Don't you want to get a few subscriptions and send in to help supply these child cripples with much needed wheel chairs?

Mr. F. L. Potts is a great sufferer from rheumatism which has crippled him and kept him in his room the last four years and much of the time in bed. His friend, Z. C. McNeil, who got 88 out of the total of 105 subscriptions for him, writes that Mr. Potts is much in need of a wheel chair and that it will be a great benefit to him.

Thelma Lucile Leeman is only five years old and has been crippled and totally helpless from infancy, not only in all her limbs but also in her organs of speech, so that she cannot talk. She does not even have a mother's care but lives with her grandparents.

Mrs. Carrie Granger has suffered severely from rheumatism the last two years, resulting in a stiff knee joint. With much difficulty she gets about the house a little by the help of a crutch, but she wants and is in great need of a wheel chair.

You notice that three of the four wheel chairs for June go to Texas, but it is not a case of favoritism; the Texas people earned them all by getting the subscriptions for them. People in other localities could do the same for their shut-in friends if they took the same interest and bestirred themselves. There ought to be three wheel chairs earned in each State every month.

Don't let your interest in the Wheel-Chair Club drop off just because the weather is getting warm; remember that in the summer heat the poor shut-ins suffer most for want of wheel chairs to get them out into the open air.

You will be interested in the letters of thanks and Roll of Honor that follow.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some worthy, destitute, crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

His COMFORT Wheel Chair Is a Great Blessing Though He Can't Live Long to Enjoy It

STRONG CITY, OKLA.

MR. W. H. GANNETT:

DEAR FRIEND.—My father, Mr. J. W. Nolte, has received his wheel-chair all safe. It is an excellent present for him. But he may not enjoy it long for the doctor says he cannot live more than a few weeks at the most. The chair has already been a great blessing and comfort to him. He can't breathe while lying down so he must sit in his chair all the time.

With the aid of his chair, he can be moved about in the house and even taken out into the sunshine when the weather is fair.

He is very thankful to you and all who helped to secure the chair for him. He would like to thank you with his own hand but is not able.

Very gratefully yours,

MRS. ROSA NEWKIRK.

Got the Wheel Chair Sooner than Expected.

DALLAS CITY, ILL.

UNCLE CHARLIE:

We were very much pleased and also surprised to receive the wheel chair for Harvy Martin for we did not think we had enough subs. to get it yet. We surely appreciate your kindness and he says he surely enjoys it. He calls me "Goody Burr" for getting it for him. I will do all I can for the chair department.

May God bless you and Mr. Gannett in this good work. I remain, a COMFORT worker,

MRS. O. H. BURR.

Thanks and Appreciation for Comfort Wheel Chair

DUNELLEN, N. J.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

As my wife is not able to write to you I will show my appreciation for the chair by answering your letter.

My mother through her energies secured the chair for us, and was a complete surprise to me. It is certainly satisfactory, and believe me, I have more than sympathy for everyone who must use them. Thanking you for the great favor, I beg to remain,

Yours truly, C. W. FENNER.

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Alha, Scott, W. Va.—A lady may say anything pleasant she pleases to the gentleman who makes her a present. A lady, who cannot say something nice on such an occasion without being told what to say, does not deserve a present.

T. K., Palestine, Ill.—As a story writer who receives good money for his stories, we should think you could manipulate your own story better than to lose the heroine as you seem to have done. However, you have two more years before graduation and if you will forget the girl until you are graduated, she may recall herself to you when she sees you with "B. A." to your name. Anyway, with this grief gnawing at your heart you should be able to write a "gripping story," for which editors always pay extra.

E. R. E., Toutle, Wash.—You ask which side of the road is it proper for the gentleman to walk on when he takes a lady walking and we reply with confidence that he should walk on the same side that she is on. Don't they always do that in your town? (2) It was quite proper for you to escort the lady home from the dance, even though you had not met her before. Now that you know her, don't let her go to a dance again unattended, so you will be sure of taking her home.

Subscriber, Carlsbad, N. M.—On a salary of $800 to $900 a year, a young man, engaged to be married and with a little money ahead, might invest as much as $100 in an engagement ring, if he got it at a reasonable profit to the jeweler. A good diamond ring has many times served as collateral for an emergency loan. A very neat little stone may be had for as low as twenty-five dollars, but it is not much of an investment. Possibly, however, the less expensive ring would be more appropriate to your social surroundings and the bride would prefer the seventy-five dollars saved for more necessary articles. Talk it over with her. Now is the time to be sensible and frank with the girl and not make any bluff that a hundred dollars is nothing to you, when your wife to be is concerned. It is a whole lot, as you will begin to discover by and by, for you write like a level-headed young fellow. As to your difference in religion, that is a different matter. Baptists are nearly as "sot in their ways" as Catholics are, and we think it is better that neither of you ask the other to give up your religion, —your denomination, rather, for true religion is the same under any name—but to have a complete understanding of what concessions each will make before you marry. Indeed, you, the man, will have concessions to make before you marry, because a Protestant cannot marry a Catholic, regularly, that is by a priest, unless certain concessions to the church are made. If the girl in this instance has sufficiently modern ideas to believe that a marriage is just as much a marriage whether the ceremony is performed by a priest, a Baptist clergyman, or a civil magistrate, you need not make any religious concessions, but you cannot be married by a priest. There are numerous harmonious marriages between persons of differing religious beliefs, but such marriages always call for extra risks. Whatever happens, don't marry until a perfect understanding is established. It may seem unsentimental to begin to get to the practical side of things at the very start, but it is the practical, not the sentimental, that counts most after marriage.

E. K., Lowden, Ia.—In using only one initial of a name for ring, or any other purpose, the initial of the last name should be used.

Baby, Kingston Springs, Tenn.—If there is no objection to the man except his nationality and you like him, you are very foolish to give him up as a friend, because of the narrow prejudices of your Know Nothing community. This is an age of progress and it doesn't all begin at home, either.

School Girl, Carlsbad, N. M.—The practise some people indulge in of calling another on the phone and having a supposedly private talk, at the same time having several acquaintances to hear the talk is not only bad manners, but is very nearly dishonorable. Still many look upon it as a joke and continue it. In our opinion the sufferer by such a betrayal, man or woman, would be justified in calling it an unfriendly act and having nothing more to do with the offender. It would not require many such penalties to educate social sentiment to the point that the ban would be put upon such joking and it would be classed with listening at keyholes and similar eaves-dropping.

Troubled Boy, Carl, W. Va.—Why not sue the newspaper for stating that you had married one of the two girls you were sparking and thus ruined your chances with the other? You hadn't married her, as you can prove, and you might get $50,000 damages which would make you all right with the other girl, unless she is looking for a millionaire. No newspaper has a right to destroy the happiness of a nineteen-year-old boy like that and you ought to have a hundred thousand dollars instead of only fifty. You have our blessing, Willie.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

WELL, my dears, June has gone and I wonder how many of you listened to the June birds sing and this time next June you will be old married ladies who have too much else to think about than to listen for June birds to sing. But you should, just the same, whether you are married or not, because the June time is the happy time of the year both to the married and the unmarried and nobody should ever miss the enjoyment of it. But July? Well July is too warm to enjoy anything much except fans and shady nooks and ice cream. And of these, I hope you will have all you want. It's no time for work, either, but I have mine to do, so I'll stop talking and get at it.

The first letter I open is from Brown Eyes of Rowlesburg, W. Va., who is in great trouble because the young man she met in January and corresponded with has married some other girl. She also wants to know how to reduce her weight. I never tried the remedy, but I should think grief over the loss of this heartless young man would soon make her thin. I advise her to try it.

Perplexed, Unicoi, Tenn.—Of course, don't marry a feeble, old man forty years your senior and as poor as you are. Only rich old men should marry young girls. As for the young man you think loves you though he hasn't made any attempt towards corresponding with you, don't bother about him until he does make the attempt. Apparently he isn't bothering much about you.

Broken-hearted, Virona, N. Dak.—Why break your heart over a man who cares so little for you that he breaks the engagement merely because you went out with a man one evening to please your brother and would listen to no explanations. It may hurt now, but by and by, my dear, you will be glad enough that you found out what kind of a man he was before it was too late.

Sue, Cedarville, Mich.—As you did not return the present when you received it, doing so now will show pique rather than observance of the proprieties. If your quarrel extends to the returning of letters, you may include the present with the letters you send back to him. P. S. Why do you spell the name of your postoffice "Sederville?"

C. A. S., Great Falls, Mont.—One good thing the drinking gambling man has done is to stop your marrying the man you didn't love or want, but whom your parents wanted you to marry. But that is not enough to warrant your marrying the other man, even though he has been drunk only once since you and he became friends. Don't be in a hurry. If he will stay sober a couple of years and do no gambling in that time, you might risk marrying him, but I would not guarantee the risk.

Happy, Golconda, Ill.—It is quite proper to be good friends with all the nice boys, but have no "steady" until you are out of school. Beaus and books don't agree.

Anemone, Detroit, Mich.—As far as you and I know the young man is all right, and as you are in no hurry to marry, which is wise, I think if you and he simply stand fast in your faith in each other and bide your time, parental objection will be removed and you will enter into your reward. As an engraver he will have work that is worth while and you can help him if you will read and study along the lines of his work and be a companion and helper to him in it.

Forget-me-not, Pine Hill, Va.—Very many young ladies and some older ones who are inclined to want the attention of men do not always act in what is called the ladylike manner and sometimes they act quite indiscreetly, though they do not often go too far for respectability. Their example is not to be followed, no matter how popular they may be with men and if I owned a home I certainly never should invite them into it, even if I were polite to them when meeting them elsewhere. Such women without really meaning any harm, very often do much harm. (2) It is quite proper and hospitable to ask a young man to call, but if he does not respond to the invitation, don't ask him again unless he explains. Some young men want to be coaxed, I think, and I don't believe in it.

Curly, Asher, Okla.—You are young yet, so young that your parents are more to you than anybody else and it is enough for you to tell any young man who wants to go with you, that you cannot accept his attentions because your parents object. If he is the right kind, he will accept that as the best excuse and prove to them that he is not objectionable.

Lonely Orphan, Martinsville, Ill.—Kissing and embracing are not permissible except between engaged couples. As for a man following a declaration of love with a proposal of marriage, I think it should be so, but in these days of flirtation, young men and women tell each other that they love when they have no more notion of marrying than they have of flying. Young men are especially ready to tell girls how much they love them. There is no defense for a girl, except to keep her head and insist upon the man making good.

There, my dears, your questions are answered as far as they were for me and I know some of you will not be satisfied, but some will and so that satisfies me. Now, by, by, be good little girls and though clouds may come into your skies remember that the sun is sure to shine through after a while. Au revoir.

"But it is all like a dream, my dear—a strange dream, and I feel as if I should wake and find I had got the toothache—I always have it after dreaming. Where did you put the notes, my dear?"

Edna started—she had only been half listening—and held out her purse.

"Will you take them, aunt?"

"No, my dear," replied Aunt Martha, emphatically. "You must get used to carrying large sums of money, and had better begin at once. What did Mr. Burdon say—a most charming man, Edna—that five hundred pounds were of no more consequence than pence! Oh, dear! oh, dear! Edna, I must go to bed; I must, indeed; I feel as if the room was whirling round!" and as Edna got up and kissed her, she added, "How you can take it so quietly I can't imagine. Perhaps you feel dazed by it, dear!" and she looked curiously almost pathetically, at the sweet young face so pale and distrait.

"Yes, perhaps that is it," replied Edna, with a faint little smile.

FRECKLES

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as the prescription othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength othine as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles. Advt.

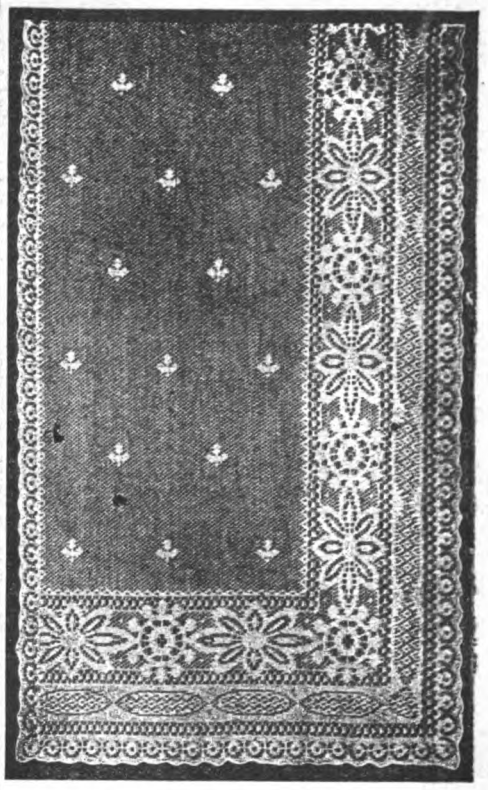
Congoleum Rug



Premium No. 7206

Given For A Club Of Six!

A YARD and a half long and one yard wide. Water cannot rot it, sun cannot fade it. It lies flat on the floor without nails, tacks or paste and positively will not curl up at the edges. The Congoleum Rug is something new. It is not oil-cloth or Linoleum or made of grass, fiber or fabric—it is not like any other floor covering in the world. It is absolutely waterproof, not affected by heat or cold, neither fades nor rots indoors or out. When you wash the floor or porch you can wash the Congoleum rug at the same time without taking it up. You can leave it outdoors the year round, and it will not rot, fade or get that dingy look that other rugs do after exposure to sun and wear. In doors you can use it on your bathroom, hall, pantry or kitchen floor, under the refrigerator or stove or in any room in the house. No matter where you place it it will outwear a dozen ordinary rugs and give years of service. These rugs come in many different designs and beautiful combinations of colors and we have selected the one illustrated herewith as the most suitable for all-round purposes. It will make an attractive appearance regardless of whether you use it as a porch rug, or in hall, kitchen, pantry or chamber. We are positive that every woman who secures one of these rugs will want more of them at once so we have arranged to supply you with as many as you may need upon the terms of the following

Roadster - $725

This is the largest 4-cylinder Overland that will be produced this year

The Newest Overland

$325 Less Than Last Year

The 1916 Overland is in many particulars the same as the 1915 Overland—the famous Model 80 that sold for $1075.

But the price is $325 less.

It has the same beautifully curved cowl and pure stream-line body design.

It has the same magnificent finish; that deep, rich tone of dark Brewster green with fine hair-line striping of clear ivory-white.

It has the same powerful, economical thirty-five horsepower, four-cylinder motor, but weighs less.

It has the same underslung rear springs. Electrical control buttons are again conveniently arranged on the steering column.

It has the same easy-working clutch which any woman can operate; the same "easy-to-handle" shifting levers; the same "easy-to-steer-with" wheel; the same positive brakes.

It has 33" x 4" tires which is unusual on a car at this price.

In detail, finish, mechanical fineness, comforts and conveniences; this newest Overland gives you all there was in the $1075 Overland and even more power.

And it costs you but $750—$325 less than last season's large 35 horsepower Overland.

Crumbs of Comfort

Many dishes have made many diseases.

One never loses anything by politeness.

Every guilty person is his own hangman.

They bear poverty very ill who are ashamed of it.

We always find merit in those who find merit in us.

Man is not depraved by true pleasures, but by false ones.

A husband is a plaster that cures all the ills of girlhood.

No man is brave in his anger who was not so before it.

A woman laughs when she can and weeps when she will.

The worst of all places is the one in which we have no friends.

The things of the earth are not worth our attachment to them.

Conscience is the voice of the soul; passion the voice of the body.

There is more merit in subduing a passion than in avenging an injury.

Men say more evil of women than they think; it is the contrary with women.

If you want to know the qualities a man lacks, examine those he boasts most of.

The friendship of a man is often a support; that of a woman is always a consolation.

The heart of a woman never grows old; when it has ceased to love it has ceased to live.

A person who is pleased with no one is more unhappy than the person who pleases no one.

There are more fools than wise men and among the wise men there is more folly than wisdom.

Some people are honest so long as they thrive upon it, but if the Devil give better wages they change their party.

Better than a Fairy

CARLO stumped down the long, sloping aisle which parted in the middle the bristling seats of the little Opera House. Those few persons in the audience who heeded him at all, saw merely a little lame boy, very pale, exceedingly thin and immaculately neat from the crown of shining fair brown hair to the stubbed toes of his well-blacked, cheap little shoes.

Nobody could look into that warm, tender little heart which thumped so wildly beneath his shabby jacket and see the riot of his happiness.

It was Carlo's first visit to the theater, the Place of Joy. He had rested in many hospitals though and learned to accept the House of Pain with a certain degree of philosophy. From his point of view hospitals were a necessary part of life, even more necessary at times than the meager home in which the little fellow spent brief periods between treatments. He even held recollections of some exquisite benefits which had reached out to him from the neat wards with their rows of snowy beds and gentle-faced nurses.

There were frequent flowers at the hospital, and Carlo loved flowers.

There were books too and picture magazines, and sometimes somebody to read aloud to him, which was always a great delight.

Now this supreme of all pleasures had come to him straight from the latest hospital shelter, for kind Doctor Mann in recognition of the little chap's bravery during a particularly bitter operation, had sent him two tickets for the theater, and Carlo and his father were there in the wonderful place.

Musicians filed into their places and a glory of melody gathered up the floating ends of his happiness and welded them into a fantastic harmony which sang of approaching rapture.

And the promise of the music was fulfilled, for when the crimson velvet curtains parted Carlo looked straight into the heart of Fairyland.

The stage was suffused with a mist of shifting colors through which romped a ring of dancing fays, and in the center of this ring was disclosed the very Queen of all the Fairies.

Such a radiant vision as she was, this wee queen, with a crown of golden buttercups and a wand made out of a single long-stemmed lily.

Carlo forgot his twisted knee and almost stood erect with excitement.

"She is so young to be a queen," he murmured, "why she looks littler even than me."

"What is it?" asked his father, but Carlo heard naught but the strains of fairy music, saw nothing but his little queen tripping a lightsome measure and floating like a bit of thistledown over the painted stumps and hedges.

Cecily Leslie was a world-famous danseuse and this was one of her most celebrated arrangements.

The scene wove itself from one marvel into another. During a stupendous clap of thunder all the flowers and trees, and beautiful green grass disappeared being replaced by cruel gray rocks, amidst which the dear little Fairy Queen fled all affrighted and shivering, pursued by a mob of satyrs with horrible grinning faces and monstrous little horns atop their pointed heads.

How Carlo's heart hurt during that chase, but just as the Chief Satyr was about to seize the weary, fainting Queen, a huge, white bear with a kind smiling face interposed and clasped the distraught fairy in his big furry arms, while the satyrs ran away screaming horridly.

The lovely white bear proved to be an enchanted Prince and of course the Fairy Queen touched him with her lily wand and he became a handsome young man in pale blue velvet.

Then the Queen discovered that he was in love with a charming maiden and wrought some magic so that the girl appeared, rising right out of the rocks in a pitiful old ragged frock. The queen also touched her with the wand, causing her to stand forth arrayed in cloth-of-gold, and being no longer ashamed of her appearance she flung herself into the Prince's arms.

Not yet content with good works the Fairy summoned all her subjects and they slowly spun a magic spell to soft, whispering music, weaving a dreamy dance measure, here and there, backwards and forwards, while the stage grew dimmer and the voices ever fainter and fainter, until the orchestra with a startling crash burst into a strain of exultation, the lights flared forth again in glorious effulgence, and there appeared upon the stage a gorgeous castle with a mammoth white marble staircase, leading straight to the skies it would seem, with scores of lords and ladies bowing before the Prince and his beautiful bride, while the Fairy Queen perched upon the back of a tall golden chair, invisible to the others on the stage, but laughing with delight at the happiness she had created.

On a thrilling lift of stupendous harmony the music ceased, the red velvet curtains fell together and silence swept the theater, a silence punctuated by rustling programs and gentle whisperings.

Carlo relaxed limply and closed his eyes.

The gentle, careworn father watched him with anxiety.

Then Dr. Mann came down the aisle, suave, kindly professional as always.

"How goes it?" he asked, his strong, deep voice vibrating through the stillness.

Carlo opened wide his brown eyes and held the doctor's gaze.

"Oh, sir," he said, "can't I see the Fairy Queen close to?"

Dr. Mann smiled indulgently.

"I am afraid not son. Did you like her so much? Heaps of bigger boys than you are would like to meet that Fairy Queen but she is almost as unapproachable as a real Royal Highness."

Carlo's dumbly pleading gaze did not waver.

"I hardly ever ask for anything," he said insistently.

"I know, I know," agreed the doctor, but the boy continued unheeding, "I didn't even ask for this," with a sweep of his transparent hand, "I didn't know there was such a place, but now that I've been here and seen her up there, I've just got to see her close to, and speak to her and have her speak to me. Why I've never known a little girl like her. I know," he went on persistently, "she is not a real fairy of course. I am big enough to know all about that. She is just making believe, but I want to see her close to."

Dr. Mann exchanged significant glances with Carlo's father and shook his head.

"You mustn't tease the doctor when he has been so good to you," protested the man.

"I've never asked for anything before," Carlo repeated stubbornly.

Dr. Mann slightly chuckled. "This falling in love at first sight is a serious business," he chaffed, "frequently it changes a man's whole disposition."

"Please can't I see her close to?" The little lad's whole soul lay in his eyes.

"I wonder now," mused the great man thoughtfully, noting the child's feverish earnestness and the strong excitement under which he labored, "I wonder now if Her Ladyship could be induced to receive a patient of mine. I am not acquainted with her myself of course, but——" and again he studied Carlo's white face.

"I've never asked for anything before," the child reiterated doggedly.

* * * * * * * * * * *

Behind the red velvet curtain the Fairy Queen dropped lightly to the stage from her high chair back.

"That thing wobbled with me, I want it propped more securely after this," she told one of the scene shifters, who like an army of huge ants thronged over the stage dismantling the glittering palace.

Then she made her way to the wings, accosting the Prince who was also picking his path over pieces of prostrate landscape.

"You were clumsy," she said coldly, "I didn't like the way you caught me. Haven't you done that bit of business often enough to calculate exactly where you should stand for my leap?"

"What is the matter today Cissy?" inquired the Prince, who was really a very nice young man and exceedingly clever in the way he handled the famous little dancer.

"Matter enough," she retorted, and there were tears in her voice, "What is the good of it all? It is very well to be a celebrity and draw ever so much money every week but what is the good of it all when there is nobody to care?"

"Of course you know Cissy if I were not a married man and if Dolly were not so jealous——"

"Don't be silly," she snubbed him, "you know what I mean. You and Dolly are the only friends I have in the Company, or anywhere else for that matter. Mother used to make it worth while as long as she lived she was so proud of me, and then——" Her voice choked at this point and the Prince looked away.

"I know," he said softly, for everybody in the profession did know that the little dancer in her loneliness had married a big, handsome acrobat who treated her cruelly, and when she objected, ran away with another woman.

"You do not know anything about it," Miss Leslie exclaimed passionately, "I hate it all, everything, my silly work which consists of springing senselessly about like a jack-in-the-box; the people I have to work with, stupid self-engrossed egotists; that horrid public out there, my hydra-headed master, who sits and stares and gloats while I go through my antics for its pleasure."

"Oh, come now, ain't you going it rather strong?" expostulated the young man. "There is something in this Art business after all, you know, and you are a dancer, if ever one twirled her toes."

"Bah! we have got to change now. How far do you think my 'Art', as you call it, would carry me if I dared to appear in the same costume for two successive acts?"

She ran off to her dressing-room where presently there reached her the card of a renowned physician with a pencilled request: "Would she see a young man, one of the doctor's most interesting patients, who was feverishly anxious to speak with her just once?"

Dr. Mann drew largely upon his fund of persuasive tact in writing that difficult request. He really desired that Carlo should have his wish granted, and almost he feared if it were denied, such a disappointment might make the sensitive child ill again.

Miss Leslie read the note through twice, startled by its unusualness; then she flung it upon her dressing table amongst the paints and cosmetics.

"Certainly not," she snapped at the waiting messenger, "the man must think I am a fool."

She was fully dressed for the second act when the messenger returned.

"Another card!" Cecily flamed angrily beneath her rouge at the presumption.

"Does Miss Leslie understand that my patient is a little lame boy?"

"A little lame boy!"

The words stabbed a hidden wound. There had been another little boy, a baby who never opened his eyes upon this world of woe, and he too, had been lame, so everybody said it was better he did not live. Cecily had never contradicted them even when her heart most rebelled.

"Tell Dr. Mann to bring him to my dressing-room after the performance. Give him a line to the doorkeeper." She issued staccato instructions to her maid who discreetly dissembled all surprise.

The Fairy Queen saw Carlo the moment she flashed upon the stage in the famous pink scene. She watched his pale, pinched face and wide adoring eyes all through the garland measure, and she danced for his benefit as she had never danced before.

To Carlo, content in the doctor's promise that he should meet the Fairy Queen, the remainder of the play was a dream of loveliness long drawn out.

When the final curtain fell and in response to the demand of a clamorous multitude, the little Queen appeared from the side of the stage, smiling, bowing and kissing her hands, she looked straight into Carlo's brown eyes and blew him the longest kiss of all.

Carlo and his father sat still until nearly everybody else had passed out. The good-by music faded away and a big emptiness possessed the huge auditorium.

Dr. Mann's brisk bustle was a relief as he strode down to them, alertly businesslike.

They passed through the theater, behind the boxes and so on to the cavernous, echoing stage.

Carlo limped across the very spot where Fairyland had lived and glowed so recently.

His whole soul hung on the coming interview. Would the little girl kiss her hand to him again? Would she wear the fluttering frock of rose petals?

A white door with a crystal knob swung softly open at Dr. Mann's gentle tap. Carlo stared eagerly into a beautiful small room, built as it were out of looking glass and hung with pink draperies.

For an instant the boy shone at the charm of the little nest, then with a distinct drop he faltered: "Where is the Fairy girl?" for he saw only a stout woman in black with white cap and apron.

"Here I am," called a sweet voice, and there right before him, having opened the door herself in her eagerness, Carlo glimpsed a pale, small lady in a strange, straight dark gown, with a fur cap pulled close over her hair.

For a long minute the little boy stood regarding the woman, wide-eyed, trembling.

Miss Leslie flung a plaintive glance at the men, as if to say, "He is disappointed in me, I'm sorry."

"I—I didn't think you would like me so well close to," she stammered.

Carlo tossed his head with a laugh of triumph. "Why you are not a little girl," he cried, "you are not a little girl at all."

"I'm sorry," Cecily quavered, but the boy interrupted exultantly:

"You are not a little girl at all, you're a mother."

There ensued a slight flurry, a gurgle of laughter that sounded like tears, and famous dancer was upon her knees before a shabby little lame boy, her arms gently enfolding him, her kisses falling upon his hair and his thin, white face.

"You blessed one!" Cecily murmured, "Do you like mothers, and how did you guess?"

"Oh, I like mothers the best of all because I never had one. The angels took her away when they brought me. You see they didn't want her to know about my knee. Of course I knew you were a mother, when I saw you close to, it's in your smile. How many little boys have you got?"

The Doctor and Carlo's father turned away watching the scene shifters at work and the maid silently slipped off. They were quite alone.

She stopped his mouth with a long kiss like a sigh.

"Dear," she whispered, "I'm a mother without any little boy and you are a little boy without any mother; suppose we help each other out."

Carlo laid his thin arms around her neck and cuddled his face under her chin.

"TWILIGHT SLEEP"

For Painless Maternity

Did you ever hear of "Twilight Sleep," that wonderful discovery that is proving the greatest boon to women? Do you know of that anesthetic which, properly administered, is harmless and in 90 cases out of every 100 in which it is used results in painless delivery, preventing shock, conserving strength and hastening recovery? It was discovered in Germany ten years ago, has recently been tested successfully in the United States and should be practised generally. Every woman should know about it. Mrs. Mary Boyd, a "twilight sleep" mother, who went to Germany purposely to receive the treatment and is an authority on the subject, has written an interesting article on "Twilight Sleep" especially for COMFORT. Don't fail to read it.

Why Our Government Permits the Sale ot War Material to Belligerent Nations

EVER since the beginning of the war now raging in Europe certain powerful interests have been and still are diligently at work trying to induce our government to prohibit the exportation of arms, ammunition and other munitions of war from the United States to the countries engaged in war, and have been equally active in their efforts through the newspapers and other publicity agencies to persuade the American people that such dealing in war material is cruelly wicked and should be stopped.

They argue that it is morally wrong for our citizens to provide these combatants with the means of destroying each other and that such traffic is a violation of the spirit of our neutrality.

Their arguments seem plausible to such as are unfamiliar with the true facts and the rights of the matter and who therefore wonder why the appeal has not moved our government to take action. The pretense that it is urged merely in the interest of humanity as an effective means of shortening the war has won the support of many sincere peace advocates who do not perceive the unjust and destructive consequences of such a policy under present conditions although both President Wilson and Mr. Bryan, the champion peace advocate, have clearly explained in official proclamations why the United States, as a neutral nation, cannot rightfully forbid the exportation of arms to the belligerent countries during the present war. And this position of our government rests on legal and moral grounds as well as being in accord with sound public policy and the best interests of humanity, as we shall show.

As President Wilson is absolutely and inquestionably right in the stand he has taken and is firmly maintaining on this question despite the threats and abuse with which he is being assailed by the unscrupulous and the petitions with which he is being bombarded by misinformed and misguided persons of good intentions, COMFORT deems it important that its readers should understand this matter in which a wrong step might lead to the most disastrous consequences, and therefore takes pains to give the following explanation which should interest everybody.

Our Legal Duty

First of all it must be clearly understood that the rights and duties of our citizens and our government regarding the sale of war material to recognized belligerent nations are prescribed and determined by a law which even the Congress of the United States, the hightest law-making power in this country, cannot change. Perhaps this information may be a surprise to most of our readers, but it is true nevertheless.

On the same principle and for the same reasons that State laws are made by our legislatures for the government of the people in their dealings within their respective States, and national laws are made by Congress to regulate commerce between the States, it has been found necessary for the civilized nations to come together through their representatives from time to time and establish a code of international law to define the rights and duties, and govern the conduct of the governments and citizens of all nations in their international dealings in peace and war. This is international law or, as it is sometimes called, the law of nations, and is recognized as the law of the world, binding all nations by an obligation superior to their national laws. As international law was made by joint action of the nations it can be changed only by the practically unanimous consent of all the civilized nations.

International law of more than a hundred years standing gives neutral nations the right to sell, and belligerent nations the right to buy war material from neutrals. Therefore, as the United States cannot change this international law, our government has no right to forbid the exportation of munitions of war purchased by the recognized governments of the belligerent nations, and if it should do so our country would become a law breaker and as such subject to penalties that might be very severe and even include punishment by war.

The foregoing statement may appear to conflict with the known fact that under authority of a special act of Congress President Taft proclaimed an embargo against the shipment of arms and ammunition into Mexico, but it does not. Only recognized governments can claim rights under international law, and as Mexico was in a condition of anarchy without any government recognized by the United States, Congress could rightfully prohibit the exportation of arms and ammunition to the various bands of filibusters, brigands and marauders who for more than four years have been pillaging their own countrymen and robbing and murdering foreigners under pretense of civil war.

Having shown that our government is constrained by international law, which it cannot alter, to adhere to its present position, we might dismiss the question as settled, but the public wants to know whether such first, on general principles and, second, as applied to the special conditions of the present war.

To prohibit the purchase abroad of arms and ammunition in time of war would increase the menace and aggravate the curse of militarism many fold. One of two deplorable results would be inevitable. Every nation would be obliged to pile up a large supply of arms and ammunition in time of peace and build and maintain at great expense enormous manufacturing arsenals to supply its needs in time of war or, failing to make these burdensome preparations, must be entirely at the mercy of any militaristic country that was prepared for war, because the markets of the world would be closed so far as military equipment is concerned. Would it be right for international law to put a premium on militarism by forbidding a peaceably inclined, unprepared nation to purchase arms to defend itself when attacked? Or is it policy to force every country to burden itself with the cost of maintaining continual military preparedness? So much for the general principles of right underlying this provision of international law. Now let us apply them to the present war conditions; and in doing so I shall try to be strictly neutral, stating only the indisputed facts and expressing no opinion as to which side is to be blamed for having caused the war.

As previously stated, for more than a century international law has allowed nations at war to purchase arms and ammunition in neutral countries. Relying on this right nearly all the nations—I may say all except one—have chosen not to incur the expense of maintaining in time of peace complete preparedness for war. When the war broke out Germany was the only nation fully prepared, and this gave her an advantage immense at the start and very considerable even at the present time. Not only were her armies larger and far better equipped than those of her enemies, but she was and still is the only country on earth having arms and ammunition factories large enough to turn out a sufficient supply of war material. The result is that while Germany is able to make an abundant supply England, France and Russia, though they have scoured the markets of the world for arms and ammunition have been and still are seriously handicapped by a shortage of these indispensable munitions of war. How this has come about is an interesting bit of history.

At Essen in Germany are the famous Krupp works, by far the largest arms and ammunition factory in the world, regularly employing more than 43,000 men as far back as 1902 and probably two or three times that number now. This enterprise was founded in 1810 and since 1859 has been fostered by the liberal patronage of the German government; but the Krupps have also sold arms and ammunition to all nations in peace and war. Thus the Krupps have built up the largest manufacturing plant and accumulated the greatest fortune in Germany. The German government has taken great interest in promoting the growth and prosperity of this industry and in 1910 the Kaiser honored the present head of the concern by conferring on him the Order of the Red Eagle and made him a baron. Germany has always considered it not only lawful but morally right to encourage the Krupps to sell all the arms and ammunition they could to other nations to fight each other with.

In the Boer war Germany was so strong in her expressions of sympathy for the Boers as to almost cause a rupture of her relations with Great Britain, yet she kept right on selling the British arms and ammunition with which to conquer Boers,—and did not sell to the Boers, simply because there was no way to deliver the goods of which these brave South-Africans were in sore need in their struggle for the preservation of their national existence.

It will be remembered that after our government stopped the shipment of arms and ammunition from the United States to the warring factions in Mexico Germany supplied them, and as late as a year ago last May, while we were having our little fuss with General Huerta at Vera Cruz, Germany sent that notorious usurper two shiploads of arms and ammunition and delivered them to him in spite of President Wilson's strenuous effort to prevent it, and regardless of the fact that it was expected at that time that they might be used to kill our soldiers and sailors. Until the present war anybody who had the price could buy arms and ammunition in Germany regardless of the interests of humanity.

But now the boot is on the other foot, and the German government, while acknowledging our legal right as neutrals to sell war material to her enemies, urges our government to restrain our citizens from doing it in the interest of humanity in order to bring the war to a speedy end, prevent further bloodshed and reestablish peace at an early date.

Perhaps the action which Germany requests, if pursued by our government, might accomplish the predicted results; but how would it be brought about, and what would be the consequences for which we should be responsible? In answer let me give you the following statement by Mr. Bryan clipped from his address "To the German Americans" published on June 11, after his retirement from the Cabinet. Mr. Bryan said:

"The fact that the administration has received more criticism from German-Americans than from those in sympathy with the Allies is due to the fact that, while both sides are at liberty, under international law, to purchase ammunition in the United States, the Allies, because of their control of the seas have the advantage of being able to export it. It is unfortunate that partizan supporters of Germany should have overlooked the legal requirements of the situation and have thus misunderstood the position of the administration. The administration's position has not only been perfectly neutral, but it could not have been otherwise without a palpable and international violation of the rules governing neutrality. This government is not at liberty to materially change the rules of international law during the war because every change suggested is discussed, not upon its merits as an abstract proposition, but according to the effect it will have upon the contest. Those who wanted to lay an embargo upon the shipments of arms defended their position on the ground that it would hasten peace, but it is strange that they could have overlooked the fact that the only way in which such action on our part could hasten peace would have been by helping one side to overcome the other."

Last fall a statement, purporting to have emanated from an authoritative German source, was published to the effect that if the United States would stop the shipment of arms and ammunition to the Allies the Germans would be able to capture Paris within sixty days and end the war in their own way and to their own satisfaction.

But as Mr. Bryan, whose earnest and sincere interest in promoting peace cannot be doubted, has pointed out, we have no right to bring about peace by changing the law of nations so as to help one side conquer the other. As neutrals, we have no right to pass judgment on the merits of their quarrel nor to help or hinder either side by closing our markets. Without criticising the propriety of the enormously expensive preparation for war which Germany has been making for years past, I will simply remark the obvious fact that the nations against which she is fighting certainly had a right to ignore these war preparations and rely on providing themselves with arms by purchasing from neutrals, in case they should need them, in time of war, and we have no moral right to spring a trap on them, now that their time of need has come.

Apply it also to our own situation. We are and always have been woefully neglectful of the needs of national defense. Shall we intensify the danger resulting from our unpreparedness by adopting a rule that would deprive us of the right, on which we have always relied, of buying from abroad arms and ammunition necessary to defend ourselves when attacked?

War is inhuman and militarism is a domestic curse and a foreign menace. War and militarism should be abolished. But so long as any nation menaces the rest of the world with its militarism it would be the most inhuman policy to prohibit traffic in arms in time of war.

How A University Man Won A Fortune.

College Training Failed But Grit Won.

BY C. L. CHAPMAN.

When a strapping young Englishman of family, wealth, and position, was graduated from Oxford university no doubt he dreamed of achievement, but it is safe to say that he had no idea of gaining renown, wealth, and success by toting giant powder up a steep mountain trail. Yet that is the way it all came about.

Have you ever carried a keg of nails on your shoulder up a stairway of one flight? If so, you can imagine what it means in dogged endurance and sheer grit to carry one hundred and fifty pounds twice a day a mile and a half up a slope so steep that the steepest attic stairway is child's play.

But this is what Charles Palmer did and won for himself a singular success in Alaska.

This is the way it all happened. Palmer was on the Pacific coast when the news of a new gold camp swept him, with others, northward toward Alaska. They followed the Portland channel to its head, and he and some others, among them experienced miners and mine superintendents, came into possession of some claims which "looked good" to them.

But the pay streak was high on the side of a precipitous mountain. Each one fell readily to his task, but for the Oxford graduate, who knew nothing of the fine points of prospecting, stopping, drifting, or sinking, there seemed nothing he could do unless he turned cook. But that was because of his education for he looked too much the debonnaire idler to be assigned to any drudging task. But giant powder and food were needed for those who knew the ins and outs of the work before them, and someone must undertake the herculean task of lugging both and Palmer was equal to that task and became a human dray.

"They also serve who only stand and wait." In those days there was no money to pay for "packing" even had men been available and willing to undertake the trip up that steep mountain-side. But the university man and linguist could both serve and wait for those who in turn were helping him. Twice and sometimes three times every day, until the veins were opened up and a prospect proved to be a rich certainty, he made the trip from the Bear river valley up a winding, steep, and rough trail through the timber, over bowlders, brush, and roaring torrents to the first shaft, 2400 feet above the valley, carrying packs that weighed from eighty to one hundred and twenty pounds. If he could keep up this task and carry out his part of the program the others could carry out theirs; but could he?

But day after day, week after week he continued his work as a human dray and work at the summit went on without interruption.

It was a close race for the men of that "outfit" between their available cash and what it would buy as to food and the day when the vein, exposed in a gully, should be reached and out. But the mine proved to be one of the big ones of the Columbian coast, and somewhere is one Charles Palmer, Esq., who now has the money and the leisure to cultivate the whims and tastes of his Oxford education.

He was in the game to win and he put his hand and heart in this effort and any old prospector will tell you of this young giant, a real man that anyone could tie to. His job was a monotonously toilsome one, he did the thing that was very hardest for winning success in a region of mountains more precipitous and more full of peril to prospectors than any encountered in the earlier camps of the Coeur d'Alene, the Kootney, or the Cariboo. The packing over Chilkoot pass which for so many years was accepted as the greatest task of human strength and endurance, was mere child's play as compared with the task Palmer undertook and finished.

So that by grit and sinew he won this singular success.

Are You Color-Blind?

"I wonder," said a man who looked like he might be a doctor, but he wasn't, "how many of you men listening to me know whether you are color-blind or not."

Every man on the stoop confidently asserted that he was not and the talker quietly took four skeins of silk from his pocket, one red, one green, one blue and one yellow, and spread them out on his knees.

"Now take a look," he went on, "and we'll find out how your eyes are on color."

A dozen men gathered around and all of them called the turn except one. That one to his own surprise and the laughter of all the others couldn't see red.

"That's all right," said the man with the colors, "only one man in twenty is color-blind and I wouldn't have thought it odd if all of you had your color sight all right. As it is one of you can't see red, which is the color that is oftenest not seen. Green usually goes with it, that is he sees green as a dull red or gray. Some men can distinguish only yellows and blues and then again some are totally color-blind, that is they can see only white, gray and black. It sometimes happens that a man goes through life without even knowing he is color blind, and only about a hundred years ago nobody had ever heard of such a defect of vision as color-blindness. About that time a great English Chemist, John Dalton, discovered that he was blind to red, as our friend is here, and he was twenty-eight years old before he knew what ailed him. After that, experiments were made and all the civilized world over it was found that color-blindness was a universal defect of musculine sight. But never a woman. No woman has yet been discovered who was color-blind. Nobody knows why, either, and scientists have not yet solved the mystery satisfactorily. But one man in twenty is and it is an inherited weakness. A color-blind father may have all girl children and there will not be one who is color-blind, but if they marry and have any boy children, there is sure to be one or more color-blind. There is no pain or danger to the sight, and as I say, some color-blind people never know it, but on the retina are rings of color and when they are not as they should be, color-blindness will result, either part color-blind, or entirely so, some eyes seeing no color whatever, only grayish white. Neither is there any cure for it. The thing is than when the defect is discovered those who have it should allow for the defect and correct it as far as possible by not trying to conceal it. Only a few years ago, men in various employments where it was necessary to distinguish colors made many mistakes, and on railroads and watercrafts where seeing signals in correct colors mean life or death, fatal accidents occurred which were unaccountable until the color-blind experts explained the cause. Now, no man is permitted to hold such positions who has not full power of sight to distinguish colors. Every man ought to know whether he is color-blind or not, and I believe in some schools the sight of all boys is tested for color. It should be so in all schools. Testing is very simple, nothing being necessary but to have some bits of colored silk with the colors clear and correct and let the boy or man pick out the colors, as called for. If he can do it, he is all right; if not, he is color-blind, to what extent may be determined by further experiment."

Dragon Flies Hold Up Cars

Dragon flies temporarily stopped traffic on the Third Avenue surface line of New York recently. It is supposed that they came from New Jersey. When the swarm of wide-winged, long-tailed insects entered the car, the women became panic-stricken and the men gallantly came to the rescue. The flies lighted on the occupants and though they did no harm many of them were killed in the melee. The dragon fly is a fierce-looking insect and is commonly called the devil's darning needle; its wings while spread are five inches. A swarm can well spread fear. They are quite harmless and feed on mosquito larvæ. It is a mistaken idea that dragon flies have a stitching needle in their tails.

Commonest Disease of Teeth Cured

Dr. Michael T. Barrett announced to the Pennsylvania State Dental Society in Philadelphia, his discovery of the germ of pyorrhea, and demonstrated its cure with emetine. Pyorrhea, one of the oldest and most baffling diseases, is shrinking of the gum until the teeth fall out. Dr. Barrett treated forty-six patients and all were cured. Pyorrhea has been known almost since records were kept and traces of it have been found in Egyptian mummies.

Immense Skeleton of Man

Three skeletons supposed to have been persons buried in prehistoric times, at Dysart, County Louth, Ireland, have been unearthed. One of the skeletons is ten feet in height. The three bodies were found incased in stone and buried in separate graves. From the crown of the head to the chin the skull of the giant measured eighteen inches.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to print letters requesting patterns, quilt pieces, etc., for the purpose of, or with the expectation of receiving the equivalent in return, for this is not an exchange column.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, Care COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

THE following poem was sent in by one of the sisters and as it seemed to convey such a message of hope and cheer, I am passing it along so that all may share it with me.

It lays stress on the fact that if we but keep our minds occupied with bright thoughts, there will be no room for the gloomy ones, with their depressing effects, to creep in.

Try it through your vacation when, unless you are a downright pessimist, the mind is more pliable and expects pleasant things, and the results will be so gratifying that you will want to continue the practise the rest of the time.

Try the Mind Cure

"Think health, and health will find you
As certain as the day,
And pain will lag behind you
And lose you on the way.

Think love, and love will meet you
And go where'er you go,
And fate can no more treat you
Like some malicious foe.

Think joy, and joy will hear you,
For thoughts are always heard,
And it shall nestle near you
Like some contented bird.

Whate'er your sad condition,
Whate'er your woes or pains,
Bright thoughts shall bring fruition
As surely as God reigns."

CHULA VISTA, BOX 126, CAL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

This southwestern extremity of Uncle Sam's domain does not seem properly represented in our "Corner," hence my intrusion. It is my first attempt, so please be forbearing.

Chula Vista is a tiny village midway between San Diego and Tia Juana, the first Mexican town across the border, and is situated in the midst of the most beautiful and luxuriant lemon orchards. It is an ideal location. We came here nearly three years ago, in search of "climate" for our invalids, and have found our anticipations more than realized.

Our home faces bay and ocean. We can see incoming ships, and often watch the war vessels maneuvering beyond the Strand, or steaming out to target practise. The views from all this section of country are magnificent. Coronado, the great tourist resort, lies a short distance to our west, and beyond it is North Island where the Government Aviation Camp is located.

We have grown accustomed to seeing the air ships above us, yet I have not yet overcome the thrill which I always experience in seeing one come in from the ocean, like a giant bird winging its way homeward after a weary flight. One must see them many times before one can contemplate without emotion the stupendous importance of their influence on the future life of the world. Many already carry passengers.

As you know, this is Exposition year with us. We are about ten miles from the gates of the Panama California Exposition in San Diego, and from our windows can see its towers by day, and its electric display at night. It opened last New Year's eve, and will close next New Year's eve, one year later. Many of you will doubtless have visited it ere this letter reaches print (should it be so fortunate). For those who come later, or who merely hope to come at some future time, perhaps I can give a little information or encouragement. Many fear to go to an International Exposition because of the expense. The conviction is of maximum charge with minimum return. This was true in the infancy of big "Fairs." I remember as a young girl, going to the Centennial Exposition, where one had to pay ordinary hotel fees for sleeping on a cot in the crowded "parlor" of a private house; but such conditions are past. San Diego is a small city of only about eighty or eighty-five thousand inhabitants, and its fair may be said to be its own enterprise. For those who desire to see a great "Fair" —one built by the millions of Government and State appropriation, San Francisco's Panama Pacific Exposition is the place to go. But after going there, come here also. That is grand, almost beyond words to express, but it lacks the quaint old-world beauty and serenity of this. San Diego itself is a most picturesque and unusual city. Much of it is built on canyons and hillsides, among sage brush and boulders and overlooking a panorama of bay, ocean and islands, mountains and valleys, lakes and streams, white hills of salt in the marshes, and such profusion of flowers the year round as only California can produce.

In the younger days of the city, a tract of 1400 acres was set apart for a Park, at its outskirts. This was mostly wild country of hills and canyons, and is now practically in the center of the town, a perfect gem of the combined beauty of nature and art. Six hundred and fifteen acres of it are occupied by the Exposition. It is so accessible, yet so secluded, so embowered in blossoms, so reminiscent of old Mission days in California, that the time spent in its enclosure is inspiring. Its attractions do not depend on its "exhibits" which are small, but on their uniqueness and their setting. Hotels are abundant and most reasonable, and there are apartment houses everywhere. One may secure a good hotel room at ten dollars per week, and eat at one of the numerous "Cafeterias." There may be some in our "Corner" not familiar with these establishments; for their benefit, I will say they are merely restaurants where one waits upon oneself. One passes along an aisle-way where there are stacks of trays, napkins and silver, from which one helps oneself with utensils needful for dining. Still farther on are long tables, heated from below, filled with most perfectly cooked food of every description and kind. White-capped and aproned men carve the meats and lay on one tray in appropriate dishes as one selects; pretty girls in dainty dresses, serve the vegetables, salads, fruits, desserts, and drinks. One passes along

Adulterated Food Products

THE subject of pure food, which has been discussed frequently on COMFORT'S editorial page, especially concerns the readers of our cooking department and calls for a further word of caution here; for it is the housewife, who does the marketing and cooking, that must stand guard to protect the family from fraudulently and injuriously adulterated food.

Food adulteration, though accomplished in a thousand different ways, is of two principal classes; the one, which is simply fraudulent without being injurious to health, consists of substituting in whole or in part an inferior or worthless substance or mixture that is harmless; the other, which is both fraudulent and injurious to health, is by means of the substitution or admixture of a harmful ingredient.

To illustrate; cottonseed oil and peanut oil are as wholesome and nourishing as olive oil (sweet oil), but they are much less costly and are not so appetizing to some tastes; therefore when you order olive oil and pay the price for it but get cottonseed or peanut oil or olive oil mixed with those oils you are simply cheated. Likewise if you buy ground spices containing ground cocoanut shells, or whole spices that have had a part of their essence extracted or African ginger is substituted for Jamaica ginger, you get an inferior article of less strength.

Good flavoring extracts and essences necessarily contain a certain portion of alcohol which is harmless in the small quantities used in cooking, but those sold by pedlers or of unknown or unreliable manufacture may contain wood alcohol which is very poisonous, deadly in moderate quantities while in very small doses repeated it acts as a slow poison injuring the nerves and finally causing total blindness.

You can't be too careful in buying your baking powder, cream of tartar and cooking soda, all three of which are indispensable as many recipes call for baking powder, others for cream of tartar and soda, and still others for soda only—with sour milk always soda.

"Pure cream of tartar," as previously stated by COMFORT'S editor, "is one of the chief constituents of high-grade baking powders but, as it is costly, you can't expect to find much of it in the cheap ones. The latter are likely to contain some inferior substitute, even alum which we believe to be unwholesome. We have known cream of tartar to be heavily adulterated with alum."

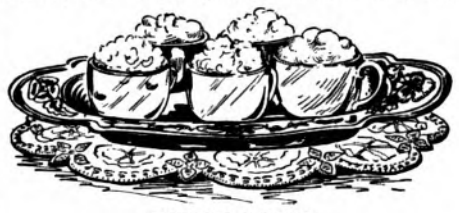
Buy a baking powder that is guaranteed to contain no alum.

Go to the druggist and buy your cream of tartar by the pound and see that you get the pure potassium bi-tartrate, as the druggists call it. The price is high because of the war, so there is greater temptation and larger profit in adulteration. A half or a whole teaspoonful of cream of tartar in a glass of water makes a wholesome and refreshing summer drink; it flushes the kidneys and has a mild laxative action on the bowels—but it must be pure.

Get your cooking soda at the druggist's, also. There are two kinds, the carbonate and the bi-carbonate. Be sure you get the sodium bi-carbonate; it has twice the raising power, is pleasanter to the taste and more agreeable to the stomach; it is also a good home remedy for sundry ailments including sour stomach and rheumatism. But get the pure bi-carbonate—it is not expensive.

We will have another talk, in this department, on pure food, for it is a great and important subject.—Ed.

Recipes



CREAM RICE PUDDING.—One cup of rice, one cup of cold water, let boil until it has absorbed the water (about seven minutes), then add one quart of milk, pinch of salt and some grated lemon rind. Let boil slowly on the back of the stove for about thirty minutes. Follow directions and you will have the most delicious rice pudding you ever tasted. Eat with whipped cream.

BELLE CHADBOURNE, Augusta, Maine.

GREEN TOMATO PIE.—Line a pie tin with a rich crust. Wash and remove stem but do not peel, four green tomatoes. Slice thin, add one half cup of granulated sugar, pinch of cinnamon and allspice, dot several places with butter, sift a little flour over top, wet over with milk. Bake in moderate oven to a rich brown.

MRS. JOS. PELKA, JR., Bark River, Mich.

PINEAPPLE PUDDING.—Scald two cups of milk. Mix four tablespoons corn-starch, four tablespoons sugar and a little salt, to a paste with one quarter cup of milk and add all to the hot milk. Cook ten or fifteen minutes; add several spoonfuls, a little at a time, to the beaten yolk of two eggs. Return to the thickened milk and cook several minutes longer. Remove from the fire and add the beaten whites of two eggs and one half cup of grated pineapple. Serve when cold with whipped cream.—Ed.

PINEAPPLE PUDDING.

SWISS COOKIES.—One cup sugar, one half cup butter one egg, one half cup sour milk, scant one half teaspoon soda, flour enough to roll very thin; bake in a hot oven.

CLARA ANDERSON, Crawford, Texas.

SPICE CAKE.—One third cup of soft butter, one and one third cups of brown sugar, one half cup of milk, one and three quarters cups of flour, two eggs, put in whole, three level teaspoons of baking powder, one half teaspoon of cinnamon, one half teaspoon of nutmeg, one half cup of raisins or figs and one half cup nuts. Mix all together and beat three minutes. Bake forty minutes.

MARTHA'S PATTY CAKES.—One cup of sugar, two tablespoons of bacon fat or butter, two eggs, one and one half cups of flour, one and one half teaspoons of baking powder and three quarters cup of milk. Take sugar, eggs and fat and beat quite smooth with an egg beater; put in flour and baking powder, sifted together; after that is in mixture add the milk and beat again. Bake in small patty or muffin pans in moderate oven till light brown. They may be served with fresh berries over them.

MISS MARTHA WASHINGTON KRAUSSE, Walla Walla, Wash.

BUTTERMILK CAKE.—Three eggs, one and one half cups of sugar, two tablespoons of lard, one cup of buttermilk, three teaspoons of baking powder, flour enough to thicken and flavoring. Bake in layers. Caramel, chocolate, or cocoanut on this cake makes it very nice.

MRS. FLOSSIE URBAN, Shelburn, Ind.

CHOCOLATE CAKE.—Two cups of sugar, one half cup of butter and one half cup of lard, one cup of sour milk, two cups of flour, one teaspoon of soda, in milk, one teaspoon of baking powder, in the flour, one half cup of melted chocolate and three eggs, the yolks with sugar. Beat the whites and put in last as you place it in the pan to bake.

COOKIES.—Two cups of molasses, one cup of lard, one cup of sour milk, two eggs, one tablespoon of ginger, three teaspoons of soda, stirred in milk, and flour enough to roll out.

ALICE CAKE.—One and one half cups of sugar, four well-beaten eggs, one cup of cream, salt, two cups of flour, and one heaping teaspoon of baking powder. Flavor.

MISS INEZ WILE, Whitetop, Va.

CHERRY ROLL.—Sift together one pint of flour, one teaspoon of baking powder, two tablespoons of sugar. Into this mix one tablespoon of lard, adding milk to make dough as for biscuit. Roll thin and line a pan, place over this a pint of cherries, either fresh or canned, well sweetened, to which add small pieces of butter. Fold the dough over the cherries and bake.

MRS. F. O. LEWIS, Salem, Ind.

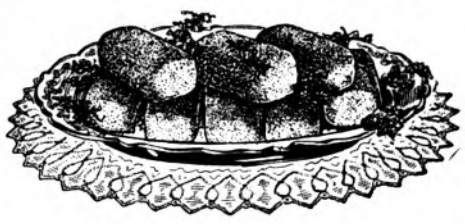
PEANUT BUTTER FUDGE.—Two cups granulated sugar, one half cup sweet milk, two heaping tablespoons peanut butter. Boil exactly five minutes. Remove from the stove and stir until it thickens. Pour into buttered pans and cut into squares.

MRS. C. M. HILL, 1121 Guerrerd St., San Francisco, Cal.

CHERRY FOAM.—Boil two cups of granulated sugar and one half cup of water together without stirring until the syrup threads from spoon. Add one quarter teaspoon of vanilla and pour it slowly upon the beaten whites of two eggs beating until stiff enough to drop from a teaspoon on butter paper. Before the candy cools press one half of a candied cherry into the top of each. Roll in little balls and place on buttered paper.

FRUIT PUNCH.—Take juice from one can of pineapple, add juice of six lemons, three oranges and a cupful of preserved cherries; sweeten to taste and let stand for two or three hours. Add one quart ice water and one cup chopped ice. If too rich dilute with ice water, though it should be rich and not too sweet.

BETTER THAN FUDGE CANDY.—Three cups of light brown sugar, a small lump of butter and a five-cent can of condensed milk. Cook this until it will form a small ball when dropped in cold water. Add flavoring and chopped nuts. Cool just a little then beat until creamy.



MRS. FLOSSIE URBAN, Shelburn, Ind.

Delightfully refreshing for hot summer days are fruit punches and as they contain no alcohol there need be no hesitancy in serving.

BEEF LOAF.—Two eggs, one pound of beef or pork, ground, one half cup of cracker crumbs, salt and pepper to taste. Put your meat in a pan and stir in your eggs and cracker crumbs and mix into a loaf as for bread, and place in pan with a little water to start it and bake one hour. If preferred add cut-up onion.

CORN CHOWDER.—One quart of corn, one quart of sliced raw potatoes, small piece of fat salt pork, one onion, sliced, two cups of milk and as many crackers as desired. Fry the pork and cook the onion in the fat. Strain this into a quart of water in which the potatoes were scalded, then put in a layer of potatoes and a layer of the corn pulp which has been previously heated; season with salt and pepper and allow to simmer for twenty minutes. Blend one tablespoon of flour and two tablespoons of butter together, add the milk and keep stirring until it boils. Pour it over the chowder. Turn the chowder over crackers, which have been slightly toasted to dry dampness.—Ed.

SWEET POTATO CROQUETTES.—Press through a ricer sufficient hot baked sweet potato to measure one pint. Place over the fire, add one rounding tablespoon of butter, the beaten yolks of three eggs, pepper and salt to taste, and beat well with a fork. Cool slightly, and form, roll in bread crumbs, dip in beaten egg, roll again in crumbs and fry in deep, hot fat.—Ed.

SALMON LOAF.—Scald about one half cup of milk and small amount of mace together. Mince one can of salmon and add one half cup stale bread crumbs, salt and pepper and a little parsley, also two eggs, well-beaten, and pour in the milk a little at a time, taking care not to get the mixture too soft. Turn into a greased mold or bowl and steam nearly an hour.—Ed.

CLEAR CALF'S FOOT JELLY.—If you require only a small quantity of jelly, an ox's foot or two calf's feet will make a pint and a half, or perhaps more. Take care to select nice, large, white-looking, fresh-boiled feet, and if you can buy them ready cleaned and scalded, it saves a great deal of trouble. Cut them into pieces, taking out any dark-looking bits; put them into a stew-pan with six pints of cold water and the rinds of two lemons peeled very thin. Let them boil without ceasing five or six hours, until the liquor is much reduced. Strain it through a colander or sieve, and let it stand all night. Next morning, take off all the grease you can with a knife, and wipe up the rest with blotting paper. Put your rough jelly into a stewpan and melt it over the fire. If the jelly is for an invalid to whom wine is not allowed, add the juice of six or eight lemons; if not, the juice of three lemons, three quarters of a pint of sherry, and a tablespoon of brandy. Sweeten to taste. Mix these together, and let them just boil. Then take the jelly off the fire, and let it stand no more than milk-warm. Then set it on the fire again, and stir in the whites of six eggs without beating them, and half the shells broken small; keep stirring it constantly with a tinned iron wire whisk until it boils up with a fine white head. Let it stand to settle a few minutes. Have your flannel jelly-bag, quite clean, ready at hand; dip the pointed end into boiling water; squeeze the water out again, and then with a teacup take out the egg shells and what jelly comes with them, and put them first into the bottom of the jelly-bag; after that, pour the jelly very gently by cupfuls into the bag, and let it strain into the basin placed under it. If at the first straining it is thick and cloudy, it must be passed through the bag two or three times until it runs clear.

JULIA TABOLA, 1216 Jackson St., Houston, Texas.

TOMATO CURRIE.—Fry two tablespoons of chipped onion in two tablespoons of butter; then stir in slowly two tablespoons of flour till creamy; add two cups of either canned or fresh tomatoes and let come to a boil and add four eggs, without breaking the yolks, and let the whites set; then stir all together and add salt and pepper.

MRS. JOSSIE CRAWFORD, Indiahoma, Okla.

SALMON SALAD.—One can of salmon, one half cup olives mixed with salad dressing. Place on lettuce and dot with olives.

ESCALLOPED ONIONS.—Butter a baking dish, put in a layer of cracker crumbs, a layer of onions that have been cut up and boiled, bits of butter, salt and pepper. Continue till dish is filled, having butter on top; pour over sufficient milk to moisten. Bake one hour. —Ed.

MUSTARD.—Four tablespoons mustard, two tablespoons flour, one tablespoon sugar, one cup vinegar. Put mustard, flour and sugar in pan, mix, add vinegar and let it come to a boiling point.

MRS. KATIE PADGETT, Griffin, Ga.

WASHINGTON FRUIT CAKE.—Two cups of butter, three cups of brown sugar, four cups of browned flour, five eggs, well-beaten, one cup of sweet milk, one teaspoon of soda, two teaspoons of cream of tartar. Mix as usual and stir in at the last one half pound of raisins, seeded, one pound of dates, seeded and chopped, one teaspoon each of ground cinnamon and nutmeg. Bake slowly and steadily until done. If any fruit is omitted, add more flour.

CARROTS IN TURNIP CUPS.—Pare small, white turnips. Cut slices from the stem end and remove the flesh, leaving a cup. Cook twenty minutes in boiling salted water, take out carefully and turn upside down to drain. Have ready a filling made of carrots cut into dice and cooked twenty minutes, to which has been added salt and pepper, one half cup cream. Cook together until hot, fill turnip cups, garnish dish with parsley and serve.—Ed.

SPONGE CAKE.—Three well-beaten eggs, one cup of sugar, one cup of flour, two teaspoons of baking powder; the last thing pour on one third of a cup of hot water; beat well; flavor and put in hot oven and it will bake in about fifteen minutes or bake in two layers, and serve with sweetened whipped cream between layers and on top.

The Man Who Helped Make Summer

The Van Camp chef.

He prepares many a meal for countless homes. He saves millions of hours in the kitchen for women to spend on the porch.

And he does more.

He makes Pork and Beans more delightful than they ever were before, and more digestible.

But why argue? Won't you, for your own sake—and the man's sake, too—let this dish tell its story?

VAN CAMP'S
PORK & BEANS BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

Also Baked Without the Sauce

10, 15 and 20 Cents Per Can

Baked Beans is a dish to serve often. It is heartier than meat, more appealing and cheaper.

But not home-baked beans. They are hard to digest. And not hard beans, crisp, broken or insipid.

Van Camp's are the Beans to serve often. They are mellow and whole. They are thoroughly baked. And the sauce we bake in gives a tang that's resistless.

You don't know this, else your pantry shelf would be full of Van Camp's. But won't you find it out—and today?

Buy a can of Van Camp's Beans to try. If you do not find them the best you ever ate, your grocer will refund your money.

holding one's tray and nodding or pointing to anything desired. There is such a clatter of dishes, canaries singing, and an orchestra playing oftentimes in addition to the talking and laughing of the diners, one doesn't try to ask many questions. When one passes the checker who lays a printed slip of the cost on one's tray, and on to a little table, usually seating four, and shining in white linen and silver, where one sets one's food from the tray to the table. The tray is instantly seized by a "tray-boy," and one is left with dinner steaming hot, and all without trouble and but few cents of expense. Tea, coffee, and chocolate (often in little individual, silver pots), are but five cents each. All vegetables five cents, and given most generously. Salads range according to their ingredients, usually ten cents. Cakes, ices, puddings and pies of all descriptions, five cents each. Meats and fish usually ten cents per helping, fowls higher according to kinds and season. My husband and I go frequently to the Cafeteria, rather than come home after a long drive to prepare dinner. Our united meal seldom costs us fifty cents, often less than forty cents, but we are not meat eaters. The helpings are so generous that where two go together, they can divide with each other, and enjoy a great variety. When we had a room at the hotel and lived in this way, we found twenty dollars per week an abundance for the two of us. Where one desires to remain a month or longer, one may take an apartment. These vary from sixteen dollars per month to almost as much as one may desire to pay, according to location, furnishing and service. If one goes out a little on one of the car lines, one may get a beautiful "three-room apartment" for twenty-four dollars per month, with hot and cold water, steam heat, gas, electricity, and telephone. The "three rooms" translated, mean living-room with wall bed, kitchenette, and bathroom. There is a cot for a third person, and here three may live and do their cooking just as conveniently as in the most modern home, all very cheaply. This applies not only to Exposition year, but to all the time, for San Diego is rapidly becoming a great tourist resort. It is the most perfect climate we have ever experienced, and we have tried several cities down the coast. My husband says it is the cheapest place we have ever lived, not because food is so reasonable, but because we need so little fuel, and so little change of wearing apparel the year round. Then one can live in almost any kind of a house; many live exclusively in "tent houses." If one has a small income it can be made to go farther here than in most places, and there is always the opportunity, if one owns or rents a home, to add to it by the growing of vegetables, poultry, and Belgian hares.

I fear my letter is already too long, so will only add that the fruit of our experience is this: Where people are in poor health and need a mild climate for recuperation, where they have reached the "decline" of life, and desire to spend the remaining years where they never need suffer from "heat" nor "cold," where they have delicate children and want to bring them up where they may run wild and barefoot, almost the year round, or where they have sufficient of this world's goods, and seek only the enjoyment of life, this climate and location are ideal. But it is not a place for money making. Those who have their fortunes to carve would better go elsewhere.

I cannot answer letters, although I would gladly do so, did time and strength permit. Would I could send you a whole cart load of flowers (including orange and lemon blossoms) for decorating our "Corner." Or better still, would I could toss you each an orange! We have bought them here for the past five months at fifty cents per box of one hundred and fifty big, juicy, sweet Navals! Many have rotted on the ground, not paying for picking.

With kindest greeting to our dear editor and each member of our corner, Sincerely,

FLORENCE H. HARKINS.

Florence Harkins. If "all roads lead to Rome" so too do they lead to California this year and all who can are on their way, by rail, automobile or boat, or else planning to go, and I wish it were possible for all of COMFORT'S readers to be there. Doubtless a great many of them will attend.

Mr. and Mrs. Gannett have just returned from California, and a tour of the South and West, where they were much impressed with the fairs and particularly with the educational possibilities they presented and they corroborate all your statements. They were much interested in the outdoor organ at San Diego and in the pyrotechnical and searchlight display at San Francisco, as well as many other things too numerous to mention. Each person who goes there will see something that some other person will miss,—probably something they are more interested in or which pertains to their work,—and I am sure the readers who are not so fortunate as to visit the Exposition will like to hear an account of it from them.

MILTON, W. VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

This is my first letter, but I have read COMFORT for years. I, too, am interested in Mission work, and would be glad to offer a few suggestions for the benefit of Ruth Knapp and others. Our pastor here suggested that the members of our church and others who wanted to help, save their Sunday eggs for a certain length of time and sell them for Mission money. Most everyone entered their name. If a church is in debt, as many are, the women folks can work up a fair. Each make some article, aprons, handkerchiefs, collars, men's shirts, children's dresses and fancy articles of many descriptions could be named, but the best sellers are vases, jugs, odd-shaped glasses, dishes, boxes, etc., made of salt work; these when carefully made in many beautiful colors find ready sale. If this work is not understood by anyone who is interested I can send in directions for making.

While building the new church here we gave ice-cream suppers at our homes, also rice suppers. In this way young men will help that would help in no other way.

I don't want to be called a crank, but I must tell of one more plan, this is the Dainty Sock Social. Either have this printed on cards or write it:

"This dainty sock we send to you,
Is not for you to wear;
Please multiply your size by two,
And place therein with care,
In pennies or in cents,
Just twice the number that you wear,
So don't forget the time and date,
We'll answer when you knock,
And welcome you with open arms,
But don't forget your sock."

Give date and place and add that this is for church or mission as the case may be. Take cambric or some cheap cloth and make a small sock, put a draw string in the top and send to everybody that you think would help. Many will send in that cannot come. The evening can be spent in singing and refreshments may be served. I hope this may help in the good work.

I was interested in Alice Warner's letter. I have earned quite a lot of spending money in many different ways. I like to sew and make fancy work. I would tell you of some of my ways, but my letter is getting lengthy. Let us have more ideas and suggestions along this line. I would like to hear from some of the sisters. Best wishes to all. IDA M. HICKS.

DUGGER, IND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

May I come in for a little chat?

I am not a stranger, I have visited our cozy corner before, and know many of you and isn't it nice of Mrs. Wilkinson to allow me to call again? I have many COMFORT friends, whom I have formed acquaintance with through the Sisters' Corner. COMFORT is one of my companions; there is nothing I enjoy more than to sit by the fire, in the long winter evenings, and read COMFORT, and the Sisters' Corner is always the favorite page.

When I read a letter from a sister that praises her home and family, and praises her children and does not look upon her home cares as merely a stern, cold duty, but rather finds a pleasure in her home and her home tasks, and in her children, I always want to take that woman by the hand, and say, "You just suit me." It has been said so often, "What would the home be without the children?" Ah, very lonely I fear, for some of us. My three children have made my home worth while since my husband's death, almost three years ago.

Sisters, you who have been left as I have, with your children to support, do not think for a moment that you would be better off if you did not have these children to care for. Far from it, I am glad that I have the responsibility of my little family, I am glad that I have these children to care for. If it wasn't for them I would have no one to make a home for. When I am inclined to feel blue or discouraged, it is always the responsibility of the little "home nest" that keeps me brave, keeps me courageous and contented, and instead of sitting down to worry, over what might have been, I

ROSEMARY A Forlorn Cherub in Search of Heaven

By Jerome Adams

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"I CAN'T possibly forgive him," sighed Miss Terrain, as she sank into a rustic chair, and opened her book upside down. "I distinctly forbade him to do it, and he had no right to disregard my expressed wishes, even if I had just promised to marry him."

Her handsome brows were drawn together in a frown, her eyes still fastened upon the pages of the inverted book, when an anxious little voice at her elbow piped out:

"Is this heaven, lady?"

Miss Terrain turned and surveyed the scrap of humanity before her with mingled pity and amusement—a forlorn little figure in an ill-fitting brown gingham dress, surmounted by a cherubic head and face, the latter somewhat soiled and slightly troubled.

"This place is called 'The Haven,' dear," she answered. "Is that what you mean?"

The hint of trouble vanished from the soiled cherubic face, the curly head nodded emphatically.

"I thought it was. 'Cause he said heaven was such a bootiful place." A pair of serious brown eyes wandered approvingly over the magnificent Terrain park. "And he said if little girls are good, the gates of heaven would be wide open, and they was. So I came in."

A beautifully manicured hand was extended and a grimy little fist instantly thrust into it.

"Who told you all this, little one?" asked Miss Terrain gently, drawing the forlorn little figure close to her side.

"Why the man what came to the Orph'nage yesterday. He told us all about heaven and God and the angels. Are you God, or one of the angels?"

"I'm just—just Ida, dear," replied the haughty Miss Terrain, with a sudden accession of modesty.

"Oh, goody!" exclaimed the child excitedly. "Then I guess you must be my Aunt Ida. She died and went to heaven, and then I had to go to the Orph'nage." The big brown eyes inspected Miss Terrain critically. "You don't look just zackly like her, but the man said we'd all be bootiful when we got to heaven. May I call you Aunt Ida, like I used to?"

"Call me anything you like, dear," murmured Miss Terrain, more touched than she would have cared to admit.

"And can I stay right here with you, Aunt Ida, or will I have to ask God first?"

"You may stay right here until you are rested, little one," temporized Miss Terrain, lifting the child to her lap. "What's your name?"

The brown eyes were wide with surprise. "Don't you 'member what you used to call me? It was Rosemary. Don't you 'member?"

Miss Terrain's arms tightened involuntarily.

"How did you get here, Rosemary?" she evaded.

"Why I just walked and walked, all the way from the Orph'nage. You see after the man told us about heaven, Mary Bains said there was a bootiful place right down this road what was called 'The Heaven,' and there was lions on the gate posts. So I just kept on till I found it. And I'm so glad. Now I can stay right here forever and ever, can't I, Aunt Ida?"

"Suppose we go into the house now, and get something to eat, and a nice rest," suggested Miss Terrain, undecided as to just what course she ought to pursue.

She felt exceedingly loath to dispel little Rosemary's illusions, but of course the Orphanage authorities must be notified and the child returned. Arrived at the house, she took the little girl to her own apartments and put her in charge of a maid to be bathed and fed.

Presently the maid returned to the room.

"I beg your pardon, Miss Terrain, but the little girl insists that she is not to put on that clothing again. She says she is to have her heaven clothes, whatever she may mean by that. So I thought I'd better ask."

"Quite right, Marie," agreed Miss Terrain, looking slightly puzzled. "Wrap her in one of my dressing gowns for the present and put her here on the couch."

"Heaven clothes!" she murmured as the maid left the room. "You poor little waif, you shall have them."

Going to the telephone, she called up the Orphanage, told of the child's safety, and asked that she might remain at The Haven for a few days' visit. Permission was readily granted, and Miss Terrain immediately dispatched a maid into the city for clothing. Her directions were few but to the point: "Get everything the child will need for a few days, and get the best." Miss Terrain never did things by halves.

During the next few days a certain young man called at The Haven with amazing frequency. But as Miss Terrain did not wish to see him (or at least, if she did, her pride forbade it), he was invariably denied admittance to her presence.

In fact, Miss Terrain was "Not at home" to a good many callers during those few days. She was restless and ill at ease, and not in the mood for entertaining. She found it infinitely more soothing to take little Rosemary and go for long rambles in the park. The child's quaint sayings and bewitching little ways were a never-failing source of interest to her, and did much to distract her mind from unwelcome thoughts.

The little one was happy as a bird in her absolute confidence that The Haven was to be her permanent home. Having found the gates of "heaven" wide open and entered in, there was not the slightest doubt in her infantile mind that she would be permitted to remain.

Miss Terrain was puzzled to know how to deal with this phase of the affair. Time and again she had thrown out hints in an effort to convey gently to the child's mind the fact that her stay at The Haven was to be a limited one. But the little one utterly failed to comprehend. It was soon evident that nothing short of the baldest statement of facts, would pierce the armor of her perfect faith, and this Miss Terrain hesitated to make, feeling that it would be an unnecessary cruelty.

As the days drifted away, one by one, she found herself becoming much attached to the cherubic little waif who called her Aunt Ida, and frankly idolized her.

One day, as Miss Terrain sat by the fountain making a pretense at reading, with the child as usual, playing nearby, a plan popped, full-fledged, into her mind, whereby the little one need not be sent back to the Orphanage. But the plan required the sanction of someone else, and that someone was the certain young man who had been making such strenuous efforts to see her. At least it would have required his sanction, had he not been under the ban of her displeasure. As it was, of course——

Miss Terrain fell to dreaming. In her heart she knew that any plan of hers would be acceptable to him, simply because it was her plan. But that was not what she wanted. She found herself wishing (always provided the young man were not under the ban of her displeasure) that Rosemary might make his acquaintance accidentally, and tell him her touching, guileless little story as she had told it to her. Then she felt that she could unfold her plan to him without the slightest hesitation.

Miss Terrain started up irritably. After all the young man was under the ban of her displeasure, and could have no possible connection with her plans. So why this idle dreaming?

She glanced around for Rosemary, remembered seeing her run down the path some time ago, and strolled off in search of her. Almost arrived at a sharp turn in the pathway, she heard the child's voice. Peering through the foliage of some tall rose bushes that screened the speaker from her view, Miss Terrain beheld a picture, which for the moment held her spellbound.

"Then you'll have to 'fess," she told him firmly.

Just on the other side of the bushes sat a certain young man on a rustic bench, and standing between his knees, gazing earnestly into his face, was Rosemary. Miss Terrain had no desire to advance and make her presence known. Neither could she go back, for the path she had just traversed was, in places, plainly exposed to the man's view. It seemed almost miraculous that she had escaped detection as she came along it, but evidently the man had been absorbed with the child, and had not happened to glance up. From the look on his face, Miss Terrain felt almost certain that Rosemary had been telling him her story. An instant later this impression was confirmed.

"So now I'm going to live here in heaven forever and ever," the child said. "Wouldn't you like to do that too?"

The man glanced away toward the rose bushes. Miss Terrain trembled, though she was positive he could not see her through the leafy screen. If there were only some way for her to escape!

"Well—er—to be explicit, little one," began the man slowly, "my idea was to transplant heaven, so to speak, to my own home."

Rosemary regarded him an instant with puzzled eyes, then evidently decided that he had answered her question in the affirmative.

"Then why don't you ask Aunt Ida?" she queried.

"Why—as a matter of fact, I did, Goldilocks."

"Did she say yes?" eagerly.

"Well, I certainly understood it that way. But, you see I—displeased her, Curlyhead, and she sent me away."

"Put you out of heaven?" In her sympathy the child laid a dimpled hand on his knee, her troubled eyes searching his face.

"That sums up the situation exactly, little friend."

"Maybe if you said you're sorry you did it, she'd let you come back," suggested the child presently.

"That would not be strictly true, Midget. You see, I'm not sorry I did it."

"Oh-h! Then I'm 'fraid she can't let you come back." There was reproof as well as disappointment in the tone. "'Less maybe if you promised never to do it again," she added with returning hope.

The man shook his head slowly. "Out of the question, Goldilocks. I'd be sure to do it again, the moment I got near enough."

Disapproval was written clearly on the childish face, but evidently sympathy urged her to seek extenuating circumstances.

"What did you do to 'splease Aunt Ida?" she inquired with simple directness.

"Well, to be perfectly frank with you, little Inquisitor, I—er—stole something from her."

The child's answer came instantly, and with authority. There had been several cases of petty theft at the Orphanage.

"Then you'll have to 'fess," she told him firmly. "And give back what you stole from her."

"Well, now, do you know, little one, that's just the plan I've had in mind all the time, but you see I've never been able to find her."

"Have you got it with you?"

"What?"

"What you stole from Aunt Ida."

"Surest thing you know, Goldilocks."

"Come on, then. She's round by the fountain."

But she wasn't. She was just on the other side of the rose bushes, and as she could neither advance nor retreat, she perforce remained where she was, and pretended to be picking roses. And not a blossom on the bush could put to shame the roses that were blooming in her cheeks.

"Oh, Aunt Ida," cried the child as they came suddenly upon her. "He wants to come back into heaven. And he's ready to 'fess now, and give back what he stole. And he——"

"By Jove, Goldilocks," interrupted the man with sudden animation. "There goes that little red squirrel you were chasing. See him?"

"Where?"

"There he is! There! See?"

The child was off like a flash, and the man turned to face the indignant eyes of Miss Terrain.

"How could you say such things to that child?" she demanded, immediately taking the initiative. "It was shameful. Did you know I was here?"

"Well, I—er—strongly suspected it. I saw you coming down the path."

"If there had been any possible way of escape——"

"You wouldn't have listened. That's just the point. I had to seize my opportunity. It's the first time you've let yourself come within listening distance since——"

"If I'd only known you were here!" flamed the woman, turning aside toward the roses.

The man came a trifle nearer.

"And speaking of opportunities," he murmured softly, "perhaps I'd better 'fess now, and——"

But Miss Terrain suddenly turned upon him with a very serious face, from which all signs of self consciousness had vanished. Apparently the subject under discussion had faded entirely from her mind.

"I'd like to consult you about something, Arthur," she said gravely.

Though the man could not have been particularly pleased at the interruption, he immediately fell in with her mood.

"I wish I could make you understand how completely I am at your service," he answered with a gravity equal to her own.

"It's about Rosemary. I haven't the heart to send her back to the Orphanage now. And besides, I've grown fond of her. I—I'd like to adopt her."

"Good idea!" agreed the man instantly. "I'll adopt her too."

"Please be serious."

"I am—thoroughly."

"Then you wouldn't object to having her round, if—if we—marry?" Miss Terrain blushed gloriously.

"Say 'when,' Ida. 'If,' in that sentence, is not a satisfactory word."

"Please be serious, Arthur. I'm asking advice."

"I'm giving it. My advice is that we adopt the child mutually. It would be brutal to send her away from you now. You see I know what it is to get a taste of heaven, and then be thrust outside the gates."

Miss Terrain's eyelids drooped and she turned away.

"Shall we go find Rosemary now?" she murmured.

But the man caught her hands.

"I can't possibly face my little mentor," he insisted, "until I've cleared my conscience, and——"

"Don't you—dare—Arthur—please——"

Apparently the man was possessed of a very exacting conscience. It was some minutes before he succeeded in getting it cleared. When the burden of his guilt finally rolled off, however, it seemed to carry all Miss Terrain's troubles along with it. She was laughing when, presently, the child returned to them.

"Did he give it back?" questioned the little one anxiously.

Miss Terrain nodded rosily.

"Where is it, Aunt Ida?"

A New Use for Cats

Trained to Track, Point and Retrieve Game

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

UP in Sturgis, Michigan, lives a man seventy years old, a Mr. Nimmo and his only and unmarried daughter. They probably have the strangest "pack of hounds" in the United States, if not in the world. It consists of two huge domestic cats, which Mr. Nimmo has been training for more than three years, until they trail, point and retrieve small game as well as any dogs. The cats are named Tom and Jerry, and are used principally in hunting rabbits, tree squirrels, and quail, though they have tracked and helped kill opossums and raccoons.

According to their owner, who began training the cats when they were kittens, on sight of a rabbit, squirrel or quail, they assume rigid positions, like that of a pointer, except that they move their tails slightly, and wait for him to come up and shoot the game they have found. They have never, since their training was finished, rushed forward to kill the game, or to attempt to stalk it themselves. When the shot is fired they retrieve the fallen animal or bird, and if it is not quite dead give it a quietus by biting it in the neck.

Mr. Nimmo and the cats keep the family larder full of meat. The felines are never allowed to hunt alone, and are kept as carefully in the house as any petted Maltese or Angora cat of high degree could be cared for.

The task of training was extremely arduous, and many times their owner felt that the animals would never learn to lie back and wait for him to shoot. Finally, however, by filling a number of dead birds and rabbit skins with fiery red pepper he persuaded Tom and Jerry not to seize game until they heard a shot fired.

The especial value of these cats, Mr. Nimmo says, is their ability to trail, capture, and kill wounded squirrels which flee to the tree tops after being shot.

He estimates he has secured some two hundred squirrels which otherwise would have been lost to him during the past season by the aid of these cats. When he takes his shotgun from the rack in his home the cats leap about him, like hunting dogs, only they meow their pleasure at going afield, rather than bark, as would a setter or hound.

Their owner claims they are better at trailing coons, those well-known game animals of the South, than the best coon dogs.

Only last December he captured twenty-two raccoons with the aid of these cats, and neither cat got so much as a scratch from the animals. "Tom and Jerry," said he, "will follow me like dogs for miles through the woods, until they see or scent a rabbit, bird or squirrel. Then they squat down close to the ground, wag their tails from side to side, and remain motionless until I see the game and shoot. Then they dash forward, seizing the animal or bird and holding it until I arrive.

QUANTITY OF RADIUM.—Radium worth about $91,000 was recently turned over to the National Radium Institute at Baltimore by the government. Within a four weeks' period, the Bureau of Mines produced over 288 milligrams of radium, which has a market value of $35,000. All of this was sent to the Institute, which is under the control of Dr. Howard A. Kelly. Most of the radium refined by the government goes either there or to the Memorial Hospital of New York City. The government department has just announced that shipments worth between $36,000 and $48,000 will be regularly made hereafter to the above institute.

A Mid-Summer Night Fantasy

"O, wild and wondrous midnight,
There is a might in thee
To make the charmed body
Almost like spirit be,
And give it some faint glimpses
Of immortality!" —Lowell:—Midnight.

ORRIN FLETCHER stood at the open window of his office on the eighteenth floor of the big city sky-scraper, and looked afar across the roofs and sky-lights of the surrounding buildings. In the West, the sun was sinking, a fiery yellow globe.

The day had been extremely hot, he was tired and fagged out, and he longed for some escape from an evening on the hot city pavements with their screeching noises and enervating breath.

He took out his engagement book and glanced at the date. He had no engagement for that evening. Most of his friends would attend Mrs. Browne-Ludlow's garden soiree, from which he had been conspicuously omitted, since he had beaten young Browne-Ludlow to a "frazzle" in a recent lawsuit, thereby straining social relations.

Fletcher didn't mind being left out of the affair. He was utterly indifferent to it, though it did leave him in a lurch since all those people whom he cared anything about would be there, and in justice to Mrs. Browne-Ludlow, it must be said that she did give the most delightful affairs.

For some time he pondered, then a happy thought struck him. He would attend the symphony concert at Canyon Park on the North Shore. He had often motored past the place that summer, but had never stopped in, though he had gone there often in previous seasons.

Satisfied that he had made a plan for the evening, he went to the office lavatory and washed up. He took a clean collar and tie from the stock he always kept on hand for any emergency, and after putting these on, he decided that his light tan suit, Panama hat, and oxfords were well enough.

He left the office and went to a restaurant where he had a solitary but enjoyable dinner, after which he went to the railroad station where he boarded the Canyon Park Special.

In about three quarters of an hour he had arrived at his destination, and entered the beautiful park, well named, for the region thereabout abounded in pretty little canyons and ravines. Down the cool, dimly lighted paths he walked to the substantially constructed, open-air pavillion with its comfortable seats and soft illumination from the electrics hidden within the large, fanciful Japanese lanterns suspended from the ceiling.

The orchestra was already in its place, and the tuning and setting of pitch was a mass of inimitable sound.

Fletcher dropped into his seat with a comfortable sigh. The place was delightful. A soft wind from the lake cooled the pavillion and set the fanciful lanterns in soft, soothing motion.

The audience generally was large, but tonight, somehow it wasn't. Fletcher looked about, scanning those present, and in a moment his eyes lighted on a party in a box nearby. He bowed, smiled, and the party smiled back at him. He glanced at his watch, it was still ten minutes before the music would commence, so he rose and wet to chat for a moment with his friends.

"Good evening, Miss White," he commenced, and then he went about the little circle. "I hardly expected to see you here tonight." His remark included the whole party.

"Meletta wanted to come, and so we got ready a little earlier, so that we might go directly from here to the Browne-Ludlow affair," young Mr. White responded. "Of course you are not going?" He winked significantly, for he knew of the strained relations between Fletcher and young Browne-Ludlow. "You're in luck," he went on, as he glanced enviously at Fletcher's neat and comfortable dress. "Don't I wish I could go to the affair tonight clad in this fashion," and he pointed to a picture in the program, advertising a mineral water. The picture was that of a Satyr with scarcely more than a drape of goat-skin upon his nude body.

Fletcher laughed. "Looks very comfortable, I admit," and he glanced at young White's spotless evening attire, "but fancy the mosquitoes! Wouldn't they feast?"

"Not at all. I'd get rid of them by plunging around in the lake. This moonlight night would be just the time for a swim."

"See how you torture your brother in forcing him to escort you, Miss White," and Fletcher smiled at the young lady.

She was a very beautiful young woman, but too reserved to be really interesting. She was gracious, yes, and cordial, but there was something in her attitude which bade men keep their distance. Perhaps it was natural, perhaps it was assumed, at any rate, while Fletcher had often danced and spoken with Miss Meletta White and did admire her tremendously, he was not, in slang parlance, "gone on her."

"Jasper is making matters worse than they are," she said, smiling between even teeth. "Mrs. Browne-Ludlow's home is situated right on the lake, and I've no doubt that everyone will find it very pleasant. I am very sorry you will not be present, Mr. Fletcher, and many will miss you. I would not remark about the matter were not the strained social relation between you and the Browne-Ludlows a matter at which we all must smile."

"I appreciate your kindness, Miss White," he replied, pleased, for Meletta seldom unbent to the degree she did when she made that speech.

She smiled in reply, a sunny, pleasant smile, but he thought there was a little more soul to it than usual.

"Shall you stay and hear the whole program?" he queried.

"We shall stay only to the intermission. We came in the car. It is parked 'till then. Mrs. Browne-Ludlow's is only a few miles beyond Canyon Park, you know."

As the orchestra conductor then appeared, Fletcher excused himself, bade them good night, and went back to his seat.

By this time, the hand-clapping which had greeted the director had subsided, and the concert commenced, and though Fletcher was dimly aware of the beauty of the music, somehow most of the time he was gazing at Miss Meletta White, and thinking thoughts of her such as he never thought before. How beautiful she was! But then she was considered one of the beauties of his social set. She was one of those girls, who, in spite of many proposals, clung to their happy single-blessedness, though their years were passing or were past the quarter century mark.

He fancied Miss White must be about twenty-six, yet to him it seemed just the right age, and he felt she would look the same ten, fifteen years hence. And how well she dressed! She seemed to know just what was becoming, and tonight she looked stunning in a gown of some soft white spangly material with coral chiffon draped in a manner that at once fascinated and bewildered him. She wore only a few jewels, just the diamond affair on her modestly low-cut gown, and the glittering bandeau with its attractive "stick-up" resting on her dusky golden hair. On the seat lay her evening cloak, a flimsy light affair, and its silken lining of a rather pronounced shade of yellow, made a striking background for her figure.

Fletcher's eyes kept wandering to their cynosure during most of the concert, and it was only when the lights were turned low, that he gave his attention to the stage, which was being prepared for the advent of Miss Ruth St. Venus.

For some moments the pavillion was in darkness, but outside, seen through the pillars which supported the roof, the dark trees rose, their branches net-worked against the silver globe of the moon. The locusts and crickets sang merrily, the air was filled with the soft noises of the night, and a strong smell of Chinese incense mingled with the fresh green of the outside.

The stage illumined, and Miss St. Venus appeared. Her flat black hair, extremely formal eyebrows and powdered, dead-white skin did not make her a beautiful woman, but they made her interesting. Her dances were wonders of interpretation and one could easily follow the stories they told.

Fletcher admired graceful dancing, and applauded generously. The whole of the appreciative audience did likewise, whereupon, Miss St. Venus relaxed and treated them to a sprightly dance which was more a cake-walk than anything else. The audience sat up and thrilled with pleasurable excitement as the charming lilt of Victor Herbert's delightful "Al Fresco" resounded. And as Miss St. Venus danced to the exhilarating music, Fletcher thought how delightfully in point the tune was. Al Fresco! In the open air! Truly the music seemed composed for just such a dancer as Miss St. Venus and deserved to be danced to only by a person of Miss St. Venus's skill, and in an open air pavillion like this one at Canyon Park.

Miss St. Venus was generous, but all delightful things must come to an end sometime, and so did the dancing.

The lights went up, and the orchestra members and the audience rose in ones, twos and groups to stroll out in the open 'neath the trees of Canyon Park, or in the dewy grass of the Stadium or to quench their thirst under the electric canopy above the little tables where only soft drinks were served.

Fletcher looked toward the box where the Whites had been sitting. But they had already gone. He sighed, and why he did he could not understand, then he arose too, and after a soda with lime, he strolled down the road, past the parked autos, and out on to the public road, down which he wandered.

On either side, the dark trees spread their branches against the light of the moon; in their midst, fireflies flashed their little lamps.

Many people were not about that night, and he was almost alone as he leisurely strolled down the road, engrossed in his thoughts and a cigar. Now and then he stepped to one side to let some snorting, monster-eyed automobile sweep by with a rush and roar; or again, he was thrown into the spotlight as other machine lamps flashed upon the road as they suddenly turned into it at the bend below.

He struck off across the heath toward the lake and reached the bluff which descended in a sheer drop to the lake. Below, the water lay a shimmering, heaving sheet; above, the sky stretched. The constellations glowed and once a meteor swept the vault of heaven.

The response of his nature to the great outdoors was voiced in a deep sigh of pure content. Then as he stood there, the faint note of a bugle—the signal that the second half of the concert was to commence—came from among the trees. But it was too glorious to leave the witchery of the night, so he sat himself down on the stump of a tree, and leaning against the trunk of another, he sat for some time, his eyes fixed upon the moon, while the hazy smoke of his cigar curled about his head.

As he sat gazing with contented mind at the moon, he suddenly observed a petite little form rising within it. Really, it was most extraordinary. Then as he continued to watch in bewilderment, the little form stepped from the confines of the moon, and with a graceful lilt accompanied with the sound of a sprightly little cake-walk that sounded tremendously like what he had heard but a half hour ago, the figure tangoed down a moonbeam!

"Why this is most extraordinary!" he observed to himself, as he watched the figure rapidly growing larger, "to think of the lady-moon tangoing from her abode to the earth. It is the most curious thing I ever observed. I wonder what she looks like? And they say there is no lady-moon!"

His wonder was not long unsatisfied, for just then, the lady sprang from the beam which immediately rolled up like a carpet and disappeared within the precincts of the moon!

"Well, did you enjoy my performance?" the arrival queried.

"Very much," he replied, "but will you tell me who you are?"

"Don't you know?" she asked, a little petulantly. "I'm surprised." She stood with her flimsy garments blowing gently about her, her hair, loose and falling about her in tantalizing waves.

"No, I don't," he said flatly, "or rather, yes I do, but I can't tell you because I'm puzzled."

"Why?"

"Because you look exactly like Miss St. Venus, except that your hair is brown and wavy, and yet I know that you are Miss Meletta White."

"Oh, is that it?" queried the Moon-lady. "Well, I am Miss White."

"Are you? Thanks so much for enlightening me. Isn't it strange that I know you are Miss White and yet you take on the personality of Miss St. Venus?"

"It is indeed," returned the Moon-lady, "but for all of that, I am Miss White. By the bye, won't you dance?"

"I should love to, but what would people think if they saw me? It seems quite all right that you should dance from the moon, for you seem a sprite, but I am clad—well, holy smoke!"

The vulgar expression escaped him, and then for a moment he was too dumfounded for words. He stood gazing down at himself for many, many long minutes and finally ejaculated:

"Where are my clothes?"

For he observed that on his feet were a pair of sandals and that his limbs were bared to up above the knee. About him was a lion skin with the great head resting on his left shoulder. His bared arms and right shoulder showed strong and muscular under the light of the moon.

"Why, this is utterly inconceivable!" he ejaculated. "I was properly clad just a moment ago. Great shade of Cæsar! And I must return to the city in the train! Had I my motor, I wouldn't care! Well, this is——" he stopped helplessly, and rumpled his hair in perplexity. He looked about. Yes, there was the road; there was the gleaming electric sign, "Canyon Park," and off to the left lay the heaving, tumbling lake.

"If this is a joke——"

"Oh, I wouldn't bother about it," said the Moon-lady, "why not enjoy the evening while you can? You've never had the opportunity of a tete-e-tete with me before, for it isn't my custom to exhibit my likes and dislikes. But come, let us have a little dance. Come," she repeated, and stood with her arms partially extended, in a manner so inviting, so that while she had the personality of Miss St. Venus, he knew her to be Meletta White, and he caught her joyously in his arms. What was the difference? It was mid-summer night and if Miss White chose to encourage him, how much less the human he would be if he could resist, especially when the invitation accorded with his wish!

Now, truly, it was amazing that the orchestra should again play the fascinating "Al Fresco!" but how absurd for people to sit in the pavillion when they could hear so much better down at the lake in the open!

Fletcher did the tango to a certain extent, but he was amazed at the wonderful evolutions and gyrations he performed, for he considered his am striving to accomplish what may be. But this story of mine is only one of the many thousand of such stories and doesn't really benefit anyone.

Thanks, Mrs. Wilkinson, I hope I have not intruded too long, but before I go allow me to leave a whole bushel of best wishes in our cozy corner for each and every COMFORT home. MRS. DAISY AZBELL.

GAINESVILLE, P. O. Box 352, TEXAS.

DEAR SISTERS:

I have just finished reading Mrs. Schiller's letter in the June COMFORT. She is a woman after my own heart. Why everyone doesn't like to read good books is a mystery to me. The happiest moments of my life, almost are when I am reading. I am alone so much of the time that if I didn't like to read I would be very lonely.

I like "The Harvester," by Gene Stratton-Porter. To those who haven't read this book, I say, "Read it if you possibly can." It is a story of the great outdoors.

My husband is chief engineer for the Texas Power and Light Co. He can't be at home very much and sometimes I get very lonesome.

We have been living here nine months and like very well. Gainesville is a town of about eight thousand inhabitants, has good schools and churches. The State Training School for Girls will be built here in the near future. There is an opera house and three moving picture theaters.

Let me introduce a new subject which I don't remember being discussed before: What harm is there in going to a moving picture show? Some people don't go to them at all, but in the small towns, nearly everyone does. Some say it is harmful; some take the other side of the question. I will not give my opinion now. I think I have done enough for this time in mentioning the subject, if the sisters will only discuss it I will come again sometime and tell what I think of it. With love, MRS. H. M. HOVIS.

Mrs. Hovis. I can see no objections to moving pictures provided they are of the right sort and it is the duty of every father and mother or public-spirited citizen, to impress upon the minds of each manager of a "movie" theater that if the patronage of the younger set is desired, films of the right sort must be shown, and no others. Let the people form themselves into a "Board of Censors" not only for the morals of the children but for the public in general. Many films are of great educational value both to young and old and these should be insisted upon.

Another matter of almost equal importance is that of ventilation and cleanliness which is sadly neglected in the average small theater. The manager desires the patronage of the public; in fact, it is necessary if he is to do business, and if the public objects to the sanitary side of his theater, and tell him so, he will endeavor to give them what they want, if he is an up-to-date business man, so really it rests with the people whether our moving picture theaters attain and hold the standard of excellence necessary to the well being of the patrons.—Ed.

DAYTON, 1128 Wyoming St., OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have often wondered if anyone in Dayton takes COMFORT, for as many years as I have taken it I have never seen a letter from here. It may be they are all too busy to write letters for Dayton is a very busy city.

Of course everyone knows that it is the home of the National Cash Register works which supplies nearly every city in the world with cash registers. It formerly employed between eight and nine thousand people but the European War has interfered somewhat with the output.

Dayton is also the home of the Wright Brothers Aeroplane factory, who are both natives of this city; they have just received a large order from Europe for aeroplanes to be used in the European War, and are working hard to fill the order.

Another large manufacturing plant has just received a big order for Shrapnel shells for the Russian government and allies.

The Recording and Computing Company has a contract to fill a $15,000,000 order for shell timers to regulate the velocity and explosive period of Shrapnels, not a very laudable enterprise, but as the old saying goes, "all is fair in love and war."

Dayton is called the "City of a Thousand Factories."

The National Military Home is also situated here, then last, but not least, we had the biggest flood two years ago that was ever in this section of the United States, lives lost, property destroyed, suffering, privation and general devastation.

There have been hard times this winter but if one could down town to market some morning or go in some of the big stores and see the crowds buying, you would hardly think of hard times.

Concerning the much discussed subjects nowadays, what do the sisters think of sex hygiene being taught in the public schools? I, for one, think it should be taught there and have the proper kind of teachers for it, for there are a lot of parents that hesitate to talk to their children about such things; they just cannot and will not, so it is far better for the young to have it taught to them in a proper and scientific manner than to have a lot of rot instilled into their minds by bad companions of which there will always be plenty—I know whereof I affirm.

I almost forgot to say that I like to read the sisters' letters and enjoy trying the recipes. I cannot send any recipes but will send a little verse which I think is suitable for everyone.

"Don't look for the flaws
As you go through life.
And even if you find them,
Be wise and kind
And somewhat blind.
And look for the virtues behind them."

Ever so much love for all. MRS. E. C. HALL.

LEXINGTON, 1015 Arlington Hts., KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

As my letter which was published in the March edition of COMFORT caused some of the COMFORT readers to request more description of Lexington and Elmendorf Dairy, I will describe one of the skyscrapers, the Fayette National Bank building, and then answer the questions, to the best of my ability, concerning the dairy.

Towering two hundred and twenty-five feet above the sidewalk on the northeast corner of Main and Upper streets, stands one of the tallest buildings in Kentucky, outside the city of Louisville. It is as nearly fireproof as modern architectural engineering can make it, the entire frame work is of the best structural steel used in the construction of such buildings. The exterior on all four sides is of beautiful cream colored pressed brick. Up as far as the third story Bedford stone is used; the Main street entrance is ornamented with four large circular polished stone columns, also extending as far as the third floor, two on each side of the entrance. From the twelfth to the fifteenth floor, the exterior is of glazed terra cotta and copper. The interior of the offices (of which there are two hundred and twenty-five) is of mahoganized brick wood; the corridors are trimmed in marble and tile. Each suite of rooms contains hot, cold and ice water. All drinking water is filtered, sterilized and refrigerated by model ice machines. The main stairway is constructed of fireproof material, with Kalamein doors opening on each floor. All windows next to adjacent buildings have hollow metal frames with wired plate glass. There are three high type electric elevators, running at the rate of four hundred and fifty feet per minute. The entire first floor and basement (which extends under the whole structure) are occupied by the Wayette National Bank. The roof-garden which is on top of the fifteenth floor is surrounded by a high wall, about four feet high. The view from this height is fine. The Cemetery, Race Tracks, Fair Grounds, State University, etc., can be plainly seen. An electric light which projects over each of the four corners of the roof-garden enables the building to be seen at quite a distance at night, the building is cleaned by the vacuum process; all dirt, dust and waste being carried out by the suction system and swept into the city sewer automatically, without being touched by a broom.

To all who asked questions concerning the "Elmendorf" dairy. It is situated six miles from the city on the Paris electric interurban line and is noted for being the finest and most sanitary dairy in the world. The herd contains four hundred cows that have been subjected to the most rigid tuberculin tests by the "Elmendorf" farm veterinary before they were accepted for the dairy. No person is employed as milker without first having undergone a medical examination. A barber and manicurist are also employed at the farm to whom the men are required to report daily. In the dairy barn there is a large bathroom, completely equipped with shower and other paths for the use of the attendants, who are required to don clean white suits and caps each milking time. Bacteriological tests are or, Playing with Hearts—By Harry S. Morris

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

LITTLE JIMMY O'REILLY sat in the warm spring sun at the door of his shop, and whistled like a bird as he worked away. Very much like a bird Jimmy looked, too, with his blue overalls for feathers, and he whistled for the bird's own reason; the knowledge that spring was with him, that the storm clouds of winter had passed, and the grass was pushing its green blades through the damp soil, that, taken altogether, it was good to be living that morning. These things Jimmy thought, as he whistled the gayer for them, grinding away busily meanwhile on the valves of the big cylinder block he held between his legs. Yes, Jimmy was undoubtedly happy, which he had reason to be. For the little shop was all his own, he owed not a penny to any man, there was just enough work coming in to make an occasional hour of leisure agreeable, so he was neither short of money nor over-worked.

Welburger, the owner of the village grocery store, a few doors down the street, came out to take down the shutters from his windows and waved Jimmy a cheery greeting, which was returned in kind.

"There's a good old fellow," mused Jimmy, "and that little daughter of his; well, I think I shall arrange to see even more of her in the future than I have in the past. Ah, there she comes now."

Jimmy brought his musings to an abrupt end and sprang hastily to his feet to greet a dainty, young golden-haired miss as she passed by on the way to her father's store.

"Good morning, Jimmy," she replied in answer to his greeting. "How is business nowadays?"

"Excellent, Ruth, excellent," said Jimmy, holding his wonderfully soiled cap in his hand, and gazing down on her (she was about the only girl in the village he could gaze down upon) with a teasing smile. "Your father told me yesterday that I was getting so prosperous it was high time I took a wife."

Ruth blushed in confusion at the plainly apparent meaning of his speech, then stated precisely and mockingly:

"Father is usually right, well I must be going," and with a bright smile she continued on her way.

Jimmy seated himself once more and attacked the valves vigorously. He must finish them that morning, he figured, so as to have the Big Six ready by tomorrow, at most, and he reckoned the shop could stagger along without him while he took Ruth for a ride.

Down the street a steady chug-chug, caught his ear, and he looked up with a broad grin. It was Bates, his helper, coming along in his one-lunger. The spectacle of the tiny car with the huge man in the driver's seat always seemed amusing to him, yet Bates cared not a whit, rather liked it, in fact.

"The toap av the marnin' to yez, Misther O'Reilly," he called in a highly exaggerated brogue, as he turned his "Betsey" into the broad doorw y.

"The same to ye, Misther Bates," answered Jimmy, gravely, "And many iv thim."

"Hey, Bill," he shouted, after Bates had placed his machine. "Bring out that other block and the valves and we'll finish them up this morning."

"Now doin' it," came Bill's ready response, and soon he appeared at the door, carrying the big trio of cylinders as easily as a bobo can carry a can of beer, almost as easily anyhow. Seating himself beside Jimmy he began his work, first helping himself to a generous chew of tobacco.

They were as opposite as the poles in body, these two, for Jimmy measured five feet four, and weighed one hundred and thirty pounds with all his clothes on, while Bates stood nearly ten inches taller and was almost twice as heavy, yet they were boon companions, and a perfect working pair in spite of it all.

Presently the 'phone bell rang, and Jimmy rose to answer it, for Bates, like an elephant, was slow to get down and very much slower to get up. Bill paused in his work to listen.

"Yes, ma'am," he heard Jimmy say. "This is O'Reilly's—yes ma'am,—on the post road?"

Bill clambered to his feet and picked up a cylinder block. "Six miles?"

Bill picked up the other block and set them both aside. "Yes ma'am, we'll be there right away." He hung up the receiver and turned away, calling, "Hey, Bill, crank up Betsey, there's a lady out in the post road with her car gone dead."

"I get you," said Bill, as he whirled Betsey's crank. "Who is she?"

"Milton Gregory's daughter, she said. You know he came in last night to see about getting a summer home in the colony back on the Flint hill. Get a wiggle on, and we'll see whether she looks as good as she talks," and Jimmy, with his pockets full of tools, trotted up, jumped aboard Betsey as Bill turned toward the street, and away they went, chugging, and roaring, leaving the shop freely open, for a thief was unknown in the village.

When they finally reached the stranded car, Jimmy sprang out and hailed the young lady, who sat in the seat calmly reading a magazine as if it were quite her habit to rest in this fashion, six miles from anywhere.

"Well Miss Gregory, we are here."

The calm young person lowered her magazine, to reveal a small aristocratic face, surmounted by a mass of black curls, and set off by a pair of sparkling brown eyes. "That fact is beyond dispute," she remarked drily. "Well," in a more serious tone, "I can't tell what's wrong, it just stopped, that's all."

"Highly descriptive, but rather indefinite," said Jimmy, falling in with her mood. "Test her for the highly requisite spark, Bill."

"The spark is perfectly satisfactory, Mr. O'Reilly."

Jimmy took hold of the crank and Bill took hold of a plug to remove the wire. The young Cely, his eyes on the girl, not noticing Bill, whirled the crank. The engine fired a few times and quit. Bill rose in the air several inches, made some rapid revolutions, then sat down on the cold, damp unfeeling road with far more emphasis than grace.

"The spark is perfectly satisfactory, Mr. O'Reilly," he announced, judicially, examining his finger. "Huh," he grunted, seeing the others convulsed with merriment, "If you'd got what I did you'd be singing a different tune."

"All right, Bill," said Jimmy, when his laughter had subsided to a broad grin, "see about the gas." Bates rising slowly and painfully, flooded the carburetor. No results. "Gas line's clogged," he said laconically, dropping down as he spoke, and sliding underneath the car, while Jimmy, pulling out his pliers, began to remove the gas line at the carburetor end. He finished his work with a few deft twists, and after which he called to Bates to "Blow 'er out." A clot of dirt and water gushed from the pipe, proving the correctness of Bates' surmise. "All very easy when you know how, isn't it?" said Jimmy with a smile, looking up from the work of connecting.

She smiled in reply, then as Bill slid out from under and moved around in front to crank up, she held out her slim white hand, saying, with a roguish twinkle in her eyes, "Well it seems our parting is at hand, Mr. O'Reilly."

Jimmy, not in the least embarrassed as she had expected, promptly took her hand in his not overly lean fingers, expressing a hope that they might meet again under circumstances happier for her. She released his hand and gazed ruefully at the grime upon it. Jimmy laughed, whereat she blushed, murmured an acknowledgment of his words, let in the clutch, and soon was out of sight up the road. Jimmy stuffed his tools slowly in his pockets, took his seat beside Bates and rode to the shop in deep silence. Only when Bates started to work on the Big Six did he speak, then it was only to tell him to leave it alone. He felt no pressing need for the big striped car now. All the rest of the day he was silent and preoccupied, but Bates noticed that he washed his hands very, very clean that night.

Jimmy saw but little more of Miss Gregory until summer, when she came to her father's summer home in the Hill colony. He met her father that summer, a keen-eyed old eagle of Wall street, and who took a prompt liking to the merry-hearted young son of Erin, and invited him to the luxurious Gregory "cottage" on Flint Hill, which invitation Jimmy was far from slow to accept. He found it pleasant, for his ready wit and even temper made an excellent impression on the bored-to-death society on the Hill. They found out somehow that Jimmy was not dependent on his business, being possessed of a fairly large inherited income, so they considered him a rather entertaining specimen of their own kind. It was all new to Jimmy, though he never showed it, and very agreeable, too, as all new things are apt to be.

So the early summer passed, with Jimmy paying less attention every day to his work, and driving his striped "Six" up to the Hill almost every day. The more he saw of Marie Gregory, the more wonderful she seemed to him, until his ardor bubbled over one June night as he sat alone with her in the soft moonlight on the veranda. He took her hand in his and told her that old, old story which always seems so new to young lovers.

But to his surprise she gently repulsed his advances, murmuring, "No, Jimmy, I can't marry you, I really can't."

"But why?" came Jimmy's puzzled voice. "There's no one else is there?"

"We-ll," very slowly, "It's—it's the life you are living here."

"What's wrong with it?" Jimmy was deeply on the defensive. "I don't make much money, it's true, but then I don't have to, I'm satisfied."

She broke in quickly, "That's just it. You are too well satisfied. You are content to putter away at old automobiles in your shop down there——" she made a gesture of contempt toward the sleeping village far below them. "When you might be out in the world, really accomplishing something—doing something worth while."

Jimmy was stunned. He had never thought about his business and his home in that way. He had liked it. Why shouldn't he? His living was good his friends were many, and his enemies,—he didn't have any. But for Marie——, he took her hand again.

"And if I give it all up Marie, and go to the city, and engage in something really 'worth while'—what will your answer be then?"

"That question must wait, Jimmy, until you have proved yourself," she replied firmly, and with that he had to be content.

Jimmy lost no time. The next morning he packed his trunk, paid Bates for a month in advance, and took the train for New York. On his way to the station he passed Ruth standing in the door of her father's store, but only paused long enough to bid her a civil good by. She stood for a long time watching his trim figure before she turned again into the store. It was many weeks later that Jimmy, having finished putting on his newly acquired dress clothes, seated himself at the window of his hotel room to smoke a cigarette and while away a bit of time before taking Marie to the theater. He gazed out over the brightly lighted city, and mused as he smoked, thinking of the changes that had so recently come to him. On coming to the city his first step had been to put a small interest into a thriving Real Estate firm, where he was now spending his time, grimly sticking to his task of learning the business. But somehow it had failed to hold his interest, despite his close application, or perhaps because of it, the business seemed to grow dryer and duller every day. Moreover, the hotel galled him, for its cold reserve and strict formality contrasted illy with the homelike friendliness of his old boarding house, where he had always been able to find kindred spirits ready to join in a rollicking song, or play a quiet game of set-back, just as the notion struck him. He had had Bates bring up the big six to the city, but driving it had palled as an amusement after paying fines for fracturing half-a-dozen laws which he did not know existed. Then he tried making friends with young Reading, the junior partner of the firm, but had given him up after passing a few evenings out with him, which evenings always consisted of champagne and chorus girls, occasionally varied with chorus girls and champagne. Well, anyhow, there was a better day coming now, for Marie had returned, and all the summer colony folks would soon be back in town, so it would not be long before he would have plenty to do in the evenings. Ah, but Marie was beautiful. He sighed, and across his mind came the vision of a face, a wistful pink-cheeked little face, which he had left behind when he came to the city. Ruth! strange he should be thinking of her. She was probably "keeping company" with some farmer by now. The thought did not seem agreeable, somehow.

Jimmy rose, passed his hand over his eyes, as if to drive away his thoughts, picked up his silk hat, and passed out of the room, down to the street, and thence to the garage where he kept the Big Six. With a wave of greeting to the night man he cranked up the old darling of his heart, and sprang into the seat. She carried no uch effeminacies as steps or fenders.

As soon as he arrived at the Gregory mansion he was greeted by Marie, very cordially, but not with half the warmth he had hoped. She was ready to go, so they proceeded at once to where the Six was standing.

When Marie sighted the big striped car, looking so incongruous in the aristocratic street, she halted and gasped in an amazed tone, "Why Jimmy, we can't go in that machine."

A flush, not altogether embarrassment, mounted Jimmy's forehead. "Why not? She's not very stylish I'll admit, but she's the sweetest running thing on four wheels."

"I know that Jimmy," she admitted, "but as a town car it's just impossible. Wait I'll have them bring my electric coupe, and we can go in it." She tripped up the steps into the house.

Jimmy gazed after her a moment, then scratched his head reflectively, and stepped down beside the Six, to remove his switch plug, a very wry smile on his lips.

The ride to the theater was made in strained silence, for Jimmy detested electrics, and Marie did not seem inclined to conversation. Once he started to tell her how lonely he had been in the city, but just as he started to speak she pressed the gong to warn an unwary pedestrian, and at that hated reminder the impulse died. So altogether the evening passed in a manner far from satisfactory, and they parted sulkily.

A couple of days later Jimmy was sitting at his desk sharpening a pencil, when young Reading came in.

"Hello Jimmy," he hailed. "I saw your friend Miss Gregory last night. She was with Boyd Peyton, the Wall Street Millionaire, in his big limousine."

"Well, what of it?" Jimmy was apparently uninterested.

"Oh, nothing .I heard they were to be married soon, and I thought that you might be sort of concerned about it." Young Reading passed on to his desk.

Jimmy said not a word. His eyes were fixed on the pencil, nevertheless, he whittled off chip after chip until there was nothing but the stub left in his hand.

That night he called on Marie, and found her in quite a gay mood, so they chatted quite amiably for a while, until Jimmy caught sight of a diamond solitaire on her left hand.

"Marie?" accusingly, "whose ring is that?"

"Why, it's Boyd Peyton's of course," she answered, with eyes averted.

"Boyd Peyton's," Jimmy's tone was bitter. "Then why have I never seen it before? You let me think—— Oh, what's the use!" He dropped his head wearily in his hands.

Marie laid her hand on his arm, and her tone was tender, for she really liked, though she had never held a deeper feeling for him.

"I'm sorry Jimmy, truly I am," she whispered. "It was only a summer romance, and I didn't think you would take it so seriously. Boyd wanted to keep our engagement secret until I came back to town. You're not angry with me are you?"

Jimmy rose slowly to his feet, and took her hand in his. "No Marie, I'm not angry, just—a—little—hurt, that's all," and he was gone before she could speak again.

* * * * * * * * * *

Where did he go? Well, that all happened quite a while ago, so you see, you never can tell. He might have jumped in the river, or he might have driven the Big Six into a telegraph pole, or he might have stayed in New York and become a real estate multi-millionaire. Anyhow I passed his old shop the other day, and there was a very big and a very little man standing out in front, taking turns playing with an outrageously fat baby, while Mrs. Ruth O'Reilly, now a plump little golden-haired matron, looked on with a smile.

This Monkey a Waiter and Loves His Tips

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

IF only Darwin could have lived to know it a brilliant chapter might have been added to his "Descent of Man."

Another and important link has been added to the chain of confirmation of his theory which binds man and ape in a bond of relationship forged eons upon eons ago.

Apes like tips.

An ape trained to wait on table shows intuitive appreciation of the fact that tips should follow a meal and accepts such with every show of satisfaction and appreciation.

To a traveler sojourning in Batavia, a city of 120,000 inhabitants on the island of Java, we are indebted for the evidence.

Augustus W. Dougherty, England, is the man.

Mr. Dougherty sat at his table in the dining-room the first day of his arrival in Batavia in an equible frame of mind and strictly sober.

Of a sudden he saw a big, manlike ape shuffling across the dining-room floor headed in his direction.

"With my heart in my throat and fairly trembling with fear," runs the traveler's tale, "I cast a side glance at my shaggy attendant. From his upright attitude and the calm eyes displayed by other guests it appeared there was no real cause for alarm. Then it dawned upon me that the hairy creature had merely been sent to take my order.

Instantly I grasped a pencil and hurriedly marked several articles on the menu card and handed it to the tarrying ape. He clutched the printed slip tight in his fingers, turned and ambled across the spacious apartment and disappeared through a rear door.

After a short interval I saw the hairy monster making his second approach, this time bearing in his brawny hands a wide tray filled with smoking dishes. Placing the burden on a nearby stool, he proceeded to set before me dish after dish of food; then with a napkin he scrubbed the plate and placed it on the table.

"Later on he brought the dessert and then the coffee, and I offered him a tip. The ape grabbed the money with every sign of pleasure and understanding. I learned afterwards that the money went to buy him nuts."

Mr. Dougherty was told that these trained apes not only waited on the table, but did chamber work and even went marketing.

Written instructions were given them describing purchases to be made, and they came back without ever making a mistake. They gathered fruit and picked vegetables in the garden.

LARGEST LOAF OF BREAD.—The largest loaf of bread in the world was baked in Austin, Texas, by Andrew Newberg. This gigantic mass of the staff of life weighed 140 pounds and was two feet high, three feet wide and twelve feet long. After the ingredients were mixed the baking process consumed over an hour, a special oven being used for the purpose. The loaf was sent to the barbecue at Moulton, where it was cut and distributed for a large crowd. Mr. Newberg accompanied the bread to its destination to see that it was safely carried. By making the bread, Mr. Newberg broke his former record of 100 pounds.

HOP up into my lap and snuggle down close. There are six millions of you in my family and I can accommodate you all. I wish I could get the whole bunch of you in a great big room and lock the door, and after I had locked the door, you bet I would not let any of you out until I had got you to endorse certain fundamental truths, certain noble and exalted principles which you've got to understand, got to absorb, got to believe in, got to live up to, and got, if necessary, to fight and die for, unless you want this old world to slip back into chaos and barbarism. It's a mighty mistake to believe that no matter what men do to push the world back it will go forward anyway. I've often told you that God Almighty keeps His hand on the throttle of the steam roller of progress, and that is true, but when humanity openly flouts God and starts to act the beast, God Almighty doesn't desert the steam roller, but He does shut off the steam! Look at the wonderful heights of learning and culture attained by the Romans and Greeks. In many respects their civilization was superior to ours, but it died dead and was succeeded by centuries of dreadful savagery, and there are enough benighted, king worshipping, ignorant fanatics in existence today to overturn whatever of civilization we possess and force us back a century or two into the black hideous night of barbarism—if we'd let them. Now if I were the father of a large family and came home from business and found a room full of kids, snapping, snarling, biting and fighting in spite of all I had done for them, in spite of everything I had given them to make them happy and contented, I could of course wade in and knock the stuffing out of the whole bunch and restore order. I could do that, but the odds are I wouldn't. What would I do? I would give the children a little talk like this: "I am utterly disgusted with you kids, not angry mind, but just disgusted. If I were really angry, I would throw you all out of the house and have nothing more to do with you. I'd disown you utterly. But as I am merely disgusted, I'm going to close the door on you until you come to your senses, and bear this in mind, you are the children of a humane and loving father, instead of wild beasts. Now remember when you are tired of fighting and see the folly of acting as you are doing, when you come out of this orgy of blood and beastliness, contrite and penitent, I will take you to my heart once more. I have warned you time and again to respect one another's rights, but you have disregarded my warning, and you see what the result is, hate and madness. Now when you come to your senses call me and you will not call in vain."

Now honestly I believe this is just about the way God must feel right now toward his warring children here on earth. Progress is halted, but not permanently. The further we swing back into darkness, the mightier will be the rebound when the rebound comes. But remember the pendulum may not swing back again for many years, and it may take years of horror and bloodshed to force it back. It was a long time swinging back during the Dark Ages, many centuries in fact—and just how far into the darkness that pendulum is going to swing, just how many years we are going to stay in the dark and be made to suffer in blood and tears, depends largely on the attitude of the United States in this world crisis. If I had locked you in that great big room that I mentioned, I should talk to you freely and though some of you would want to rend and tear me because I trod on the corns of your prejudice and racial stupidity, all the samee before I got through with you, I would have you at the mourner's bench, confessing you were wrong and I was right. I am not infallible, I would not want to be. To err is human, but to continue to err isn't, and it is those who insist on treading the pathway of error, that make progress for the rest of us so cruelly hard. There are some fundamental truths and principles and certain lines of national policy that this country must follow, both in regard to home and foreign issues if we are to lead the world out of the pit of horror into which it has fallen, and we are the ones that should and the only ones that can properly undertake the task.

Now there is one principle that all irrespective of creed should stand for and that is the democratic American ideal of liberty, freedom and justice. Now don't tell me that if there is such an ideal you haven't seen much of it, and we don't live up to it. I know that just as well as you do. There are a good many reasons why that ideal is so often obscured. We have such a big country and we have been so busy developing it, so busy trying to wrest a living from nature and often so busy in our new-found opportunities for creating wealth (piling up dollars without giving a thought as to whether they were honest dollars or not) that we have smothered the pure gold of character, fair play, honor and honesty that lie concealed even in the poorest of us, under a mountain of selfishness, avarice and greed, and it is these qualities that have made our industrialism ruthless and crude and our politics venal and corrupt. But it is we who have defiled our own hearth, it is we who have put the national conscience in mothballs, while we ruthlessly exploited one another for profit. We have been foolish because we lacked experience. Ours have been the faults of headstrong youth rather than the studied wickedness of old age. That we are not wholly corrupt, wholly material, was proved in the bloody days of the 60's. We are just as ready now as then to cast profit-mongering aside and stand shoulder to shoulder, ready to give our last drop of blood in order that government for, of, and by the people shall not perish from the earth. I am writing at a time of great national stress, when it looks as if nothing could stop us from sliding into the hell pit of war in which more than half the human race is already engaged. In a crisis of this kind people should forget racial animosities and think only of what concerns humanity as a whole. "Why should I fight for America," said a man to me, "the land of Rockefeller. I've had no work for months. Why should I fight for a land that will not give me a chance to earn my bread? Why should I fight for a land that is rotten with graft? I prefer an honest monarchy to a dishonest republic. This is a country of fraud and shame. It is not a democracy, it is a plutocracy. I'm tired of the humbug of it all."

"All you have said is true my friend," said I, "but you forget one thing. You can stay here and with millions more who are as discontented as you are, mould this country into anything you want it to be. It is your country, absolutely yours. You can vote the rascals out and put the honest men in. But you won't do it. You won't think right or vote right. You could fill Congress with the representatives of the toiling masses, with men from mine, mill and factory. Other nations do it, but you won't and don't. You fill Congress with Trust lawyers and self-seeking, axe-grinding politicians. You sow stones and expect to reap bread. You left Europe to escape militarism and monarchies and to have a chance to rule yourself and do your own law making, and because you make a miserable failure of the job, you want to break up the whole works and send for a parasite king to boss you and put a uniform on you and make you into cannon fodder. You poor peanut-headed, dull-witted, henbrained, low-browed, human grasshopper, you want to punish me and mine and all the others who are awake to the golden opportunities this country presents, because you won't use the brains God Almighty gave you, except for the criminal purpose of forging more chains for your weary limbs to carry."

"If this country presents such golden opportunities, why, Uncle Charlie, are you always knocking it?" said my friend.

"Pardon me," I replied, "I don't knock the country, I knock conditions. I knock conditions that peanut brains like yours have brought about, and if I want to knock the way the country is run, I can do it, because it's my country, our country, but if you returned to your native land and started knocking your king and government and conditions generally, you'd be put in jail for two thousand years and then sent to the trenches to be shot. Here you have an opportunity that you could never have in the old country, the opportunity to absolutely change all conditions unfavorable to human development, and to remove all obstacles that stand between you and the highest ideals of human freedom and happiness, and you've cast the opportunity aside and are now crying for a king and conditions our Pilgrim Fathers left the old world to escape. Shame on you. Say, my hyphenated "American" friend you have a son. Do you realize that your son can be President of the United States? Of course he won't be if you dope him up with old country ideas, and fill your home with nothing but papers printed in a foreign tongue. But in spite of all the drawbacks you've imposed on him, he can be the head of one hundred million people. Doesn't that enthuse you? Why actually those vacant, sleepy eyes of yours are beginning to sparkle. You're actually waking up, actually absorbing a great democratic idea for which humanity has fought and bled for millions of years, the right to elect one of their own as a head, instead of having a privileged class push a Divine Right parasitical hereditary monarch on them. Now in the country you come from, if you do vote, your vote amounts to little. If every man for instance in your country were to vote for the abolition of monarchy and the installation of a democracy, as millions of them already have, the ruling, aristocratic, military class, led by your King could crush every one of you as a steam roller crushes a hickory nut and not only could they do it, but they would do it. A paternal government such as you have been used to, only looks after its people with a view to keeping them in good, healthy condition, so as to make the best possible material for the fighting machine. You are looked after much as a fighting game cock is looked after, just with a view to winning battles; industrial battles in time of peace, battles of blood and conquest in time of war. In your own country you are a mere pawn on a checker-board, to be moved around at the will and convenience of those mighty powers which rule your destiny absolutely. Over there you are just the plaything of a king, here you can be a king yourself, and have your son a king of kings if you want to. Directly you vote your new party into Congress here, your rule is absolute, and whatever army and navy this country possesses is yours to use and command. It isn't the lack of liberty that has ruined the United States, but a false conception of liberty that degenerates into license, the idea that laws were made for the other fellow and not for ourselves. But you and millions more with your grouch, and with plenty of reason to grouch, can alter and have things here to your liking whenever you want to, and that's something you can't do in that old king cursed land across the sea."

Now what I said to that man I say to you all. The fundamental ideals on which this nation is reared are all right. Clouds of greed have obscured us from the life-giving rays of the sun of liberty and justice. That is why so many millions of immigrants who have come to this land are still aliens, still foreigners even unto the second and third generation. Not to have absorbed these elements is a sign of national weakness. If our Americanism had been of the genuine kind, most of these racial groups, most of these hard, indigestible racial lumps that we find in the national melting pot, would have been absorbed long ago. There are however, I regret to say, some people in this country who refuse to be absorbed and who glory in the fact that they are non-absorbents, and rejoice that they are more racially loyal today to certain foreign countries, than were their parents or grandparents who brought them here or bred them here. This element is about as welcome as a cannon ball would be in a plum pudding and about as useful and digestible. These elements are a menace to this country and its institutions. They are a menace to humanity for the only hope of the world, the only hope for human happiness is the gradual elimination of racial prejudice and the development of those assimilative qualities necessary to complete absorption into God's great human family, in whch love and brotherhood shall yet reign.

"It is an ill wind which blows no man good," and this war in Europe has done one very valuable thing. It has brought us face to face with the great danger of hyphenated citizenship, unrestricted immigration and indigestible immigrants. This land must write another declaration of independence, revivify its democracy, and purge its citizenship of king-worshipping fanatics. We must blaze the trail of a new freedom and drive it clean through the miasmatic swamps of industrial despotism, and we must allow no man to take up his residence here who will not hit the trail with us, and be one of us, and furthermore let it be understood that those who are not with us are against us. Those who put the land of their birth before the land of their adoption should be given forty-eight hours to hit the trail for home, and if the walking isn't good, they should be invited to swim. No military reservist of any foreign power should be allowed to land on these shores unless he intends to stay here permanently. This running home to fight for crazy kings should be stopped forever, and the activities of an alien press, spreading the propaganda of foreign powers and stirring up race hatred on these shores, is a menace that should be stopped once for all. Right now and here the door should be shut tight that leads to the old world, and kept tight until every man has a job and every man swears solemnly to give the best that is in him to the upbuilding of this nation along lines of the purest democracy. We do not want the clamor, strife and contentions of the old world transplanted to and reacted on this soil. We are all immigrants more or less, and the man who lands today may be a better American than he who has been here a hundred years. It all depends on his ideas, on his point of view. If he is an earnest seeker after liberty, truth, righteousness and brotherhood, if he is a hater of kings and monarchies, caste and oppression, drum beating and sword rattling, he is a genuine American in heart and instinct, and these are the kind of men we want on these shores, and the only kind that should be allowed to get here, or remain here, and if we had a hundred millions of them today, real thinking, progressive, humanity loving souls, we could see this war in Europe settled and settled right, and by settling right I mean that our influence would be great enough to banish monarchies in Europe from the face of the earth forever, and to give freedom and democracy to all peoples, little or big, with the view that everybody's racial rights may be respected, and that every man may feel free to take up the duties of world citizenship so we can have a nation of nations, a federation of the world, with peace and love alone reigning in the hearts of men.

Let me beg and beseech you not to let any of your children sing that piffling, idiotic, drivling, nauseating ballad "I Didn't Raise My Boy to Be a Soldier." I blush to think that a dear old friend of mine by the way is the publisher of that song. Anybody who sings or circulates sickly slush of that kind is an enemy of civilization. What the world needs above all things just now is soldiers. Do you get that? Soldiers! I don't mean pirates, fiends, butchers, beasts or murderers, but Christian soldiers, not men who go into battle singing "Tipperary" or "Uber Alles," but men of the caliber of Cromwell's embattled hosts, crusaders in a righteous cause, moving to victory with a psalm to the Most High upon their resolute lips. Whatever mankind possesses that is worth while he has had to struggle for, fight and die for. That has been due to the fact that the forces of might have always been stronger than the forces of right, and what is true of the days of old is equally true of today. If you don't want to fight for your own country, your own hearths and homes, your own ideals, don't think for one moment that your fool doctrine of passive non-resistance will save you from slaughter, for it won't. Directly you are conquered, your conquerors will turn you into miserable conscripts. You will be uniformed, drilled, armed and made to fight your own kin, just as the poor wretches in Poland are doing today. If you don't fight for your own country, you'll be made to fight for another country, but fight you will and fight you must. Just watch what Japan will do to China. The Chinamen are peaceful people and care nothing about fighting, but when the time comes and Japan feels it necessary she will arm the Chinamen and make them fight her battles, and make them fight one another. Do you want to turn this country into another China? Do you want your enemies to make you wear queues, long hairy pigtails, as the Manchu conquerors made the Chinese wear so they can the more easily jerk you around and cut off your heads when they feel disposed? Don't fool yourself with any idea that you are living in a civilized era, for you are not. The cancer of greed and militarism are abroad in the world. You cannot stay bullets with puff balls, platitudes, prayers or driveling doggerel about "I Didn't Raise My Boy to Be a Soldier." Napoleon cynically said (and if anyone knew what he was talking about Nap did) that Providence was on the side of the big battallions. We don't want mothers to raise their boys to be soldiers, neither do we want them to raise them to be cowards, curs and slaves. We want mothers to raise their sons to be strong men who will do their duty to their country, their God and civilization whenever called upon. It is madness to talk of peace when there is no peace. This is not a world in which we can have just what we want whenever we want it, though we could have such a world if all the mothers in the world had a vote and could vote the devil and his works entirely out of existence. But, alas! the spiritual side of humanity—which is the woman side—has never yet been allowed to assert itself, except in a few progressive spots on the globe, and so we must face conditions as they are and we must either be trampled into the dust, and our poor, pusillanimous, shrunken, cowardly, mean little carcases thrown to the war dogs or be strong and make the war hogs of the world respect and fear us. The time is not yet here when we can pray or wish wrong out of existence. The only way we can do at present is to chase it out with shell and sword, and if we stand ready with shell and sword to do the job in the approved twentieth century manner the job won't have to be done. The powers of greed and might will come to the conclusion that the jig is up and will return to the paths of peace for good and all time. We have a big part to play, we should be the world policeman throwing all our weight and might on the side of the oppressed. We can do that job only in one way and that is by being strong and giving all our moral support to right and righteousness as God gives us the light to see the right. Providence looks to us to restore peace and sanity on this earth. If we cannot restore peace and sanity by an appeal to reason, decency and common sense we must stand ready to use stronger methods and if we are ready, good and ready, sanity will return and force will not have to be used. I have been asked what I would do if I were President of this republic. This is what I would do and I would lose no time in doing it: I would make this country safe from enemies without and then bet your sweet life, I would make it safe from enemies within. Then in the history of this country I could stand with Washington and Lincoln, and both our national heroes would say: "Uncle Charlie you have seen your duty and you did it, and we're mighty glad to have your company."

Remember having an army and navy is not militarism but just plain common sense. Militarism is an entirely different thing, a hideous and evil thing. Militarism is not the possession of force but the worship of force as the only worthy, manly means of obtaining one's ends. This is the doctrine of the devil, a doctrine which can never find endorsement in the land of Lincoln. Militarism too means the dominance of the civil power by the military. We will have none of that and for that reason we have plain citizens at the head of our army and navy. Now wise up and don't let anyone fool you on this all important point.

That is my fifty-second birthday message to you. Read and ponder it. Whether we are at peace or at war it is just as timely and fits the occasion, and should go right to the hearts of all who want to see this country lead the world, not in its ability to heap up profits and to build up wealth but in the enormous possibilities it affords for producing high-minded, Christlike, God-loving, happy men and women.

I shall be very glad to hear from those who feel like writing me a birthday letter—there is plenty of time as that event doesn't materialize until the 25th of September. Those Golden Keys I told you about last year and which have been the source of my knowledge and the inspiration of my life, can still be had by all who send me a stamped, addressed envelope. Always sign your name when writing. I take no notice of unsigned letters. If you feel like giving me a roast do it by all means, and don't be so cowardly as to fear to sign your name to what you write. You needn't be afraid of me I'm quite harmless. Don't be like the sneaky street urchin who rings a doorbell and runs away. The more I am reviled by some people the more I feel complimented, for

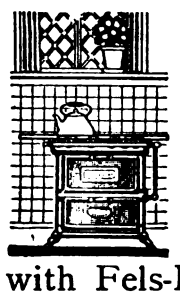
Where Do You Spend Washday?



At the tubs all day? No matter how big your wash is, you can do it in half the time, with less than half the trouble, if you use Fels-Naptha Soap.

For instance—this isn't just a tubful of dirty clothes, soaking. It's a tubful of clothes soaped with Fels-Naptha, and put to soak for 30 minutes.

That's the reason why this woman isn't hard-rubbing the life out of them on a washboard. It's the reason why her work is easily done in half the time it used to take. Not yet noon and most of the washing done.

Because she used Fels-Naptha Soap is the reason there's no steaming washboiler on a red-hot stove. Clothes washed with Fels-Naptha don't need boiling or scalding.

She uses Fels-Naptha for all kinds of soap-and-water work. It takes out stains, and is as good for dainty laces as for heavy blankets.

It makes dish-washing a pleasure—china and glassware glisten. It does all your housework easier, better and quicker.

Fels-Naptha Soap keeps you rested and well; keeps your house bright and shining and your clothes sweet, clean and white.

Orpingtons: Black, White and Blue

IN 1911, only one person in this country owned Blue Orpingtons, and I remember telling you last December about the interest and admiration they excited at the New York Poultry Show. Now, after four years, they are thoroughly established, and have taken their place among the other varieties of Orpingtons in the Stardard of Perfection for 1915, which is just out.

Like all the other varieties of Orpingtons, they originated in England. It was a Mr. A. C. Gilbert who created the Blue Orpington. He crossed and recrossed Black, White and Spangled Orpingtons with diligent care for several years before he succeeded in getting this new variety, which is gaining so much favor in this country. Perhaps one reason for its rapid advance in general favor is the fact of its being a blue fowl, for Blue Andalusian is about the only blue fowl of that color generally known.

It is not much over eighteen years ago that Mr. Cook, one of the best experienced breeders in England, started experiments that resulted in the creation of the Orpington breed. At that time Plymouth Rock did not breed as true to type as they do now, and there were often one or more black chicks in a brood. Such birds were watched, and it was found that they matured about a month earlier, and laid from thirty to forty eggs more in a year than their barred sisters of the same brood.

Mr. Cook, being a very shrewd and experienced breeder, took note of these facts, and decided to collect the Black Plymouth Rocks and breed them to Black Minorca roosters. Minorcas were chosen because they are very good layers of larger sized eggs. That is, in a mild climate, and during warm weather in any part of the world, but they are not rugged enough to withstand cold winters and still maintain their egg-laying qualities. By crossing the two breeds he hoped to get an improved egg strain with the strength of the Rocks. Then, to get a better table bird, the pullets of that cross were mated to Black Langshans, which have been for years England's best winter layers and roosters.

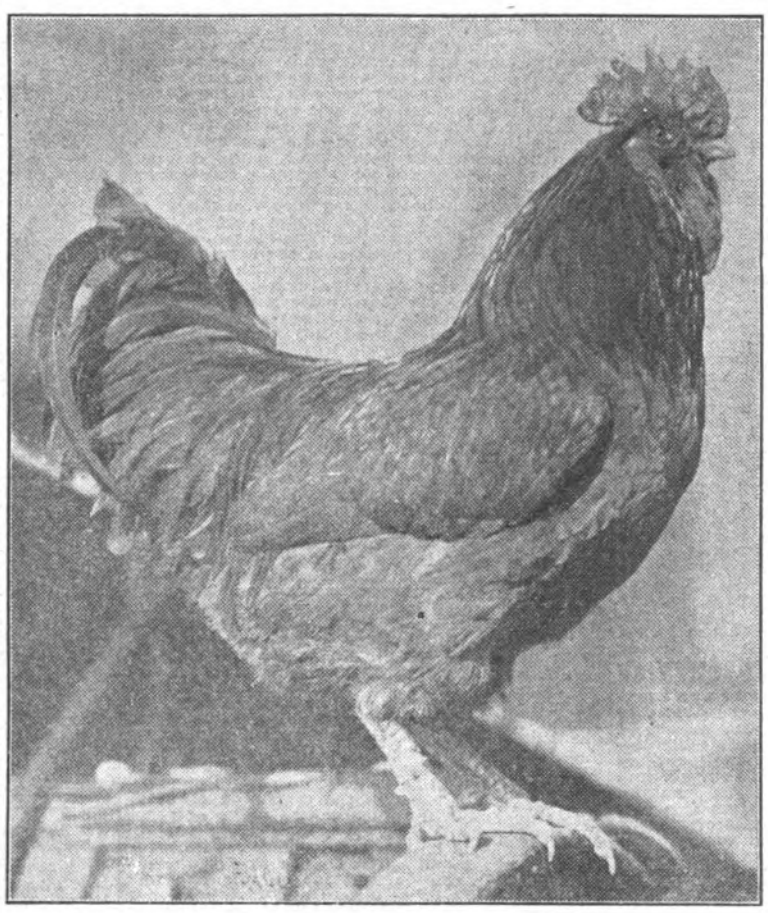
When these three birds were blended, the new fowl was ready for the table from one month to six weeks earlier than either of the separate breeds, and pullets laid from a month to six weeks earlier than any of the ancestral breeds. It was the above mingling and perpetual selecting and breeding which produced the Black Orpington. It has taken years of careful selection to do away entirely with the feathered legs of the Langshan, besides the special peculiarities of the other breeds not wanted in the Orpingtons. After seventeen years it can be truly said that they breed perfectly true to type and color.

The White Orpington was the second variety produced, and came out two and one half years after the Blacks. Many experiments were made to find out the best methods of producing white fowls that were up to date. White Leghorn cocks were crossed with Black Hamburg hens, and the pullets from this cross came very white and with four toes on each foot. Next was used a single comb White Dorking cock, mated with the offspring; some of the birds were blue, some barred like Cuckoo Dorkings. It was several years before white birds could be produced. Even now occasionally some will come with color on them. The White Dorking blood is seen sometimes when a five-toed bird is produced. By careful breeding the white Orpingtons were developed into a breed which produce quick-growing, vigorous birds, with good laying and table qualities.

The Rose Comb White Orpingtons were made by using a Rose Comb White Dorking cock instead of a Single Comb. The blood in the Rose Comb and Single Comb White Orpingtons is exactly the same, and there is no difference in size and qualities. The White Orpingtons have neat combs, either single or rose, white beak, red face and earlobes, white plumage throughout, white legs, and four toes on each foot. The cocks should carry their tails fairly well back, much as a Dorking, only the tails are a trifle smaller and are carried higher. In the hens the points are the same, only the comb and tail are smaller. They lay a nice brown egg of good size.

Mr. Cook remembered that many people like buff colors. The Buff Cochins were held in favor a long time, even though they were fond of sitting, inactive, had feathers on their legs, and as a rule did not lay well between their broody periods, which, fortunately, lasted only a short time. To improve their egg production, Mr. Cook made a careful selection of their best layers. He found that some would lay twenty-two eggs in twenty-two days—even forty-three eggs without missing a day. This was the class of Cochins selected. Mr. Cook made many experiments for years before he found the best blood to blend with the Cochin. He crossed Cochins with every variety of bird, and after five years of such experiments his ideal was fully formed. He began by taking a Golden Spangled Hamburg cock and dark Dorking pullets. The product of the pullets was mated with a Buff Cochin cock of the highest laying strains. This makes the Buff Orpington.

He selected Hamburgs because they laid more eggs than any other variety in England, were non-sitters, but too delicate for winter layers in their pure state. They were the best shaped birds of any living variety. He took the Dorking to get length of breast-bone, and quality of table meat. The English Dorking has always been considered one of the best table fowls. From the first cross he selected the pullets that came of a dark brown color with white legs and the very best layers of these. Buff Cochin cocks bred from the very best layers were selected for making the last cross. Note that the Hamburg has blue legs, large black tail and white earlobes; the Dorking, white legs, large black tail, and five toes on each foot; the Cochin yellow legs, with an immense amount of feathers to the toe ends. Mr. Cook had ten years' breeding before he showed the public a single bird. From the beginning to the finish required fifteen years—five years in experimenting and ten years in perfecting the variety. The perfected Buff Orpington has pinkish-white or flesh-colored legs; no black or white showing in wing or tail when the bird is at rest, bay eyes, bright red face, comb, earlobes and wattles; clear legs; light flesh, and lays a brown-shelled egg of good size and shape.



The next in order of production by Mr. Cook was the Diamond Jubilee Orpington. As far as color is concerned, it is a revival of the old Speckled Dorking, one of the prettiest birds known. They were produced much in the same way as the Buff Orpingtons, only that a Speckled Dorking was used instead of a Colored Dorking. The cocks have white legs, four toes on each foot, long breast, with a single comb; well-serrated, standing erect; red face; a white beak, occasionally showing a brown shade. The neck hackles are reddish-brown, rich in color; the center of the feathers should be black, edged with brown, and just the fine tips at the ends are white. This is the coloring of a dark bird.

Many of the cocks have what is termed a light-colored breast, the body color being brown, and then a black mark across the center of the feathers down near the end, while the extremity of the feather is tipped with white facing; the color has a brown black-and-white-speckled appearance all over the bird, the black showing a little less on the buff over the thighs. Old hens get whiter as they advance in age. The tail and the wings are of the mixed brown broken color like that of the cock, the wing flights showing a good deal of the white. The rose comb should be full of work, but the colors are just the same. The Diamond Jubilees were brought out in 1897, and the colors are not yet fully fixed. They lay tinted eggs of good size.

The Spangled Orpington was brought out in the autumn of 1899. The plumage is different from any of the other Orpingtons. They are considered the most remarkable layers of all the English breeds. They lay large numbers of tinted eggs of good size. They breed very true, and present a fine, handsome appearance. In some instances they weigh nine pounds at eight and one half months old. In order to produce this fowl, Mr. Cook had in his mind a still better layer, if possible, than any of the other varieties. He completed his task within eight years. To make the Spangled, a Dark Dorking cock was mated with a Barred Plymouth Rock hen. This first cross gave pullets of great size, but almost black, with very little white in them, and a trifle brown on the breast. These pullets were mated with a Silver Spangled Hamburg cock for shape and laying quality. The Dorking gave size; the Hamburg, eggs; and the Barred Plymouth Rock, hardiness.

The second cross produced pullets of black and white, and cockerels of drab or straw color, with scarcely any white in them. It took several years of close selection before the black and white required in the cockerels was produced. In some cases the pullet has dark legs, which grow lighter as the bird grows older, dark-plumaged birds being darkest in the legs. They are quite clear in the head, with no muffle. The single combs should be evenly serrated and stand erect. The cocks and cockerels should be white on the wing, and have much more white on the tail, but the principal tail-feathers should be white, edged with black, the breast being the same color as in the hen. The neck-hackles and saddle-feathers should correspond black and white. The eggs are tinted or brown, not so deep as the other Orpingtons. The pullets begin to lay at five and six months old. They are capital table birds, plump, very hardy, stand confinement well, and are good foragers when at liberty. The plumage is black and white—that is to say, the ground color is white with black spots upon it, so that it is really black and white. The pullets and hens should have an even marking all over.

Now comes this beautiful new variety, which bids fair to become the most popular of the whole Orpington family.

FIRST PRIZE BUFF ORPINGTON COCK, CHICAGO POULTRY SHOW.

Correspondence

J. A. S.—I had two Rhode Island red pullets not a year old that would jerk their necks after eating. Their crops were very much enlarged and soft and if carried by the feet water would run out of their mouths. It had a very bad odor. I finally killed them. This was during the winter and last spring. During the winter my chickens were fed whole corn, some wheat, potatoes and other table scraps cooked and thickened with ground barley (uncooked). They were free to run about and had oyster-shells. Hens were all heavy and layed quite well. Please tell me what was wrong with the ration. Am now feeding wheat, dry bran, green Alfalfa and a little table scraps. Chickens have had some sour milk at all times. Am keeping them penned. I killed the rooster and he was very fat. Would his being so keep the eggs from being fertile?

A.—The birds had indigestion and sour crop, caused by too much rich food and not sufficient green vegetables, corn, potatoes, table scraps and barley, which are all very fattening. Birds given such rations will lay well for a time, but sooner or later the digestive organs will be affected, and they are almost sure to develop some form of crop or liver trouble. Oyster-shells provide lime for the shells of the eggs, but it does not take the place of grit in helping them to digest their food. The rooster being fat may have made him lazy but the hens' condition is far more likely to affect the hatching of the eggs, and what is almost worse, the constitutional vigor of the chicks. Don't feed any corn, potatoes or barley during the summer or early fall. Give the birds free range, and just a little oats or wheat night and morning, and all the sour milk they can drink, then they will have a chance to exercise and be in a condition for next winter's laying. Read the notes for feeding pullets at the beginning of last month's article.

T. O.—I have just started in the poultry line and have bought thirty little chicks hatched from an incubator. They are White and Barred Rocks with one Brown Leghorn, and are taken care of by one hen. They seem all right when they go to bed but in the morning they cannot get their eyes open. Their droppings cling to the down or feathers, sometimes preventing a movement. The pen is large and the ground upon which they run has never had chickens on it before. The rooming box is cleaned and sunned every day and clean, fresh water before them constantly. I feed ground chick-feed, table scraps and green stuff, such as onion and radish tops, grass and clover all of which I chop fine. I give them wood ashes and sulphur in which to dust.

A.—Never use wood ashes for chickens. They contain caustic properties which would be very liable to cause bowel trouble, and the dust getting into their eyes would burn and make them water. Fine coal ashes or dry earth are the best materials for dust baths. It is not safe to give young chicks table scraps. They are like babies and young children—unable to digest rich food. Chickens from an incubator must be kept very warm. One hen could not brood thirty well. Some of them would be beyond the warmth of her body, and would surely get chilled. Refer to your back numbers of COMFORT, and in some of the spring numbers you will find full instructions for feeding baby chicks. In all cases of ordinary bowel trouble give them rice water to drink and boiled rice to eat, or soak bread in milk which has been scalded, and after it is cool, squeeze very dry, and feed. If they paste up behind, bathe until the droppings can be removed, and keep the chicks in a dry, warm place.

L. M. S.—I never fail to read the poultry page first and receive much benefit from it. What is the matter with my chickens? A few days ago about a dozen hens grew sick, their combs turned black and they had a high fever. Their craws were filled with gas and their droppings were a dark green streaked with white. They lived two days. We cut two of them open; they looked healthy so far as we could see. Their livers were a dark red.

A.—The hens must have eaten some irritating substance which caused gastritis. In such cases, hold the bird by the feet, letting the head hang down, and work the crop gently from the breastbone downward, to force out any sour water or gas that may have accumulated in the crop. Let the bird have a few minutes' rest, and then administer a tablespoonful of Castor or sweet oil, to work off any poisonous matter in the intestines. Give them rice water to drink, and feed very sparingly on bread and milk.

M. A. B.—My hens seem to be sick and when they drink they throw it up. When I pick them up the water has a bad odor. They have a diarrhea of a greenish cast and as they get worse they just drag around. Those that have died were swollen. I could not hold their feet together, they were so swollen. Their mouths become ulcerated like roup. My little chickens also have a diarrhea. (2) Can you tell me how to use waterglass for putting down eggs or where I can get directions?

A.—For reply to your question about hens and little chickens please read answer to T. O. and L. M. S. in this number. (2) To preserve eggs in waterglass they must be strictly fresh and quite clean by which I mean, not more than twenty-four hours old, and laid in clean nests, for washing eggs removes the natural coating which helps to preserve eggs, and you must remember that the shells of eggs are quite porous and likely to absorb germs, if they come in contact with dirt of any description. The liquid form of waterglass should be quite thick, like syrup, and should be used in the proportion of one part waterglass and ten parts water. It is best to boil the water, and let it become cold before mixing with the waterglass. Pack your eggs carefully in a crock or keg, and pour the solution over them. Or, if you have only a few hens, and must collect your eggs from day to day, they can be added as gathered for a week or ten days, if they are carefully deposited on the lower ones. The last layer should be at last an inch below the top of the solution. Keep them in a cool, well-ventilated place. The hens have a very severe case of inflammation of the egg passage, a condition which may arise from excessive use of stimulating powders or concentrated food sold to promote egg production, or some accident causing the egg to be broken before it is laid. In the case of old hens, excessive intestinal fat may bring about the trouble. As your birds are only a year old, and you feed sparingly, it may not be either of the first causes, so you must investigate along the line of the broken egg, which may happen if the birds fly from a high roost, or are frightened from the nest when about to lay. Watch your hen closely, and if any come off the nest, or show signs of uneasiness it would be advisable to use a small syringe and inject a little sweet oil into the vent, and give them a tablespoonful of sweet oil. Repeat the treatment two or three times, if necessary. When the trouble has advanced as far as you describe, doctoring is useless.

M. E. O.—From the time my chickens were hatched this last spring they have held their heads back against their back and kick and turn round and lie on their backs with their feet up. The male bird is some cross and we had to cuff him. Would that have anything to do with the chicks?

A.—There is no cure for the chickens. It is an affection of the nervous system. The parent stock being inbred, old and fat, or otherwise out of condition, may cause it. Or if they are incubator chicks, uneven temperature during the hatch may be answerable. I don't think anything you did to the roosters would cause it.

D. E.—I have ninety Rhode Island Reds. They are healthy and lay well and are on free range. I don't know how to feed so they will moult early. COMFORT has helped me.

A.—As the hens are on free range, don't feed them at all for two weeks, then commence gradually to give them a little grain night and morning for two weeks, after which start the regular rations given to laying hens.

J. K. K.—What shall I give my little chicks? When they are about one week old they get some stomach trouble. Their bowels run constantly.

A.—Read answer to T. O. in this number.

J. F. D.—I have seventeen hens and a rooster which were hatched in May, 1913. I have a nice, roomy henhouse and feed oats in the morning and evening and a mixed feed at noon, also plenty of clover and grit. I got eggs during the winter,—an average of five per day and about nine a day since Feb. About two weeks ago I got only three or four a day and felt there was something wrong as the droppings looked green. They were the color and thickness of cream-colored paint for a day or so, then the next day were a bright green and thicker with a strong odor. I got up at daylight to examine the pen and found something resembling clay or chalk, and something else which seemd to be plaster strewed around. One hen has a roll about an inch thick and three inches long, extending down from the vent. There is a putty-colored discharge. She sits around and sleeps nearly all the time and eats but little.

A.—As you have found foul material in the henhouse, there is little doubt that that has caused the illness. You should have taken some of it to a drug-store, and found out what it was. In any such cases of suspected poison, it is a good plan to administer a tablespoonful of Castor oil to each bird. Put a good lock on your chicken-house door, and cover the front with muslin instead of wire netting. This would prevent people throwing things in to them.

L. P. R.—I have very good success with all kinds of poultry raising but turkeys; they hatch well and grow fine until they commence to feather, then they droop and die. Would it be advisable to give permanganate of potassium as recommended for old birds in January issue?

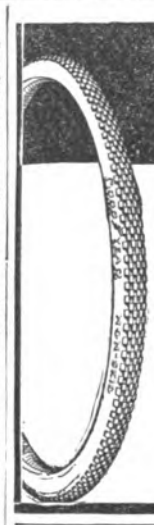
A.—The address you ask for has been sent by mail. Permanganate of potassium in the drinking water would not help your young turkeys. It was recommendeded for old birds in the fall, to kill microbes in the intestines.

T. P. F.—I have a flock of White Leghorn chickens, raised last year. I would like to have them moult early. What shall I do?

A.—Please read answer to D. E., but, as your hens are confined, give them a very small quantity of oats night and morning.

A. D. S.—What is the trouble with my geese? Two got so they could not walk; their legs seemed helpless. They got well in about a week, but would not eat very much. They had oats, free range, plenty of grass and running water. My goslings have all died but one. I kept them in the sheds when it rained but they seemed to get weak and die. I fed clover and chopped grass when it was too wet for them to be out.

A.—You don't tell me the age of your geese, but I judge from the fact that the goslings seem weak and die, that they are young birds. Goslings hatched from eggs laid by geese under three years of age, are often wanting in strength, and usually die off before they are three months old. The geese going lame suggest damp sleeping quarters. They must have a dry place to sleep in. If the floor is damp, cramp and rheumatism are sure to be the result.



B. M. L.—My young chickens have a white diarrhea, sometimes nearly like milk. Some of my chickens are six weeks old and are still dying. I have lost nearly all I have hatched. My chickens died the same way last year. I would be glad to know a remedy and how to clean up the grounds so I could raise chickens next year.

A.—I fear you have to fight white diarrhea, a most infectious disease, which may develop from four distinct sources. The most common cause is a bacillus which affects hens and the eggs they lay. Chicks hatched from such eggs will show signs of the disease within a few days. Their droppings contain the microbes which become scattered on the ground, are carried on the chicks' feet to drinking and feeding dishes, so breeding contagion through the flock. The second source of infection is a chronic disease which affects birds and small animals, but is rarely noticeable, though eggs laid by affected hens carry the germs that mean death to little chickens hatched from them. The last cause is a fungus which develops in dirty places, and in damp, mouldy bedding. Old bran, chaff, or other light material, are all apt to contain the spores, and if eggs are packed in such material, they will be infected. I have given you the different causes to show you how thoroughly the work of cleaning up and prevention must be. Houses and fixtures, incubators and brood coops must be all thoroughly cleaned and disinfected. Plow up yards or ground where poultry has usually congregated, and sow some quick-growing crop. During the fall add fifteen grains of catechu to a gallon of water, and fill the drinking dishes with it for a month. Before using eggs for hatching wipe them with a cloth moistened with alcohol. After the chicks arrive, should there be any sickly looking ones, any that peep constantly, or huddle together in corners, kill them at once.

L. A. S.—I have bought thirty hens within a month, buying three to ten at a time from different places. Three days ago I added seven hens and one rooster to my flock. One day later I found one of these hens dead. She had many lice on her. I found them on the rooster. What can I do to prevent others from having them, and how can I kill and rid them of lice? (2) Should whole corn be scattered on ground or in

Better Tires at Lower Cost

Why pay as high as $4.25 for bicycle tires when you can buy genuine Goodyear-Akrons at little over half that price? Higher price brings no greater value. In fact, Goodyear-Akrons would cost more to make than others, in most factories. For they are made of the finest materials and in the best way that science has developed.

But you can buy these leading tires at $2.48 each for smooth tread, $2.75 for Non-Skid. We offset the costly material and construction by wonderful factory machinery and methods. We can spend more on material because of this efficiency. You get the saving in lower prices.

Goodyear-Akron Bicycle Tires are built with the same care as Goodyear Automobile and Motorcycle Tires. Better cannot be made at any price.

At Your Dealer's Remember this when you buy your next bicycle tire. Ask your dealer for Goodyear-Akrons. $2.48 each for smooth tread, $2.75 each for non-skid tread. If he has none in stock he can get them quickly from our nearest branch. Accept nothing but the best—Goodyear-Akron.

Fate of the Fleur-de-Lis

By Gertrude Hockridge

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

HUNGRY-HEARTED, so homesick that she almost forgot her weariness, Joan Marineau came upon it one morning in early spring. It was in the very heart of the great city, far back from a street on which her discouraged feet had never wandered before.

She had been out of work ever since the glove-makers' strike began. Through the early autumn and gloomy fall and biting winds of winter she had struggled, living on a pittance, all the while hoping and praying for a settlement. Spring came. The strike was lost. Immediately she set out to find other employment.

For two weeks she had gone the rounds, receiving everywhere the same answer. This morning, hearing of probable employment at the Lehner Box Factory, the largest in the great metropolis, she had started early on her long walk. Wearily she dragged herself across the viaduct which spanned the numberless tracks where the great engines were puffing clouds of grime and smoke.

She was thinking of France this morning; of sunny France; of the flowers which bloomed about her father's cottage; of Pierre, with whom she had parted in anger.

They had been sweethearts ever since they were children. On Michaelmas Day, Pierre had whispered that their cottage was completed. He had begged her on that spring morning nearly a year ago to marry him and she had promised that she would; but afterward the opportunity to go to the new land where she could find a fortune came to her, and with all a girl's hope of success, Joan had listened.

A contractor had visited her home town in search of lace-makers. To Joan, one of the best, he came first, offering transportation, and wages which seemed a small fortune. She was to go to America with a number of other girls she knew to help launch a new venture—the starting of the first lace factory in America. He promised that they should share in the profits; that as he prospered, so should they.

When the contractor went away, giving her three days in which to decide, Joan, glowing with hope, rushed to Pierre to sketch in brilliant colors pictures of the wealth she would win, of the glorious future which would be theirs. Pierre, manlike, hooted at the idea, refused to be convinced that the offer was a good one; so they had parted in anger. The next week Joan and a half dozen other girls from her home town set sail for America, and she had never seen him since.

At first all went well. After six months the factory closed for lack of funds, and the helpless French girls were turned upon the streets of a strange land, without resources.

Joan had fared better than others. Her dainty embroideries brought her work almost immediately. The prices paid were small, but sufficient to provide a living and a little besides.

All hope of the fortune of which she had boasted gone, Joan was ashamed to write to Pierre; with the fear of the fortune looming up between them, Pierre was ashamed to write to Joan. A year had passed since one had received word from the other; and now, this morning, the girl stood upon a bridge in a cloud of coal-smoke, dreaming of a white cottage which her lover had builded for her among the blood-red grapes in a vineyard of southern France.

The striking of a clock in a nearby steeple aroused the girl. Almost running Joan hurried down the hill, but at its foot she paused again. Here was purity in the midst of the city's grime.

A great, old-fashioned, pale yellow brick house stood on the hill in the center of an immense wooded, grassy lawn which was radiant with an array of gorgeous spring flowers. Hyacinths tossed their silver bells, tulips swayed their gaudy heads, and snowdrops and narcissus and jonquils bloomed by their side.

As Joan came nearer, she heard the sound of running water, and then she saw. Her breath came fast. What could it mean?

In a hollow beneath a great laurel tree, Joan Marineau saw a round basin formed by blocks of pure white granite. A fountain was throwing jets of clear water up to the blue and it fell again—Joan could scarcely believe it—into a basin edged with tall green rushes, luxuriant and beautiful; and mingled with those satiny spikes were the glorious blossoms of a fleur-de-lis such as was found nowhere except in her father's garden.

A year ago she had held the dainty lavender blossoms, flecked with purple and buff and red, in her hands, and kissed them as she handed Pierre a flower "for remembrance." She had told him to keep it to remember her by until they met again. That scene had been enacted thousands of miles from here, but now the fleur-de-lis was here, blooming in a stranger's garden. Could she still be dreaming? A sudden gust of April wind tossed the branches of the trees, bringing to Joan's nostrils a whiff of delicious fragrance, such as no other flower possessed but hers.

She remembered her sixteenth birthday, when her father had led her to a secluded spot in the garden and uncovered a wonderful flower which was blooming in a tub of marsh mud. She remembered his words—her father was a gardener and florist of no mean ability—"I have been experimenting for months little daughter, to produce a flower lovely enough to present to you on your sixteenth birthday. Here it is, pure and sweet and beautiful as the precious dawn of young womanhood. Guard your womanhood more carefully than I have watched this flower, daughter, and some day the two shall be a precious heritage for a king and a nation."

A homely, shaggy, black and yellow dog, barking fiercely and leaping high against the heavily barred gate, interrupted Joan's dreams. Telling herself that it was a wretched mistake, but cheered by the fragrance and beauty of the flowers, the girl quickened her steps.

It was yet a mile to the great factory, but Joan scarcely noticed the distance, the dirty streets, or the street cars with their clanging bells.

She entered the office of the great building, a misty smile upon her face. It was so charming a face, and so sweet a smile, that the clerk in the office took the trouble to introduce her to the forelady himself and to speak a good word for her.

It chanced that the girls were engaged this morning in filling a large order for a very exclusive candy house. They were to use their ingenuity and originality; to make no two boxes alike if they could find so many styles. Joan listened to the instructions, smiling dreamily. How fortunate it was that lavender paper and paint and ribbon lay before her!

All the girl's artistic ability came to her finger-tips as she fashioned a mammoth fleur-de-lis. With a song in her heart, she darkened the lavender in spots of purple, laid on the gold and red just as they were painted in by the hand of Mother Nature. And when the box was finished and lined with moire paper, edged with imitation lace so like the dainty web which Joan had been weaving that it was hard to tell it from the real article, she carried it to the forewoman for inspection.

The woman's cold, hard face lightened like a November sky suddenly kissed by the sun of June. "It is lovely!" she cried delightedly. "You are an artist, girl! Make one hundred just like this! Begin at once!"

So, dreaming Joan returned to the workroom to fashion hundreds of copies of the purple fleur-de-lis.

That night when she passed the great old house, she stopped long enough to throw a kiss to the nodding blossoms, which seemed to beckon as they wafted a fragrant message.

"Dear little flower, you brought me good luck this morning," whispered the girl. "Bring my Pierre back to me!"

Every day, so long as the flowers nodded by the fountain, Joan paused for a moment of silent worship. Things were going better now. The lucky choosing of the pattern that morning had brought her into the notice of the superintendent. The delivery of the boxes had brought an order for ten thousand more at a much better price than that factory had ever been able to command. Different designs were to be used, but the fleur-de-lis was still the favorite, and the company had stipulated expressly that this box was to be sold to no one but themselves.

Roses—French roses—and violets and buttercups were added to Joan's list. From boxmaker she was advanced to instructor, and from instructor to designer. Her wages were raised; her shabbier clothing and shabbier boarding-place changed for better; and with the era of prosperity she thought of home.

Before the Christmas season she had written to Pierre, intending to send him a present; but she received no reply. Through the dull weeks of January and February, when other girls were idle, Joan worked steadily. Another springtime glided swiftly upon her. She was surprised, one day, to see the fleur-de-lis again blooming beside the fountain.

It was Saturday, and with well-filled purse but an aching heart, Joan started home. When she reached the great house, she saw that something unusual was happening. The gates were thrown wide open. The windows of the house were open too. As she crossed the street the clanging red auto fire-engine dashed through the gateway and up the drive, trailing the hook-and-ladder wagon and the firemen behind it.

Dazedly Joan joined the procession of people, and a moment later stood with them by the fountain. A stream of smoke was pouring from the roof of the old mansion. The first crash of the firemen's axes brought a rush of flame. A crackling and an ominous roar greeted the onlookers. The current from the fountain was turned into the hose, and the firemen's heavy heels crushed down the fragrant flowers.

Protestingly, as if to protect them from injury, the girl gathered the lilies to her heart. With a feeling of curious content she stood watching the busy streams of water which were fast subduing the flames.

"The family is in California; they've been away since January," Joan heard a man's voice explaining. "No one knows what caused the fire, but the chief attributes it to defective wiring. The house is not greatly damaged, thanks to that Frenchman. I suppose Wilson will give him a good reward. The old house is filled with valuable historic relics; have been in the Wilson family for a hundred years."

"Who is this man? One of their employees?" Joan heard a woman's voice ask.

"He is their gardener."

"Oh, that fellow who came here two years ago!" It was the woman who spoke, and Joan held her breath lest she should not catch every word. "I remember now. It is such a pathetic story. Mrs. Wilson told me herself. The poor fellow, who is very handsome and bright and all that, came here in search of his sweetheart, who had come here with the hope of making a fortune. It seems that, having not heard from her, he grew uneasy, came here to hunt her, bringing with him a peculiar kind of a fleur-de-lis which the girl's father had developed from a lily which grows wild in France. He hoped that the flower might be the means of bringing them together.

"It is truly a gorgeous blossom, so beautiful that Mrs. Wilson was delighted when he grouped them around the fountain. A few months after the first flowers bloomed, Taylor's candy store brought out a bonbon box which was an exact reproduction of the lilies which grew by the fountain. Poor Pierre was wild when he happened to see the ones which came to the house for Mrs. Wilson's party. He thought that his sweetheart had made them, that she was found, and went at once to the store to find out where the boxes had been purchased. They refused to enlighten him, so Mrs. Wilson, to whom he had told the story, tried to secure the information for him, but without success."

"What a story! I'd like to see those wonderful flowers! Where are they?"

Joan heard the woman's voice reply, "By the fountain; there to the west of the house."

A sharp turn of the path brought man and woman directly in front of Joan Marineau, who stood as if turned to stone, her arms filled with the wonderful flowers.

"Mercy!" exclaimed the woman in a low whisper. "What a beautiful girl! How romantic it would be if that were the Frenchman's lost sweetheart! Let's question her!"

"Clear the way!" shouted a mounted policeman, suddenly. Before the man could reply, the fire company, their work done, puffed down the drive, and behind them stalked the faithful Frenchman.

The gates slammed shut. The man turned his weary, thoughtful face toward the fountain to learn the fate of his lilies. They were gone. But in the foreground, her great eyes wide with wonder, stood a girl, and in her arms were the purple fleur-de-lis like the withered one which he had carried so long against his aching heart.

"Joan!" one bound brought the young Frenchman to her side.

"Pierre!" the flowers fell forgotten to the earth.

* * * * * * * * * * *

A band was playing. Friends on shore waved handkerchiefs and tearful good bys to those on deck. Over the rail leaned a young girl and a handsome man, chatting joyously in French. They were planning for the furnishing of a white cottage which had waited three years for its mistress.

to me every knock is a boost. No man can please everybody and no man should try to. A man who starts out to please everybody as a rule ends up by pleasing nobody, not even himself; a man who has the courage of his convictions and dares to freely express his opinions, is bound to make a few enemies, but to one enemy he makes he gathers in a million friends. The world is sick of trimmers who shift their sails to suit every wind, and so keep revolving in a circle without succeeding in getting anywhere. I am fighting the battle of the masses, the battle of humanity, and the masses have no quarrels, at least they shouldn't have any. Your interests and mine are identical. The last twelve months have been months of anguish, physical and mental for me, for from seven A. M. until midnight eight days a week and then some, I have been planning how I could help to advance the cause, of you my fellow humans, my brothers and sisters, and what I am doing now I shall be doing until my last breath. Hold up my hands and encourage me in my work and rally round COMFORT, and increase its circulation, for it is the only medium of its kind in America that would allow me to open my heart and talk out to you from the depths of my soul, as I am now doing. These are hard times for everyone and that is why you should rally round the best friends you have, COMFORT and your old college chum, Uncle Charlie.

Now for the letters.

If you haven't a set of Uncle Charlie's three wonderful books your home is not complete and you are not equipped for the full enjoyment of life. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers. All can be had free as premiums; the Book of Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers for a club of only two subscriptions. See full particulars at the end of this department. These three books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.

DEAR SIR:

Having read the COMFORT for several years I am going to write a letter to you and ask you about these germs you speak of. In your letter you spoke of germs on the hands, in the water and so forth. Learned men are trying every kind of experiment to try and find more germs. I am sixteen and think I have a good view of these things.

And another question I have to ask. Do you think that it is the mother's fault for a girl to wear slit skirts and go wrong? No! it is not! Since I was thirteen I have studied women and I think I have a good view of them. Now about germs. Our forefathers did not go to the trouble of boiling the water and wash their hands every time they turned around and why is it that they lived as long (and longer than the people who boiled water, washed their hands every time they touch anything). Can you answer that question? No! I think not. (Can't I? You wait and see. —Uncle Charlie.)

Well, I suppose you think I am a knowitall, but I think I know just about as much as the next one.

So will close hoping you will print this and tell me all about what you think.

Very respectfully, PHILERTA DALTON.

P. S. Do you think I write good? (No, your writing is very hard to read.—Uncle Charlie.)

So you are interested in the germ business, Philerta, are you? You say our forefathers didn't go to the trouble of boiling their water and washing their hands every time they turned around, and you think they lived as long a century or two ago as we do today, and you say you think you have a good view of these things. My dear child you have a very poor view. Your ideas are those that are held by millions who simply refuse to profit by the wonderful new light science has thrown into every corner of the world. These people have a habit of comforting themselves thus: "Oh, well, if father ate with dirty hands, I guess I can do the same. If father didn't bother about germs why should I?" The only way the world can advance is by one generation knowing a little more than the one that preceded it. From your letter I gather you do not want to know any more than grandfather did and believe me our grandfathers on the whole knew mighty little. If you follow your reasoning to its logical conclusion we could abolish railroads, flying-machines, telephone, telegraph, wireless telegraphy, antiseptic surgery, anæsthetics, the sewing-machine, typewriter, phonograph, automobile, agricultural machinery, ocean greyhounds, electric light, electric power, the bicycle, fountain pen, and hundreds of other things that father knew nothing about. Why not go back still farther to our troglodyte ancestors of the stone hatchet period living in caves and eating their next-door neighbors, and away back beyond that to where our ancestors were clinging by their tails to the trees in the forests, or away, way back to where they were fish, swimming in the sea, or away, away beyond even that to where they were just colloidal slime. It is evolution that carries the world forward. Evolution is God's steam roller and it goes pounding on, refusing to be halted by the never-thinks, thrusting ignorance aside, crushing the bad beneath its all-powerful wheels and pushing the good a little further onward and upward. You can be very thankful that you are living in an age that has just learned the wonderful fact that everything about us is swarming with invisible life. As you are so very fond of the days of your forefathers, we'll put you back there. See what would happen if you had a leg crushed or had appendicitis or cancer of the stomach. If they had attempted to have removed that crushed leg there would have been no ether or chloroform to have given you, and the pain would have been so agonizing you would probably have died from the shock. I can hear you crying out: "Oh, Uncle Charlie, give me ether or chloroform," then I'd have had to harden my heart and say: "No, little girl, your forefathers got along without such things, and as you are such a great admirer of what your forefathers did, we'll let you get along as they did." Suppose you rallied from the shock of the operation, the surgeons who operated on you, knowing nothing about aseptic surgery would cut and saw with instruments reeking with germ life. If they washed your wound at all it would be with water teeming with poisonous germs. It's a hundred to one blood poisoning or tetanus, which is lockjaw would set in and finish you off. You'd perish miserably because you preferred the methods of your great grandparents. Suppose you had appendicitis. No surgeon in these dear old days of yours would dare operate and open up the abdomen. If you had any trouble there in the old days you just died, and poor ignorant people referred to it as inflammation of the bowels, because they didn't know any better. Today a good surgeon could remove your appendix, or cut away a cancerous portion of the stomach, remove half a yard of intestine and connect the several parts and restore you to health. In a few weeks you could be playing football. Medicine is largely guesswork, but surgery is an exact science, and we have to thank Lord Lister for making it an exact science, for he it was who introduced antiseptic surgery. He used certain solutions, such as carbolic and bichloride for instance, which kill all the germs on a man's hands, for of course you can't boil the hands, and he boiled all the operating instruments, subjected all the bandages to a high temperature, thus killing off all germs and allowing nature to start its process of healing without being hampered by millions of invisible enemies ready to prey on the tissues, start inflammation and suppuration, pus and gangrene. You would have had a pretty sad time of it young lady, if you had lived in those bad old days. There are some foolish sentimentalists who think that the old days were the good days, but there never were any good old days, they were all bad old days. These are bad days too, but they are the best the world has ever seen and every day is a better day than the one preceding it. You ask how it was our forefathers lived so long. They didn't live long. As I told you before when I wrote upon this subject, they died like flies, and whereas centenarians, people who live to be a hundred years of age, are quite common today, very old people were a great rarity in the days that are gone by. Few people actually knew how old they were. All the reports of people who lived to be a hundred and over are just plain buncomb and rubbish. In fact the people didn't know when they were born, as few records were kept, and so as the years rolled on and senility set in, they lost their count and in the early eighties began telling people they were a hundred or a hundred and twenty. It is a great wonder that people lived at all and the reason that they did live is due to the fact that weaklings perished at birth or soon after, and only those with the most robust constitutions survived. There was a city in France not so very long ago, and though it contained over thirty thousand people, it didn't have a living soul in it over thirty-five years of age. In the days of our forefathers whole continents were swept by epidemics that carried off people by the million. Whole communities were completely wiped out. Those were the dear, good, sweet, lovely old days when there were no sewers, no sanitation, and all the filth, sewage and garbage were thrown out of the windows into the middle of the narrow streets. The law compelled the people to give a warning cry before emptying their buckets, so that pedestrians in the streets could duck and run before the avalanche came. The stench was intolerable and death worked overtime. During our war with Spain, thousands died of disease, died like rotten sheep, of typhoid. I saw them die with my own eyes, had them dying all around me. All that death and suffering could have been easily avoided by sanitary science and ordinary precautions, by boiling water and keeping flies away from the men's food. Even in our camps here in the United States, before men were sent abroad, they died like flies. Those are the good old days that you, Philerta, would have immensely enjoyed. Recently we had some twenty thousand men strung along the Mexican border for many weeks, and scarcely a life was lost from typhoid and other filth diseases. Our army has learned its lesson. In their campaign with Russia the Japs taught the world how big armies could be handled, losing scarcely any men from disease and thanks to antiseptic surgery, very few from wounds. The germ of tetanus or lockjaw lurks in the rich, black soil of northern France. Shells after hitting the ground, explode, and hundreds of fragments scatter in every direction, carrying dirt along with pieces of steel into the bodies of unfortunate soldiers. This dirt causes lockjaw, a terrible disease which has almost entirely baffled science. Those who are familiar with the Bible remember how the Jews were admonished to be careful about the washing of hands and the preparation of food and the cleansing of various vessels. You must remember that the Jews lived in a tropical climate where food quickly went bad, and where there were no ice boxes or refrigerators. It was the strict observance of these laws that kept the Jews strong and healthy and saved them from annihilation. It is true that scientific men are looking for germs. They are looking for the germ of cancer and other diseases. As soon as the germs are found steps can be taken to destroy them or render them harmless. There are good germs and bad germs. If it were not for the good germs in our bodies the bad germs would soon put us out of business. On the trains and in schools the public drinking cup has been abolished. This is a splendid step in the right direction. If this step had been taken twenty-five years ago, I shouldn't have had to spend three months in a hospital with typhoid fever. Oh, those good old days! That deadly source of infection, the common drinking cup, is being put completely out of business. Now the Pullman porter hands you a paper cup, and so that no germs from his hands can touch the cup that you drink from, it also is wrapped in paper. Epidemics of disease are now practically unknown, because sanitation has given us a clean world and men can no more wallow like beasts in their filth as they once did. Filth was the breeding place of the germ, and the more filth there was the more germs could get into the human body, with the result that epidemics swept the land. Today epidemics are rare and if started are soon got under control. The fool hath said in his heart "There is no God," and there are some present day idiots who think there are no germs. Thank Heaven the majority of us know better. Philerta, my dear, you say that you know just about as much as the next one. Probably you do, but are you sure that the next one knows any more than you do? If he does not I'm afraid he is a very poor teacher and knows nothing of science or sanitation.

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

The Soft White Arm

ONCE a year, at least, all the members of the Pretty Girls' Club have one big wish in common, and that is when summer-time with its transparent fabrics and shortened sleeves makes every girl from one end of the country to the other sigh for pretty arms.

How to have pretty arms, then shall be our subject this month, and we will consider how to make thin arms plump, and fat arms thin, and all arms pretty to look upon.

Every once in a while, I get a letter from someone of my girls, saying, "Between my elbow and my wrist my arm is smooth and soft, but from the elbow to the shoulder it is rough with goose flesh. What can I do?" Since the question is such a common one, let's get it answered and out of the way before we go on to the other problems in connection with pretty arms. The cure for the rough skin of which my girls complain is—guess! Just a bathbrush and soap and water! It usually means that the daily bathing of the body has been a bit hasty. You can buy a camel's-hair bathbrush (a small complexion brush will do) at the drug-store for a very small sum, and every night or morning of your life you should use it, with hot soapy water, to scrub the arms thoroughly, especially the elbow and any roughened patches. After scrubbing, you should rinse thoroughly, and then moisten with this soothing lotion:

Lotion for Arms

Rose-water, one pint; tincture of benzoin, one fluid dram; tincture of tolu, twenty drops.

The next thing to consider after we have scrubbed all the tiny flakes of dry skin away and started our arms on the road to a smooth skin, is the shape and size of our arms.

Very fat arms are more to be deplored than too thin arms, for the latter may be concealed, but the former are apt to be only too much in evidence. One of the simplest ways to get rid of the inconvenient and unbecoming flesh is to knead it off. Nightly massage—very vigorous movements—will aid in getting rid of the extra layer of fat; but in addition to this the flesh of the arms should be twisted and "worked." Grasp the upper left arm with the right hand, the fingers on the top, the thumb underneath. Now twist the flesh of the arms as far to the left as possible. Remove the hand, and grasp an inch further down on the arm, twist the flesh in the same direction as before, and so continue from shoulder to elbow. Practise this for five minutes at a time.

While massage will take off surplus flesh, it can also be used to increase the size of the arm; but to accomplish this end, it must be administered very gently indeed, the fingers being dipped in cold cream or skin food before being applied to the arm. Do not use the twisting motion for this, however, as that is primarily a reducing movement. Rather, rub the arm up and down, and around and around, with a gentle pressure.

An excellent exercise to reduce a fat upper arm should supplement the massage.

A Reduction Exercise

Stand with chin up, chest forward, heels together, and the arms outstretched horizontally from the shoulders. Now close the hands, and with the closed fist describe a circle at arm's length from the shoulders, keeping the elbows perfectly rigid, but moving the shoulder in its socket as well as the stiffened arm. Practise this first, with the right arm, with the left, then with both together. It will reduce a fat shoulder most satisfactorily, if practised daily.

An exercise which may supplement this is one which is given for strengthening the wrists. It will, however, also develop and improve the shape of the arm between wrist and elbow.

An Exercise for Pretty Arms

Stand with chin up, chest forward, heels together, and the arms outstretched horizontally from the shoulder. Now, close the hands tight, consciously exerting all the force you can; open them again, and stretch the fingers to their fullest length and wide apart.

If the arms are red or blotched, a whitening lotion may be used immediately after bathing and drying them at night. Rub it well in with the palms of the hands.

For Red or Blotchy Arms

Elder-flower water, six ounces; powdered borax, one and one half drams; glycerine, three fluid drams.

If the arms freckle easily, you should take the same precaution to protect them before going outdoors, as you do to protect the facial skin. Use a good cold cream, and before dressing in the morning rub it well into the arms, wiping any surplus off with a soft cloth. Dust with powder, and wipe with a cloth again. Before going outdoors during the day, rub cold cream again into any exposed portion of the arm, and dust with powder, as before. This does not mean you should let a thick layer of powder be visible. You should only apply a little, and that should be wiped off with a cloth immediately. Enough will remain to prevent any greasy appearance from the application of the cold cream.

With this precaution your arms are not likely to freckle; but if the skin is particularly sensitive, it is wise always to wear silk gloves which meet the sleeves. This year the old-fashioned fingerless mitts are fashionable again, and they look very quaint and attractive, besides protecting the arm while leaving the fingers free.

If your arms are already freckled, rub with the cut surface of a lemon daily. Possibly, this will not be strong enough. If not, have your druggist put up this freckle eradicator:

Freckle Eradicator

Rose-water, one half ounce; glycerine, one ounce; lactic acid, two ounces.

When applying, pour only a small portion at a time into a little small dish into which you can dip a cloth or bit of absorbent cotton. Use the cloth or cotton to mop the freckled places several times daily.

If you have any little brown moles on the arms, the freckle lotion may help to bleach them; but, if not, try moistening salicylic acid with alcohol or glycerine, and apply to the mole for half an hour. Be careful that the acid covers only the mole, for the object of the treatment is to cause the acid to eat away the brown tissue. Three applications is supposed to be enough to destroy the mole, each one lessening it somewhat in size. It must be allowed to heal after each application.

SUMMER GOWNS DEMAND A PRETTY ARM.

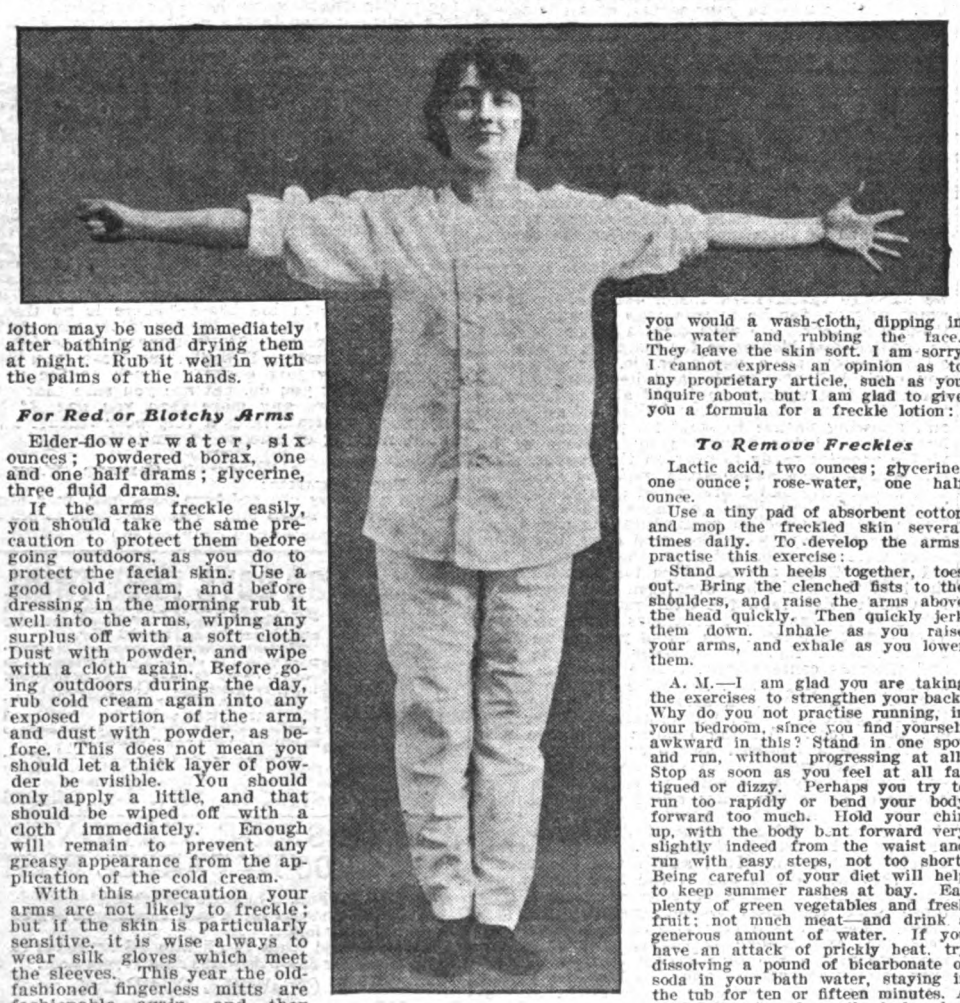
Have I given you enough to do to keep you busy for a month? I guess so! And I hope I shall hear of dozens and dozens of pretty arms as a result.

Answers to Questions

W. W. W.—If your hips are too large, because they are fat, you can reduce them by exercise. If your frame is large, you can't alter its size. But I imagine your trouble is too much flesh. Practise this exercise night and morning:

To Reduce the Thighs



Stand with heels together, toes out; now, move right foot out about eighteen inches in front of you. Raise your arms above your head and bend the trunk to the left, aiming to touch the floor with your finger-tips. Bend the right knee slightly, but keep the left one perfectly stiff. Inhale as you rise, and exhale in bending.

For Too Fat Thighs and Abdomen

In another excellent exercise for your needs, you stand with heels together, toes turned out. Place your hands on the back of a chair, or any object that may be convenient. Rise on your toes; then, bending the knees, sink down to the floor slowly. Rise slowly to the standing position, again, without allowing the heels to touch the floor. The object of placing your hands on the back of a chair is to help preserve your balance. Inhale when rising, exhale when squatting.

To Develop Calf of Leg

To develop your legs between the knees and ankles, practise rising on the toes slowly, hands on hips, then very slowly sinking to the ground again. Be sure you rise to the very tips of the toes. I am glad my directions have helped you to develop your bust to a good thirty-eight. If your skin is a little rough, you probably use too much or too strong soap on your face, and do not rinse it thoroughly. Try using bath-bags of table oats—little cheese-cloth bags three by three inches, half filled with oats. Use them just as you would a wash-cloth, dipping in the water and rubbing the face. They leave the skin soft. I am sorry I cannot express an opinion as to any proprietary article, such as you inquire about, but I am glad to give you a formula for a freckle lotion:

STRETCHING THE FINGERS TO DEVELOP THE FORE ARM.

To Remove Freckles

Lactic acid, two ounces; glycerine, one ounce; rose-water, one half ounce.

Use a tiny pad of absorbent cotton and mop the freckled skin several times daily. To develop the arms, practise this exercise:

Stand with heels together, toes out. Bring the clenched fists to the shoulders, and raise the arms above the head quickly. Then quickly jerk them down. Inhale as you raise your arms, and exhale as you lower them.

A. M.—I am glad you are taking the exercises to strengthen your back. Why do you not practise running, in your bedroom, since you find yourself awkward in this? Stand in one spot and run, without progressing at all. Stop as soon as you feel at all fatigued or dizzy. Perhaps you try to run too rapidly or bend your body forward too much. Hold your chin up, with the body bent forward very slightly indeed from the waist and run with easy steps, not too short. Being careful of your diet will help to keep summer rashes at bay. Eat plenty of green vegetables and fresh fruit; not much meat—and drink a generous amount of water. If you have an attack of prickly heat, try dissolving a pound of bicarbonate of soda in your bath water, staying in the tub for ten or fifteen minutes. A good lotion to rub on the body when the heat has produced an uncomfortable rash, can be made by this formula:

Lotion for Summer Rash

Glycerine, three ounces; spirits of camphor, one half ounce; powdered borax, one quarter ounce.

M. L. A.—To develop the neck to conceal a prominent collar bone, practise rolling it on the shoulders; drop it first on the chest, then roll it toward the side, toward the back, the other side, and back to front again. Rotate it in this way ten or fifteen times before stopping, and practise twice daily. Better, also, practise some chest and arm exercises. I have given many in these columns.

H. T. A.—To reduce your large stomach, practise the exercises given "W. W. W." Also, be careful not to overeat. One good helping of each article of food which forms a meal is enough. At fourteen, do not consider darkening your hair. It will almost inevitably grow darker, itself. Just be careful to eat healthful food, drink eight to ten glasses of water a day, and get plenty of outdoor exercise. This will put your blood in healthy condition, and that will keep your hair healthy and of good color. Your pimples will probably disappear under the treatment, although at fourteen young girls sometimes have pimples which are not especially affected by the diet, but which soon pass away. Don't eat many sweet things, and be careful to chew every mouthful until it is almost liquid before swallowing.

Rosa.—For blackheads and pimples, be careful of your diet, drink lots of water, see that the bowels move freely daily. Then scrub the face every night with a camel's-hair complexion brush (which you can buy of your druggist for twenty or fifty cents, or order by mail), using plenty of hot soapy water, and afterward rinsing the face in many waters, at first very warm, but at the last dashing cold water on to close the pores. For freckles, rub cold cream into the face and wipe off thoroughly before going outdoors, then dust on a very little powder and wipe softly again. This will protect the skin. See answer to "W. W. W."

Pine Rose.—About the only thing you can do for the scar caused by the burn from carbolic acid is to massage it very gently, indeed, each night with a little cold cream on the finger-tips. I think quite likely it will wear away in time, especially if you use cold cream nightly.

A Worried Louise.—The reason your breasts look small is because they lack firmness, and so sag and spread out. Dash cold water on, after bathing daily, to help firm them. Also, be careful to stand well, raising the chest a trifle. I suggest that you purchase a pulley exerciser, and attach it to the wall and practise with it daily. It will develop chest and help to make bust firm. Also buy a simple lawn or net brassiere such as is made by any of the corset companies, and wear it to support the bust and hold it in proper shape. Your figure will show a decided improvement.

M. V. L.—Electrolysis is sometimes effective in removing a scar. I suggest that you use massage nightly as recommended to "Pine Rose." The following paint is sometimes used to conceal a scar, or you can wet the scar, powder it white, put on a layer of flexible collodion and then powder again with flesh-colored powder.

To Conceal a Scar

Chalk, five drams; flexible collodion, four drams; glycerine, one and one half drams; rectified spirits, one dram; wood charcoal, one half dram; carmine, one half dram.

You can vary the color by using more or less charcoal, carmine or chalk.

A Young Girl.—The rings under your eyes are caused by your not being well in some way. Perhaps your bowels or stomach are out of order—perhaps these rings only come at special times, when you are more tired than usual or are not feeling well. They are a good warning to "slow up" just a little, be careful to get enough sleep, to eat sensibly, to see that the bowels move daily, and to be careful not to get chilled or to get the feet wet. At fourteen you need to be careful of all these things, that you may be a healthy, happy, attractive woman later. (2) Yes, indeed, your hair can be healthy at fourteen—it will be healthy if your body is healthy; so, eat three good, nourishing meals a day, not many sweets, but eggs (not fried, but boiled, scrambled, or poached, all very soft), and milk, and green vegetables, and fresh fruit, and good bread and butter. Do not eat fried meats—they are too hard to digest. Shampoo your hair once in two weeks, unless you are not feeling well, and take an all-over bath before going to bed at night, sponging the body quickly, a little space at a time, rubbing it pink and dry immediately. Buttermilk is said to whiten face and hands. Let it dry on the skin. But the best thing for the complexion is keeping the bowels open, being careful of the diet, and keeping face and body scrupulously clean.

Homely.—See answer to "A Worried Louise." Perhaps you are a little run down and need to add some flesh. This will increase the size of your bust, but in any case be sure to wear a brassiere. Try the milk diet if you need to gain weight: it will add from one to three pounds a week. I have given directions many times in these columns. The condition of your hair would indicate that you need some general building up. In the meantime, shampoo once in two weeks and massage the scalp nightly. You might use my Geranium Soap Jelly.

Geranium Soap Jelly

Pare one cake of white soap into three cups of water to which has been added a teaspoonful of powdered borax. Boil until the liquid has been somewhat reduced; then let cook until it jellies. Add two drops of geranium oil, if desired, and put in a jar to use as wanted. A good face bleach is as follows:

A Face Bleach

Buy a 50-cent jar of theatrical cream. To a teaspoonful of the cream add as much almond meal as it will take, and enough hot water to make a thin spreadable paste. Cut two squares of cheese-cloth large enough to cover the face, with holes for the nose. Dampen these and spread paste between them. Apply this mask to the face and pat close. Over this apply two small, wet hot Turkish towels, and as soon as cool replace with others. Keep this up for fifteen minutes, remove pack, wash face in warm, then cool, then cold water. Repeat twice a week for three weeks. It will be safe to use for your face any standard advertised cold cream. If you want to make one yourself, this formula is a good one:

Skin Food

Melt one ounce each of lanolin, and cocoanut oil, one half ounce each of spermaceti and white wax, and two ounces of sweet almond oil, in a porcelain kettle. Take from the fire, add one ounce of orange-flower water and three drops of tincture of benzoin, fluffing it with an egg beater until cold.

Radium on the Farm

"Fertilizer for farm use at seventy million dollars a pound hardly seems reasonable," said the man with an Agricultural Department tone of voice, "but it is a fact nevertheless. Oh, you don't believe it, don't you? Well, maybe it isn't exactly fertilizer and what is used isn't quite the thing itself, but it is the next thing to it. I refer to radium which is worth that much, but instead of radium, radium ore tailings are used which cost about three hundred dollars a ton and contain enough radium which cannot possibly be extracted to produce remarkable results when used on land, not exactly as fertilizer, for radium is not a plant food, but for the radio-activity it produces in the plants to make them grow. On one experiment farm where the tailings were tried lettuce increased 29 per cent, lima beans, 17 per cent, cucumbers 35 per cent, varieties of squash from 35 to 44 per cent, Rock Ford melons 24 per cent, carrots 5 per cent, and radishes 70 per cent. From 25 to 200 pounds were used to the acre, mixed with ordinary fertilizer and results proved that an excess of the radium had a bad effect. It was also shown that the radio-activity extended for some distance beyond where it was placed in the ground and plants were affected by it and produced two or three times as much as those not affected. On radishes and turnips the most marked effects were shown and especially those varieties extending farthest below the surface. The effect of the radium on plant diseases is to the advantage of the disease and diseases developed where radium was used, while it did not where there was no radium. One application of radium is sufficient for years as it appears to remain in the soil. On lawns and flowers its effect is remarkable in their increased brightness of color. It also improves the quality of vegetables even more than it increases their yield. Just the same, none of you need be in a hurry about trying radium on your soil. By and by it will be ready when the price has been reduced and when its properties are better known. For the present you may wait and watch for results, but I want to say to you that the time is coming when radium will be making crops that we haven't thought about yet."

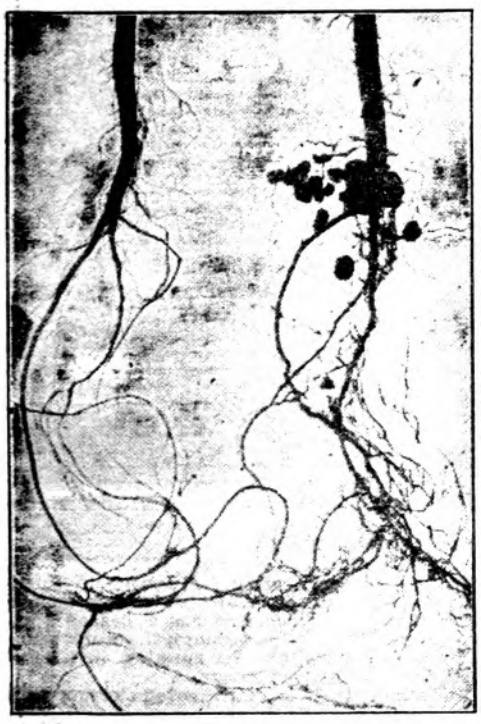
Garden Suggestions for August

WHILE it is a little late in the season to start new garden crops, there are a few that do need special attention during this month.

CELERY.—The late crop may be set early this month. The earlier crop needs careful cultivation and attention to blanching. This may be done with earth, boards or drain tile slipped over the plants while yet small enough to do this easily.

CABBAGE.—Give careful attention to cultivation and to keeping down insects. Paris Green may be used with good effect before the plants begin to head. Later this poison is dangerous to human life as already described in other numbers of COMFORT'S Modern Farmer. Use hellebore, if necessary, instead. Give good cultivation and gather the early crop for the market.

ONIONS.—Early onions will be ready for harvest this month. Do not delay but pull and let onions lie on ground until dry and well cured. Remove the tops about one half inch from the bulb and place the onions under cover until a satisfactory market can be secured. It is better to place them on the early market than it is to attempt to store them with the best of storage facilities available.



TOMATOES.—It is a good plan to stake up tomatoes before the fruit begins to set. Keep the vines pinched back and the suckers cut off so that the strength of the vine may be thrown into the best specimens of fruit. The ripening may be hastened by picking the fruit as soon as it begins to turn and placing it in the sun. This will tend to throw the energies of the plant into the ripening of the green fruit on the vine. The removal of a portion of the outside leaves which tend to shade the fruit will also aid in hurrying up the ripening process.

Fly Swatting and Weed Killing

Not only is this the fly-swatting time—and that is a business that should be kept up as long as flies are seen—but it is weed-killing season. We like to see the "old man" carry a "pizen weed" from a field and place it on the top of a fence post to die in the sun. Seldom does one see a boy or a girl do that, but "Ma" surely does—if she happens to be out on the land and not killing herself "putting up stuff" for the men folks. The quack grass patch we hope has not been allowed to go to seed. It has been mowed and fed to the cows, no doubt; but now it should be plowed two inches deep in hot dry weather so that it will dry out; then it should be plowed deeply, clear out of sight, so that it may never see the light of day again. All of the roots that can be raked and harrowed off the patch before the second plowing should be burned and when these things have been done not a green blade of this terribly hardy grass weed should be allowed above ground. Eternal vigilance is the price of success in destroying this weed. And so it is with every weed going to seed at this time of the year, or busy shedding seed to "smut" the farm and the neighborhood. The only weed we may except is ragweed in the pastures; for many a stockman will tell you that it shades the land and makes the grass come away green and sweet at the roots. Still it would be far better to have pastures free from ragweed and bull thistles and the newer farming is to have new grass each year and to depend largely upon the silo for succulent feed in the hot, dry months of the summer. The big burdocks will die readily now if the tap root is cut through and some salt poured on and those big plantains need attention in the same way and the Canada thistle patch must have just as good clean cultivation as the quack grass plantation. If all of us would but get after the weeds religiously and strenuously our farms soon would look much better and certainly return better profits and with far less labor than now is the case.

Inoculation for Soy Beans

Our Southern readers will be interested in the accompanying picture which shows the effect of inoculation on soy beans. The nodules produced on the roots of soy beans are among the largest to be found on any kind of legume and because of this are much more striking than the tiny specks to be seen on the roots of Alfalfa. It is in these nodules, however, that the tiny germs live that have the power of taking nitrogen from the air and feeding it to the plant. This is the reason why inoculated soil produces the biggest crops of legumes.

UNINOCULATED. INOCULATED.

SOY BEANS.

Inoculation for Alfalfa

The value of inoculation for Alfalfa is strikingly shown by the accompanying picture taken from a recent publication. The large plant was taken from a field which had been inoculated with a bacteria favorable to the growth of Alfalfa. The small plant was taken from a nearby field not so inoculated. The pictures speak for themselves. They are not exaggeration. The same experiment has been repeated over and over again at the various state experiment stations with similar results. The Alfalfa and soy bean pictures are reproductions of photographs furnished by U. S. Department of Agriculture.

INOCULATED. UNINOCULATED.

ALFALFA.

Effect of Late Cutting on Alfalfa

In the Northern tier of states late cutting of Alfalfa is usually followed by disastrous results. If the crop is cut late it does not have sufficient time to mature a crop that will cover the ground and thus protect the roots during winter weather. If the first and second crops have been cut at the right time the third crop should be ready for cutting by the first week in September. If let stand for two or three weeks it will mature a heavy growth and may start to blossom. This crop is often tempting to the farmer and he harvests it, with the result that no later growth appears and serious winter killing is the result. Better let this third crop stand and go into the winter with a heavy growth on the ground than risk cutting Alfalfa in these Northern states after the first few days in September. Winter killing leaves bare spaces over the field in which weeds and grass soon make their appearance. These will soon do serious damage to the crop and may run it out altogether in the course of a year or two.

Cows in Fly Time

With the month of August the flies so annoying to dairy cows begin to be very troublesome. The cows have to spend so much time fighting flies that they do not get enough time to eat. This, with the annoyance of the flies themselves, soon begins to tell in the milk pail. There are some things, however, that can be done to counteract this loss.

There are several commercial sprays on the market that are proving of value in keeping flies off cattle. Stabling in darkened barns is a very satisfactory preventive, and blanketing the cows with light muslin does a great deal of good.

The Need for Extra Feed

Just at this time of the year the pastures begin to get short. Short pastures will further decrease the flow of milk. Flies and short pastures usually come together, hence the great need for extra feed.

In former numbers of COMFORT'S Modern Farmer we have emphasized the need of planting a solling crop to use when flies come and pastures get short. If you have not made provision for this, and are in the dairy business, it may be wise for you to cut some of your early corn for this purpose. There is nothing else quite so good, however, for use at this time, as a patch of Alfalfa. It grows rapidly, stands the dry weather well and a small patch will give a large amount of extra feed in a short time.

One of the best of solling crops is sweet corn. For this purpose a large evergreen sort should be grown. It provides an abundance of forage and is so sweet and juicy that cows eat it with great relish. Of course it is too late to think about it now for this year, but it is a good time now, while the matter is on your mind and you can feel the need so much, to plan for providing a good supply of crop to be cut green for your dairy cattle when fly time and short pastures come again.

Now Is the Time to Feed Grain

There is no better time than right now for feeding grain to your dairy cattle if they have begun to shrink in milk. If the farmer will watch the milk and as soon as he sees the results of fly time or poor pasture begin feeding grain he may be able to check the decrease. Let us remember that when a cow once shrinks in milk it is well-nigh impossible to get her back to a full flow again during that lactation period. Thus a decrease in milk means not only a loss for that month but for all succeeding months during which the cow is in milk. Let us make a few figures to see how this works out. Suppose a cow capable of giving an average of 30 pounds of milk daily for let us say 300 consecutive days. This is a very ordinary record for a good dairy cow and amounts to but 9000 pounds per year. Let us suppose that she has been in milk but 100 days when the time of short pasture comes around. She then has 200 days of her milking period left to run. Now suppose that from annoyance of flies and poor summer pasture she drops off only five pounds daily. Since her milk flow cannot be restored this loss will run through the remaining 200 days of her lactation period and amount to 1000 pounds of milk. If her milk shrinks 10 pounds per day, which by the way is not at all unusual, the loss will be 2000 pounds of milk instead.

A little extra care to prevent annoyance from flies, a small grain ration and plenty of green feed will keep the cow up to her normal flow. On a herd of twenty cows this may amount to all the way from $100 to $500. Is it worth while?

Feeding Wheat Bran at a Profit

One of our readers says that she has been feeding pigs nothing but wheat bran and skim-milk and she has bad luck in the work. Now that is not a good way to feed bran. It is a bulky feed and takes up much water, besides which it is somewhat irritating to the bowels on account of the grit it contains as well as the indigestible cellulose of the husk. It is not a particularly good feed for pigs. Fed in large quantities right along it tends to produce scouring and often causes piles or eversion of the rectum. If fed to pigs it should form a very small part of the ration along with corn-meal, wheat middlings and flaxseed meal or a little digester tankage. A mixed ration gives the best results in hog feeding and the bran in the mixture is most valuable as a regulator of the bowels and in furnishing bone-making materials which are very deficient in corn. Bran is better fed to the dairy cow and as an ninth part of the ration of whole oats for horses. It is a great milk producer and balances corn, regulates the bowels and stimulates milk flow. It acts in the same way as a feed for the brood mare and is fine for growing colts as it is a bone-builder. In the best Percheron producing districts of France the farmers feed their colts half and half whole oats and wheat bran, on grass and nowhere are draft colts better developed for their age than in that country. The old idea that a bran mash on Saturday night is a grand thing for a work horse is fast dying out. The better way is to fed bran daily along with oats. The mash often causes colic or less severe forms of indigestion. It is too much of a "surprise" to the horse's stomach. Feed three bran mashes in succession and it will be noticed that the third one comes away practically undigested in the manure and is bad smelling. It irritates the bowels so that little if any of the nutrient is assimilated. Feed it right along and it is digested and also acts as a regulator.

Letting Calves Nurse

A reader asks us whether it will pay better to separate milk and sell the cream to the creamery three miles away or let the calf suck for five or six weeks and sell it for veal in a neighboring city or ship it to a large city. This question cannot be satisfactorily answered as regards all districts, but where fourteen or fifteen cents a pound can be got for rough dressed calves of five or six weeks old it usually pays quite well to feed for veal instead of selling cream. Sixteen dollars or more is a good price for a fat veal and pays better than selling the cream at a cent or so per pound over the Elgin price for butter fat. This is particularly the case with ordinary dairy cows the milk of which tests say not much of anything over 3.5 per cent of butter fat. With rich Guernsey or Jersey milk, testing over five per cent of butter fat, cream may pay well, but it takes a mighty good cow to bring in as much as the fat veal in the time stated above. Then, too, there is the saving in not having to milk the cow. The calf is allowed to suck three times a day and if the cow is a big milker she may at first nurse two calves and make a profitable job of the work. This calf raising for veal is done in the months when grass is at its best and the rush of field work is on. At this time the men are too busy to bother with much milking and so that is an additional reason for vealing the calves. This should not apply to the heifer calves, however if they are by a fine pure-bred sire and from cows that have made fine records at the pail. It is a difficult matter to find good dairy cows for sale at reasonable prices. Usually the seller has some good reason for selling and it is not one that is favorable to the buyer. More than ever before it is going to be good policy to raise the heifer calves for dairying, as foot and mouth disease is not extinct yet and the introduction of strange stock is attended with danger on account of that disease, as well as tuberculosis and contagious abortion. A good plan is to let a calf suckle and see how the price obtained pays for the work and the time taken to raise the animal for veal, compared with what the cow would have yielded had her cream or milk been sold. Probably the calf will bring the most money in every case where there is a good market for veal.

Cultivating Corn Until Maturity

It is believed in some sections that it pays to cultivate corn after it is laid-by. Most farmers in the corn belt like to finish with their corn cultivation before haying and harvest begin and such would scarcely find time to cultivate corn throughout the growing season even though they were certain of getting an increased crop. Now are there seasons and localities when and where this should be done to save the crop? Yes, in dry seasons and in regions of light rainfall. It will not be worth while for the farmer to cultivate late in ordinary seasons. Neither will it for those living in regions having sufficient rainfall to mature the crop. But in dry years and in arid regions late cultivation conserves soil moisture. It creates a dust blanket and keeps the soil from drying out. The drier the season or place the more frequent should be the cultivation. Keep it up. Don't quit because the leaves roll. They will roll worse if you do. The dust mulch forces all the water to come up through the plant. It saves for the plant all there is in the soil. Hence in dry times and places cultivation should be shallow and frequent. Begin early and continue until the corn is near maturity, if good crops are to be secured.

Cutting Silage Corn

Don't be in a hurry to cut your corn for silage. Nearly ripe corn makes the best silage, for two reasons. At the ripening stage corn has its maximum amount of food matter in the form of oil, starch and protein. Earlier than this these substances have not been completely formed. The plant then contains a good deal of sugar which is later changed into the form of starch. This sugar ferments easily in the silo and becomes sour, producing an acid silage. Green corn always makes a slushy sour silage. It is therefore best to let the corn get ripe or nearly so before beginning to fill the silo.

We get so many questions from farmers about the kind of corn to grow for silage that we are reminded at this time that the variety grown for this purpose should be one that gets ripe in the locality. In the northern states it is the practise of many farmers to send South for silage seed corn because the corn is big and seems to yield heavily. They believe therefore that they get more silage. This is doubtless true but the silage that they do get is of poor quality. Good silage cannot be made from green corn. It is neither wholesome, palatable nor nutritious. While more can be made per acre by weight, a large part of this weight is water, hence it should not be considered. Farmers should always grow for silage a variety of corn that will ripen in their own localities.

Getting Rid of Moles

Answering a correspondent we recently advised using traps to catch ground moles and added that it was sometimes possible to see the moles working and quickly throw them out of their burrow by using a spade or spading fork. We have since collected some other ideas on the subject and they may prove of interest while other readers may care to give their methods if they are not mentioned here.

One farmer mixes a small quantity of arsenic with bran and pours some of into the runs, through holes punched into them by means of a broomstick. Moles are said to be fond of bran and the poisoned bran proves destructive. Another farmer opens one or two places in the run making the openings ten inches long. He then sprinkles concentrated lye freely on the floor of the run, covers the holes with narrow strips of board and covers the boards with dirt. The lye gets on the feet of the mole and he licks it off and poisons himself. Another plan is to soak kernels of corn in a solution of Paris Green and drop them in the runs to be eaten by the moles. Arsenic is used as a poison by one farmer who administers it by rolling little flat bits of fat meat in the powder and dropping them in the runs. He says that people are wrong in thinking that moles are blind and also in imagining that they will not eat vegetable matters.

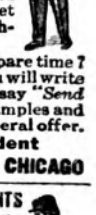
The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming, but it is hardly reasonable to expect us to waste valuable space in answering the same questions month after month for the benefit of those who need not have asked the questions if they had read and remembered the answers which we had previously printed.

Questions and Answers

CROSS-PLOWING.—Should land be cross-plowed? By which I mean: Plow it north and south one year and east and west the next year. Our land is mostly new and I would like to know how cross-plowing would affect it. MRS. WM. S., Black River Falls, Wis.

A.—Cross-plowing will not injure level land. If the land is hilly, plowing up and down the hill will cause it to wash. Side hill land should, if possible, be plowed one way. Cross-plowing is often advisable for level land if not too wet. Wet land should be plowed one way and in narrow beds with open dead furrows to assist drainage.

QUACK GRASS.—I would like to know how quack grass looks and how to kill it out. I don't know whether or not it is quack grass that is bothering me. It grows about as tall as Timothy and the seed heads are like wild oats; it is quite rooty. Please tell me how to kill out Canada thistle.



MRS. W. R. K., North Freedom, Wis.

A.—You should send a sample for identification. Quack grass does not have loose seed heads like oats, but has a seed head on alternate sides of the stem. It is best killed by plowing under in July and then deep plowing later and never letting the green leaves appear again, constant cultivation keeping them buried. Canada thistle is conquered in the same way.

RASPBERRY BORER.—I have some raspberry bushes that I set out a year ago. I kept them hoed all summer. I mulched them about a foot deep with barn

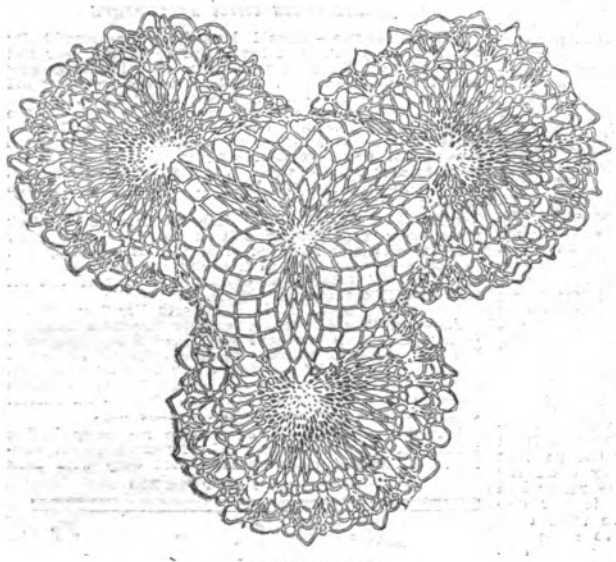
The roll when completed is straight, with a thread the length of roll along its side. The length or size of a roll is regulated by the number of times the thread is thrown over; o., over, thread over hook the number of times indicated; k. st., knot stitch, draw out loop about one quarter inch, catch thread and pull through, then put the hook between the drawn loop and the thread just pulled through, catch the thread, draw through these two stitches to form the knot; blk., block, a st. in each of a given number of sts., preceded and followed by a space; sp., space, a space is formed by making a chain of 3 or 4 sts. and omitting the same number of sts. in preceding row; sk., skip, to miss or omit number of stitches indicated in preceding row; p. c., padding cord; * stars mean that the directions given between them should be repeated as indicated before proceeding.

Terms Used in Knitting

K. knit plain; o. over; o. 2, over twice; n. narrow 2 stitches together; p. purl, meaning an inversion of stitches; sl. slip a stitch; tog. together; sl. and b., slip and bind; k. p. knit plain; stars and parenthesis indicate repetition.

Three Netted Doilies



IN response to the requests of some of our workers who understand netting we are pleased to give directions for a square, trefoil and large doily.

For all of these one will need a mesh and a form, such as are here illustrated.

For the center of the large round doily cast on 30 stitches over mesh, tie the ends of the cord together and work the following rounds:

1st, 2nd and 3rd rows.—Net plain, over mesh.

4th row.—Net 3 into every stitch. Next seven rows net plain. There will now be 90 stitches.

TREFOIL DOILY.

This center can be used for different doilies as as follow:

Trefoil Doily

Cast on 27 stitches and net around 6 times plain over mesh. Once around over form once around netting 3 into every other stitch. Two rounds plain over mesh, one round plain over form.

Square Doily

Cast on 14 stitches and net 17 rounds plain over mesh.

For a doily with 5 scallops cast on 25 stitches for each scallop, over mesh.

1st, 2nd and 3rd rows.—Net plain over mesh.

4th and 5th rows.—Plain over form.

6th and 7th rows.—Plain over mesh.

8th row.—Net 4 stitches over mesh into every other stitch of row.

9th row.—Net plain over mesh.

10th row.—Using mesh, net 3, sk. 1, net 3, sk. 1 all around.

11th row.—Net 3, * wind thread once around mesh, sk. 1, net 2, repeat from *. This completes one scallop.

MESH NEEDLE.

Having finished all the scallops required, apply them to the netted center with needle and thread. Divide the large round center into 5 equal parts. Be sure to have the center of each scallop in the exact center of each part. After all the scallops are applied, lay the work on an even surface and draw the thread in sufficently to allow the work to lie perfectly flat. After each scallop is evenly placed, fasten the center of each one firmly to the netted center; also fasten well the ends of the scallops, so they will remain in the right position. Divide the small netted center into 3 equal parts and proceed as directed for the large one. Sew a scallop around each corner of the square netted center, fastening each scallop well at each corner. If preferred, linen centers may be substituted for the netted ones. The measurements of the linen centers, after they are hemmed, are as follows: The large round center from edge to edge measures 6 inches; the small one 3 1-2 inches; the square one is 4 inches square.

BONE FORM.

Wide Apron Lace

Chain 91 stitches, turn.

1st row.—In 6th st. from hook work 1 d. tr. c., 3 d. tr. c., in next 3 sts., ch. 5, sk. 5, 1 d. tr. c., in 6th st., ch. 5, 1 d. tr. c., in next 6th st., ch. 5, 1 d. tr. in next 6th st., ch. 5, sk. 5, 7 tr. c., in next 7 sts. 23rd round.—Same as 22nd round excepting, that there are only 2 groups of 4 d. c., 5 spaces and 2 more groups of 4 d. c. on each side of the square.

These blocks when made of carpet warp will be about 18 inches square and 20 blocks will be needed for a good-sized spread.

The single block here shown gives one but a partial idea of the design as a whole as the work in the corners and sides of the blocks when joined, form additional squares, and all joined together make up a very pretty pattern.

Four blocks made of silkateen make a very pretty sofa pillow. Ribbon can be run in and out, diagonally, across each block and tied into rosette bows which will make an attractive finish for the sides and corners.

Now repeat the pattern from the first row.

This lace is very pretty for household linen such as pillow slips, scarfs or towels or for under clothing. The lace has a beaded top, a diamond like pattern through the center with a pointed edge, suitable for running in a ribbon, if used on corset covers.

If desired directions for turning a corner will be given in these columns.

COMFORT readers having knitted edges of any width or doilies are requested to submit the same for use in this department. Each pattern must be accompanied with correct directions. Address all communications to the Editor.

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Mid-Summer Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

ALL the girls are delighted with the smart suspender dresses, which are lovely in pique, linen or corduroy, with a pretty blouse of crepe or voile.

There is a strong tendency toward Princess effects in the new fashions, but for summer fabrics, the fluffy, ruffly, full skirts, with full waists and short sleeves are much admired.

For sport or outing wear the simple tailored styles are to be preferred. These are also nice for business wear. They lend themselves readily to gingham, chambrey, linen, lawn, tub silks, taffeta, and the new fabric called goline.

For "little girls" there is nothing more effective than the short-waisted dresses in suspender or "button on" style. There are also pretty over blouse styles, to be worn with a guimpe, and like the dresses for grown ups, the skirts have pockets in jaunty styles.

Fashions for children have never been more picturesque or dainty. Even the boys have their share in the new modes.

There are new blouse suits in "smock" style, three-piece jacket suits, and best of all, shirts and blouses with short sleeves.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated.

1352—Girls' Suspender Skirt and Guimpe. As here illustrated, brown plaid gingham was used for the skirt, with white lawn for the guimpe.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires three yards of 36-inch material for a 10-year size.

1346—Suspenders, Girdles and Vestees for Ladies. The suspenders may be made with or without the belt or girdle, and are suitable for velvet, silk, cloth, linen, taffeta, gingham and percale. The vest or vestee may be of lawn, linen, pique, batiste, mull, organdie or chiffon.

The pattern including all styes illustrated is cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires for No. one and for No. two, three quarters yard of 36-inch material, and for No. three, seven eighths yard of 27-inch material, for the medium size.

1349—Girls' Dress with Plaited Skirt, attached to an under waist. The blouse may be finished with a regulation middy sleeve in wrist length, or with a neatly pointed cuff turned back over the sleeve in elbow length. The skirt is a straight plaited model. Pique, linen, linene, poplin, batiste, dimity, lawn, gingham, galatea, percale, chambrey or serge are nice for this style.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires four yards of 36-inch material for an eight-year size.

1348—Ladies' Waist with sleeve in either of two lengths. For batiste, lawn, madras, gingham, crepe, linen, ratine, silk, poplin or voile this style is very pleasing.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure, and requires two and one quarter yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1340—Girls' Apron. This model has a gored skirt, the front of which is cut in one with the bib and bertha portion. It will develop nicely in gingham, cambric, lawn or percale, and is also good for sateen, alpaca, drill, or jean.

Cut in five sizes; six, eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires two yards of 36-inch material for a 12-year size.

9821—Ladies' One-piece Corset Cover, in round, square or "V" neck edge. Suitable for "all over" embroidery, for lawn, batiste, cambric, nainsook, crepe or silk.

Cut in six sizes; 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42 inches bust measure. It requires one and three eighths yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1366—Ladies' House Dress with reversible fronts, with or without collar, with sleeve in either of two lengths, and with cap. Galatea, seersucker, gingham, chambrey, percale or lawn are good for this style. The neck finish may be collarless or with the neat rolled collar.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. The cap is cut in one size only medium. The pattern for the dress requires seven yards of 36-inch material for a medium size. The cap requires three quarters yard of 27-inch material.

1371—Girls' Dress in Empire style, with or without bodice. As here shown, white batiste with Swiss "all-over" and bands of insertion were used. It is also good for challie, crepe, gingham, organdie, mull or wash silks. The bodice may be omitted, and a ribbon sash or girdle substituted.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires two and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for a six-year size.

1367—Child's Rompers and Cap. The front has waist and bloomer portion cut in "one." The back has the waist separate. The sleeve may be finished in wrist length or short in kimono style.

Cut in three sizes; two, four and six years. It requires two and one half yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size. The cap requires one and one quarter yard of 24-inch material.

1342—Ladies' Apron, with or without band trimming. This design is fitted by shoulder and underarm seams, and has a belt over the back. The free edges of neck, sleeve, pocket and right front may be trimmed with bands of contrasting material; (pattern for these bands are furnished with the model) or the edges may be underfaced, bound or hemmed.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires five and one eighth yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1321—Ladies' Eight-gored Skirt, in regulation or short length, and with raised or normal waistline. For broadcloth, serge, wool or silk gabardine, linen, crash, linene, gingham, chambrey, voile or poplin, taffeta or cheviot, this style is excellent.

Cut in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30, and 32 inches waist measure. It requires three and three eighths yards of 44-inch material for a medium size.

1359—Junior Dress with skirt in raised or normal waistline, two styles of sleeve and with high or low neck edge. White batiste, with Swiss embroidery is here shown. The waist may have a yoke of contrasting material, of net, lace or embroidery, or it may be finished low and round. The skirt is a three-piece gathered model.

Cut in three sizes; 12, 14 and 16 years. It requires five and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a 14-year size.

1252—Ladies' "Envelope" Drawers. The back portion is cut with a pointed extension that laps over the fronts and forms the closing. Buttons and buttonholes are best for fastening.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires two and one half yards of 27-inch material for a medium size.

1350-1336—A Charming Summer Dress. Composed of ladies' waist pattern 1350, and ladies' skirt pattern 1336. The waist has new style features. The sleeve in short length is finished in bell style. The skirt is composed of double flounce sections. For poplin, linen, organdie, lawn, dimity, voile or crepe this design is very attractive.

The waist is cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. The skirt in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30 and 32 inches waist measure. It requires seven and one quarter yards of 36-inch material with one and one quarter yard of lining for the foundation skirt, for a medium size. There are two separate patterns, price 10c for each pattern.

1379—Girls' Dress with Bloomers, and with sleeve in either of two lengths. The dress is a one-piece model and has a convertible collar and fronts, so that it may be closed high or rolled open at the neck edge. The bloomers may be made to button to an underwaist. It is good for linene, linen, galatea, percale, taffeta or tub silk, crepe, pique, corduroy, gingham, seersucker or chambrey.

Cut in four sizes; four, six, eight and 10 years. It will require two and three eighths yards of 44-inch material for the dress, and one and one quarter yard for the bloomers, for a six-year size.

1344—Ladies' House Dress with or without collar, with sleeve in wrist or elbow length, and with skirt in raised or normal waistline. This neat and trim model is good for linen, lawn, gingham, repp, poplin, voile, chambrey, ratine or percale. The skirt is a four-gored model, and may be joined to the waist at raised or normal waistline.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires eight yards of 27-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1382—Ladies' Costume in one or two-piece style, with or without chemisette, with vest cut high or low, and with two styles of sleeve. As here shown, embroidered crepe and cluny lace are combined. The vest and broad collar and the crush girdle are of soft satin. It lends itself nicely to gingham or chambrey and is also good for taffeta.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires eight yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1339—Ladies' Kimono perforated for sack length in straight or pointed outline. This design shows a waist in Empire effect, finished with a heading at its lower edge. The sleeve is cut in one with the body of the waist.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large, and will require four and one half yards of 44-inch material for the full length style, and two and three quarters yards for the sack length, for a medium size.

1357—Girls' Dress with two styles of sleeve, and with or without peplum. As here shown, white linene was used, with dotted percale for trimming. In galatea or seersucker it will make a serviceable school dress.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires three and one half yards of 36-inch material for a six-year size.

1378—Boys' Blouse Suit. The blouse has a new feature,—the short sleeve,—and a jaunty flat collar. As here shown striped gingham and white percale were combined. The trousers may be of serge, or cloth and the blouse of wash material.

Cut in four sizes; three, four, six and eight years. It requires one and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for the blouse, and one and one eighth yard for the trousers for a three-year size.

1331—Girls' Dress with or without bolero and collar, and with sleeve in either of two lengths. This style may be developed as a simple comfortable school frock, in gingham, percale, lawn, or poplin, or, for more dressy wear, as a "best dress" in linen, batiste, voile, crepe or silk.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires three and three eighths yards of 44-inch material for an eight-year size, without bolero it will require five eighths yard less.

1351—Dress for misses and small women with or without bolero, with two styles of sleeve, and with skirt in raised or normal waistline. As here shown, white batiste was used, with all-over embroidery and insertion for trimming.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires seven and one half yards of 27-inch material for an 18-year size, with one yard for bolero.

1343—Boys' Blouse Suit in Russian style, with trousers having straight lower edge. Striped madras in blue and white is here shown, with collar of white linen. The sleeve is finished with neat tucks at the wrist. The design is good for all wash fabrics, cloth, woolens, velvet or corduroy.

Cut in four sizes; three, four, five and six years. It requires three and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a five-year size.

1363—Ladies' Costume, with sleeve in either of two lengths, with or without over back, with two styles of collar, and waist fronts. It may be made with a flaring or a low rolled collar. The fronts may be shaped in points or in straight outline, and closed at the side, or finished with a rever. The skirt is cut circular and with four gores.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1347—Child's Coat with yoke, and sleeve with shirring or with cuff finish. This style was attractively developed in white gabardine, with pipings of black satin. It would also develop well in sand colored gabardine, taffeta, black satin, broadcloth, pique, serge or poplin.

Cut in four sizes; one, two, four and six years. It requires two and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size.

1375—Ladies' Dress with sleeve in either of two lengths and with eight-gored skirt. As here shown white taffeta was used, with black and white striped silk for trimming. In voile, crepe, lawn, gingham or ratine, this style would be equally smart.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires eight yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

Poultry Farming for Women

a dish for hens to eat? (3) How late would you advise me to set eggs for hatching?

A.—Use Dalmatian or some other good insect powder on the hens themselves, three nights in succession. Then skip three nights, powder one night, and repeat one night for two weeks. Paint the nest boxes, roosts and fixtures with sheep dip or any creosote mixture. If you want chickens for table use, you can hatch until the end of September, but for laying hens, chicks should be hatched before the 15th of May.

B. H.—Nearly all the chickens I raised last year are affected with scurvy on feet and legs. Their legs are about twice their natural size and sore to the touch.

A.—The birds have scaly leg. Soak their shanks and feet in warm soapy water, to soften the hard skin, then scrub with a soft brush, wipe on a clean rag, and while still moist, rub with carbolic vaseline or sulphur ointment.

P. M. B.—I have a hen that cannot walk. The trouble seems to be in the right joint. The leg slants out from the body and is stiff. When she lifts her foot the toes drop limply.

A.—The bird has cramp and rheumatism. Rub with a mixture of turpentine and sweet oil, or a salve made of lard and pepper.

H. D. H.—My goslings do fine until a month old. They are all right one minute and the next they are kicking and yelling. Some live three or four days and die at once. They have a large yard with plenty of grass, shade, grit and fresh water. I don't feed them. They roost on a dry board floor. From forty eggs, thirty-eight goslings hatched. I have ten left.

A.—Goslings must have some feed, even if they are in a large yard. Ground oats and wheat bran, made into a mash, should be fed, about a tablespoonful to each gosling night and morning, after they are two days old, for two weeks; then double the quantity. Read answer to A. D. S.

P. R. S.—My chickens stand around as though they were cold and do not eat much, mope around a couple of days and die. I opened one, and there seemed to be a skin covering its heart. It was full of water of a yellow color. Its liver and other parts looked all right. A couple of weeks ago I killed a rooster and his heart was twice the size it should have been. It also had a skin around it. We have just had a cold, wet spell.

A.—Probably the chickens did suffer from the continued damp weather. The condition of the roosters' and chicks' hearts shows an abnormal condition of the individual birds, but not a symptom of any special disease.

B. I. G.—I have a lot of nice geese and ducks. After they are two or three weeks old they can't walk and die in a short time. The ducks' eyes seem to stick shut. They eat and drink good, have free range, clean water and mother hens with them. I have fed them chick-feed, scraps from the table and cottage cheese, twice a day and corn-meal at noon.

A.—Corn-meal and table scraps are not good for little ducklings and goslings. Read answers to H. D. H. and A. D. S.

L. R.—Sometime ago I noticed one of my hens with her crop full as it could be. I cut her crop open; it was full of food which had soured and had an offensive odor. Another hen took the same disease. The last one that took it is still laying. Would the eggs be fit to use?

A.—Lime, paint-skins, and such irritating materials often cause inflammation of the crop. Empty the crop as much as possible. See answer to L. M. S. and follow treatment advised. It will not, however, affect eggs laid before the hen was sick, as it is not a constitutional disease.

HER MOMENT

By Juliette Augusta Parnson

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

MOLLIE MARTIN was sulking. She herself would have admitted that she was bored. She would have said that a houseful of people who insisted on playing bridge through the whole evening, when there was moonlight and a whispering summer night breeze and the ripple of running water outdoors, was a stupid thing. And she was right. Nevertheless, Mollie was sulking.

Weldon had been making love to her through practically the whole month of her stay at his brother's house. And when you know that the Weldon house was the only house on a five-acre island in the middle of the St. Lawrence river, and that the people who made up the party were not too many and were nice, understanding people who rowed and fished and bathed and flirted, each after his own manner in these things, and generally minded their own business, you can see that Weldon's opportunities were plenty.

Mollie had liked him the very moment when Sarah Cummings, her school chum who had married the elder Weldon brother, had introduced him. From the beginning she had had her suspicions that Sallie had designs upon the two of them. She had resented that a little. But it was not easy to hold the resentment in the face of his big shy devotion.

Several times he had gotten to the point where it seemed that she could not keep him from seizing her in his arms and declaring his love. He was just that uncomfortable, direct sort of person. You could see just what he was going to do. He did not care who saw. And it was very hard to keep him from doing it. But Mollie had succeeded in evading the crisis.

She had never fallen in love before. And, what was more, she did not expect ever to fall in love again. And she knew that if she were once caught in those arms of his the process of falling in love would be past. It was a creepy, delicious period that she wanted to taste to the very last of its sweetness.

Now on this last night of her stay he had taken to play bridge and to flirt—yes, positively flirt—with the Carton girl! It was true that she had been out on the river the whole afternoon with Jim Dayton, while Weldon mooned about the house alone. But what business was that of Weldon, she argued. She was not engaged to him. He had no rights.

So, I say, Mollie was sulking in a dark corner of the veranda that leaned right out over the rush of the Gallou rapids where from the beginning of things they had been trying to tear away the rocks of the north side of the island.

She saw Weldon come out on to the veranda. He looked very fine and big and strong as he stood there under the light, looking about eagerly—for her. She rose and slipped deeper into the shadows as he started toward her. He came straight to her, though it was hardly possible that he saw her. Then, the moment he did see her surely, she felt the difference in him. His step was the hungry, hunting step, nothing would stop him or hold him back. She knew that her time of falling in love was over. The next moment she would be swaying in his arms, in love.

She was standing facing away from him out over the water. She felt herself caught almost roughly in one of his great arms, while the other stole around her neck and lifted up her chin so that his big brown head came over her shoulder and his lips caught hers and held them. She could not resist, and she found, and gloried in it, that she had no wish to resist. The kiss, her first kiss, the startling, unknown ecstasy of it, thrilled down into her throat where the blood from her heart came leaping up to meet it and to send it tingling through her whole being. She stood swaying happily for a moment, her great moment, the moment of love's awakening, the moment that never comes again.

He had not spoken. He was taking everything for granted. Suddenly she remembered that he was yet to be castigated. She stiffened in his arms and began to push him away.

"Mr. Dayton!" She stormed in a fine fury. "How could you dare!"

Weldon's arms dropped as though they had been struck by iron bars. His face went white as his linen. A shiver ran through all his length. Then he pulled himself up sharply and said grimly:

"Dayton? You wanted Dayton? I'll send him to you." He turned on his heel and was gone.

Mollie knew that she had taken—and given a love kiss. No man or woman, however inexperienced, could mistake it for anything else. And she had sent the man she loved away believing that she had intended it for another man! She had thought that he would stay and quarrel a little. She had forgotten Tom Weldon's direct, unflinching ways with men and women.

She had thrown away her heart's desire for a whim. She raged out over the swirling waters of the north channel and tore viciously at the palms of her hands. The sullen, rushing water challenged her. It was a big murderous thing. In her desperation she wanted to fight it, battle to death with it.

She turned and ran down the steps of the veranda and through the dark toward the head of the island where the canoes lay drawn up on the shingle. Picking the lightest one she shoved it into the water and in a moment was paddling and whirling madly in the surge of the water.

In good daylight a man who is prepared to swim ashore may, by shooting his canoe from left to right and back constantly, climb the successive white rollers and come safely through the rapids. Probably he will lose his canoe, but he need not drown. For a woman to make the attempt in an evening dress is—barring miracles—plain suicide. Mollie had no thought of drowning. She was in a towering, mad rage with herself and all the world, and she struck wickedly with the paddle at the churning waters.

As she shot and whirled down toward the veranda where they had been, a man was standing there. He had seen her and was tearing off his coat.

It was Weldon. He had come back! Why? Then she forgot to wonder. She had slackened her paddle one instant, and the first roller caught the canoe playfully and turned it over on top of her.

For ages she fought and clawed her way back to the surface, to air. Her lower limbs, swaddled in the folds of her gown were so much dead weight. She was not yet afraid, she still fought angrily.

When she breathed and saw a little again the canoe was running swiftly beside her. Foolishly she grasped it, and the next roller picked it up and dropped it deftly back upon her. This time she did not fight. She struggled weakly back to the air and as she feebly shook the water from her face a voice that was all earth and heaven to her said; almost at her elbow:

"Stay up, darling, and leave the canoe alone. I'll have you in a second."

He grasped her hand and keeping well away from her, fixed it into the band of his shirt.

"Don't cling, please, dear. Just stay up and—duck for this roller, quick!"

Together they went through the roller and came out, gasping but sure in his strength. He struck out quickly, she holding his neckband and paddling meekly with the other hand, and in a moment he was floundering to his feet in the shallow water of the eddy at the foot of the island.

When she knew that he was standing firm, she reached up her other arm around his neck and confessed to his ear:

"I knew it was you, Tom, dear; all the time."

He caught her and kissed her again and again, and again, until her chilled blood ran warm. And, Lo! her moment, her great moment came back to her.

Sisters, you to whom I failed to reply with a letter, please consider this as an answer, as I received quite a number of letters and have not time to answer all. Am sorry I cannot write to each. Best wishes to all,

MISS AGNES PIERCE.

UPPER MATTOLE, CAL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

In the March number of COMFORT I read two letters from sisters that wanted to know about homesteads, and as my husband and I are living on a homestead in Humboldt County I thought I would write and tell them through COMFORT about our homestead, and others near us.

We have one hundred and sixty acres of land, which lies in the southern part of Humboldt. The land is not all level, but slopes in one direction. One cannot expect level land in the country. The water supply is fine; there are springs and brooks on the place, and the land can be irrigated very easily.

The soil is good and will raise almost anything with a little cultivation. We have all kinds of berries and fruit trees planted on our place and they are doing fine.

Tan bark is another good export. On every homestead there is more or less tan bark and one can always receive a good price for it. Besides the tan bark trees there are a great many pine trees, which are used for many things.

One good thing about a homestead and in the country, you get all your wood and water free, where in the city the coal and water would amount to a good deal. You can raise all your vegetables, and can them for winter use. My mother always cans enough fruit and vegetables to last until there are fresh fruits and vegetables the following year. If you were in the city there would be the cost of buying your fruit, vegetables and meat. Out here one can most always have fresh meat, and it does not cost a great deal to get it either.

Of course there are not so many amusements, and entertainments as in the cities, but here we have the good old-fashioned country dances during the fall and winter (the rest of the time we are all too busy to dance) where everyone goes and meets all their neighbors, and has an enjoyable time, either dancing or playing games. Everyone comes to one of these parties before dark and does not go home until midnight or later. The parties are given at the neighbors' houses. Each neighbor gives a party until everyone in the neighborhood has had a party at their home. These are given about once in two weeks.

I am five feet eight inches tall, a blonde, wear glasses, and am nineteen years old. Have been married one and one half years to the dearest William and have one brother and sister. My brother is at home with my father and mother, and my sister is a school teacher. She is away from home now, teaching.

In our house we have three rooms; a living-room, bedroom and have a kitchen and dining-room combined. We are very comfortable and cozy though and would not exchange our little house for any large one.

I belong to the COMFORT League of Cousins, and enjoy the letters and Uncle Charlie's answers very much.

If any of the sisters would like to hear more about the homesteads around here I will try to answer all letters received.

Best wishes to Uncle Charlie, Mr. Gannett, Mrs. Wilkinson and dear old COMFORT.

Your COMFORT sister, MRS. WM. K. D. REYNOLDS.

MONTANA.

DEAR SISTERS:

Will you move over a little and let two girls in your circle? We are twins, eighteen years old, and orphans, but we still have our home in this wide, wide world. Mother was taken from us two years ago and father several months after.

We live in the country, but we speak of the city every day. Do the sisters think it would be all right for us to go to the city to live?

We have fifty head of cattle and twenty-four head of horses so you see it keeps us busy looking after them.

We are five miles from the nearest neighbor. We go to dances. Do you think it is wrong?

We can do any kind of work, indoors or out of doors and have muscles like a man and are healthy and strong.

We have no relatives, so we don't know of whom to ask questions but the dear COMFORT.

With best wishes to COMFORT and sisters,

MISSES DOROTHY AND NANCY.

Dorothy and Nancy. To protect you from possible trouble I have witheld your name and address. The world is full of unscrupulous people who would not hesitate to take advantage of your unprotected state, and still I want you to have the benefit of the sisters' advice. You didn't really ask mine, but that doesn't matter for people seldom wait to be asked for advice but administer it gratuitously and I am no exception so here's mine—stay where you are. Don't think because I am no longer young that I am trying to deprive you of pleasure but if you could compare your lot with that of many, many girls who work in the city, you would understand better, and the contrast would make you appreciate your country home more than ever. There you are practically your own boss and you need not worry about being discharged or laid off during a dull season. With the right management your farm and stock should yield you more than the starvation wages so many girls work for and even if your nearest neighbor is five miles away, you never can experience the loneliness a girl can feel in a crowded city where the people are too busy to know or care. Greater than all other blessings, you have good health—due largely to your outdoor life—and that alone is enough to make hundreds of tired, sickly city girls envy you,—girls grown old long before their time from hard work in factory or store and in ill health because the wages paid them will not permit of enough nourishing food, if clothing and other incidentals are to be considered. To be sure, there are exceptions and lots of girls make good, but it is a gamble with very few chances of winning.

You would enjoy an occasional trip to the city perhaps, but I wouldn't advise you to go for any length of time without relatives or friends, whom you could trust, to help you. You gave me very little idea of your home life, but if you will take up some particular study, music or reading, for spare time, you will find that it will help you in more ways than one. As to dancing—that depends, but I feel safe in assuming that you would not go to any that were not all right.

You have my sympathy in the loss of your parents; otherwise, if you keep your head, I do not think you need pity but if at any time I can be of assistance I hope you will not hesitate to come to me, by letter, which you may rest assured will be given full consideration.—Ed.

OGEMA, R. R. 2, WIS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have never seen any letters from this part of Wisconsin, so may I enter your dear, friendly circle?

Ogema is just a small town with a population of about five hundred. The farmers here grow mostly potatoes, oats and corn. Only a few have silos. They have a Farmers' Union, which is a good thing, as the farmers ship their products together and get better prices then they would in Ogema. They send for flour and other products and get them much cheaper.

I have taken COMFORT for only two years, but I am already very fond of it.

I have two bright boys, one is two years and eight months old, the other one is just one year old. Dear little precious gifts from God, how I love them. I will try to do the best I can for them, so that when God sees fit to take His gifts back, I can give an account of the way I have taken care of them.

How many of you mothers are keeping a diary for your children? I do, and don't you think that they would like to have some references from their childhood? I am sure they would, especially in cases where the mother dies, so that they have no other remembrance of her. Would they not prize that book above everything where they in their imagination can go back to their childhood and live over again, all the happy times with their fond and loving mother. I also write down in their books, how much they add to my happiness and how dearly I love them, telling them that my dearest wish is to see them grow up to be good, honest men. I have also one of the best Johns. We have been married four years and three months. I am twenty-six years old, weigh one hundred and fifty-five pounds, and I am five feet five inches tall.

Was born in Sweden, where my parents still are living. Was only seventeen when my sister and I came over to this country, to try our luck. I worked as a servant girl until I got married. I wonder how many of you sisters, have come to this country without understanding one word of English, to work for your living. If some of you have, you know it is no pleasure at first. The families certainly take advantage of those "green ones" too. At least, most of them do. The hardest of work, for the smallest of wages. I know now that I would not stay one month where I stayed nine, when I first came. Had to get down on my knees and scrub the kitchen floor on Sunday forenoon or afternoon, if I did not get time to do it in the morning. I was "green" and didn't know any better. And with the children making fun of me, for not understanding, and homesick besides, you can imagine how happy I felt. There was more than one night at first that I cried myself to sleep. Sometimes yet I get lonesome for home, but if we ever get the money to spare we are going to take a trip over there. It certainly does not look very promising at present, as ours seems to be a from hand-to-mouth business.

We have tried both the city and country, and are just renting a house here as we have no land, and my husband is working in the woods. His home is here. We have been trying to buy some land, but it's hard without the money. It is the money that rules this world. Wish some of the sisters could tell of some good place where a man could get a good job and make good.

Well, this is getting rather tiresome for you, I presume, so I better close. Maybe I won't even be admitted, but I know that Mrs. Wilkinson has a good heart.

A Lullaby

"Sleep little baby of mine
Night and the darkness is near,
But Jesus looks down through the shadows that frown,
And baby has nothing to fear,
Shut little sleepy, blue eyes,
Dear little head be at rest,
Jesus, like you, was a baby once too,
And slept on His own mother's breast,
Lullaby, lullaby, sleep my baby sleep."

I hope to hear from some of you. With love to you all,

MRS. JOHN E. CARLSON.

Edna's Secret Marriage

By Charles Garvice

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Weston, old and wealthy, knowing he has but a few days to live, sends for Richard Burdon, his lawyer. Remembering a debt he owes Charles More, he revokes a will in favor of a younger brother's child and makes a new one, disposing of the lives and hearts of two, and leaves it for Mr. Burdon to carry out his bequests. The banker is found dead the next morning. Sixteen years later Sir Cyril More with wealth squandered and no aim in life, finds himself at Lucerne, Switzerland, where he meets Edna Weston, who has only Aunt Martha. Edna inquires of Sir Cyril if he knows Richard Burdon. Her father, on his death-bed charges her to go to him the first of the following September. Edna and her aunt board at the Pension, a Swiss boarding house and Sir Cyril leaves the Grand for the Pension Petre, where he gives his name to Edna and her aunt as Harold Payne. Seated in an arbor Cyril hears voices and recognizes Mr. Howley Jones, who admits being a chum of Cyril More, who has completely gone to the dogs, squandering all his money on Glitters. Edna listens and questions if he knows Sir Cyril and is it all true? He admits he has heard of him. Later Cyril meets Miss Glitters and requests her not to tell he is there. Passing on he sees Edna who has witnessed his greeting with Glitters.

A few days later, Aunt Martha, Edna, Sir Cyril and others go by train to the top of the Rigi. Returning, Cyril and Edna decide to walk down. A mist, preventing them from following the path, envelops them, and rather than have him leave her to find the path, she would rather die, Cyril clasps her in his arms, and she admits her love and promises to marry him. Without telling their secret, they go to a little Protestant church four hours' ride from Lucerne and are made one. Returning Edna realizes that Aunt Martha must be told. Coming to the Cathedral Edna recalls she has left her crepe shawl. Leaving her upon the Cathedral steps Cyril returns for it. Miss Glitters comes along and she remembers having seen Edna at the entrance of the Grand Hotel and knows she is waiting for the gentleman with whom she has seen her before. She tells Edna of his broken promises, shows her the face in the locket she wears, begs of her never to see him again and leaves her crushed with grief. Cyril returns and seeing the agony in Edna's face implores her to tell him the cause. She upbraids him for the wrong he has done. Filled with remorse he parts from her. She tries to call him back; it is too late.

Mr. Richard Burdon and Edward More, brother of Sir Cyril More, in legal consultation, learn the contents of John Weston's will and the fortune awaiting Sir Cyril More which Edward More regrets. Aunt Martha and Edna are announced. Previous to Mr. Burdon reading the will to Edna, he explains its purport. —John Weston, grateful to Sir Charles More, who saves him from financial ruin, and desirous to enrich his descendants devises the scheme of disposing of his vast wealth by the marriage of his niece Edna Weston to Sir Cyril More,—the fortune going to either Edna Weston or Sir Cyril More or to both in equal shares on one condition, that they become man and wife, leaving each free to decline or accept, without depriving the other of his or her chance of it. The choice resting with Sir Cyril, Mr. Burdon sends for him. He comes reluctantly not knowing a fortune awaits him or the conditions to which he must comply. Learning them he declines to marry Miss Weston and writes her a letter withdrawing any claim he may have had or may still have to the money accounted for in the deed. Returning to the hotel her aunt cannot understand why Edna takes all so quietly.

THEY parted at the doors of their respective bedrooms, which adjoined each other, and Aunt Martha made haste to dream in real earnest. As she was going off into her first troubled sleep, she fancied she heard something like low, stifled sobbing in the next room and murmured drowsily:

"Poor child! It has been a trying day for her. I've read of people being killed by a too-sudden joy."

Was it the too-sudden joy, or an overwhelming sense of loneliness that opened the floodgates of Edna's tears?

When she woke in the morning from a broken, dreamful slumber, it was with a confused sense of mingled pleasure and pain that was not dispelled when she remembered the events of yesterday. The sleep, short as it had been, had been of service, however, and she came down to breakfast still a little pale, but with a firmer light in her expressive eyes. While they were finishing the meal, a very elaborate one—could the landlord have got an inkling of the new importance of his guests?—Mr. Burdon was announced, and came in full of apologies for his early intrusion.

"But I felt that you had a busy day before you, and that you would perhaps like to see me before you commenced on it," he concluded.

Edna smiled and put her hand upon a coffee cup.

"May I give you a cup?" she asked, and so sweetly that the lawyer, who had breakfasted two hours ago, felt that he could not have refused if she had offered him belladonna. To him she looked more beautiful this morning than yesterday, and while he sipped his coffee and chatted, he could not help groaning inwardly at the insanity of poor Sir Cyril.

"A picture in herself!" he declared to himself over and over again, as he watched her sweet, pensive face, and listened to the soft music of her voice, which gave to her words the slight clipping foreign accent which renders our English so subtly enticing.

"And now," said Mr. Burdon, "let me trouble you with a little business," and he produced a formidable black bag, and proceeded to explain what the French would call "the situation." He did it very well, and very clearly, and in half an hour he had given the young heiress some idea of her possessions. Edna sat speechless, with downcast eyes, Mr. Burdon enjoying, in a quiet way, her amazement.

"The extent of the fortune it is impossible to calculate, but you see it is immense," he concluded, rustling his papers.

"And all this, you say, is mine?" said Edna.

Mr. Burdon nodded.

"And would have been Sir Cyril More's"—she colored faintly at the name—"if—if——"

"He had fulfilled the conditions—that is to say, half of it would have been his."

"The whole of it would have been his if I had refused to comply with the conditions," said Edna, raising her eyes and looking him straight in the face.

Mr. Burdon nodded. He did not quite see the use of going over all the ground again after the exhaustive explanation of yesterday.

There was a moment's silence, then Edna looked up with the same steadfast expression in her eyes.

"Mr. Burdon," she said in a low voice, "I feel that I have no right to all this money; it is not that I undervalue it or that I am careless and indifferent to my uncle's wishes, but because I feel that I am robbing—yes, robbing," she repeated emphatically, "a—another person."

"My dear young lady," began Mr. Burdon, but Edna stopped him by going on a little more hurriedly:

"You know Sir Cyril More, he is a friend of yours; will you—I want you, Mr. Burdon—I want him to have half this money. I want you to offer it to him—to make sure that he takes it!"

In her earnestness the eyes filled with eager tears, the dainty, budlike lips trembled. Mr. Burden stared aghast.

"My dear Miss Weston," he said at last; "you said quite right that I knew Sir Cyril, you do not, or you would not suggest such a thing as this I am afraid you have heard nothing but ill of him"—Edna looked down—"or have judged his character from the few words let slip by Mr. Edward More, who, who—well, who is no friend to his brother. But take it from me, that Sir Cyril More would rather starve—if such a ridiculous misfortune could happen to a British baronet—than take a penny of this money from your hand after declining to comply with the conditions. Yes, I know Sir Cyril More."

Edna's voice trembled.

"Is he so proud?"

"Proud!" repeated Mr. Burdon; "well, yes, all the Mores are and were, but Sir Cyril is something—he is simply indifferent to money—actual money, and he is equixotic in his way of looking at some things—such circumstances as these for instance. The fortune is yours, my dear young lady, and you must keep it, difficult as it may be;" and Mr. Burdon smiled.

Edna looked at him reproachfully.

"I see," she said in a low voice, "you think I am silly—one more question. Suppose"—and her voice trembled—"that there had been something which would have prevented me and made it impossible?"

Mr. Burdon was rather staggered for a moment; Aunt Martha had gone out of the room for something or other. Was this innocent, childlike girl going to make a confession—a confidence? His face grew pale.

"Had there been any such obstacle on your side, and Sir Cyril had professed himself willing to conform to the conditions, then the estate would have been his instead of yours."

Edna's hands clasped and unclasped themselves as they lay white and soft looking in her lap, something, some revelation seemed trembling on her lip; but the impulse to speak passed away, and she leaned back with the air of languid weariness that follows an inner struggle, and Mr. Burdon went on, emphasizing each word:

"But the choice rested with Sir Cyril, and he distinctly and decisively refused to comply with the conditions on his part; therefore, such a question as you have now put is quite beside the issue. The estate is yours."

Edna smiled.

"You will not refuse to convey my offer to Sir Cyril," she said, almost imploringly. "I would do it myself—if I had courage—but you would do it so much better. Tell him—tell him anything, so that he will consent to accept it."

Mr. Burdon smiled.

"Very good. I receive this as your first instruction. I've been a lawyer all my life and been accustomed to do with people who were only too eager to get other people's money; now, here is the novel experience of two persons who seem obstinately bent upon refusing to accept their own. Plan of the estate in Berkshire," he went on, as if anxious to dispose of the subject. "It occurred to me that you would, of course, like a country seat, and might prefer one of your own—I mean already yours—there are several."

Edna put her hand to her head.

"Of course, they have been let during your minority. The lease of one has just expired—last Christmas—and if you fancied the place you could not do better—if I may advise—than keep it as your own residence. It is a beautiful place—I might say a magnificent one if it were not so thoroughly English, situate in the prettiest part of Berkshire. I can show it you on your own map," and he spread out a plan, upon a table, of the Weston estate in that county.

Edna leaned forward and regarded the map with something approaching a smile.

"What is all that red part?" she said.

"All the parts colored red are yours," said Mr. Burdon, with a smile of enjoyment. "A very nice slice, and beautifully chosen. John Weston knew how to buy land as well as everything else. That is the estate I spoke of—exquisitely placed, you see, on a rise above the river; plenty of wood, a very fine view, and for the rest, as complete as a gentleman's seat could be. The last tenant was a man of taste and spared no expense. There is a magnificent avenue of limes—that is it, that dark line, leading up to the house; splendid preserves—I have shot many a brace there in the old time——"

"Perhaps the birds are not all gone yet," put in Edna, quietly.

Mr. Burdon bowed, and looked pleased.

"Well, it is a beautiful place, and I think, considering its nearness to town and other things, as convenient as any you could choose, and there is a good choice there—the place in Yorkshire, one in Scotland— too far that for a regular residence—and the park in Herefordshire."

"Are all those mine?" asked Edna.

"All yours—I hope I may be allowed to show them to you before long; but this Rosedene you could see at once."

Edna thought a moment.

"What is the place painted green?" she asked, laying the tip of a taper forefinger on the sketch of a mansion and land adjoining Rosedene.

"That, of course, is More Park. John Weston bought Rosedene that he might be near his dear friend, Sir Charles More."

"And Sir Cyril lives there?" asked Edna.

"Not just at present," answered Mr. Burdon, with some little hesitation.

"Is it let?" asked Edna, apparently more interested in her neighbor's property than her own.

"No, unfortunately, not; Sir Cyril will not let it."

"Nor live in it?" said Edna, curiously. "Is it not pretty?"

"One of the most beautiful places in England," replied Mr. Burdon, promptly and almost proudly. "In fact," he went on, with apparent reserve, "it is too large for Sir Cyril; he—I do not know that it is worth while endeavoring to conceal from you what you will learn from county gossip in a week—Sir Cyril has been careless in money matters, and cannot afford to keep up the park."

Edna looked dreamily out of the window, and then back to the plan.

"He is poor and proud," she said; "poor, and yet he refused——"

She stopped, with a blush. Poor, but refused to secure a fortune that was to be obtained at the price of sacrificing himself by marrying her!

Mr. Burdon made haste to move the subject to a more pleasant ground.

"Sir Cyril is rather a strange young man—there is no accounting for his actions. He will not let More Park, although he wants the money very badly. It is a beautiful place, and makes Rosedene all the more valuable by its proximity. Perhaps you will fix a day on which I can have the honor of accompanying you on a visit of inspection—if you decided to reside there you would wish it got ready at once?"

Edna thought a moment, looked across at Aunt Martha, who had reentered, and was sitting listening with half-bewildered nervousness.

"This Rosedene is very large, is it not?" asked Edna, with a smile. "What would aunt and I do in it, two women alone in a great English mansion?"

Mr. Burdon thought to himself, looking on the sweet, ingenuous face, "You will not be two women all alone long if some of the male members of your county neighbors can help it." But he said aloud, "It is very easy to overcome that objection; you can ask your friends——"

"I have none," said Edna, shaking her head; "no relation in the world but Aunt Martha."

"I think you will find that you are mistaken," said Mr. Burdon, significantly. "I will wager, my dear Miss Weston, that before a month has passed a horde of relatives, distant and near, will have arisen to claim kinship, and as for friends!" He raised his brows and smiled, adding, "let me name two at least—Mr. and Mrs. Edward More."

Simple Edna didn't know whether he was in earnest or cynical; but she had been deciding while he had been talking.

"I am sure we should like Rosedene, should we not, aunt?"

Aunt Martha, thus appealed to, gave ready assent.

"So I think we will decide to live there at once."

"You will take my word for its advantages," said Mr. Burdon; "very good. Then it only remains for me to make the place fit for you as quickly as possible. You will want a steward and servants——"

At this moment a servant opened the door and announced "Mr. and Mrs. More!" and Mr. Burdon rose with a smile.

"Here are two friends who will be of more assistance to you in these matters than I can be."

CHAPTER XIV.

NEW EXPERIENCES.

As he spoke there entered a tall-looking woman, whose still rather youthful beauty was set off by a Parisian costume of the last autumn fashion, and many of the best approved tinted preparations of the day. Behind her trailing skirts, Mr. Edward More was effectually concealed, but he came forward in time to say good-day and good by to the departing Mr. Burdon.

Mrs. Edward More came forward with hands—fair sevens squeezed into six and a half of Jowett's best—extended, gushingly exclaiming:

"My dear Miss Weston—how glad—how delighted I am to see you! I shall never forgive that horrible bilious headache"—Edward had declared it to be neuralgia yesterday, as Edna very well remembered—"for keeping me from your side yesterday! And this is Mrs. Weston, your dear aunt," ran on the lady, in her most charming manner, turning to poor Aunt Martha and overwhelming her with a most affectionate smile. "How delighted I am to see you both at last! Ah, you can never guess, my dear Edna—I may call you Edna, may I not?—how often we have talked of you"—which was literaly true, for if Edna had guessed that Mrs. Edward More had thought or talked of her once, she would have guessed once too much. "Often and often, Edward—where are you, Edward?—and I have vowed that we would come and see you in that dear—dear—Italy."

"We were in Switzerland," corrected Edna, gently.

"Switzerland, I mean, of course; as if I could forget dear Switzerland—Tell and liberty, and all that! But we never came, did we? No, and I am almost glad we did not, for then I should have missed the delight of welcoming you, for the first time, in dear England—the—garden of the world, you know," and, brought up short for lack of breath, not words, Mrs. Edward More sank into a chair, and delicately wiped her lips, smiling all round.

Edna was glad to take breath, too, and shake hands with Mr. Edward, who, if himself restless and fidgety, was not quite so exhausting as his charming wife.

"And now I have come," continued Mrs. Edward, outstretching her hands again, with the little strip of lace that did duty for a pocket handkerchief held out in one of them, "to place myself at your disposal—absolutely at your disposal. I know what a fearful—what a terrible amount of work you must have, and I mean to help you—don't say a word: it will be of no use; here I am by your side and here I mean to remain while I can be of the slightest use to you. I said to Edward this morning: 'I must go to that dear young creature—nothing shall prevent me!' did I not, Edward?"

Mr. More grunted something like corroboration and resumed pulling the button off his glove.

"And so we ordered the carriage and came. Don't say you are not glad to see me, my dear?"

Edna colored at the direct appeal and made a suitable response, and Mrs. Edward took up the thread.

"Of course, my dear Edna, you and dear Mrs. Weston will come to us for the present, that's settled." It seemed to be so thoroughly that Edna had not courage to venture a refusal. "What will you do about a place after a time——"

"I have decided to live at Rosedene," said Edna, gently.

Mrs. Edward looked overjoyed.

"My dear child, the very place I was about to suggest! We were talking about it last night—were we not, Edward?—and saying how delightful it would be to have you near us—that is, I mean near More Park——"

"I thought—Mr. Burdon told me that no one lived there," said Edna, wonderingly.

Mrs. Edward looked rather confused, but only for a moment.

"No, of course. I meant so near the park, which of course, will not always be empty. Cyril"—with a little hesitation—"Cyril may come back or—or—a hundred things."

Mr. Edward grunted and looked rather annoyed, and his charming wife hastened to gloss over her mistake.

"It is so nice to think that you are near the dear old place, although no one is there. So like a relation; you are a relation, of course!"

"Not that I am aware of," said Edna, doubtfully.

"Oh, yes, indeed you are; I am certain of it," retorted Mrs. Edward, not at all doubtfully. "Well, and you are going to Rosedene, and that's settled. Of course, Mr. Burdon—one of the most charming men I know, now isn't he dear?—will see to getting the place ready."

Edna had time to incline her head, not to speak.

"But, of course, there are hundreds of other things to see to—servants, furniture, horses, carriages—and that reminds me that I told the coachman to keep the carriage at the door, in case—only in case, dear—you would like to go with me and see about a few things—remember, I place myself at your disposal," etc., etc., etc., to such an extent that Edna, utterly unable to stand up against the gushing torrent—gushing in two senses of the word—found herself in her modest little bonnet and jacket, and with Aunt Martha, in Mrs. Edward's neat pony carriage, and out of one large establishment and in another, from carriage builders in Long Acre to Jackson & Graham's, in Oxford Street, and on to Swan & Edgar's, and from thence to half a score of other fashionable shops, before she could find her breath. But through it all she was conscious of the new power that came within her reach; she felt rather than saw the obsequious deference, which almost amounted to awe, with which she was received everywhere, and noticed, almost with amusement, how, at the mere mention of her name in connection with Rosedene, the stateliest of attendants grew round-backed and deferential. It was well—exceedingly well that pounds were to be counted merely as so many pence, for Mrs. Edward More had helped the heiress to spend a few before the day had closed. By the time Mrs. More's ponies had turned their heads toward Richmond, Edna was possessed prospectively of a brougham, a traveling chariot, a barouche, the horses to each of which Mr. Edward had kindly promised to procure for her, a variety of dresses—morning, walking, dinner and evening; a choice collection of millinery, some articles of jewelry—the three latter items including those required by Aunt Martha—and a variety of other things too numerous to mention.

As Mrs. Edward insisted that they should return with her to Richmond that very evening, Edward More had gone on to the hotel to prepare the landlord for Miss Weston's departure, and the carriage was to pick up him and Edna's small talent limited in that direction. Yet here he was, doing the hesitation, the grape-vine, the one-step and other steps too numerous to mention.

"AL FRESCO"

While he had always considered himself light on his feet, dancing with the Moon-lady he scarce seemed to touch the ground. Round and round they spun, galloped, dipped or stepped, each time coming closer to the edge of the bluff, then with a sudden dash and dip, they went over the edge!

Ordinarily this would have been a calamity! But it seemed quite natural now, and when they landed, Fletcher found they were sailing on the bosom of the lake in a circular affair. Meletta was reclining opposite him in a restful pose, as if she enjoyed the rest after the strenuous dance.

Their odd ship gently swung over the little waves of the lake which glinted with moonbeams.

"What are we sailing in?" queried Fletcher after a bit.

"Why, in a Japanese umbrella, of course! What else do people go sailing in?" the Moon-lady replied.

It did seem the thing to go sailing about in, that night, and Fletcher looking cautiously about, saw that they were indeed, in a large Japanese umbrella, of striking design, and what he formerly thought was a mast, was in reality the long ebony handle with a gay tassel waving in the breeze.

"Well, it seems natural enough, somehow," he remarked. "It seems quite like the three men of Gotham who went to sea in a bowl. How gentle the lake is, and it surely is queer that the waves do not wet one," and he smiled as a big, whitecapped breaker dashed over the side of the umbrella and broke without doing any damage or causing discomfort.

"I thought you'd like to sail about a bit," the Moon-lady went on. "That's why I danced over the cliff with you."

"It was thoughtful of you, Miss White, and I appreciate it. I didn't think you cared for me at all, but tonight you have changed wonderfully, from a cold image to a warm-hearted girl who has set my heart to dancing. Do you really like me?"

"Why, of course, though under other circumstances, I wouldn't admit it. But really, did you ever show me that you cared for me? Haven't you been lax? Did you ever attempt to play the gallant, the lover? No, you did not, and I am woman enough to know that men prefer to do their own wooing. Isn't that correct?"

"Yes, to a certain degree. But I criticize you for not unbending a little. Now, tonight, when you sat in the pavillion, you spoke so unusually kind, that you quite made me love you. In fact, I then decided that I would seek the first opportunity of finding out whether there was any chance for me, and if I could win you, for after years of bachelorhood, I find that love is very sweet, and were I to win you, my happiness would be complete. May I tell you now that I love you, Miss White?"

"Haven't you done so already?" she asked with a mocking little laugh, which, somehow, seemed just the encouragement he wanted.

He leaned forward and clasped the Moon-lady in his arms, for though she came from the moon, and had the personality of Miss St. Venus, he knew her to be Meletta White, and he loved her. He sought to kiss her lips, as she laughingly, teasingly evaded him, with an artless coquetry for he knew she would surrender in the end. And then, then—just as she lay in his arms, and he was to take the struggled-for kiss——

A sudden terrific racket like the crashing of the welkin about his ears, resounded. The umbrella disappeared, it seemed to sink, the Moon-lady flew from his arms, up, up, toward the sky, somehow his clothes flew about him, and he opened his eyes.

The sky was gray, the stars were pale. He was leaning against someone with dusky golden hair. He looked about bewilderingly. He was completely dressed; the scene looked like the road near Canyon Park; a big automobile with its glaring arcs stood motionless on the drive. Out across the lake a streak of dawn showed.

Now he looked up into the eyes of the lady against whom he rested. Why, it was the Moon-lady, but the personality of Miss St. Venus was gone—it was Meletta in her own beautiful self.

"Ye gods, what has happened? Miss White, you—I—the Moon-lady—did you enjoy the voyage in the Japanese umbrella?"

The girl looked up in terror. "Oh, Jasper, he's raving," she cried.

The sound of her voice brought Fletcher to his senses.

"Good heaven! Don't mind what I just said, Miss White. It was simply the after effects of a dream!"

"Are you hurt?" she asked with tender concern.

He roused up. There was a sharp pain down the whole of his leg. He got to his feet unsteadily, then keeled over into Jasper White's arms, for he could not stand up.

"What has happened?" he managed to gasp out.

The men helped him into the automobile, gave him some water, and when he was comfortably installed, they started away. His senses were his own now, fully.

"Please tell me what has happened, Miss White?" he begged again.

"We were returning from Mrs. Browne-Ludlow's, when we turned into the road at Canyon Park. Though the morning was graying, we still kept our electric lamps burning. As we came down the road, we noted you—though we didn't know it was you—walking along the road. Brother honked, but you kept steadily on. We supposed you heard our signal and we continued on, when suddenly, without any warning, you stepped in front of the car and were struck. Imagine our amazement when we found out who it was! I'm awfully sorry that it occurred."

"I'm not," thought Fletcher, but he didn't say so. Instead, he said: "It is just what I deserved. if I don't know any better than to go to sleep in the open and start doing somnambulistic stunts, I must take the consequences. Gracious, what a dream I had! Canyon Park, you, Miss St. Venus, Japanese lanterns, moonlight and program ads. were all mixed up in a heavenly hash! It was some glorious nightmare. I'll tell you about it later."

The car was flying along like Jehu, and reached the Whites' home in an incredibly short time. Jasper jumped out on the run to phone for a doctor who was there shortly after Fletcher had been helped to his room.

Fletcher thanked them for their kindness, but Jasper said he was doing what he was merely to mitigate the damages which he felt sure Fletcher would be awarded in case he decided to sue!

There were no bones broken, but there were several severe scratches, bruises and a damaged ankle. The Whites insisted that Fletcher must stay with them until he was entirely recovered, and Fletcher did not demur at all, for somehow Meletta's actions seemed a continuation of the Moon-lady's delightful ways, though not quite so free.

It was not long before he could walk about with the assistance of a cane, and so he decided to learn his fate, the first opportunity that afforded. This would not be hard to find, as it was his custom to sit out upon the lawn with Meletta, in the evening. Their home was on the lake also, just outside the city limits. It was a beautiful place, and tonight it seemed unusually so, for the air was filled with the scents of summer, and the little waves sobbed on the beach where the lawn ended.

They were sitting out there in the dark, Fletcher and Meletta. The girl was a dusky white silouette before him.

"I mean to tell you all about that dream, Meletta," he began, using her Christian name as he often did of late, "for," as he said, "being for the present as one of the family, it seemed more natural to do so."

And so he did, telling it in a merry little way, until he came to the part where he told the Moon-lady who looked like Miss St. Venus but whom he knew was her own dear self, that he loved her. Then he stopped.

"Well, what did she say?" queried Meletta quietly.

Fletcher's heart fell with a thud. Meletta was getting conventional again.

"Come, now, Meletta," he begged, "are you displeased? Listen to the outcome, and don't speak of it so coldly. Why, of course, the Moon-lady looked upon my proposal with favor. Won't you listen favorably also? You know why I am telling you all this. It is to let you know that I love you. that I've loved you for a long time, and that that love only needed to be awakened. My heart is gone; it is in your possession. Can you, won't you give me any encouragement?"

He caught her hand which was lying loosely in her lap. and held it in both his own. He tried to pierce the darkness and see the effect of his words.

She let him hold the hand he had captured, and then in a voice, so demure, so encouraging, so electric, she said:

"In the dream, what did I allow you to do?"

"You—you let me kiss you."

"Oh," and he didn't know whether she was shocked or pleased or what. But in a moment she said, with a merry little note in her voice: "Well, convention doesn't sanction a display of affection, but—but——" her other hand closed over his. "Suppose we pretend that this is still the dream?"

much. We take COMFORT and like to read it.

We have a large family. I got a pony, it isn't a Shetland either. We have eight cows and get lots of milk and butter. We have fourteen horses, a dog and six cats. I have a piano, but can't play. We play cards at night, our favorite game is pinochle. I went to town and had my pitcher took last week, they ain't very good, am going to keep them though. I would like to see this in print. Will close hoping Billy the Goat won't criticize too much.

Your niece, SUSIE BROWN.

P. S. Uncle Charlie, will you write a poem about Washington? We read your poem about Texas and liked it very much.

Susie, I am awfully sorry to hear that you had your pitcher took, or rather taken. I was playing baseball once and the pitcher threw a ball through a window, then the policeman came and arrested the pitcher. That was another occasion on which we had our pitcher took. I knew a lady who married a baseball player. He was the pitcher of the team. One day a very fascinating dame came along and wiggled her left optic at the ball tosser. He did not wait for the female submarine to fire a torpedo at him before he hauled down his flag, threw up his hands and surrendered. That's where another pitcher got "took". Now I want to tell you, Susie, you are taking a lot of chances when you go to town with a pitcher. It's ten to one if a cop happens to flash his lamps on that pitcher, he'll conclude that you are toting around a gallon of old Kentucky, or a barrel of Budweiser. That's where you are liable to get your "pitcher" took again. If I were you when I went to town the next time, I'd take a chain and padlock, and hitch myself up to the pitcher, and then you won't get your "pitcher" taken quite so easily. The Goat says he thinks you mean picture and not pitcher. Of course that alters things entirely. However, I don't see how you are going to keep your pictures, if as you inform us you have already had them took. Now for that rhyme.

There was a girl in Washington,
Lived all day on half a bun,
Broke and hungry as you may suppose;
But soon she made a heap of "mon"
In the wilds of Washington
Washing tons of clothes.

I hope that will hold you for a while Susie.

WEST GRAHAM, VA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

May I ask you to do what I regard as a great favor to not only me but the whole U. S. by publishing in the COMFORT paper your opinion of card playing in and around the home. I have a right to believe that you are against it, judging by your previous articles. I have talked to several members of the church about it, but you see they can't afford to say anything very strong against it for fear they are playing themselves or have friends who play. But will say I'm bitterly opposed to it. Had a young man say to me not long ago that two thirds of the United States were practising card playing and this included church members and the "best of folks." Now Uncle, I have three young children and I am very anxious for them to reach maturity in a pure and natural state of mind and heart. But I think if they are taught such degrading games as Set back, poker, I doubt it, etc., that they'll never reach the goal. Please give me and the world light on this subject. I shall await the next number of COMFORT with great anxiety. Don't disappoint me for the sake of my home and children, also of thousands of others. Please omit my name as I wish to keep peace in the home and community.

Yours respectful niece, ANXIOUS.

Some years have elapsed since I discussed card playing and I won't apologize for returning to the subject, as new members are constantly coming into our family and old questions have to be threshed over for their benefit. There are lots of people who regard cards, dancing, the theater and a number of other things which broader minded people see no harm in whatsoever, as inventions of the devil. I won't say that the person who sees danger in cards is narrow-minded, and the person who thinks cards all right is broad minded, for it just all depends on the way you look at it. It depends on the point of view. Cards in themselves are innocent enough things they are just slips of paper and they help to while away spare hours very pleasantly and some people have a lot of spare time, alas I have none. The fact that some people use cards to gamble with is of course to be regretted, but we can't blame the cards any more than we can blame a horse because people will bet on it in a race. If we are to abolish cards then abolish horses. Abolish baseball, too, for people bet on our national game. For one person who bets on a game of cards there are several thousand who don't. Shall we stop card playing because some people make boobs of themselves? Shall we stop the pleasure of millions to save a few crack brained ginks from their folly and stupidity? Personally I never cared for cards. If I spent an evening with friends and someone suggested cards, I went into the game only as a matter of courtesy, and I've only played in one game in my life where money was involved. When I was visiting and card games were going on, I always preferred to get a book and sneak off to an easy chair, or seek out some congenial soul and exchange ideas with him or her. Cards always seemed to me a dreadful waste of time, an excellent pastime for people who find time hanging heavily on their hands. Time never hung so heavily on my hands that I wanted to find a vehicle for killing it. Conversation with intellectual people and plenty of good music, that is my idea of spending a social evening but that's only my idea. Because cards don't interest me, I'm not going to start out and deprive other people of the enjoyment they get out of them, and because a few boobs find in cards an excuse for gambling or neglecting other and more important matters is no reason why those who enjoy a quiet rubber of whist and find enjoyment in displaying their skill in the manipulation of painted pieces of cardboard should be robbed of that pleasure, and I do not think anyone has any right to interfere with them unless they start gambling. Gambling, I believe, in any form is prohibited by law, and the law should be enforced to stop it. In these nerve racking days people want, and will have relaxation, change, entertainment and amusement. These things are as absolutely necessary as are food and raiment, and without recreation most of us would become morbid and go crazy. The fact that some people can get along without cards proves nothing. Some people find a morbid delight in getting along without anything and foolishly think they are pleasing God by talking in whispers and acting as though life were one long funeral at which they were the chief mourners. We must be careful how we interfere with the liberty and enjoyment of other people. Tens of thousands of people would close up the theaters, if they could, and the Bible is the only book some would allow to be read. Now did you ever stop to consider what difference there is between a theater and a novel by one of our best authors. In a story by Dickens you read what the various characters say and do. On the stage you do not read what they do, but you see them do it. The characters come to life. There is no more harm in a good play than there is in a good book. The theater where good plays are acted is just as necessary to the social health of the community as many a church, and a good play is of far more moral value than a good sermon—it goes deeper and reaches more people. It is a good thing to remove temptation from anybody's way, but it is a finer thing still to have character strong enough to resist temptation. If I were a minister I should never mention hell and the devil, I should never tell people they couldn't play cards, shouldn't dance or go to a theater. What I should do is this: I should try to interest them in the great big facts of the universe, the great big, fundamental principles of life. I should try to broaden their vision so that life would take on a wholly and entirely new aspect. I should try to build up and reinforce their characters to such an extent that even the smallest act they did would seem to have a noble purpose back of it. I should say: "Play cards if you want to, but after I've talked to you for a few months I think whenever you and your friends meet at one another's homes you will find so much more delight and satisfaction in living in the enjoyment of one another's intellects, that cards will seem stupid and trivial. You won't want to kill time, you will want to hoard it and save it as a miser hoards gold." There are various ways of obtaining the ends one seeks without starting a campaign of repression—antagonizing and making enemies of everyone. Those kinds of methods simply make people more determined to have their own way. None of the card games, except the gambling games, is degrading. In the winter evenings, when I was a child and we got tired of reading, checkers, chess and other games, we played cards and got lots of enjoyment out of them. If I had children I don't think I would give them cards, as cards merely amuse, they do not educate or get us anywhere, and I always like to think that no matter what I do I'm being helped as well as amused. If I were in your place dear friend, I wouldn't take this card question quite so seriously. There are so many much more serious things to be considered, and you don't know how much good you might do if you were to get all the members of your church together and submit to them some of the scores of letters I get from your fine old state, letters from people who have not enough clothes to send their children to school or to church presentably clad, and there are other people who have sickness in the family and can't pay for medical attendance or provide proper nourishment. There are thousands of illiterate people in your state and all other states who need education and there are thousands of children being worked for profit that ought to be in school. There is a dead level of mediocrity everywhere. There are tens of thousands of peo-

COMFORT Home Prizes Paid
300 Pictures to be Published

My Dear Friends:

The splendid results of our "COMFORT Home Prize Contest" have far exceeded my expectations.

As stated in our May number, my purpose in offering the fourteen cash prizes ranging from one to fifteen dollars was to obtain photographs of homes of our subscribers from which to select a series, representing all the States, to be reproduced in COMFORT.

The pictures and descriptions sent in were much more numerous and averaged better than I had looked for and included so many really excellent ones that I have retained

Over 300 of the Best Pictures and Descriptions for Publication

These are many more than I had intended to use and would make too long a series to run in COMFORT, so I shall publish them all in book form under title of and shall give it as a subscription club premium in order that all our readers who wish may obtain a copy free.

I am doing this at the suggestion and urgent request of some of our subscribers who express their belief that there will be a very large demand for such a unique and extremely interesting book containing over 300 pictures of homes and many pictures of the owners with their families and pet animals, and describing how they live in city, town and on the farm in every section of the country, representing the luxuriant farm mansion, the sod house of the western homesteader, the hospitable home of the southern planter, the log cabin of the Michigan pioneer, the California bungalow, the ranch house of the owner of a princely domain of 3,500 acres in Colorado, the modern city dwelling and even the houseboat home of a family that live and make their living on the water, and in fact all kinds and conditions of homes.

COMFORT subscribers in every walk of life are of the busy, active, energetic, wide-awake, progressive class that constitutes the backbone of the nation and their descriptions of how they have carved their own fortunes in the world, built up their homes and acquired and improved their properties tell the story of the marvelous conquest of the wilderness, development of the country and up-building of the nation during the last quarter of a century.

Some of these pictures and descriptions will also be printed in COMFORT from month to month as I have promised, beginning with the coming November issue which will be a special Home Number and contain several pages of the home pictures and descriptions.

I have awarded and paid the fourteen prizes which I offered, and besides I have given eight special prizes that I did not offer or promise. The following are

The homes of these 22 prize-winners and of 300 or more others, to whom I have paid $1.00 each for the privilege, will be pictured and described in the "COMFORT Home Album" which I shall publish in book form as soon as possible for a COMFORT subscription club premium, and a considerable number of them will also appear in November COMFORT, which latter will give you some idea of how very interesting, entertaining and instructive the Home Album will be.

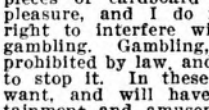
I was intensely interested in this contest and have given it my personal attention all through; I have carefully considered every picture and description that has come in.

The contestants entered were so numerous that, although I gave the matter my entire time, it took me over two weeks after the contest closed to examine and compare the pictures.

Awarding the prizes has been a difficult task, for there were so many excellent pictures of very attractive homes that it was hard to choose. I have tried to judge them fairly according to my own standard of attractiveness which rates mere size and costliness as not the most precious factors of the home.

I am proud of the thrift and neatness of the homes of our subscribers as shown by the pictures they sent me; they were better than I expected and I kept more of them than I had intended, and I would have retained still more if there had been room for them in my proposed Album, as there was scarcely one that did not possess attractive features worthy of commendation. So I hope that those whose pictures I could not use will understand that my returning them is no disparagement of their cozy homes.

I thank you all for your kind interest and hearty cooperation in this undertaking which I believe will be helpful in its results.



Sincerely your friend,

W. H. GANNETT.

A Thorn Among Roses

By Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

Copyright, 1898 and 1899 by Street and Smith. Serial rights by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

THE MISSING LINK.

Probably all our readers have noticed that an important link in the chain of events that make up the plot of this story was missing. The accident to Alice Weston, which resulted in the happy discovery that she is the real and only daughter of Mr. Fletcher, is referred to in chapter twenty as though it had been already described although there is no previous mention of it in the narrative. A considerable number of our readers have written us calling our attention to this omission; but we had already discovered it. It was not our fault. We bought the serial right of Mrs Sheldon's publishers who own the copyright, and we printed the story just as it was furnished us by them. We wrote them for the missing part but did not receive it in time to print it in its proper place, which should have been at the end of chapter nineteen. So we print it here, better late than never, as follows:

A PAINFUL ACCIDENT.

We now take the reader back to the closing scene of the trial in the courtroom.

The judge then dismissed the case, adding his regrets that circumstantial evidence had caught Mr. Fletcher in its grip, and finished his brief address by declaring that there was not a stain on the defendant's character.

The excitement was so intense that few heard his words. All that Alice knew was that Mr. Fletcher was free, and there was sublime elation in her heart as the crowd surged about her.

One other thing she knew—that Will had come in and pushing his way through the mass was at her side holding her hand and looking down into her eyes with a gaze that spoke his pride and his love.

But the strain on her nerves had been very great and she felt physically tired. In something of a daze she was borne forward to the exit doors.

Then occurred one of those mishaps, little in themselves, but which have sometimes changed history; a mishap that was destined to have wonderful results for her. A painful accident, yet it was to bring great joy.

On the steps of the court she slipped and unable to regain her balance by reason of the pressing crowd which had now separated her from Will, she stumbled to the sidewalk with a little cry.

Will shouted a warning to "Keep back!" and bent to raise the girl, while Mr. Fletcher strove to clear a space around her. But when Alice essayed to rise a deadly nausea overcame her and she fainted.

Tenderly she was carried to an adjoining room, where they revived the fainting girl.

But it was evident that Alice was still suffering acutely, and she moaned: "My ankle! My ankle!"

With businesslike promptness Will whipped out a knife and slashed the silken stocking; then with gentle but firm fingers he began to massage the creamy flesh.

"A sprain, but not a bad one," he said pleasantly. "You feel easier now, don't you, dear?"

She smiled—a little ruefully but still brave. "Much easier, thank you," she answered. "Now if you could possibly carry me to a carriage ——"

"Of course we will, my darling," broke in Will impulsively. "We'll have you home in a trice." And he rushed away to clear the entrance of the curious people who still lingered, and to see after the carriage.

"I'm so, so sorry to make such a fuss," said Alice, looking up into Mr. Fletcher's face with a child's expression of contrition.

But Mr. Fletcher was not looking at her face. His eyes were fixed unbelievingly on the bared ankle. On the inside of the ankle joint was a tattooed cross!

What memories that mark in India ink revived in his mind! It took him back to the time when he had tattooed that identical mark on the tiny ankles of his own babe long, long ago.

"Excuse me for asking, my child," he began huskily, the words coming with an effort. "But—that mark on your ankle! Is there—is there one on the other ankle also?"

"Indeed yes," she answered smiling. "It's curious, isn't it? But I don't worry about it, for you know the fashions haven't yet decreed that a lady's ankles shall be shown in public. But why do you ask?"

"It's—it's a strange coincidence," he stammered. "I'll tell you about it—some time."

By this time Will had returned, and Alice, feeling greatly relieved, was borne to the carriage where Buxton was waiting with the reins in his hands.

CHAPTER XXII.

CONCLUSION.

ON his arrival at Beechcote, Mr. Fletcher found Alice even more comfortable than when he left her a few hours previous, and sitting up, although her foot was still badly swollen and too lame to admit of her moving about. She greeted him with a flush and a strangely fluttering heart, for she had not forgotten his caress of the morning and was still wondering what had prompted him to bestow it. He sat down beside her and inquired if she felt able to listen to a somewhat lengthy, but very interesting story. She looked considerably surprised at the question, but said she was perfectly able and would like to hear it.

"You will remember that you thought it strange I should ask you this morning if you had another mark on your right ankle like the one on the left, and I told you I would explain the matter to you later," Mr. Fletcher began.

"Yes," Alice assented, and at once gave him her earnest attention. Then the gentleman proceeded to tell her the story of his life, of his marriage to Judge Ashburton's daughter, of his being ordered to Italy shortly afterward, and where a little girl had been born to him, how, a little later, his wife had become a hopeless invalid, and this trial was followed by one even greater in his being called to another country, whereupon he had determined to send his child to her grandfather in America. He described how, moved by some unaccountable impulse, he had pricked a small cross into the tender flesh of each ankle of his little one before consigning her to strangers to make the long voyage across the ocean. Then he went on, taking up, point by point, every circumstance connected with the thrilling tale until all was told, while Alice and his other listeners sat spellbound throughout the recital.

The wondering girl grew very pale and grave as she listened, and every now and then she raised her eyes and swept her mother's face with an anxious glance.

When, at length, Mr. Fletcher concluded, she tremulously remarked:

"And am I really that little child who was born in Italy?"

"There cannot be the slightest doubt about the matter; it has been proved beyond dispute," Mr. Fletcher replied.

"Mamma, it does not seem possible! I cannot realize it!" Alice exclaimed, as she turned to her mother and yearningly searched the dear face, which bore the stain of many a tear that had fallen during the revelation just concluded.

"I do not wonder, dear," the woman replied, meeting her look and trying to smile bravely, "but the story is all true, and, since the time had come when it must be told, I am proud and happy to find the revelation so propitious for you."

The girl's eyes filled and for a moment she could not control her voice to speak.

Then she turned with a frank and charming smile to Mr. Fletcher.

"Yes," she said, "and I, too, am proud and happy to know that you are my father. Now I can understand."

"Well, dear, what can you understand?" he eagerly inquired, as she suddenly paused and flushed.

"I can understand why I have experienced such peculiar sensations. I have sometimes felt the same thrill of my whole being when listening to impressive music, whenever I have met you," Alice explained, and her father exulted to know how thoroughly her heart acknowledged the tie of kinship between them. "But," she continued, with trembling lips and an appealing look into his eyes, "mamma must still be mamma and May my sister."

"By all means; I would not have it otherwise," Mr. Fletcher earnestly responded, while both May and her mother were utterly overcome by this evidence of love for and loyalty to them; "they have indeed been mother and sister to you, and I would not have the slightest cloud mar the relationship."

The whole party then fell to chatting socially, and the hours flew swiftly by, until it was nearly time for dinner at Castleview, when Mr. Fletcher arose to take his leave, but promised to come again on the following day.

Will accompanied him, and they dined by themselves, Olive sending word that she had a headache and did not feel able to come down, and when the meal was over Mr. Fletcher retired, feeling as if he had lived a month in that one day, so many and varied had been the events that had been crowded into it.

The next morning he led Olive to the library, directly after breakfast, and kindly and gently rehearsed to her all that we already know, remarking that he felt it would be wrong to leave her in ignorance of the facts. The girl was stricken dumb—almost paralyzed, in fact,—at first, but as the story was unfolded more and more, she bowed her face upon her hands and sat cringing and shivering until it was concluded.

"My dear child," Mr. Fletcher said, tenderly, when all was told, "do not be so overcome, and I hope you will not feel that my affection for you will wane because of this discovery, or that our attitude toward each other will be changed, and you shall be as tenderly shielded and cared for in the future as in the past. We have too long known and loved each other as parent and child to admit of any break in the relationship. But, of course, my own child must hereafter share our home and substance and be acknowledged as my daughter before the world. I sincerely hope, dear, that you will receive Alice in a sisterly spirit, and that we shall continue to be a peaceful and happy household."

He was wholly unprepared for the reception which his kindness and gentle sympathy met with.

Olive bridled like a serpent suddenly surprised and aroused to strike its deadly blow.

"Then I am no longer Miss Fletcher, of Castleview," she exclaimed, sitting erect and facing her father with blazing eyes.

"Certainly, Olive, you shall retain the name if you desire," he said, in a soothing tone.

"But I am no longer to be regarded as the heiress of Castleview," she persisted.

"Not the sole heiress, of course, Olive, but I have too long looked upon you as my child not to wish you to still be so regarded, if that is also your wish; and you shall share with Alice all that I have. Your grandfather will, no doubt, also feel the same," Mr. Fletcher gravely returned, but with a pang of disappointment in view of her selfishness.

"How about my mother? Oh, I cannot make it seem real that auntie is my mother!" the girl interposed, passionately. "Will she remain here with me? Will all this dreadful story have to be sown broadcast?"

"Not necessarily, but I hardly think that Mrs. Ingraham will feel disposed to remain at Castleview after the revelations of today," he concluded, stating the fact as inoffensively as possible.

Olive understood him and threw back her head with an angry air. She looked a veritable little fury, just ready to explode in a torrent of jealous wrath and hatred.

"When will that girl come here?" she demanded through her tightly locked teeth.

"Olive! to whom do you refer?" questioned Mr. Fletcher, coldly.

"That Weston girl, of course."

"My daughter, I am deeply pained and displeased that you should manifest such a spirit of resentment and so little sympathy with me in my joy that my lost one is found," returned Mr. Fletcher, with a regretful sigh, but with some sternness. Then he aded: "But I shall bring Alice to Castleview just as soon as she is able and willing to come."

"Then let me tell you that she and I can never live under the same roof," Olive burst forth, in a white heat of passion. "I hate her! She has been a marplot and an eyesore to me from the first moment of our meeting. She has mesmerized you. She has wormed herself into grandpapa's affections. She has stolen Will's love. She has ruined my life, and I will never live in the same house with her. I wish I need not live in the same world with her."

With these bitter, malicious words, she started to her feet, darted past her father and out of the room before the astonished man could fully comprehend all that her wildly uttered sentences were intended to convey.

Even when he did realize their full import, his kind heart tried to make excuses for her, for he could well understand that the hitherto petted girl must be keenly sensitive to the great change which the recent discoveries would make in her life, while he sincerely grieved over her hopeless attachment for Will.

But he hoped that time would soften the blow and everything become harmonious after a while.

A few days passed, and Judge Ashburton was once more perfectly well and able to go out, and his first act was to repair to Beechcote and literally take to his heart the girl he had grown to love, and claim her as his granddaughter, the child of his lost Alice. Imogen had also improved, but she still remained in her room. Olive had had an interview with her, and a stormy one it proved to be, for the girl had expressed herself in no tame or limited terms regarding her agency in the humiliating romance of her life.

Mr. Fletcher was only awaiting a few necessary preparations before bringing Alice to Castleview.

Already he had given the main facts regarding her relationship to and her early separation from him to the public, although he had carefully refrained from having anything published that would wound Olive; he did not even state that there had been an exchange of children, but that Alice had been stolen from him during infancy, and Imogen's agency in the affair was also withheld.

Of course, there was a great sensation for a time and much curiosity manifested regarding details, but these were courteously met and evaded, and then the world settled down and went on as before, while Miss Alice Weston Fletcher was most warmly welcomed, as the daughter of her distinguished father, by the circle which had hitherto ignored her existence.

One afternoon, about a week after the trial, Judge Ashburton sought Imogen in her room, for she still secluded herself, as did Olive also, much of the time.

"I have come, Imogen," he began, "to talk with you about your future. Of course, under existing circumstances, it will not be agreeable to you to remain at Castleview. I have a proposition to make to you. It is that you return to the United States and I will settle upon you an annuity that will enable you to live comfortably, during the remainder of your life; this to take effect immediately and upon the condition that you never again meddle in this household in any shape or fashion."

"And Olive; what is to become of her?" the woman questioned, in a stifled voice and white to her lips.

"That remains for Olive herself to decide," said the judge, and losing a shade of his own color. "I am bound to confess that I am greatly disappointed in Olive of late; she does not manifest a good spirit. If she chose to do right, Roland will be only too glad to still regard her as his daughter and be the kind and gentle father that he has ever been, while I shall not forget that for more than twenty years I have loved her as the child of my lost Alice."

"Oh! I cannot give her up," moaned Imogen, "I cannot be separated from her."

"Of course, I can understand that such a separation would be hard for you," her companion replied, in a kinder tone than he had yet used. "But Olive's interests must be considered. Roland has done everything possible to make matters smooth and easy for you both. Olive, having been reared as the child of the house, can retain her position if she wishes, and will conduct herself as a good daughter should; and if you are a true mother you will advise her to do so and not stand in her light in any way. What do you say to my proposition?"

"I suppose I have no alternative but to accept it," said Imogen, wearily. "I have nothing, and no one to care for me, and so I am obliged to take what I can get."

Judge Ashburton was sorry for her, for she seemed wretched beyond expression, but at the same time he could not fail to observe that she did not appear to be burdened or to utter one word of regret for the great wrong of which she had been guilty.

"Very well, then, I will settle a thousand dollars a year upon you, and that will give you a very comfortable living," he said, as he drew a folded paper from one of his pockets.

"A thousand dollars a year!" the woman repeated, while she glanced yearningly around upon the evidence of luxury all about her. The judge colored at the slighting tone and greedy look. He was ashamed for her; for her selfishness, her heartlessness, and the ingratitude which closed her lips to the slightest expression of appreciation of the fact that her whole future had been most generously provided for.

"I trust you will see the wisdom of acting at once upon my suggestions," he coldly observed, as he arose to go, "I will leave this paper for you to look over; it states clearly the terms of the agreement, and I shall hope to receive your decision by tomorrow."

The moment the door closed after him Imogen tore open the paper he had given her and read it through with frowning brow and tightly compressed lips.

Then she rang her bell and ordered the maid to send Miss Olive to her.

What passed between them was never known by the other members of the household, but, a little later, Olive sought an interview with her father and grandfather and informed them that she had decided to go with her mother for the present. She was somewhat subdued in manner and language while she talked with them, and, while both gentlemen were pained by the coldness she manifested and the selfisness which evidently governed her decision, they finally agreed that it might be best for all concerned for her to accompany Imogen.

They made her a handsome allowance—a provision with which she appeared to be greatly satisfied, although she, like Imogen, uttered no word of grateful acknowledgment.

The next morning both left Castleview, going to London, whence, the following week, they sailed for America, while it was announced among the society items of a local paper that Mrs. Ingraham's physician had advised a sea voyage and a rest and change, and Miss Olive Fletcher was to be her traveling companion during her absence. Immediately after this exodus, the family at Beechcote removed to Castleview, Mr. Fletcher having insisted that Mrs. Weston and May should become his guests until the marriage of Alice, the date, at his request, having been set for three months later than had at first been proposed, in order to give time to prepare a proper trousseau and enable him to give a fitting wedding to the future Lady of Leith.

When Lady Marchmont was informed of all the wonderful things that had happened, her astonishment was only exceeded by her delight.

"Will, my dear boy," she said, with shining eyes, "I was already prepared to receive your lovely bride most cordially, and love her with all my heart, for her own sweet sake, but I must confess that I am very, very happy to have you marry the daughter of the distinguished Roland Fletcher."

The wedding at Castleview, three months later, was a very brilliant affair, and, although Mr. Fletcher sighed over the thought of parting with his recently recovered treasure, he gave her with his heartiest blessing to the dear boy whom, for many years, he had loved as a son.

The bride was munificently dowered by both her father and her grandfather, and Lady Marchmont presented her with an array of diamonds which a princess might have envied. May was

This man is growing bald. "Crystolis" is just the thing for such cases.

Here's good news at last for men and women whose hair is falling, who are growing bald and gray, whose scalps are covered with dandruff that nothing seems to keep away and whose heads itch like mad.

Good news even for those who imagine themselves hopelessly and incurably bald or who suffer from hair or scalp trouble of any kind.

We have secured the sole American rights for the wonderful new hair remedy, Crystolis, that in Europe has been called the most wonderful discovery of the century, having been awarded Gold Medals at the big Paris and Brussels Expositions.

Already since securing the American rights hundreds of men and women have written us to tell of phenomenal results obtained by its use. People who have been bald for years tell how they now glory in their beautiful hair. Others who have had dandruff all their lives say they have now a clean, healthy scalp and that hair stopped falling after a few applications of this wonderful new treatment.

We don't care whether you are bothered with falling hair, prematurely gray hair, matted hair or stringy hair; dandruff, itching scalp, or any or all forms of hair trouble, we want you to try "CRYSTOLIS" at our risk.

We give you a binding guarantee without any "strings" or red tape, that it won't cost you a cent if we do not prove to you that "Crystolis" will do all we claim for it, and what's important, we have plenty of money to back our guarantee. $1000 has been deposited in our Bank as a Special Fund to be forfeited should we fail to comply with this guarantee. DISEASED COW.—I have a cow that wouldn't eat last spring and began to fail in giving milk. When the weather changes she gets stiff and swells in her joints; around the tops of her hoofs are cracks. Her ankle joints are swollen and appear to be hard and feverish. A sore formed on her hip. I lanced it and it discharged freely. It hasn't healed and is still running. The cow is in pain. She runs with the herd, but none have taken it. E. C. P.

A.—Kill the cow at once as she is in an incurable condition, suffering and a menace to the other animals of the herd. In all probability you will find that she is badly diseased with tuberculosis when you open her, or if that disease is absent we suspect that internal tumors or abscesses are present.

GROWTHS IN TEATS.—What is the matter with my cow? She has her first calf. The second morning the milk was caked on the end of one front teat. I pulled it off and that night we could hardly get any milk. I ran a hairpin up it to start the milk, and it is harder to milk each time. (2) I have two calves that suddenly got so they can't suckle at all. They don't lose their appetite, and seem as hungry as ever. They grit their teeth and lick out tongue. I. R. S.

A.—Growths in the teats cause the obstruction and bleeding. If they are close to the tips of the teat they may possibly be rimmed out with a small, sharp scalpel, or removed by means of a special instrument used by veterinarians. If you cannot get at the growths in this way dry off the milk flow in that quarter, as infection will be likely to cause an abscess and spoiling of the udder if you continue the present treatment. (2) Examine the mouth for foreign bodies or ulcers which will have to be removed or treated. Without an examination we are unable to say just what is wrong.

LAMENESS.—I have a five-year-old gelding which appears sound and healthy. He has had three attacks of what I call rheumatism but one of my neighbors says he has worms. His coat is shiny and he eats good. About the first of April in the spring of 1913 and 1915 he had an attack of stiffness in the shoulders lasting two weeks. With these attacks he sweats easily. He cannot climb up a little bank, run or trot. When I turn him out in the correll he will lie flat on his side for half a day, having hard work to get up. I feed him mixed wild hay and Timothy and two quarts of oats three times a day. I drive him on a stage, thirty miles each trip Tuesdays and Saturdays. F. M. S.

A.—The symptoms indicate founder, in the feet rather than in the shoulders. If founder is present the fore feet will be stuck out in front of the body and hind ones advanced well under the body when the horse starts to walk. If that is so we should clip the hair from the hoof-heads of both fore feet and blister them, one at a time, with a mixture of two drams each of powdered Spanish fly and biniodide of mercury rubbed up in three ounces of lard. Repeat the blister in two weeks. To do the work you mention a horse should have four quarts of oats three times a day, adding one ninth part of wheat bran by weight. Cut down the grain during idleness. For worms mix in the feed night and morning for a week, a tablespoonful of a mixture of equal parts of salt, sulphur and copperas, by weight; then skip ten days and repeat. Omit iron for a pregnant mare and increase salt and sulphur.

INFECTED NAVEL.—I had a young calf that would not nurse on first day. Then for four days he appeared all right. The following morning the left front leg above the knee was soft and swollen and he could not stand on that foot. Later in the morning he breathed quickly and died about noon. What was wrong and was there a cure? MRS. N. P. M.

A.—The calf died of pyemia or pus poisoning (absorption) from infection of the navel at birth and consequent formation of abscesses in the joints. This would be sure to prove fatal, but might easily have been prevented by saturating the stump of the navel at birth with tincture of iodine and then applying slaked lime twice daily. Do this with all new-born animals.

LUMPS.—I have a mare eight years old. In the morning she was in the pasture and all right. At noon when I went after her she had soft knots on her joints. D. F.

A.—Change to grass feed probably caused urticaria or nettlerash which is akin to hives of children. It is not serious and soon disappears when the new feed is stopped. Also bathe the affected parts with a lotion of one ounce of baking soda to a quart of soft water as often as found necessary. The horse may be given a light dose of physic.

SORE TEATS.—What is the trouble with my cow? Last August her teats broke out in large blisters. In about twenty-four hours they burst and left them in a solid sore. I used different remedies and they healed. They have broken again. It is hard to milk her. The milk is yellow and lumpy. She is a good Jersey and ten years old. MRS. A. L. F.

A.—Bathe the udder twice daily with a solution of one ounce of granular hyposulphite of soda and one quart of water and then apply freely a mixture of equal quantities of bay rum and glycerine. If any spot is obstinate in healing swab it with tincture of iodine every other day and once daily paint it with glycerite of tannin. Isolate the cow and milk her last.

BLACK TONGUE.—I have lost four dogs with the same trouble. They become lame in their legs and their tongues appear to be sore, and they can't eat food or drink water and die in four or five days. I feed them such food as I eat myself and they stay indoors sometimes. H. W.

A.—This no doubt is the deadly disease of dogs known as "black tongue" in the Southern states and for which no cause or cure has been found. Keep dogs from eating carrion or garbage of any kind. See that they do not range at night. Keep all food utensils perfectly clean and sweet. If the trouble starts swab the mouth twice daily with a saturated solution of boric acid and try the effects of salol in five grain doses every four hours.

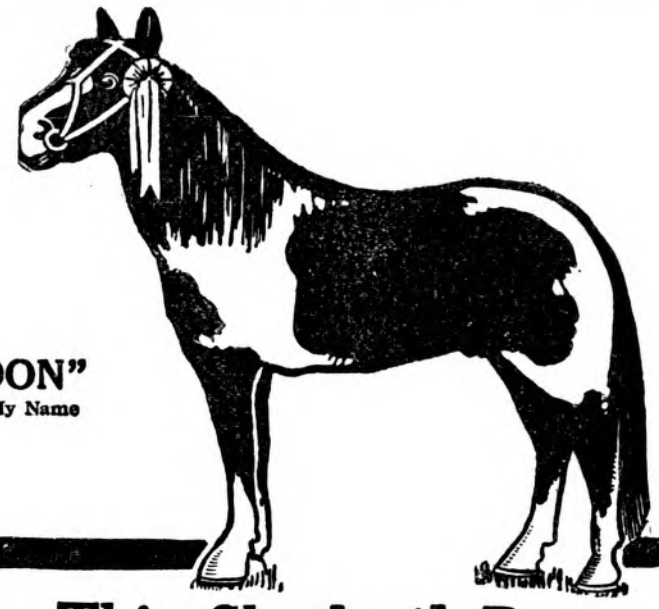
TUMOR.—I have a young heifer two and one half years old. She has a hard round lump, under the skin on her left jaw. It is flattened on two sides and does not appear to be fast on the bone. It does not discharge and isn't sore to the touch. Can the lump be cut out, or can a medicine be given, in the feed, that would cure it? She will eat clothing of any kind and old felt boots if she can get where they are. Is the milk safe for household use? MISS J. M. B.

A.—Lump jaw apparently is coming on and the lump should be removed by a trained surgeon. If you cannot have that done swab the lump with tincture of iodine every other day. Iodide of potash in dram doses twice daily is effective for lump jaw, but it dries off milk flow, causes great emaciation, may cause abortion and is an expensive remedy. The heifer needs more mixed feeds. Give her wheat bran freely and she will be less liable to show a depraved appetite. The milk is safe for use.

ECZEMA.—I have a rabbit that has sore ears. He has great scabs. Is it contagious? D. D. B.

A.—Cleanse the ears with peroxide of hydrogen and then apply an ointment of one dram each of sulphur and compound tincture of benzoin to the ounce of lard. Isolate affected rabbits.

SICK CALF.—I have a fine heifer calf four months old. One morning she appeared weak and shivery, as though cold and wouldn't eat. I thought the calf had been poisoned and gave her a dose of Japanese oil. She appeared better, but the next morning her eyes were swollen and the white of them red. The calf seems weak, dragging her hind feet when walking. F. M. B.



A.—The calf should have had a full dose of Castor oil, two or three ounces, shaken up in milk as it was evident that it had indigestion or stoppage of the bowels. The physic in such a case might be followed with a dose of whiskey and ginger in coffee three times a day.

CURB.—My three-year-old mare has a curb that makes her go lame when trotting. (2) Also a mule that has a hard collar boil on the point of the shoulders. W. C. F.

A.—Clip the hair from the part and blister twice, at intervals of three or four weeks, with a mixture of two drams each of powdered Spanish fly and biniodide of mercury rubbed up in three ounces of lard. (2) Have the tumor cut out if it is a hard lump, or badly swelling. Otherwise paint it with tincture of iodine each other day and twice daily apply a little carbolated vaseline, if the mule has to be worked.

ENLARGED KNEE.—I have a cow that has had a large lump on her knee for several years. It is hard and will spoil the sale of the cow. It doesn't appear to hurt her any. MRS. S. C. M.

A.—The enlargement is of such long standing that it has become organized and there is no remedy.

Cubby Bear's Picnic

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

BUSY BEAVER came to little Cubby Bear one afternoon and said, "I want a picnic!"

"A picnic?" asked Cubby Bear. "I don't think I quite know what a picnic is! Where will you get one?"

"Why," Busy Beaver explained, "you find a nice, shady place, and ask your friends to come, and everyone brings something nice to eat, and you play games, and——"

"Oh, I see," said Cubby Bear, "a picnic is something like a party! That will be great fun! May I go to your picnic? And may I bring my cousin, Bonniebelle Bear? And will you ask Shinyblack Crow?"

"Yes, I want you all," answered Busy Beaver. "You must help me plan. We will ask Brother Binny Beaver, Molly Muskrat, Bunny Rabbit and his Baby Bunnies, Chirpy Chipmunk——"

"Yes, and Redtop Woodpecker, and I think Squilly Porcupine would like to come. Brownie Whippoorwill does not like the bright sun, so he would not come—he likes the quiet night, when there is only the pale moonlight. That is when he sings his song."

"Where will we have the picnic?" asked Busy Beaver. "I stay always by the Big Brook, where my home is. You go about more, so you may know of a good place."

"Oh, I know!" cried Cubby Bear. "Please have it under the little tamarack trees, at the edge of the big pasture! It is a pretty place, and then Kiddie Goat and Little Lambkin could be there."

"Listen!" warned Busy Beaver. "I hear Redtop Woodpecker tapping at a tree. We will tell him about the picnic now, and I think he will ask the people for us."

Redtop Woodpecker kindly flew about to give the invitation and everyone was pleased.

Bonniebelle Bear was visiting her cousin, little Cubby Bear, and was delighted when she heard about the picnic.

"You do such nice things here!" she said. "How glad I am that I came to see you just now! The last time I was here, you had a party. I would like to live here always, if my mamma would come, too!"

So Bonniebelle Bear was at the picnic, sweet and smiley, wearing her gold locket tied round her neck with a blue ribbon. All the others who had been invited were there, too.

Everyone had brought something nice for the picnic dinner, and Mamma Bruin spread it all out temptingly on a big, flat rock. There were blackberries, blueberries, raspberries, a fine collection of bugs and worms, clover-tops, juicy leaves and tender twigs, four large angel cakes and plenty of ice-cream.

"You said we might play games! I love to play," whispered Lillie Lambkin bashfully to Cubby Bear.

"What game shall we play first?" asked Cubby Bear.

"I know the very thing!" cried Wollie Woodchuck, "'Hide the thimble!' Only," he added soberly, "we have no thimble. 'Colors' is a good game, too, but we need a thimble for that!"

"I have my pretty new thimble here in my pocket," Bonniebelle Bear told them. "We will use that. Shall we play 'colors' first?"

Bonniebelle filled the thimble with water, and asked:

"What color am I thinking of?"

"Red," guessed Chirpy Chipmunk.

"White!" said Kiddie Goat, "the color of Lillie Lambkin's pretty wool!"

"Pink!" cried Mollie Muskrat.

Then Bonniebelle tossed the thimbleful of water into Mollie's face, for she had guessed the right color.

How they laughed!

Then Mollie filled the thimble with water, and the game went on.

They played "hide the thimble" next, then "come to supper" and "chase the squirrel."

While all the fun was going on, Cubby Bear's tender little heart was troubled. Foxy Reynard and Woozie Weasel had not been invited, because, as Busy Beaver had said:

"They are not good, they are not polite, and they would be sure to spoil all the good time!"

"I believe," said Cubby Bear to Mamma Bruin, "I believe I should like my dinner better if I took some good things first to Woozie and Foxy."

Mamma Bruin agreed, and cut two large pieces of angel cake, and filled a little pail with ice-cream.

Cubby looked back longingly to where the others were playing. "I do hope I shall not have to go far to find them!" he thought.

He had gone only a little way when suddenly he tripped and fell over a stout piece of wild grape-vine, the ends of which had been tied around two trees a little way from the ground.

He heard loud chuckles, and Foxy Reynard and Woozie Weasel called out, "Ho, Cubby Bear! We can have some fun if we are not invited to picnics!"

Cubby Bear picked himself up, and brushed the dirt from the angel cake. He had hard work to keep from being cross—just for a few minutes. Almost, he would have been glad to throw the pail at Woozie and Foxy—almost, but not quite.

"I'm afraid your fun is not very good fun," he said, "but I am glad I have found you before the ice-cream melts. I was looking for you both, and have brought you some nice angel cake and a pail of ice-cream. I was afraid I might have to hunt for you a long time."

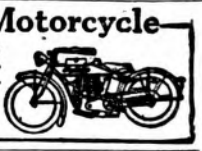
Foxy Reynard and Woozie Weasel could not look at Cubby Bear. They looked at each other, then down at the ground. They were ashamed.

"Thank you," said Foxy. "You are a kind little bear. I am sorry you fell, and hope it did not hurt you. We will take the grape-vine down, so that no one else will fall."

Woozie Weasel was already untying the vine.

"I like ice-cream," was all Woozie said, but he thought, "Cubby Bear is better than I am. He is always doing kind things—that must be why he has so many friends. I have not many friends—I do not try to have!"

Cubby Bear went back to the picnic, and was the gayest of them all!



"Perhaps," he thought, "perhaps Foxy and Woozie would not be so bad if only they had someone to love them!"

NEW EDITION
Uncle Charlie's Story Book
51st Birthday Souvenir

A Beautiful New Edition of Uncle Charlie's Story Book is now offered as a souvenir of his fifty-first birthday which occurred September 25th. This splendid book of 157 pages printed in good, clear type on fine paper, was gotten up by Uncle Charlie regardless of trouble and expense as a worthy memorial of his fiftieth birthday a year ago.

Besides six unique stories, a dramatic sketch and personal memoirs and thrilling incidents of his remarkable life, all from his inspired pen, there are chapters by "Billy the Goat" and Maria which throw interesting side lights on his character and let you into the mysteries of his daily life. Illustrated with new pictures of him and Maria and Billy.

The immense popularity of this book has exhausted the previous editions and this handsome new edition has been printed to meet the continued large demand for it.

This edition is limited, so this may be your last chance to obtain a copy. Every home should have one.

FREE Premium Offer

It is bound in two styles, both handsome and either good enough. One in heavy, fancy opal blue paper covers known as "cloth of gold paper," will be sent post-paid as a free premium for a club of two new subscription to COMFORT at 25 cents each, 50 cents in all, or for your own one-year subscription or renewal at 25 cents and one other 25-cent subscription,—send 50 cents in all.

The other, beautifully bound in lilac silk with stiff covers, will be sent post-paid as a free premium for a club of four subscriptions at 25 cents each, one dollar in all, or for your own one-year subscription or renewal at 25 cents and three other 25-cent subscriptions, —send one dollar in all.

This offer holds good while the supply of books holds out.

Probably this is the last edition that will ever be printed.

BE QUICK and secure a copy while they last.

These are the best and most costly premiums that we give for such size clubs.

Manners and Looks

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

F. Z., Bay City, Texas.—Most engaged girls think it is very nice for them to kiss their beaus after they are engaged, and we have seldom heard any objection to it, especially from the beaus. Sentiment permits it, etiquette permits it and you may kiss your beau, or be kissed by him. But don't make pigs of yourselves, though, come to think of it, we don't believe pigs kiss each other at all, do they?

Twins, Atlanta, Ill.—A lady may go out every night in the week with a different gentleman, if there are so many at her disposal, and be strictly within the bounds of propriety. A girl of nineteen is not too young for a "boy" of 28 or 29, and a widower or bachelor of 45 is not too old if he is intelligent and interesting and not silly over young girls, as men of that age and older too often are. It is the lady's duty to teach the gentleman caller what time to go home, if he doesn't know, or does know and will not use his knowledge.

B. T., New York Mills, Minn.—You say you tried to kiss the school teacher good night after going with her for two weeks, and ask us if we think she loves you. How do we know? You only say you tried to kiss her. Did you succeed? If you did and she did not object, we think you might risk continuing your attentions and by and by win her highest regard. Still, we give no guarantee in such cases.

Wondering, Pleasant, Mo.—When a married couple is leaving after a call on another married couple it is proper and hospitable for the home couple to ask the visitors to call again. Ordinarily the hostess does this and her husband adds his invitation to hers, or not as it happens, and the visiting wife thanks her and says they will be glad to call again, to which the husband may or may not respond, though it is more courteous if he does. It would be extremely rude if the visitors made no response to the invitation, and they could hardly remain silent unless they wished to insult their hostess and host. Of course, there are some people so ignorant of ordinary social usage that they would say nothing in response to such an invitation, but they are scarcely civilized. Callers who are good friends knowing each other well are not so formal as others, but it is always expected that other calls will be made. Naturally, when the visitors are asked to call again they extend an invitation to the others to come and see them. This is the most elementary good manners which everybody ought to know. (2) If a person out in company alone asks another she meets to call, the other must make some reply or it will be a positive breach of good manners. When no reply is intentionally given, it is known as a "snub" and it is not polite in public, nor is it often done, except in very high society, and usually then there is an evasive reply. At a club meeting there is a little more latitude because clubs are often made up of people who are not all of the same social circle, and people are not expected to invite everybody they meet to call. The only etiquette literature COMFORT issues is the Manners and Looks column and if you will read that carefully you will learn a whole lot.

H. O. R., Bradford, O.—Your best plan to get a housekeeper is to advertise in your local newspapers for one, or in the papers of your nearest city. You can put a Want Ad in the Cincinnati Enquirer without cost. But we advise that you get a housekeeper near home, so that if she doesn't suit you you can send her home easy. It's a risky business, this of a lonely widower hiring a housekeeper, because as like as not you'll be wanting to marry her, or she will be wanting to marry you, and the chances for trouble are great. Go almighty slow about it, and be sure you're right before you go at all.

Troubled, Rowlesburg, W. Va.—If you are so unhappy at home with your stepmother and your father is not good to you, why don't you learn stenography, or to do some other work by which you can make your own living, and go out for yourself? But don't go out unprepared for then you will be at the mercy of the world. Thousands of girls are earning their living at all sorts of honest occupations and you can do the same if you will learn to do some kind of work well. The trouble with most working-girls is that they are inefficient or lazy, or both, and they can't, or won't do their work right when they get it to do.

ple all round you, good church members too, who never in their lives felt the thrill of one holy enthusiasm. Oh, if you only knew what I know about your state and all the other states you would find that card playing was a very small issue. They say that life is made up of little things. That is only half true. Life is made up of little things for little people, but when one starts to really live, life is made up of big instead of little things. There is an old saying that if you take care of the pennies, the pounds will take care of themselves, and if all our good ministers, all our church people and all well disposed people whether church goers or not will only tackle the great big problems that press for solution, and press never more acutely than now, all the little petty propositions will take care of themselves. We are great hands at dealing with effects and ignoring causes. I consider card playing an effect. The real cause back of all these troubles, these little human frailties is the lack of proper education for life, the lack of real growth, real development of body, soul and spirit. Get at the causes. One of the first steps towards it, at least in my opinion is to get men and women thinking along right lines, lines that will lead to right action, and right action will lead to woman suffrage and woman suffrage my dear friend, will give you a weapon that will protect your boys from enemies far more serious than little slips of cardboard, enemies such as the saloon and liquor traffic, white slavery, vice, the black plague, industrial slavery, child labor, graft corruption, ignorance and the dollar-a-day wage, so very prevalent in certain sections of our country. As I said before this card playing business all depends on the point of view, and I have given you my point of view fairly and honestly as I can. Those who live another twenty-five years will I think find my point of view isn't far wrong.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a 15-month subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for August

"Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Written references from postmaster or physician must positively accompany all appeals from shut-ins. Appeals unaccompanied by written references will be destroyed.

J. W. Bennett, Jr., Northville, N. Y. Helpless invalid for thirteen years. Great sufferer. No means of support. Highly recommended. Give him a boost. Jennie Spencer, Campbell, R. R. 1, N. C. Great sufferer from rheumatism for over forty years. Unable to work. Parents dead. Send her a dime shower. Well recommended. Fulton R. Lowe, Sheppards, R. R. 1, Box 20, Va. Invalid for thirty years. Lives on milk and crackers and needs money to buy them. Send him some help. Mrs. Lillie M. Kelsick, Sidon, Ark. Badly afflicted with rheumatism. Husband also an invalid. Send them some cheer. Miss Callie D. Barefoot, Four Oaks, R. R. 2, N. C. Shut-in for twenty-seven years. Has spinal trouble and rheumatism. Depends on charity for support. Remember her. James Thorm, Mingo, Miss. Twenty-eight years of age. Shut-in six years. Unable to move even a finger. Poor and needy. Send him some help. Mrs. Minerva Durham, Price, R. R. 2, Box 76, N. C. Mrs. Durham is taking care of three orphans, a boy aged twelve, who is nearly blind, a girl of six and a boy of four. She is poor and would be grateful to anyone who would send clothing for the children. Well recommended. Blanche Simpson, Volga, R. R. 2, W. Va. Invalid. Would like cheery letters and postal cards.

No shut-in can have his or her name published in our mercy list more than once a year, and for that reason you ought to give liberally. Few except at Christmas time, get more than a dollar or two. When that is gone there is a grim disheartening wait for twelve months, possibly longer before any further assistance can be obtained, so once more be generous in your giving, for you are the only friends these poor souls have. Plenty of others give sympathy, but you alone give bread. Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

Celebrate Uncle Charlie's Birthday by Getting a Book of His Poems!

Between now and the 25th of September you will have ample opportunity to get up a club of only four subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each. The only way to get thoroughly acquainted with Uncle Charlie is to have his books in your home, and you have them all without cost to you. Uncle Charlie's Poems is an exquisitely artistic 160-page volume, bound in lilac silk cloth, gold top and autumn leaf-lining. It's a scream from cover to cover, with a few tears dropped in for good measure, also a sketch of the author's life, with splendid half tone pictures. It's a duty you owe the young folks as well as yourself to get this book under the family roof tree. Every copy is autographed by Uncle Charlie's own hand. Work for it today. The young folks will help you.

Uncle Charlie's Songs Are Sung All Around the World.

Uncle Charlie's song book is the musical wonder of the age. It is distinctly novel in its make up. There are no dead ones in this beautiful volume. Every song is a gem; gems for all occasions with beautiful haunting melodies. Get up a club of only two subscriptions to COMFORT at 25c each, and you will get twenty-eight superb songs with full music for voice and piano free. Both books free for a club of six. Work for them today.

manure. This spring they are growing well and full of buds, but now and then I find a branch that wilts and dies, and on examination I find a worm in the stem and some have several eggs. What can I do to stop them? My bushes are set out on the hill system. Is it best to cut off all young shoots that come up between the rows or let them grow?

P. E. W., White, S. Dak.

A.—The cane borer is a rather serious pest of the raspberry. Since the grub works inside the cane, about the only effectual remedy is to cut out the wilted canes and burn them. This will prevent their multiplication. Keep rows open so that plants may be cultivated. It is also much better for picking fruit and giving the patch other necessary care.

WANTS DRIED BEET PULP.—Would you kindly inform me where I can buy dried beet pulp to feed to my stock? F. E., Walkerville, Mich.

A.—Ask your elevator man or local feed dealer to make inquiries of dealers in Detroit. We cannot supply the name and address of a firm near to you but they may be able to do so.

FOR SUCKING COW.—A subscriber advises the following remedy:

Editor COMFORT. Miss D. C. asks for a remedy for sucking cow. Take a cow halter with an iron on it to which I make fast a hard wood stick, three feet long; put a ring in other end of stick through which pass a surcingle and make fast round her body, back of the shoulders. She will not be able to get her head around to suckle; otherwise it will not incommode her. Yours truly, ANNA WALKER.

MOLES AND GOPHERS.—Please tell me how to rid my garden of moles and gophers. They have run under nearly all the peanuts and vegetables I planted, cutting some of them off at the top of the ground and cutting off the roots of others so that they died.

MISS H. F., Jay, Okla.

A.—Gophers can be poisoned with corn soaked in strychnine solution and placed where the vermin will get it. See article relative to destruction of moles in this issue.

Four Wheel Chairs in July

292 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

I am sending out four wheel chairs this month of July, although the total wheel chair subscriptions for the month fall some short of the requisite 800, because I know how these poor cripples suffer who are held prisoners in the house through hot weather for want of wheel chairs. As I have often told you, I do my part a little faster than you do yours. I frequently anticipate the future to some extent,—this month to the extent of 90 subscriptions in order to send out the fourth chair at once. You will appreciate the feeling of sympathy which impels me to do this when you read, below, the description of the sad condition of the recipient of the fourth July chair. I could not bear to make the poor little fellow and his brave mother wait another month for a wheel chair.

The four July wheel chairs go to the following applicants. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their respective friends in their behalf.

Tolie Edith Cramer, R. R. 2, LaFontain, Ind., 204; Vergol Barber, Memphis, Texas, 200; Annie Opal Beck, Dryden, Ky., 96; Elwin Hale, Kingfisher, Okla., 94.

Tolie Edith Cramer is severely affected with spinal trouble believed to have been caused by a fall when she was six years old. She is now seventeen and, although she has been a great sufferer, she has managed to attend school most of the time until last March when she lost the use of her legs and since then has not walked a step. The neighbors took hold and in one week got 204 subscriptions for a COMFORT wheel chair and sent them to me all in one bunch and I ordered the chair shipped at once to Mrs. W. Breckner who was the moving spirit in this good work. The Cramer family had nothing to do with this undertaking; the neighbors did it all with the understanding that it was to be a community chair to be loaned by them to Tolie Cramer so long as she might need it, and if she ceased to need it, it should be passed around for the use of any other person that might need it in that community. I think this an excellent arrangement under the circumstances and might well be adopted in similar cases in which a neighborhood joins to get a wheel chair for an invalid. It would avoid the difficulty which was the cause of a recent complaint to me. In that case the neighbors got the subscriptions to provide a much needed wheel chair for an old lady who died soon after receiving it; they wanted to pass the chair on to another cripple in their community, but the old lady's son, who had refused to help get the chair for his mother, insisted on selling it for his own benefit. I wrote and told him plainly what I thought of him.

Vergol Barber is a little five-year-old boy who is entirely helpless. Mrs. C. O. Jones, who sent the entire 200 subscriptions for his chair all in one club, describes his condition as very pitiful.

Little Annie Beck is ten years old and has never walked, and of course there is no hope that she ever will. Her mother and Ada Beck have sent all the 96 subscriptions for her chair.

Elwin Hale is another little five-year-old sufferer that has never walked and is a hopeless, helpless cripple. His mother has been trying ever since last October to get the requisite subscriptions to obtain a COMFORT wheel chair for him. She wrote me that she was very anxious to get the chair for her little boy before hot weather. I am very glad she comes in line for a chair now.

Here are four cases of child cripples this month, and to me they are unutterably sad.

We have sent out 34 COMFORT wheel chairs in the first seven months of this year, and now let us keep up the good work in spite of the present hot weather. If it is hot to go out and get subscriptions to help the shut-ins just remember how they suffer for want of wheel chairs at this season. We have lots of hard cases on our waiting list, just as sad as the four I have described above, and they all need your help. Don't forget and don't neglect to do what you can for them this coming month of August.

My talk is so long that I have little space left for letters of thanks, but you will be interested in the Roll of Honor which follows.

Sincerely yours,

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some worthy, destitute, crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

Like the COMFORT Wheel Chair for Little Girl It Will Help Mother in Caring for Her

CALHOUN, TEXAS.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

Jessie's wheel chair arrived in good condition and we like it fine. It is a great help to me in taking care of her. We want to thank you and all kind friends who helped us get the chair. Will send you a few more subscriptions when we get them all together.

Very truly yours,
MR. and MRS. JAMES JOHNS.

COMFORT Wheel Chair a Great Pleasure and Help to this Little Crippled Girl

BRADLEY, MISS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Please accept thanks for the nice wheel chair sent me by COMFORT. I also want to thank Mr. Gannett and the many kind friends who helped me to get it. Certainly it is lots of pleasure and help to me.

Your little crippled friend, KATYE SANDERS.

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S HOME LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

A. D., Pennsylvania.—We cannot advise you in the question you submit in relation to the conducting of a testimonal correspondence club.

Mrs. A. E. W., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that if your adoption was a legal one under the judgment or decree of the proper court you would have the same intestate rights by descent from your foster parents' estate as any lawful child would have, and that their estates would go to you in preference to parents, brothers, sisters or their descendants; we think under your laws children may be disinherited by will, and that in this way your foster parents, if they so elect, can bar you from any share in their estates.

R. R., South Carolina.—Under the laws of Georgia, we are of the opinion that a clerk of a court of record under the seal of such court, has power to take acknowledgments to deeds.

M. B., Washington.—Under the laws of Kansas, we are of the opinion that a wife should join in the deed of conveyance of her husband's real estate, but that this is not necessary if at the time of the making of the deed she has never been a resident of the state, unless the land in question is the homestead; but the signature of the children is not necessary to the deed of conveyance of their father's real estate.

Mrs. S. J. H., New Jersey.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a bond and mortgage would be outlawed after the lapse of twenty years from the time of the last evidence of indebtedness.

G. P., Illinois.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the transfer of property from the husband to his wife would be legal and binding as against the claims of children in such husband's estate provided the deed was legally drawn, executed, acknowledged and delivered and provided that at the time the transfer was made the husband possessed mental capacity and no undue influence was exercised upon him.

Mrs. J. C. M., Maryland.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will, and leaving a widow and two children as his only heirs at law and next of kin, his widow would receive dower of a one third interest for life in his real estate and one third of his personal property absolutely, the balance going in equal shares to his children.

N. W., Wisconsin.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, his whole estate, after payment of debts, would go to his widow if one survive him.

Miss F. B. G., Oklahoma.—Under the laws of Nebraska, we are of the opinion that the signature of children is not necessary for the conveyance of good title of real estate belonging to a widower.

Mrs. H. M., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that children of the husband by a former marriage have no interest in the property of their stepmother; we think however, that, in the absence of a will, they would inherit an interest from their father's estate upon his death, and that the father's estate would include such property as the stepmother may have turned over to her husband during his lifetime even though such property may have in the first instance, been the separate property of such stepmother; we think real estate held by the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety upon the death of herself and family while she may reside thereon, does not go into, or form any part of the estate of the one who dies first.

L. W., Tennessee.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man leaving no will and leaving no child or descendant, the widow would receive dower of a one third interest for life in his real estate, and the whole of his personal property after payment of his debts, and in addition thereto the homestead of the value not exceeding one thousand dollars for the use of herself and family while she may reside thereon.

Mrs. J. E. B., California.—Under the laws of Minnesota we are of the opinion that upon the death of an unmarried man, leaving no will, his estate, after payment of debts, would go to his father and mother in equal shares, or, if but one survive, then to such survivor, and if both be dead then in equal shares to his brothers and sisters, the descendants of any such who shall have predeceased him taking their parents' share; we think his undivided interest in a partnership together with any other property he might own at the time of his death would constitute his estate.

Mrs. A. C., Michigan.—Under the laws of your state we think you have a legal right to dispose of your property by will in such a manner as to provide a life estate therein for your husband with the remainder over to your daughter and her son; we think it would be better for you to employ some competent lawyer or other competent person in your locality to draw such will and to attend the signing thereof, as a mistake in this connection might invalidate the whole will.

fifteen pounds; have dark brown hair, blue eyes and fair complexion and am seventeen years old.

This is a small island, but it forms one of the provinces of the Dominion and is one of the most beautiful spots of the world. It is surrounded on the north by the Gulf of St. Lawrence and on the south by the Hillsborough Straits. It is called the "Garden of the Gulf" and sometimes the "Garden of Eden."

We have a good healthy climate with warm summers and medium cold winters. It is a fine farming country. Almost any kind of grains and vegetables grow here. Farming and fishing is the chief industry.

Every year thousands of tourists come from all parts of the United States to spend the summer here. The seashore is lined with summer resorts and hotels.

Charlottetown, the capital city and commercial center of Prince Edwards Island, has a population of twelve thousand; is situated upon a very extensive and perfectly safe harbor, formed by Hillsborough Bay and its three rivers, East, West and South, all emptying into the bay, which affords the best of bathing, fishing and boating. The city is located upon a beautiful hillside, gradually ascending from the water's edge to a height of one hundred and fifty feet above sea level.

Queen Square, located in the center of the city, adds very much to its attractiveness. It is, in fact, a public park or garden with shrubbery and beds of flowering plants artistically laid out and well cared for. Some of the most substantial business blocks are built facing the square. Here we also find the post-office, court house, the Provincial building, and the Market house, which should be visited on a regular market day by every tourist reaching the island.

Wishing Mrs. Wilkinson and sisters many years of happiness to continue their good work,

Your loving sister, MARGARET JANE MACEACHERN.

TO CLEAN FISH EASILY.—Be sure the spine is severed so the fish is dead, but do not cut the head entirely off, remove top fin and split the skin from head to tail along back, then remove small fins and intestines, and split to the tail on lower side; then you can pull the skin from head to tail by holding to large fins adjoining the head. You can also skin a scaley fish the same way. And also, a large fish, if cut in small pieces completely around and not lengthwise of the "grain" will be more flaky and delicate.

FARM LIFE, DEPT. C.F.A. SPENCER, INDIANA

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

MY dears, 'tis the last month of summer left blooming alone, all its summer companions have faded and gone, but August is with us and it can be hot as all of the rest of the summer lot and therefore you needn't put on your heavy clothes for a while yet. You know, the best thing about August is that it is the last month of summer and if you have weathered the other two all right, you are not much afraid of the one left. How has the summer been for all you summer girls? I hope you have had such a good time that when the work time comes around again you'll be glad of the change. Speaking of work reminds me that I have some to do this very minute, so here's to it.

The first letter is from Cousin K. T. of Aransas Pass, Texas, who is only fifteen and a man of thirty wants her to marry him. She is troubled about it and asks my advice. Of course she isn't old enough to marry anybody, but she is old enough to know that a man of thirty ought to have more sense than to ask a girl of fifteen to marry him, and if he hasn't any more sense, she certainly should not marry a man with so little. I suppose there is not one girl in a hundred thousand who marries at fifteen who does not many, many times wish she hadn't Snowflake, Campaign, Tenn.—When a girl cannot trust a man fully, although he makes all sorts of protestations and promises, she should not marry him. Something is wrong with him and it will come out after a while. Don't try to find out if he is true, or not. Let him go. And don't try to convince a man you like him by letting him kiss you. He wants all the girls to like him that way.

M. L. O., Port Lyden, N. Y.—My dear, don't go with any of them at all. You don't know enough to have beaus and you should read books and magazines for a year to learn.

Nicht Wahr, Crawford, Texas.—I want to be as neutral as I can just now, but if your German father insists on your giving up the American you love and marrying a German of your father's choosing, you tell him to go back to Germany where they do things that way and you marry the American and stand by the Star Spangled Banner against all its enemies. Hooray!

Indian Maid, Ook, Texas.—I certainly do think you should go to school some more, even if you don't want to and you quit when you were eighteen. As you can't marry both the men you have promised to marry, don't marry either of them. Go back to school and go quick.

Lucile, Chattanooga, Tenn.—I am not much in favor of girls marrying soldiers unless they know exactly the life they must live and are willing to live that way for the love of the men they marry. Social lines are very strongly drawn in the army and the wife of an enlisted man can never rise above that. We understand the government does not allow marriage of an enlisted man during his term of service, and with good reason, we think.

L. M., Mathiston, Miss.—I am not a fortune-teller, my dear, and can't tell any better what he thinks or what he intends to do than you can. But don't give him up because some other girl is trying to get him away from you.

Brown Eyes, Brownington, Mo.—I am sorry you did not make more effort to go to school. You are a nice girl of good principles and I wish you all joy in marrying this worthy young man you will take by and by. But, my dear, when you have children and they see how you write and spell, they will not be as proud of their mother as they would be if she could teach them to write and spell. Now, as you will not marry for a year or so, suppose you and the young man, instead of making love to each other every evening, take up a course of writing, spelling, grammar and general reading to improve your minds. You won't love each other any less and you will be so much better fitted for the duties of home and of the community in which you live. Try it and see. Organize a night class among the other young men and women of your neighborhood and give a portion of your time to books. I hope other COMFORT cousins will take this subject to heart and do the same in their neighborhoods.

E. T., Upton, Wyo.—When you go with a young man "just to spite" those who don't want you to go with him, both you and he are doing wrong and if you continue with that motive you will do worse. To judge from your letter, you might much better go with a spelling-book and grammar.

Troubled, Remsen, Ia.—Some great men have been red headed and maybe this one who loves you is destined to greatness. Your parents should not object to him merely on account of the color of his hair.

Sad and Lonely, Lancaster, Texas.—Don't worry. You will get over it as you say you think you will. Girls always do at your age. But you were quite right in going to the show without him after you had waited an hour. Goodness knows how many hours you would have to wait meals for him if you married him. Can't you find a prompter sweetheart than he is?

G. A., Hilltop, Minn.—Being a Catholic you cannot marry a divorced man according to your church laws. His becoming a Catholic would make no difference. His former wife being married again I think would make no difference. Anyway, the case is too complicated for me; you and your church must settle it.

Troubled, Clay City, Ind.—I should think that after waiting two years to hear from the young man and he has not cared enough to write, or make any inquiry, you would stop thinking about him and put your mind on one who was not that kind. Why worry about a man who doesn't worry about you?

Reader, Worthington, Minn.—If every girl, who accepts the attentions or the proposal of a man who does not stop to think until after he has lost his temper and acted like a fool or a crazy person, would stop to think before she married him, there would be fewer unhappy marriages in the world. Your young man was that kind and it was all right to break the engagement if you keep it broken. Otherwise you will deserve any unhappiness that may result.

Lonely, Marsh Hill, Pa.—I should think that you wouldn't have much time to be lonesome having the work of nine at home to do, but all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy, and I can understand how home must be dull if your father will not let you go out and meet people. Every young person needs company so much that they will take any kind, good or bad rather than none; so it is the duty of parents to see that they have good company. You will get into bad company sure if you look for it through unknown correspondence. Stop that, now. Did you ever try reading good books for company? There is none better and a young girl who will read and improve her mind will be worth something socially when she is old enough to meet sensible people. Borrow books, if you can't buy them, and try them when you are lonesome. They are ever so much better than silly beaus.

Y. Y. Z., Clark, S. Dak.—Don't bother about the young man who listened to gossip instead of you and doesn't write. "I have never saw anything what I wanted to know." Ask the nearest school teacher what is wrong with it, if you don't know.

M. C., Larimore, N. Dak.—It is too late now to answer questions about graduating dresses and anyway I don't answer fashion questions. As for the beaus you ask about, there's time enough for that after you are out of school.

There, my dears, your questions are answered as far as my answering goes. Some of you insist upon asking me questions which are not for me and I have to send them to other departments of the paper. But you girls with heart troubles, I have answered your questions and the very best thing you can do is to take my advice. You see, I know so much more than you do and that is why I have to scold sometimes to make you learn. Anyway, by, by until we meet again. COUSIN MARION.

amount of luggage on its way home. As it pulled up at the hotel door, with much stamping of hoofs and clanking of bits and curb-chains, Edna, who had been rather listless and weary since they had left the last shop, happened to glance at Aunt Martha's face, and something in its still bewildered expression amused her against her mood.

"Well, aunt," she said, "are you still undecided as to whether it is a dream or not?"

"My dear Edna," replied the old lady, "I'm more confused than ever; nothing that could happen would surprise me, no not if Mrs. More"—that lady was talking to her footman, preparatory to alighting—"not if Mrs. More were to declare that we were going to Richmond in a balloon."

Edna laughed her soft, silvery laugh, and was still smiling as she stepped on to the pavement.

A small crowd of street boys had collected to see the grand carriage, with its powdered livery servants; and, as Edna appeared, a little murmur of admiration rose from the juvenile lips, and caused a tall, stalwart-looking gentleman, who had gone into the road because of the block, to turn his head. As he did so he saw Edna's beautiful face bright for the first time that day, with its smile. He stopped suddenly, as if he had been shot, and looked at her, with his hand thrust into the breast of his coat and his face pale and strained. Then, as Edna disappeared through the doorway, he dropped his head upon his breast, and hurried on, muttering hoarsely:

"Forgotten already! Is it the money? No, poor child! you never loved me, never. All the money in the world could not make me smile. Ah, Edna, Edna, may you be happy!"

He was gone in an instant, and there was no one to tell the great heiress that Sir Cyril More had been within arm's length of her.

The journey to Acacia Lodge, Richmond, was enlivened by Mrs. More, who favored her guests with an account of some of her future neighbors. Edna leaned back and listened—she had a slight headache and felt rather dazed—while Mrs. More ran on like a watch or a clock.

"Of course, the duchess takes the lead—you will be charmed with the duchess, I was!"—if report speaks truly the duchess was anything but charmed with Mrs. More. "The duke's place, Arleigh Castle, is only a drive from Rosedene, and he is almost always there. Then there are Lord and Lady Passington—he is an earl, my dear—Lord Mersey is his eldest son. Now, there, if I might make a suggestion; though they say that he will never marry until he is obliged, and then one of the blue stockings he is always associating with, for her ladyship goes in for social science and all that sort of thing. And then there are the Bromleys—Sir George and his wife and two daughters. I dare say you'll think the baronet a bore, I know I do; but Edward says he is the great authority on agricultural matters, and you might want his advice about the home farm some day or other, so you must put up with him sometimes—and oh, by the way, have you been presented, my dear Edna?"

"Presented! Oh, I beg your pardon!" said poor Edna, awaking from a reverie; "at court, you mean. No; this is my first week in England since I was a child."

"Of course; how stupid of me!" responded Mrs. More. "Well, that must be the first thing. I wonder whether her grace would do it? If she would, your position would be made."

Edna looked frightened, and murmured a modest doubt.

"Well, we shall see!" said Mrs. More, nodding confidently; "if she won't, I suppose I must," with a gracious smile.

Edna expressed her gratitude in suitable terms, and Mrs. More talked on until the carriage bowled through the gates of Acacia Lodge. Mr. More woke up and began grumbling without loss of time at the coachman at once for not driving slower or faster, the footman clanged down the steps, a maid with pink ribbons and a general air of Mrs. More about her came out, and Edna and Aunt Martha were carried off to their rooms.

There was a bright fire in Edna's room, and she dropped into a comfortable chair and looked around her, still asking herself if she were awake, and whether it was she, Edna Weston, who had spent the day in purchasing carriages and furniture for Rosedene, near the great duchess' castle. The maid coming in with warm water roused her, and having dismissed that damsel, whose ministrations would have made Edna, who had dressed herself since she had been able to tie a bow, exceedingly uncomfortable, she proceeded to array herself in her modest black silk. A long time seemed to have elapsed while she was doing this, as she thought, and she deemed it wise to descend in search of the drawing-room, in case dinner should be waiting. She had noticed a daintily decorated room on the ground floor as she came up-stairs, and she now turned into it. No one was there, as she thought, and wondering whether she had done right, when, going up to the fire, she came upon a little boy, who was curled up on a white mat before the fire reading a huge book, which he supported on his lap by clinching the top of the open volume with two tiny hands. As Edna came up to him he raised his head and looked at her, and Edna stopped abruptly in her approach, and stood with half pained and half pleasurable emotion. It was not the beauty of the child, and he was beautiful, with a fair, round face and long, flaxen hair, that made his dark blue eyes look almost brown, but a strange resemblance to someone, to—yes! with a throb at her heart she remembered. But that the face was that of a child, and was more dreamy and staid looking, it was identical in expression and meaning as Harold Payne's.

Edna recovered herself with an effort, and going up to him put her hand upon his silvery head, and with her own sweet smile, said:

"Well, dear, what is your name?"

The child looked at her with grave scrutiny, as if he were trying to decide whether he liked her or not, then he said:

"My name is Bertie More. What is yours?"

Edna turned pale at the sound of his voice, and quietly dropped into a chair beside him. The voice had the very ring and rhythm of that other's!

"My name is Edna Weston," she replied, bending toward him.

"Edna Weston," he repeated, looking up at her curiously, as if he was either surprised or disappointed. "Are you the lady who is so very, very rich?"

Edna smiled.

"Yes," she said, "I suppose I am," and she sighed, why, she could not tell, neither could the boy for he looked still more curious as he said:

"Why do you sigh? Isn't it nice to be very rich? Mamma says that you are wonderfully lucky."

"I dare say mamma is right," said Edna, smiling now.

The child nodded.

"Yes, but you would not have been so lucky if Uncle Cyril had not been so stupid. Mamma says he was a great fool; do you think he is?"

Edna colored.

"I—I—don't know; I have never seen him."

"Haven't you, really?" said the boy with great interest; then, with a sigh, "neither have I for a long time! He doesn't come here now, and More Park is shut up. Have you ever been there?"

"No," replied Edna.

"I have," continued the child, raising his head with a dreamy, far-away look. It is a beautiful place; I used to go and see Uncle Cyril. I love Uncle Cyril—that is, I would if mamma would let me, but she says I am not to. She says he is very wicked; Jamieson the butler, you knows, calls him wicked Sir Cyril; I've heard him. I am very sorry he is so wicked, aren't you?"

"Yes," murmured Edna, fascinated by the strange child, and unable to keep her eyes from his beautiful little weird face.

"I think you would like him if you knew him, though he is so wicked; you couldn't help it, like me. He is so kind, and speaks so—so—nice and pleasant, and he can play tennis and climb trees; he could climb the highest tree you ever saw and think nothing of it. He is very clever if he is wicked."

There was a pause; Edna slid down on to the white fur mat, and looked over the child's shoulder.

"What are you reading?"

"'Froissart's Chronicles,'" he answered, slurring the name over with a childish attempt at the accent. "Mr. Bell, my tutor, you know, gave it to me. He says that I ought to read it and study it, because it gives an account of some of my ancestors—the Mores, you know. They fought in a great many battles. I am a More. I shall be"—and he raised his head with a strangely thoughtful look upon his face—"I shall be Sir Bertie More of More Park some day, perhaps, if Uncle Cyril does not marry."

Edna shrank inwardly. Was it wordliness or pure innocence? A glance at the child's unconscious face answered her.

"Do you so very much wish to be Sir Bertie More?" she asked.

He looked at her, and ruminated for just a minute.

"I couldn't be Sir Bertie unless Uncle Cyril died, could I?"

"No," said Edna.

"No, then I don't want to be Sir Bertie," he replied, with great promptitude; "I would rather Uncle Cyril lived always. You don't, I suppose, as you've never seen him?"

What sent that strange thrill through Edna, and sent the answer to her lips so earnestly?

"Oh, yes, indeed I do, although I have not seen him."

"I thought, perhaps," said the child, queerly, "that as you had taken all his money from him, you wouldn't care."

Edna looked down, pale and trembling.

The child, whose eyes were sharp, peered up at her.

"What is the matter?—what are you crying for? I can see you are crying, though you don't make a noise like Marie—that's mamma's maid, you know—does when she cries. Aren't you happy?"

"Not very," said Edna, smiling at him through her tears.

He looked at her curiously.

"That is strange, isn't it? You're so very rich, you know! Perhaps somebody you know has died, or perhaps—have you got a husband?"

Edna drew back trembling, and shook her head.

"I thought perhaps he'd died, like Mrs. Marweb's, the cook's; but I remember mamma said you were not married, because she said that you might catch Lord Mersey."

Edna's face went crimson, and her eyes flashed fire that dried up the tears.

"Hush!" she said, putting her hand upon his arm, "I don't think you had better tell me anything more mamma said."

"No? I am sorry for that—I like to talk to you."

"Yes, talk to me," said Edna, with a smile. "Tell me about yourself; do you go to school? Ah, no, you have a tutor. And have you any brothers and sisters to play with?"

The child shook his head, and sighed a little wistfully.

"No; I never play."

"Never play! Oh, come then, there's something I can teach you!" said Edna, with her winning smile.

He drew a little nearer to her, and let the book slip from his tiny legs.

"You can play then! So could Uncle Cyril! Oh, he could play at anything! He always used to play with me! I wish he hadn't gone away."

"So do I!" exclaimed Edna, involuntarily.

"Do you? You are not going away, are you?"

He said it with such a wistful eagerness that Edna was reluctant to answer him.

"Yes, I am going away in a little while; but that is no reason why we shouldn't play together. I am not going so far. I am going to a house near More Park; there are some trees there, but I'm afraid I can't climb them like—like——"

"Like Uncle Cyril, Sir Cyril More, you know," he put in, impatient for her to go on.

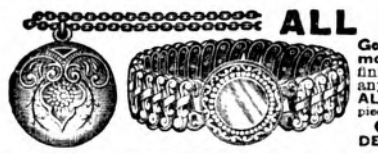
"But we can have a swing under them, and play at hide and seek, and tennis, and, oh, half a hundred games that you and I like!"

"Shall we?" he exclaimed, his pale face lighting up as he drew himself closer to her and rested his elbow on her lap. "And will you let me come and see you—just like Uncle Cyril did? You are quite sure—you are not promising me like mamma promises me sometimes—and then doesn't do it? I am so glad you came."

Then he looked up at her with innocent intensity and said, suddenly:

"Papa told mamma that you were pretty, but I think you beautiful—very beautiful; would you mind letting me kiss you?"

Edna shook her head, blushing and smiling at this piece of unconscious audacity, and Bertie slowly climbed onto her knees and deliberately took the precious boon, as the door opened and Mrs. More entered.



"My dear Edna!—and are you done already?—and plagued to death with that tiresome boy! Bertie, I declare you are always in the way! Martha must look after you more attentively. Why are you not in the schoolroom? I have told you so many times not to lumber the drawing-room with those dreadful books. There, take it up and run away before papa comes. Tut—tut! all over Miss Weston's dress!"

"Please do not mind that!" said Edna, earnestly, as the child, pale and abstracted again, bent and strained over old Froissart. "Let me carry it for you, Bertie, dear?—yes, if you please, Mrs. More," she pleaded, as Mrs. More floated toward her fussily, shocked at such an exertion for a troublesome child. "I like children, and Bertie and I are friends. Show me the schoolroom, Bertie—come along," and taking his hand, she hugged the book and got away with him.

Together they went up-stairs, and on the landing, Bertie took the book from her, saying, as he did so, with an air of conviction:

"Yes, you are very beautiful, and I love you very much."

Reader, Cleveland, Tenn.—If we could tell you how to protect yourself and other people, as well as property from lightning our fortune would be made a thousand times over. But we can't, nor so far has anybody been able to do so, though lightning rods are some protection to property. The lightning is like the weather and when we have learned to control the weather, we will be able to control the lightning. However, when there is lightning it is safer not to stand under or near a tree or other high object, or cattle, or wire fence, or near an open door or window or an open fireplace, or stove, if you are in the house. Also keep away from the walls of the room, or chandeliers, if you have them. Lightning when it strikes goes at once to the ground and one is comparatively safe who is not in or near its pathway. One of the peculiarities of lightning is that it never seems to strike the extremely high modern buildings in cities. The Washington Monument, the highest isolated structure in this country, is protected by conductors of copper, and though it is believed to have been struck many times it has not been injured perceptibly.

Mrs. B. A. B., Birnamwood, Tenn.—Lincoln pennies are worth only their face—one cent each. Other COMFORT readers please note.

Vivian, Blythe, Ga.—You can never, no never, be an actress, Vivian, until you not only know where to apply to become one, but know how to get a job after you do know. There are hundreds of them waiting around for places these days, and they know more in a minute than you know in a year. Unless you want to go to wreck and ruin, Vivian, keep away from the stage until you have learned to act so well that managers will be crowding around your front door begging you to name the amount of salary you want. In other words, learn some common sense about the stage before you go crazy to try it.

G. F., Jackson, Miss.—The same talent is required to be a moving picture actor as to be any other kind. Indeed, many of the actors now in the movies got there only because they were good actors. A man of thirty years is foolish to attempt the stage unless he has had unusual amateur experience and by heredity or environment has the dramatic instinct. The only possible chance for a man of your age, inexperienced, might be on the vaudeville stage, if he had some musical or other stunt that was sufficiently unusual and well down to command an opening. Now and then that sort of talent comes in from the hayfields and makes good, but it happens mighty seldom. And all he gets out of it is a fair salary for a time, with no reputation whatever as an actor. Take our advice and keep out of the limelight. Note what we have said in this column to "Vivian" who also aspires to histrionic honors.

B. R. M., Norfolk, Va.—If you expect to make your living hunting and trapping in the North Carolina mountains, don't get information from anybody by mail, but go there and learn for yourself. You'll starve to death otherwise.

C. S., Philadelphia, Pa.—In our judgment matrimonial agencies are more or less a menace to public and private welfare and we beg to decline to give the addresses of any we know of. Isn't marriage risky enough with those you know instead of trying it with strangers?

Miss S. A., Marion, La.—The number of known madstones in this country and the stories connected with them make them objects of curiosity and as curios only can purchasers be found for them outside of their immediate localities. If you have one you want to sell advertise it generally in New Orleans newspapers, or in The New York Medical Journal, where some physician may see it and become interested. What it would be worth depends entirely upon what a possible purchaser wanted to give. Madstones have no established market value like sandstones or precious stones.

Reader, Sylacauga, Ala.—We have never heard of a school North or South, devoted entirely to the study of mathematics. Two leading civil engineering schools where there is more mathematics taught than the average human mind can master are Mass. Inst. of Technology, Boston, Mass. and Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y. Civil engineering to some extent is taught in all general colleges and universities.

Mrs. A. R., Peyton, Colo.—The U. S. mints are located in the following cities with dates of their establishment: Philadelphia, 1792; New Orleans, 1835; San Francisco, 1853; Denver, 1862; Carson City, 1869—discontinued in 1893 and now conducted only as a government assay office.

T. W., Maxwellton, Texas.—Information concerning the preparation and sale of butterflies and moths may be had from L. O. Howard, Entomologist, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. If you succeed or fail at it we should like to hear from you for the benefit of other COMFORT readers who have made similar inquiries.

Mrs. C. H., Salem, Ore.—Panama hats may be cleaned with hot water, soap and a brush. Oxalic acid in the hands of an inexperienced person will destroy the fabric. The best cleanser for all kinds of straw hats may be had at drug-stores at a small price with directions for using and we recommend that you use that. Also we may add that if you can get a Panama hat cleaned to look much like new, you will do more than we have ever been able to do with ours.

A. C., Doering, Wis.—The angleworm comes from the ground and not from the sky. Its real name is earthworm and it gets its other name from the fact that anglers use it for bait. The fact of its frequent appearance after a rain is that the water softens the soil and it can get out easily and take an airing, as it were. In this country its usual length is from two to four or five inches, but in Europe it is sometimes found to measure nearly that many feet.

Mrs. F. H., Fayetteville, N. C.—Lodestone is the literary or poetical name for magnetic iron ore. You can buy various forms of magnets made of steel at almost any store where toys and novelties are sold.

L. H. M., Tolstoy, S. Dak.—Pearls are frequently found in oysters by persons who eat oysters and if they are found in raw oysters they may have some value, depending upon their size and quality. If the oysters have been cooked, however, the pearl is ruined for sale, though you might have it set and wear it as a souvenir. Usually these pearls are too small to be worth seeking a purchaser for. Show them to your local jeweler.

H. J. D., Henderson, Md.—If you have not made a will you should do so as should every reader of COMFORT who has any property whatever to dispose of after his demise. We refer now especially to those persons who have only small properties, personal or real, to be distributed, as those having property of any great value realize the necessity of arranging for its final disposal, while the others are careless and don't think it is worth while. But it is, because heirs of small amounts can and do get into as much family trouble and litigation as do those where much is involved. Some persons have a superstitious dread of making a will, seeming to think that if they make a will death will come after them at once. This is really too foolish to talk about. The making of a will is a very simple matter and a lawyer's fee for making it is small. Every man and every woman who has any property to go to heirs should signify in a witnessed will how it is to be divided and that will in many cases save a lot of unnecessary trouble, especially, as we say, if the amount is not great.

Aner Eam, Rome, Ga.—A course in business college will give you stenography, all right, but to be a first-class stenographer you must be born with the faculty, for it is not a profession in which perfection may be acquired by study. You may be able to get it so you can earn from eight to twelve dollars a week, but there are so many girls now doing that that it is not easy to find a satisfactory position. First-class stenographers among women are few and far between, but they get good pay when they do show up, though never as good pay as first-class men stenographers.

I. T., Waverly, Iowa.—Write to the Mayor of Walla Walla, Wash., or to Secretary Board of Trade, for information about that section and you will be sure to get all you need before going out to see for yourself. COMFORT readers desiring information about any part of the West or Southwest especially, or the South, can get it by writing to the Mayor of the county seat of any county, or to the Sheriff of the county. These officials are interested in developing their localities and are always glad to give information to prospective settlers. Make your questions clear and don't ask for information you could only get by being there in person. And don't buy property of any kind until you have seen it.

Inquisitive, Dresser Junction, Wis.—There are several woman suffrage newspapers and magazines published. For information in detail write to Secretary National American Woman's Suffrage Association, 505 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Don't be afraid to ask for what you want. That is one of the planks of the W. S. party platform.

Mrs. A. S., Macon, Ga.—Read the advertisements in COMFORT and you will find among them reliable coin firms who will supply you with coin books and other information along those lines. Lincoln pennies and Buffalo nickels are worth only their face value. The COMFORT reader who fails to read the advertising columns misses many a good thing.

Ruddy Steve, Utopia, Fla.—Our present national flag was adopted by Congress in 1818—thirteen alternate red and white stripes and an additional star for each new state admitted, the new star going in on the 4th of July following the admission of the state. (2) Vermont was the first state admitted to the Union, 1791. All the original thirteen states came in without an act of Congress. Montana means a mountainous region. Itasca is a word coined by Schoolcraft from the Ojibwa "tptosh," meaning woman's breast. The center of population by the last census (1910) was at Bloomington, Indiana.

L. S. K., Bennington, Ind.—Information about widows' and mothers' pension laws which have been passed by several states, no two of them alike, cannot be had from COMFORT as satisfactorily as it can from own local officials, town or county. Make your inquiries of officials who are on the ground and can, not only tell you definitely what the law of your state is, but can assist you in securing the benefit it affords. This is for all COMFORT readers in states where such laws exist. In states where they do not yet exist, information concerning them can best be had from the local officials.

The White Rose

By Arthur Wallace Peach

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

OLD JOHN MACLARNEY had been gardener on the Guild estate for forty years. The wide gardens about the beautiful suburban home had bee his world, and he had learned to love the flowers as a man learns to love whatever is fragile and beautiful; but there was one however that he loved more than any other among the spacious aisles; that flower—he always thought of her as a rose—was the daughter of the owner. Her name was Alicia.

She was bright of hair, cheery of heart, and sweet of face. When John was young, she used to play at gardening with him; oftentimes he had threatened to plant her and change her into a rose. As she grew older and bloomed into young womanhood, she still spent happy hours with the old gardener. The feeling of protectorship that he had over her when she was a little tot continued and her interests were his interests in a close and personal way.

So it came about that when he heard disquieting news of her, he was sorely troubled, and many times he would pause in his work amid the flowers to ponder on the trouble that had come into her sunny life.

One of the maids in the house told him about it first. It seems that there had been a little quarrel between Alicia and Nathan Rutherford, the handsome young Southerner, who had been Southern agent for her father's firm. He was warm-blooded and hot-tempered; she was born with the pride of the North in her ways; and between such a little rift in happiness soon widens.

Old John was much worried. No shadow of unhappiness had ever come into her life within his knowledge. He knew she loved the impulsive fellow, and that he loved her; and it seemed a pity that anything should come between them. But what could be done about it as far as he was concerned, he did not know.

He pondered on the matter long as he busied himself, and he pondered in vain. Then, one day, he heard that Rutherford was going on a long business trip, a trip that would keep him in Europe for many months. Maclarney was still more worried, for such a trip at such a time seemed to suggest that Rutherford was going away in order to forget her.

Late one afternoon, John looked up to see the slender rose of a girl he loved standing near him. There were little shadows in her eyes where the little lights of fun and joy had been.

"Hello, Little Rose," he said gladly, for it did seem good to see her. "I was thinkin' o' sendin' you a spray o' rosemary."

"Why? Oh, I know; rosemary is for remembrance!"

"Yes," he answered, pleased. "I ha' told you so many you forget." But he knew she had made believe she did not know just to tease him.

She chatted a while with him, but the laughter had gone from her voice; and he, though he longed dumbly to speak, did not dare to ask what the trouble was.

When she left, he watched her white figure fade down the aisles of the garden that was rapidly growing dusky with the fragrant and soft-falling twilight. As he watched her, a sudden thought made his old heart beat rapidly. Did he dare, he asked himself. He had a plan in mind; he wished he could carry it out, but he hesitated.

He went into the summer-house and sat down to think. Thinking was a long and tiresome process to him, but finally he reached a decision. Trembling a little with the immensity of it, he picked up his old cap, his tools, and hurried to the garden toolhouse. From there he went on his errand.

The next afternoon just as the faint gray of twilight was coming again, she came to make him her customary visit. He had finished a day's work, but work that had not been up to his usual standard, for he had been in a peculiar frame of mind. When he saw her coming, he was a little fearful of what she might say or do if she knew what he had done.

But she did not know. She chatted with him as he gathered up his implements, her sweet voice falling like music in the silent spaces of the garden. She gathered a few flowers as he went back to the toolhouse.

After he had finished putting the trowels away, he turned to the door, and stopped stock-still, quivering with what he saw.

Down the garden aisle from the house was coming a tall figure with stealthy steps. She was bending over, breathing the scent of a rose uplifted for her kiss. Suddenly the tall figure seized her, and her white, slender figure was folded in the darkness of a deep embrace.

To John came the sound of broken voices, charged with emotion and a great, sweet joy.

"Alice!"

"Nathan!"

John listened, his old ears straining for the words, his slow-beating heart quickening. His secret must come out, and what would be the result?

The voices became clear.

"Nathan, why did you come?"

"Why—why—didn't you send me a white rose?"

"Why, Nathan, I—I—no, I——"

Setting himself for the supreme effort, John hastened down the walk. "Miss Alice, I—I sent to Mr. Rutherford the white rose, because—because once in the garden as you two were talking, I heard him say the white rose was the sign—the sign of forgiveness. I sent it to him. I hope I haven't done wrong; I thought——" He stopped, troubled with their silence.

Nathan put an encircling arm about Alicia, and she, after a glance into his face, leaned against him. The free hand Rutherford held out to John.

"I am glad you sent the white rose, Mac; I have been foolish."

She laughed softly, and the music was again in her voice.

"And I'm glad, too!" she said.

We Want to Prove at Our Own Expense That It Is No Longer Necessary to Be Thin, Scrawny, and Undeveloped.

Fair Bather: "I'm going to leave this writing in the sand and see if that skinny pair yonder won't take the hint."

This is a generous offer to every thin man or woman who reads COMFORT. We positively guarantee to increase your weight to your own satisfaction or no pay. Think this over—think what it means. At our own risk, we offer to put 10, 15, yes, 30 pounds of good, solid "stay there" flesh on your bones, to fill out hollows in cheeks, neck or bust, to get rid of that "peaked" look, to rejuvenate and revitalize your whole body until it tingles with vibrant energy; to do this without drastic diet, "tonics," severe physical culture "stunts," detention from business or any irksome requirements—if we fail it costs you nothing.

We particularly wish to hear from the excessively thin, those who know the humiliation and embarrassment which only skinny people have to suffer in silence. We want to send a free 50-cent package of our new discovery to the people who are called "slats" and "bean poles," to bony women, whose clothes never look "anyhow," no matter how expensively dressed, to the skinny men who fail to gain social or business recognition on account of their starved appearance. We care not whether you have been thin from birth, whether you have lost flesh through sickness, how many flesh builders you have experimented with. We take the risk and assume it cheerfully. If we cannot put pounds and pounds of healthy flesh on your frame we don't want your money.

The new treatment is used to increase the red corpuscles in the blood, strengthen the nerves and put the digestive tract into such shape that your food is assimilated and turned into good, solid, healthy flesh instead of passing through the system undigested and unassimilated. It is a thoroughly scientific principle, this Sargol, and builds up the thin, weak and debilitated without any nauseous dosing. In many conditions it is better than cod liver oil and certainly is much pleasanter to take.

Send for the 50-cent box today. Convince us by your prompt acceptance of this offer that you are writing in good faith and really desire to gain in weight. The 50-cent package which we will send you free will be an eye-opener to you. We send it that you may see the simple, harmless nature of our new discovery, how easy it is to take, how you gain flesh privately without knowledge of friends or family until you astonish them by the prompt and unmistakable results.

We could not publish this offer in COMFORT if we were not prepared to live up to it. It is only the astounding results of our new method of treatment that make such an offer and such a guarantee possible on our part. So cut off the coupon today and mail it at once to The Sargol Company, 12-H Herald Bldg., Binghamton, N. Y., and please inclose 10c with your letter to help pay distribution expenses. Take our word, you'll never regret it.

Free Sargol Coupon

This certificate, with ten cents to help pay postage and distribution expenses, entitles the holder to one 50-cent package of Sargol, the Flesh Builder. The Sargol Co., 12-H Herald Bldg., Binghamton, N. Y.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Apply to the hair twice a week until it becomes the desired shade. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and removes dandruff. It is excellent for falling hair and will make harsh hair soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off. —Advertisement.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

R. M., Latham, O.—As dry air is considered a corrective of catarrhal conditions produced by damp air, the logical conclusion is that catarrh sufferers should go to the dry climate and as Florida is low and with the sea on both sides, there must be a dampness in the air which is not found in that of Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado and other inland sections. That is the theory, but in practise it might be that Florida would suit your case better than the other sections, just as there are certain medicines which are beneficial in ninety-nine cases, but are without effect in the hundredth. Try Florida if you prefer going there and if it does not benefit, then try the others.

D. L., Doylestown, O.—Chronic diarrhea is very often a symptom rather than a disease itself and acute diarrhea may soon become chronic if the patient is careless in diet and habits of living. The intestines, the liver or the kidneys may be the seat of the trouble and the attention of a physician is necessary to determine conditions and the proper treatment. Many serious cases are the result of patients considering the trouble of little consequence and treating themselves ignorantly, thus aggravating the disease. The patient may treat himself by regulating his diet eating sparingly and oftener than usual, milk, eggs, rare meat and rice if well cooked. Boiled milk is better than raw milk. Thoroughly toasted or stale bread should take the place of fresh bread. Drink no coffee. Chew every mouthful to a pulp before swallowing so as to promote digestion, indigestion being a cause of diarrhea. Avoid sudden cooling of the body, and especially protect the body while asleep from sudden cooling by throwing off the covers. With this self-treatment established, consult a physician for medical treatment, because certain medicines are necessary which the patient cannot determine and administer. Dysentery is different from chronic diarrhea in that it results from intestinal inflammation, is very painful and is more liable to result fatally.

B. G. F., Jensin, Fla.—You have nervous indigestion in a mild form and need rest and careful dieting more than anything else. Nervous troubles as you have learned are not simple matters and their proper treatment must be from a physician who can have personal knowledge of conditions and be competent to treat them not only scientifically, but sympathetically. This cannot be done by yourself through printed advice.

Puzzled, Clark's Corners, Conn.—Everybody's right and you are wrong. Everybody thinks you are healthy, but you do not. Mind is greater than matter. You only think you are not well. Stop that thinking and agree with everybody else and you will be all right. (2) Varicocele is not harmless. If you have anything like that, go to a doctor with it and get his advice and treatment after he has examined it.

Mrs. W. S. O., Hopkinsville, Ky.—That doctor we think was right who told you your child's tickling in the throat was due to "the bugle being too long," but he was wrong in not clipping it off. The operation is simple and sure. Take the child to another physician and have an examination made for an operation. Have it done at once if the physician so advises. (2) As to the tetter or eczema on your husband's hands, if the ordinary drug-store remedies have failed, he should consult a doctor, because while eczema shows on the surface and does not affect the general health, the cause of it is deeper and must be removed if possible. Eczema is very stubborn and many times it is incurable, though it may be held in check if properly treated.

H. M. B., Thorn, Miss.—A girl sixteen years old and bothered nearly all your life with your eyes and still never gone to a doctor for treatment. It is a wonder you are not physically as well as mentally blind. Why don't you understand how much good eyesight means and take the very greatest care of it? Now go to a good doctor just as fast as you can and have him examine your eyes and treat them as they should have been treated long ago. Other COMFORT readers whose eyes trouble them go and do likewise and go quick.

Mrs. A. W., Shively, Ky.—Hardening of the arteries is not at all uncommon among older people, men particularly, and in these hurrying times of ours more than ever, and among various causes are excessive mental or physical effort and great anxiety, these being probably more than any other the cause in your father's case. Nothing can be done toward effecting a cure, but a physician can be of great service who will see the patient at intervals and give such advice as may be necessary towards temporary relief and in checking the progress of the disease. Do nothing except by a physician's direction because one wrong move may end it all in a moment. By proper care your father's life may be prolonged several years, but he will never be capable of much exertion. The use of alcoholic liquor is one of the most common causes of the premature occurrence of this disease.

R. P., Murfreesboro, Tenn.—About the only remedy for fallen arch are the mechanical devices to be had in most shoe-stores. For sweating feet bathe them morning and night in water containing a few drops of ammonia, wear cotton socks and wear rubbers only when absolutely necessary. Shoes should be removed whenever possible and let the feet have ventilation.

Mrs. M. S., Augusta, Wis.—Don't wash your hair so often. Once a month is enough and then rub a little olive oil into the roots. Clip the splitting ends. Arizona or New Mexico has the warm dry climate which would relieve your catarrh, though you should be sure it is catarrh. Why wait till your eyes are "very bad" before letting a doctor examine them? Do you let your kitchen-stove go to pieces before you try to repair it? Go to the doctor now. Also go to him about those numerous other ailments you ask us to guess at and prescribe for. For constipation a tablespoonful or two if necessary, of pure olive oil at mealtime and before going to bed will produce the best results. It is food as well as medicine and a fine intestinal lubricant.

Miss F. L. R., Gowrie, Iowa.—If you have pleurisy the best thing you can do for it is to go to the doctor who told you you had it and let him prescribe for it. Why did you write to Maine to find that out? You may rest assured that it is not "chronic consumption" yet, but it may become chronic if you don't attend to it promptly.

Inquiring, Frederick, Md.—"Paralysis of the brain," as you call it is a loss of the possibility of transmitting impressions from the seats of their peripheric commencement inwards to those portions of the brain which are concerned with their realization in consciousness. The proper term for it, however, is sensory paralysis.

Mrs. A. B., San Francisco, Cal.—Do not worry about losing your sense of taste and smell from having a cold. It is so common that we supposed everybody who ever had a cold knew about it. It is caused by a catarrhal condition of the nerves of those senses which deaden them temporarily. The hearing is also often affected in the same way.

Worried Girl, Elizabeth City, N. C.—Why should we give you advice when you tell us that you didn't think it worth while to take the advice of the physicians from the Board of Health who examined you two years ago and told you what was the matter with your stomach? We think it would be very "wise to take into consideration what they said," though it may now be too late and nobody to blame except yourself. We cannot guess at your condition now and have no suggestions to make except that you see a physician. There should be some sort of remedy for such carelessness as you have shown, but unfortunately there is not.

Pimple, Wheatfield, Ind.—You'd probably lose your eyesight if you prefer to have a physician a thousand miles away guess at what is the matter with your eye, instead of consulting a physician on the spot who can examine it and prescribe properly. And you almost deserve to.

J. F., Gooding, Idaho.—Goiter in itself will not cause a mental breakdown, but to a sensitive person who can't get his mind off of it, such a result might follow. You know, many diseases could be cured if sufferers could keep their minds on something else. You should not let the goiter grow, but get the best treatment you can and stop it. What kind of water do you drink? In many localities goiter is very common owing to something or other not definitely known in the drinking-water. Drink distilled water.

Miss B. J., Cambridge, Mass.—Your feet are not fat. They are merely broad, out of proportion to their length and you should realize that and wear shoes wide enough to fit, even though they are not quite as shapely as you admire. Standing on your feet so much will broaden them, but that makes no difference if you will wear shoes broad enough for them. A shoe a half or three quarters of an inch too long may be a shade narrower than one the exact length of your foot, as the extra length will allow for a certain spread forward instead of lateral.

G. S., Peoria, Ill.—We fail to see any especial jerkiness in your writing and you certainly haven't writer's palsy. Also if there is anybody who has nerves hard enough not to jump at a sudden noise as a pistol shot, we would like to have his address. Get your mind on your cartooning and stop thinking about your nerves. Boys have no right to have nerves and they really haven't. They only think so maid of honor and Arthur Stamford was best man, while several friends of Alice and Will officiated as bridesmaids and groomsmen.

The young couple went to Italy for a few weeks, Mrs. Weston and May remaining at Castleview at Mr. Fletcher's earnest request, and where the former easily dropped into Imogen's position, while May just revelled in the luxuries surrounding her, especially in having dear old Chub to drive again to her heart's content.

More than this, the future began to hold much of promise for her, for Mr. Stamford became a very frequent visitor at Castleview, and it began to be rumored in society that the prospective baronet was likely to carry off Lady Marchmont's fair sister to Stamford Hall at no very distant day.

On the return of Lord and Lady Marchmont from their bridal tour, there was another grand merrymaking at Marchmont Court to welcome the master and mistress home. When the next season opened in London, the family took a fine house in town, where Alice and May were both presented at court by the dowager Lady Marchmont, and their beauty and culture were the subjects of special comment upon that and many following occasions during their sojourn in town. During this season May became the betrothed of Arthur Stamford, and their engagement was formally announced, the happy girl believing that no other was quite so blessed as she. Imogen and Olive made a home for themselves in New York, and, although both Mr. Fletcher and the judge tried to keep in touch with the latter by means of letters and occasional visits, the proud and jealous girl did not cordially respond to their efforts, and was always cold and constrained whenever they met. Two years after leaving Castleview, she married a prosperous diamond merchant, when the judge and his son-in-law gave her a generous dowry. It was accepted with cold and formal thanks, after which they drifted still farther apart, until finally all intercourse between them ceased.

Imogen always resided with her daughter, but, although she was surrounded with every luxury, she never wholly rallied from that last blow received at Castleview. Her proud spirit was broken, although she endeavored to conceal the fact, but her whole life was haunted by many bitter memories and wearing remorse, and she never again cared for society.

The detective, Reardon, was tried and convicted, and sentenced to ten years' transportation, in spite of Mr. Fletcher's efforts to have his punishment made light, in view of the fact that he had not intended to steal state secrets.

May Weston was married at the close of the London season, when the young Lady Marchmont gave her a grand wedding at the court and provided her with a trousseau befitting the position which she was to occupy, and thus the bright girl secured the opportunity for her long wished for nibble at society, which she enjoyed to the utmost, while, at the same time, she was a loving, lovable and helpful wife to her noble husband.

It had been arranged that Mrs. Weston was to reside at Stamford Hall with her daughter, but Judge Ashburton had been dismayed at the thought of losing their pleasant, ladylike and efficient housekeeper, who, he suddenly became conscious, had become very necessary to his comfort and happiness, and one morning he surprised her by quietly asking her if she would object to affixing his name to hers and walking by his side for the rest of his life.

She did not object, and the matter was speedily settled. This unexpected proposition created quite a commotion in the three families most interested.

They were all intensely amused, and many a sly joke was cracked at the expense of the venerable groom and his middle-aged, but still attractive, bride-elect; but everybody finally admitted that it was the nicest possible arrangement, Mr. Fletcher expressing himself as especially delighted over the fact that he would not be obliged to keep a forlorn bachelor's hall.

The judge lived to a good old age—long enough to trot three lovely greatgrandchildren upon his knees and to begin to instruct the promising heir of Leith in the elements of the profession he so loved, and upon whom he often declared the mantle of his mother's brilliant talents had fallen with such signal promise as to point to a coming star of the first magnitude in the legal firmament.

THE END.

Genuine Gold-Filled Ladies' Rings!

WE show here six of the latest styles in ladies' and girls' rings. They are not solid gold rings but they are genuine gold filled so that they are just as handsome and will wear just as well as if they were solid gold. They are beautifully made and finished and set with imt. stones so exquisitely cut and mounted that only an expert can distinguish them from the real gems which would cost from $5.00 to $25.00. Remember that these are not cheap "electro-plated" rings which always look brassy after you wear them a little while. They are filled with enough real gold to give them genuine wearing qualities, and being fashioned in style and design to exactly correspond with the latest styles of expensive solid gold rings not one person in a thousand will realize that you are wearing anything but the solid gold article. Please read the following descriptions then you can easily tell which one of these beautiful rings you prefer to have us send you as a gift. ORDER BY NUMBER THE RING OR RINGS WANTED.

BE SURE TO SEND YOUR RING SIZE!

By using the above diagram you can tell exactly what size ring you wear if you will follow these directions: Put a stiff piece of paper around the second joint on your ring finger. Cut the paper off so that when drawn tight around your finger the ends exactly meet. Then lay the paper flat on the diagram, one end at the line O and the other end will indicate correct size. By following these instructions your ring will be a perfect fit.

Free Offer! By buying a large quantity of these rings direct from the manufacturers we did not have to pay two or three middlemen's profits but secured them at the factory price and this enables us to make a great offer that none of our readers can afford to overlook. Send us only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents and we will send you FREE AND POSTPAID your choice of any one ring illustrated and described above. Remember our guarantee that these rings are genuine gold filled and that they will wear indefinitely and give splendid satisfaction. Do not forget to specify by number the ring or rings you want.

Get Rid of the Flies!

IF you would protect yourself and family, especially the children and babies, from that which is now recognized as the most deadly of all pests, "the common house fly," then COMFORT can show you the way and that is by means of the New Sanitary Fly Trap. To trap the flies is the only safe and sanitary way to get rid of them. Old-fashioned sticky fly paper, poisonous dope, "swatter" or any other fly-killing devices that leave the flies lying around the house or smashed on wall, floor or furniture are worse than useless because as all health authorities now agree dead flies are more dangerous than live ones. To prepare this new Fly Trap ready for business it is simply necessary to place the bait consisting of a little sweetened bread and milk in a butter plate directly underneath it and the flies are instantly attracted to it—and the trap does the rest. There is no getting away from it. The flies are there to stay until you are ready to instantly kill them by simply holding trap over lighted match, gas flame or open cover of stove. This done you then remove top of trap, empty it and it is all ready for business again. We will send you one trap or a dozen traps absolutely free on the terms of the following offer.

Premium No. 50

Offer No. 50 A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents, we will send you one Sanitary Fly Trap free by Parcel Post prepaid.

Offer No. 50 B. For your own subscription or renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all), we will send you one Sanitary Fly Trap free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 50.

Panne Satin Petticoat

Premium No. 7223

Given For Three Subscriptions

THIS is one of the best bargains we have been able to offer this season. These handsome latest style colored skirts were actually made to retail for $1.50 but owing to financial difficulties the manufacturer was obliged to sell them at a greatly reduced price. We were very fortunate in getting hold of exactly one hundred and twenty-nine dozen of them and while they last will distribute as free premiums among our readers. They are made of finest quality mercerized panne satin which has all the sheen and brilliancy of the highest grade satin. The deep flounce is trimmed with four rows of cording and a 4½ inch knife plaiting. They are well made in every respect with finished seams. We have them in colors of mahogany, orange, green, king blue, American beauty, tango and navy blue and in sizes from 36 to 44. Remember the value—a regular $1.50 petticoat—when you read our offer below. And also remember that when our small stock is exhausted we shall withdraw this offer because it will be absolutely impossible to secure any more of the skirts at such a low price. When ordering be sure to specify size and color wanted.

CLUB OFFER. For a club of three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you one of these fashionable high-grade panne satin petticoats free by Parcel Post prepaid. Be sure to mention what size and color you desire. Premium No. 7223.

Crumbs of Comfort

Agreeable advice is rarely useful advice.

We take less pains to be happy than to seem so.

Chance makes brothers, but hearts make friends.

Men marry to make an end; women to make a beginning.

It costs more to be miserable than it does to be happy.

For every friend one loses for truth's sake he gains a better.

Every human being believes that he has a greater possibility.

It is never too late to learn what it is always necessary to know.

It is for young men to gather knowledge and for old men to use it.

Too much effort to increase our happiness transforms it into misery.

Covetousness would take for itself that which was intended for all.

One of the greatest of human sufferings is to ask oneself, Does God exist?

We know truth when we see it, let skeptic and scoffer say what they choose.

He who will do good after a disappointment must stand still and do nothing at all.

Every man is not so much a workman in the world as he is a suggestion of what he should be.

It is an ill thing for a man not to know the measure of his stomach, and knowing it not to respect it.

Visits are too often mere inventions for discharging on our friends something of our own unendurable burdens.

There is nothing that we fear which is so certain to come, as it is certain that many things which we do fear will not come.

How many casualties and difficulties there are that we dread, which upon further thought we find to be mercies and benefits.

Things are only ill that are ill-taken and it is not for a man of worth to think himself better or worse for the opinion of others.

How dear, how soothing to man is the idea of God, peopling the lonely places, lighting the darkness and effacing the scars and sorrows of our mistakes and disappointments.

Billy Dale—Coward

(See Title Page Illustration.)

By Clayton Heath

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

HE was born to be afraid, even as a small boy such games as "Follow your Leader," "Stumps," and the like held for him none of the joy that they gave to his fellows. When he was dared to swing from the limb of a tree or jump from the roof of a shed to the ground his heart seemed to turn to water.

But the fact that he was able to hide his shame, that none of his playmates suspected his weakness, buoyed up his confidence, and it was balm to his soul to speculate on the emotions of others, wondering if perhaps all the world were not a coward hiding behind a screen of assumed courage. It was not until his fight with Joe Sands of the "Tough End" gang in his thirteenth year, that he really began to despise himself.

In the presence of a dozen boys Sands slapped his face, not once but three times. Flushed by his easy victory he called after the retreating boy:

"Always knew you was a coward Bill Dale, now I know you are just a yellow dog. You're a coward."

It was a fatal mistake for Sands. Dale turned on him with a throaty cry, and in three minutes it was over.

"Bill," queried one of his friends after the fight, "why didn't you let him have it when he struck you? What was you waiting for?" "But when you did go after him," commented another admiringly, "you were just like a 'cornered rat'."

Abruptly Billy left his companions and sought the privacy of his room. Now he knew what he was. "A cornered rat." A thing that would not defend itself unless its very life was at stake. He knew what would have happened had there been no witnesses to Sand's affronts. They would not have been resented. It was only when Sands called him coward that the rat's instinct to fight when cornered had come to his rescue and saved him from his friend's contempt. He was worse than a coward—he was afraid of being called one.

How he ever got through his school and college days without again having his physical courage questioned, only he knew. Only he knew of the subterfuges which he adopted to avoid playing football, basketball and other games for which a lad of his strength was in demand. But he kept his secret and when, after his graduation and admission to the bar, he met the girl, he forgot everything else but the fact that he must win her and one evening he planned that after taking her home from a certain musical comedy he would put the momentous question to her. He had reasons to believe that he would be accepted.

The performance that night was ordinary, but not even the presence of a famous and beautiful star could win Billy's attention, he had eyes only for the girl, but in the second act while the chorus was performing various evolutions his mind susceptible to quick impressions by many years of wondering what people thought of him, and if they knew of his cowardice grasped a certain uneasiness in the atmosphere of the crowded house. People were twisting in their seats, turning their heads from side to side as though to discover something of whose existence they were not certain, and the chorus seemed to be singing louder and dancing more vehemently than the character of their song required. And from the rear of the stage there fluttered a wisp of smoke.

But even before it had been observed, Billy had sensed its coming. He had the aisle seat and was out of it facing the exit before anyone else had time to move. His escape was easy; he had a clear field, and he was about to take advantage of it when he remembered the girl. He turned to her with a smile.

"Pick up your wraps," he said, "and come quickly."

Already the theater was in an uproar, shrieks, yells and curses filled the air, by this time murky with smoke, forced into the auditorium by the draft from behind the stage. The star was vainly trying to make herself heard, her gestures indicating that there was no danger. Ushers ran madly down the aisles exhorting people to keep their seats, and then above all came the clang of the fire engine. The panic could not be stayed.

Billy seized the girl in his left arm, and with his right arm forced a way into the aisle. Women and children and men were struggling madly to escape, spurned on with this greatest of human emotions, fear.

Steadily Billy forced his way to the space behind the orchestra chairs. There was no chance to get out; the terrified mob was blocking its own escape, and had jammed the door so that it could not be opened. With a roar like a maddened bull before its last charge, Billy turned on the grasping wild-eyed throng relentlessly forcing him on.

"Go back!" he yelled, "Go back!"

His right arm shot out and a man insane with fear dropped before the blow, another fell, writhing in pain as Billy's right leg lifted him from the ground, another seized in one hand was thrown bodily into the crowd, and now for a moment before this veritable madman, the theater goers gave way.

"Go back!" came the roar again, in a voice that the girl did not recognize. "Go back to your seats, there is no danger, the smoke is already gone."

A few of the cooler headed took up the cry and began forcing the people back and those in the rear, seeing that the smoke really had vanished and that the chorus was still singing and dancing reluctantly began making their way back to the main body of the theater. The panic ceased almost as quickly as it had begun and in five minutes people were actually laughing and joking over their recent fright, and were banteringly offering to exchange wraps which they had hastily picked up in their flight for their own property.

As soon as the panic had ceased Billy had made his way through the curious throng assembled outside and summoned a taxicab. Once inside the girl threw her arms around his neck.

"Oh, Billy!" she half sobbed, "Oh, my own Billy!"

"My God!" he groaned. "Don't make it so hard for me!"

"Hard for you, what do you mean? Why, Billy you don't mean that you don't care—what have I done? Offered you myself, and you have r——. I don't believe you," she cried. "I know you care. I've known it for weeks."

She loosened her arms and drew away from him.

"You've made love to me in every way except speech, you've been wanting to ask me every time we have met, and now—what do you mean? You're mine. I didn't know until tonight the real you. But now I know I love you, Billy."

"Dolly," his voice was strained, "that's just it, you don't know the real me, you didn't see the real Billy Dale tonight, for he is a coward, a cur, yes, just a common yellow cur. He was more panic stricken tonight than any woman in the audience, but he fought because he had to, like a cornered rat."

The girl switched on the light in the cab, and looked searchingly at his face which revealed as did his voice the bitterest self contempt.

"What do you mean?" she asked, wonderingly. "Tonight you saved the lives of perhaps a thousand people, you fought them into sanity, you brought me safely out of that mob, and, even, if they had not been quieted, I know that you would have brought me out or died there with me."

"That's just it Dolly," he groaned. "I was shamed into fighting just like a cornered rat. I could never have faced the world if I had left you there to die, I had to fight to keep my secret, to hide my cowardice. I had to force that crowd back that you might escape and in your escape give me the right to live. I tell you I am a coward, I have always been one. I thought to always hide it from you, but now that you love me because you think I am brave—Dolly I can't do it. I can't live an eternal lie. It was shame I tell you, it was the dread that the world would know me for what I am that made me do what I did. God, can't you see me shaking now, trembling with horror, terrified, frightened, pain-stricken? Could you love a man who confesses this?"

"Billy," her arms went around his neck again —"You are a foolish boy, you have only one fear and that is the fear of fear. If you are a coward I only hope," she hid her face on his shoulder, while face and throat were crimson, "that if we ever have a son he will be just such a coward as his father."

"You mean that Dolly?"

"Must I say it again," she whispered, and this time it was his lips that sought hers.

ROSE or VIOLET

By Arthur Wallace Peach

LAMSON was asleep, and Ellen let her sewing drop into her lap as she leaned back and studied the face on the white pillow. Across the porch the scented wind from the garden and meadows blew. It was a drowsy afternoon, just the time for reverie, and her thoughts went back to the day when she had stood on that porch and seen a sight that chilled her into frozen horror.

Down the curving country road had come a great, plunging car, driven by a crouched figure; the car had reared and turned like a wild thing on the curve; hard against the stone wall it had crashed, writhed and stopped. From the wreck of it they had taken a battered human figure which, when given consciousness by the skill of the country doctor, cursed him bitterly. But the doctor had refused to let him die.

She had looked deep into Lamson's soul since that day, and she had learned much, but he was still a mystery. To her joy, as he grew better, he seemed to take an interest in the life of the farm about him; and when it was suggested that he go to a city hospital, he had begged to remain, and he did remain. He seemed to have plenty of money, but during the first days a shadow lay always on his face; now the shadow was gone.

He stirred a bit, turned and smiled at her from his cot with pleasant brown eyes that suddenly darkened. "Miss Ellen, I haven't rested in years as I have rested here. Do you know, you and this quaint, lovely, old place have made a man of me. Honestly, that is just the size of it. I wish I could stay forever."

She smiled. "But you will soon be leaving us; going back to that far-off city of which we country folk hear so much." He was a mystery, and she did wish he would tell her more about himself.

His face shadowed and brightened. "Yes, I suppose I must be going; but it has been next door to Paradise here. I wish——" But he did not finish his wish.

In another week he was able to walk about. From his face had gone the harsh lines of dissipation, the devil-may-care look, the cynicism which had been there before; it was the face of a man almost at peace.

They were walking in the garden one afternoon, when an automobile stopped in the road and three figures came forward, one a beautiful girl, who greeted Lamson with sudden joy, after a moment's scrutiny. He greeted her in turn, joyously.

Ellen stole away. It was evident to her that friends of his from the great city had found him. He would be lured back—there was no doubt about it.

And so it proved. He came in the house, excited a little, and announced that he was to return with the party of his friends. The girl in the automobile, regal and full-blown as a rose, came in with him, and Ellen met her.

That evening there came to Ellen the knowledge that during the days in which she had watched over the injured man, during the weeks when she had seen in his eyes the wish to die fade and the desire to live enter—during all that time she had been learning to love him. Absence and parting touch the eyes that see not and they see.

She watched the costly city car fade down the road, and turned from the window with misty eyes. The city would claim him, even the beautiful girl who had been first to greet him in the garden.

Only one memory she had of a purely personal nature: that was his farewell, "So long, Ellen." He said it smiling, and she knew he said it in the way he did, using her first name, because his heart was warmed within him at the thought of his return.

Two days passed and nothing was heard from him; some of his clothes were sent for. The farm life about her went on as usual; the usual news of the community was passed around; a near neighbor reported that he had sold his place, etc. But news of the one she loved came not.

Very sensibly trying to reason with herself, she put all thought of him, as far as she could, from her, and went about her duties. But when the long summer evenings came and the quiet afternoons, she listened for a voice and she waited for a step.

Then one evening, an automobile stopped in the roadway, and she saw a figure run lightly from it to the house. A clear voice asked, "Where's Ellen?"

She heard her mother answer, and the next moment Lamson was threading the garden aisles toward her.

"Hello," he said, cheerfully, his hand outstretched, "I want you to congratulate me——"

A shock went through her. Was he asking her to congratulate him on his engagement or marriage? Did he think she knew?

"Why," she said, drawing back, "what do you mean?"

His expression changed. "I mean; tell me you are glad to see I am wise enough to return."

"Oh, I do!"

He laughed. "Thank you. Will you come over here, and sit down with me?"

Wondering what he had in mind, she went over, and they sat down on the old bench under the apple-tree.

He was silent a moment, then he began, "I went back to the city, and I had a good time. Then the old feeling came back; I have done many things I ought not to have done there; the sins of it are on my soul. I was sick of life when I came tearing out here on the racing-car. Miss Vannorm was good to me—very good; but, someway, the old bitterness began to come back. Ellen," he turned to her suddenly—"I bought the farm next to this; and I've come back where life runs clean. The happiest days of my life have been here. Life means something now, if I may have you with it, Ellen. I know you were learning to love me—deny it if you dare!"

She made a weak attempt to, but her voice was muffled in his embrace. She did manage to say, "But Miss Vannorm—she seemed like a rose—you ——"

He stopped her speech again. "Between the rose and the violet—give me the violet!"

"THE LITTLE MARPLOT"

By Mrs. Georgie Sheldon,

is one of the very best stories this popular author has written. The heroine is a live character that challenges the reader's wonder and admiration and stirs the heart's strongest emotions. Love, the greatest thing in the world, is the key-note of this as of all other great stories. It is full of action which moves rapidly through a succession of startling events to the final solution of a baffling mystery. This story will start in October COMFORT and run as a serial through the fall, winter and spring months. Don't miss the thrilling first part in October COMFORT.

"TOUGHEY TRAVELS ABROAD"

By Adele Steiner Burleson,

is an interesting and instructive series of travel stories, telling, in the author's fascinating style, the true story of her family's experiences in an extended tour of Europe and Toughey's and the "Children's" amusing exploits and thrilling adventures in foreign lands. In it the reader is given a glimpse of the human side of royalty and an introduction to a real princess. It is of especial present interest because most of the countries included in the tour are now desperately engaged in war, and the national customs, habits and manner of life peculiar to the people of these lands are graphically described. This new story will appear as a serial only in COMFORT. Be sure to read the interesting first part in October COMFORT.

"THE LORD OF THE HARVEST" is a beautiful, touching short story that will be one of the many attractive features of our fine OCTOBER HARVEST NUMBER.

Our National Awakening

AT last our leading citizens in public and private life, including those who are responsible for the administration of the government, have become impressed with the danger that threatens us because of having neglected to provide for national defense. The European war has forced it on their attention and recent investigations have disclosed the fact that our great country is practically defenseless against attack by any first-class power.

In view of present and prospective international complications it is an alarming situation which our government and our people have been reluctant to acknowledge, and even six months ago was denied by prominent officials at Washington.

Secretary of the Navy Daniels is organizing an advisory board of great American inventors and scientists, headed by Thomas A. Edison, to give the government the benefit of their inventive genius in devising the most effective weapons and other mechanical appliances for defending the country and especially for repelling attack by naval forces and air craft. But all their efforts will be in vain unless Congress rises to a patriotic sense of its duty in the matter.

We are glad to learn that President Wilson, according to recently published statements, will urge Congress, at its session which will open in December, to act promptly in providing adequate means for national defense. But, as Congress has persistently disregarded the repeated warnings of our generals and admirals in this respect, a public awakening is necessary to spur the people's representatives to drop their political game long enough to give effect to the President's recommendation which is supported by the far-sighted, broad-minded, patriotic men regardless of party affiliations.

The present war has demonstrated that though battleships and cruisers are necessary as ever they are of little use unless supported by a large fleet of submarines and air craft, and that an army is helpless without aeroplanes for scout duty. We have scarcely any submarines and practically no naval or military aeroplanes. Our army and navy are deficient in ammunition and equipment of all kinds. We haven't torpedoes enough for one round for our ships, and our coast artillery hasn't ammunition enough for two hours' firing. The navy needs more ships, and what ships it has cannot all be put in commission for lack of officers and enlisted men. But our army is even more wofully deficient than the navy, and Secretary of War Garrison is helping the President to formulate a plan to strengthen it.

Former Secretary of War Stimson has pointed out the most vital spot in our alarmingly weak system of national defense. He says:

"Today there are less than five thousand officers in the regular army excluding the medical corps, but including all others of all ages, all ranks, all manner of service and detail. This little force is scattered all over the world from the men on duty in the Philippines to the military attaches in the capitals of Europe.

"The most vital of all shortages is the shortage of trained men fit to be the officers of our citizen army —a shortage which is now crippling the efforts of England, which is one of the causes that has permitted Russia to be hurled back from the Carpathians—that is the shortage which in the United States transcends and exceeds all others."

In less than ten months of war the British loss of commissioned officers according to official figures totaled 8,812. The official figures of Germany are still more startling. In but six months of war the great central military empire lost in killed and wounded more than 30,000 officers. It will be readily seen from these statistics that Great Britain lost twice and Germany six times the total number of officers enrolled in the military service of the United States.

It takes the training of years to produce an efficient army officer. He can be no more extemporized or turned out in a day than can the other destructive engines of war, battleships, sixteen-inch guns and torpedoes. An ordinary private soldier after three months of training, Europe has discovered, is still a negligible quantity when opposed to seasoned troops. This being the case, of what use would be officers who had no more training than the raw levies under their command? They would be more likely a menace than a help in time of battle for it takes not only years of training, but actual experience in the handling of men, to give that confidence and steadiness which is requisite to win victories.

In a case of national emergency Congress would call for not less than half a million men, and the men would be quickly forthcoming; but where, pray, would we get trained officers to lead them? The officers we have could do no more than handle the tiny, widely scattered force on which we at present fatuously rely for protection.

The total mobile army within the United States is only about 25,000 men. It would be far better if they were all officers. Then we would at least have the nucleus of a fair fighting force. But they are not officers, and but few of the men in the ranks are qualified to hold commissions.

A little thought and enterprise on the part of those whose sworn duty is to provide for the protection of this country and its institutions would give us an ample supply of officers. Why cannot we have a military or naval academy in each State? It would, of course, be the primary duty of these institutions to fit their students for civil life, but sufficient military instruction could be given so that the graduates of these institutions could, in the event of a national emergency, be called on to drill and command our citizen soldiery, and work them into shape for the field. The military drill should constitute a part of the training of every able-bodied boy in the public schools.

While the world is in its present disturbed state, would it not be better for the favored sons of our moneyed class, who spend most of their time in chasing the athletic "bug" at Yale, Harvard, Princeton, Cornell, Pennsylvania and other universities, if they concentrated their superfluous energies on the drill and parade ground? If a small part of the time and activities of our youth can be directed into channels that will mean a wall of protection against the marauding spirit of the age, there need be no fear that the foeman will ever place his iron heel upon our peaceful shores. We want peace, and the only effective means of insuring it is by being thoroughly prepared for defense.

Armies and navies are expensive things, but they are incomparably cheaper than war. What is advocated is neither militarism nor navalism, of which there is no danger in a republic, but that we should be so strong in our preparedness for national defense that none will dare attack us.

The Latest Word On Pellagra

NEW diseases and new pests inimical to human, animal and vegetable life are continually appearing in the United States. They are mostly imported from Europe or Asia, and when they once get a foothold here it is usually impossible to eradicate them and often very difficult to control them.

Within the writer's recollection leprosy, the dreaded scouge of Asia, was unknown here, but Oriental immigrants have brought it and spread it and now there are many victims to its contagion among our native population.

More recently pellagra, known to have been prevalent in Italy for more than a century and a half, has been discovered in the United States and is spreading with considerable rapidity, some estimates placing the number of cases as high as a hundred thousand in this country at present. Most of these are in the South though there are not a few in the Northern States and some cases even in New England.

Very little is known about this mysterious disease except its awful effects which some authorities declare to be even worse than those of leprosy.

The ravages of pellagra were first attributed to the eating of moldy corn meal, but this diagnosis is now said to be incorrect. Its real cause is still a mystery. At one time it was thought to be contagious, but now it is believed not contagious.

In the earlier stages of pellagra it seems to be a skin disease and is at times mistaken for eczema and at other times for erysipelas. The sufferer is afflicted with giddy spells, singing in the ears and unbearable irritation of the skin, certain areas of which become livid and red.

The pellagra victim soon becomes unfit for work. During the first year there is a remission of the disease in summer, and the patient feels better. The improvement, however, is only temporary, for the old symptoms reappear in a more aggravated form.

From year to year this condition will go on, the sufferer growing gradually worse, the pupils of the eyes becoming dilated, the eyelids drooping, sight failing, the surface of the tongue becoming red and dry and the throat rigid. Finally the whole body looks as though it were mummified, the sufferer frequently becomes insane or an imbecile and sinks into the depths of melancholy until death ends his sufferings.

Several cases of pellagra have been found in Kansas and Professor S. J. Hunter of the University of Kansas is of the opinion that the germs are carried by sand flies.

The Federal Public Health Commission which has been investigating pellagra in various sections of the south, says in its report that this terrifying disease happily is not communicable but is due to some fault in the diet which has not yet been determined.

It is the opinion of the Commission that pellagra can be prevented, incipient cases cured, and sufferers in advanced stages benefited by substituting a nourishing, well-balanced and varied diet for the restricted, one-sided diet that so many millions are in the habit of daily consuming. The Commission recommends all who are afflicted and all who would escape affliction to eat abundantly of eggs, fresh lean meat, beans, peas, and drink large quantities of fresh milk. We hope these facts will prove of interest to our readers and be the means of restoring to health many of those who are suffering from this dread disease.

Foreign Intervention In Mexico

WHAT are we going to do to Mexico? Is our Vera Cruz fiasco of last year about to be repeated? It is less than a year since President Wilson withdrew our military and naval forces from Vera Cruz and abandoned that city to the tender mercies of General Carranza's army which entered as our troops retired.

Our forcible taking of Vera Cruz, the previous May, from General Huerta, the self-appointed president of Mexico, helped accomplish his overthrow by the insurgent armies commanded by Generals Carranza, Villa and Zapata. But what good did it do?

Carranza immediately proclaimed himself president; whereupon Villa and Zapata, each ambitious to rule the country, promptly declared war against him. And so the factional fight has continued with intensified bitterness and cruelty. It cannot be dignified as civil war, because neither faction has an organized government behind it. The three principal leaders and innumerable lesser chiefs, each with a little army or a band of brigands, have ravaged the country in successive campaigns of murder, robbery, rape and arson so destructive that large donations of food from the United States have been required to save the people from starvation.

Anarchy reigns in Mexico which has no government nor any prospect of ever having one. Most of its fifteen million inhabitants are the helpless prey of the hundred and fifty thousand armed plunderers that parade as revolutionists, and as there is little left worth stealing in Mexico large bands of these outlaws have recently crossed the border and at the present writing are plundering and murdering the people of Texas and even giving battle to the State militia and U. S. regulars.

The lawless condition of Mexico has grown to be an intolerable menace to the peace of our States that border on that country, and President Wilson is now convinced that, for the protection of our citizens as well as in the interest of the Mexican people who have no hope of deliverance except through foreign intervention, it is the duty of the United States to take vigorous action. At his request the governments of the leading nations of South and Central America have joined him in an effort to induce all factions in Mexico to stop fighting, agree on a temporary government, and then submit to the result of a general election. But as General Carranza has spurned this proposal and announced his determination to make good his claim to the presidency by force of arms, there is reason to fear that our army and navy may have to be sent to drive General Carranza out of Vera Cruz as the initial step in armed intervention to restore peace and establish a respectable, responsible, constitutional government in Mexico.

King Victor Emmanuel

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

The king of Italy, after surveying the situation critically, finally unsheathed his sword. But he is a home-loving monarch, a loving husband, a proud father, much preferring to spend the hours with his children than to be drawn into the seething caldron of war.

Somehow it is quite natural to think of Kaiser William being at the front, or the Czar of Russia, or the King of England. Nicholas of Montenegro and Peter of Servia do not seem out of place at the head of their troops, away from their families. But it is hard to reconcile Victor Emmanuel in the role of a soldier, in the role of anything but a peaceful monarch, though he is recognized all over Europe as one of the ablest strategists.

King Victor Emmanuel is the idol of his people, because he believes in democracy. He rules to serve his people, not to command them. Everywhere, his people, whether north or south, east or west speak of him with the same genuine enthusiasm and love. This is true of his subjects, though he means more to his army. He likes to fraternize with his soldiers and listen to their stories and their experiences. Though a firm believer in peace, he likewise is a firm believer in preparedness. The king has assumed the command of the army and navy forces of his country, which will necessitate his being away from his family the greater part of the time.

It was in Venice that Victor Emmanuel, then the crown prince of Italy, met his future wife, Elena, a Montenegrin princess. She was there with her mother and sister, and she dazzled everybody with her rich beauty, accentuated by her brilliant dark eyes and jet black hair. The young prince was charmed. The love of the prince was returned by the princess, and much to the surprise of royalty, they became engaged. Emperor Alexander III of Russia had hoped to welcome Elena as the bride of his oldest son, and with this in view had gone to the expense of having her educated in Petrograd. Hence the surprise of royalty when she accepted the proposal of the future king of Italy.

Victor Emmanuel and the princess were married in Naples. It was with some fear that Elena went to Rome to make her debut at the Quirinal. She knew that every one at court would be eager to note how a modern Montenegrin girl would conduct herself at the brilliant court of Rome. But she won them all immediately by her beauty and unaffected manner. So began the married life of Victor Emmanuel and his consort. They are no less sweethearts today and devotedly fond of their children.

The king began his military training on reaching his teens. He was educated under Colonel Osio, who taught him the highest forms of strategy. After a year's service like other Italians of rank he was given command of a regiment and rose rapidly. Then he went aboard a man-o'-war and got the same broad experience. When King Victor Emmanuel took the throne he made many reforms in his government, especially of the military branch. Like the king, Queen Elena is idolized by her people. She is a mother first and a queen last, and she has always seemed willing to forget her own interests when her subjects' welfare is threatened. Often has Queen Elena gone out among the sick and suffering of Italy to administer comfort and aid—sometimes at the risk of her own life. The most memorable incident of this character occurred at the time of the earthquake at Messina. As soon as she learned that the king was hurrying there she made ready to accompany him. King Victor Emmanuel tried in vain to persuade her to remain behind. So she went to the stricken district, impatient to assist in this difficult and dangerous work, helping the Red Cross to care for hundreds of unfortunates, many of them lifeless. While engaged in this work there she suffered an injury to her arm, which has caused much concern since. She has often shown the same heroism and patriotism when Naples and the surrounding country have been threatened by earthquakes or cholera. She has been given the Legion of Honor, presented by the Republic of France in Italy by their representative.

In times of peace and prosperity Queen Elena has helped the women and children of her country in a great many ways. She has founded creches where working mothers may leave their children while toiling, and where they may be sure of good food and attention. She has spent much of her own fortune in establishing hospitals for women and children. She was the first woman to found kindergartens in Italy, giving Doctor Maria Montessori her hearty support and co-operation in the work among the tenement districts of Rome.

When the king and queen are together the discrepancy of their height is particularly noticeable, for she is a very tall woman. This is a point on which the king is very sensitive. He is scarcely five feet high, and walks with a slight limp.

The King is not artistic, none of the Italian kings have been, strangely enough. His mother and his wife are musicians and the latter has written poetry, but the king can hardly play the simplest music on the piano. But Victor Emmanuel is a student, he is a master of the science of electricity. He was one of the first and most successful experimenters with X ray after its discovery. He speaks French, English and German with equal fluency, is accurately informed in history and geography and has zealously devoted much attention to his military training and studies.

He has displayed cool-headed judgment, liberality, consideration for all people, and an understanding of his kingdom and subjects such as few contemporary monarchs have shown.

The Palace Where Moses Lived, Unearthed

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Pub., Inc.

The very palace in which the great leader of the Israelites was educated and prepared for his life work, has been unearthed in Egypt. The Israelites were oppressed with hard labor and building up cities—and "the Israelites were commanded to do these things" by the Pharaoh, Rameses II, who ruled Egypt when Moses was born and who caused this oppression also said that "Every son that is born ye shall cast into the river, and every daughter ye shall keep alive." (Exodus I:22).

So the mother of Moses fearing to keep the child longer with her, after three months, placed the infant in a little box well covered with slime and pitch, so that it would not leak and laid it near the river bank among the bulrushes, and Miriam his sister watched over him.

And as the Bible relates: "The daughter of Pharaoh came down to wash herself at the river; and her maidens walked along by the river's side; and when she saw the ark among the flags, she sent her maid to fetch. And when she had opened it she saw the child: and behold, the baby wept. And she had compassion on him, and said: "This is one of the Hebrew's children." (Exodus II, 5-6).

Then Pharaoh's daughter told Miriam, when she approached, to bring a nurse to take care of the child, naturally the sister brought his mother. "And the child grew and she brought him unto Pharaoh's daughter, and he became her son."

The adoption of Moses by Pharaoh's daughter made possible all the life history of Moses.

At that time Egypt was a great center of learning and science. This culture was not given to the people, but to the ruling classes, the priests and Pharaohs. The people were kept in ignorance, making it less difficult to rule them and keep them in subjection. The people were not even taught to read and write—so that Moses, being adopted by Pharaoh's daughter was given every opportunity to study, preparing him for his later work, which still stands as the supreme ideal of civilized mankind—especially the Ten Commandments, and which are still used as the moral standard of the world.

So that the finding of the palace where Moses lived for forty years, and doubtless some of the books from which he mastered the great learning of the Egyptians, is of greatest importance and interest.

The wealth of Egypt at that time was almost fabulous. The Pyramids had been built and wonderful temples and palaces. One of these, the temple at Thebes, surpasses in its colossal proportions all buildings of the ancient and modern world.

To have lived at this time during the wonderful reign of this mighty Rameses and to have been a prince in his very household, was a most remarkable good fortune and no doubt Moses made every possible use of these opportunities as his life has shown.

To have found this palace is a great achievement and one in which all the world will eagerly wait for further findings in its ruins.

A Magnetic Rake

A Chicago man has invented a magnetic rake which is operated on the vacuum-sweeper plan for removing nails and bits of steel from driveways where they often injure the feet of horses traveling over them. The teeth of the rake are magnetized by an electric current and are drawn over the roadway from which they remove every particle of dangerous steel.

Negroes in The U. S. A.

The number of negroes in the United States proper in 1910 was 9,827,763, compared with 8,833,994 in 1900, or an increase of 993,769, the Census Bureau announces. In 1910, negroes formed 10.7 per cent. of the total population, against 11.6 per cent. in 1900. The increase for the decade was 11.2, compared with 20.8 per cent. among the native whites and of 30.7 per cent among the foreign-born whites.

The Pestiferous Sparrow

One more serious crime is laid at the door of the pestiferous sparrow. A St. Louis, Mo., investigator has found that these birds by stripping the bark from cedar trees to be used as material for constructing nests, cause the death of numerous trees. The birds use great quantities of material in building their nests and the denuding of the trees for this purpose proves disastrous in a short time.

For Pirates' Treasure.

A San Francisco firm whose business is to seek salvage from the sea in all parts of the world has fitted out a schooner which has been dispatched to Magdalena bay to search for treasure supposed to have been lost there in the wreckage of pirate vessels which made their headquarters in the bay and adjacent waters many years ago.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to print letters requesting patterns, quilt pieces, etc., for the purpose of, or with the expectation of receiving the equivalent in return, for this is not an exchange column.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, Care COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

IN various letters mention has been made of "Parent-Teacher Associations" and while the majority of these have been from Southern states, I see no reason why the idea should not be equally productive of good results in any state. At this season of the year the school is quite in evidence, but the distressing side of the matter is that the parents allow this enthusiasm to wane and blissfully continue to throw more and more of the responsibility on the teacher.

In one case that I have in mind, the school building was a fairly up-to-date one, the teachers of the best and the community in general, intelligent and capable of appreciation, but with all these there was an indefinable something lacking. Finally some of the more progressive mothers called a meeting in the schoolhouse and the matter was threshed out with the result that a Parent-Teacher Improvement Association was formed.

Now this same school boasts a well-stocked library, open to the town, various other improvements and even a fund toward a school piano. It was accomplished by the working together of the parents for a cause of interest to all—the welfare of the children, and I feel that other schools and communities can do as well with as little effort. Here's wishing you success.—ED.

DETROIT, MICH.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for three years and I think it is a fine family paper, and brings much ple sure to the readers, especially those living in the country. I don't read it as much as I would like to, as I am a very busy woman living in the city of Detroit, but I always read the Cousins' Corner and portions of the sisters, and I want to say that I indorse all Annie Kirk has said respecting personal description. I think it perfect nonsense. Just let me say that instead of the sisters describing their beauty, let them follow A. Kirk's example and send the dear shutins a little cheer. I am sending cheer to one, reading matter only. If the sisters will send as much as I am sending, they will get more than a dime shower as requested. And as regards Uncle Charlie's birthday shower I do wish the sisters would join me and a friend in sending him a silver shower, and let the minimum be fifty cents and as much more as you see fit. I do not ask you to do so, I only suggest. How nice it would be if two or three thousand would give him this cheer. I think it is only a duty we owe to him seeing he does so much for the people, and being a shut-in himself it is only right to give him a little encouragement, and do not expect him to send personal letters as he could tell us through the columns of COMFORT how much he received.

With best wishes to all the sisters and Mrs. Wilkinson, I remain, Yours faithfully, MRS. MEISSNER.

SNYDER, TEXAS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

I have just finished reading the many good letters in our March issue, and as the sisters have been discussing city and farm life, I feel I must write to the page, but I beg that you will excuse my many mistakes. I was reared on a farm and my school days were very few. I was the second child and the eldest girl in a family of seven children; our dear mother was sick the greater part of her life, and the most of my girlhood days were spent doing the housework, caring for mother, and in the field; the school terms were short in the country and the little time we went to school we walked two and three miles. My oldest brother and I failed in getting the education we so much desired. When a little boy he made a solemn vow that if he didn't work himself to death before he was a man he would never be a farmer, and I vowed that when I became grown (if I looked well enough for any man to care for me) I would not marry a farmer. These vows we both kept. Some say life on a farm is so independent, well I lived on the farm twenty-six years, and failed to have any independence. If there was to be a picnic a few miles away, the teams were too tired to drive, or else Peggy's young calf must be cared for, or probably old Speckle would come off the nest that very day with a brood of chicks that must have attention. We couldn't go to the river for a few days' fishing and outing, for neighbor Jones's cattle would likely break into the field and destroy our crops, and if the crop was laid by, winter wood must be cut, the barn and fences needed repairing, quilts and comforts to be made, fruit to dry and can, old dried beans and peas to gather and clean, there was always something to do on the farm.

We have one little girl of thirteen winters and our one aim in life is to educate her. We shudder to think of her little shoulders being stooped, back bent, and health broken, by dragging a cotton sack or using the hoe. I know many women that have lost their health on the farm. We don't want our girl to think she is better than the field girl, or that she is too good to work, but there is always work enough in the house for a girl to do; she wasn't created to do a man's work on the farm.

And sisters, another thing we teach our girl not to snub a schoolmate that has less of this world's goods than we. In this town such a distinction is made between the working girl and the so-called society girl, on our street there is a sweet, modest, young lady, working hard at home to help support her father, mother and self. On the same street are girls more fortunate, they have nice homes, their music, their friends, they dress, and entertain. Do they ever call on the girl that is working? No, no, their set would snub them. I wonder why they never think how lonely this girl must feel, how much happier they could make her by inviting her to take a stroll with them on a Sunday afternoon, or to church some evening, or the opera some Saturday eve. I wonder if they know that a good way to be happy is in making others happy?

We live in a nice little town in western Texas,

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

SEPTEMBER, in the Northern States, is the mouth for preserving and canning fall fruits from which also an endless variety of delicious jams, jellies, marmalades and sweet pickles may be made at this season to be put away for use through the coming year, and it is preeminently the pickling month.

Pickling and preserving are laborious but the results are well worth the time and effort which the thrifty housewife will not begrudge, considering how much an abundant supply and goodly variety of these delicacies and relishes add of appetizing quality and dietary value to the home larder.

It is a shame for farm families not to put up an ample store of preserved, canned and pickled products of garden and orchard.—Ed.

TO STERILIZE JARS.—Wash jars and fill with cold water. Set in a kettle on a frame and surround with cold water. Heat gradually to boiling point, remove from water, empty and fill while hot. Put covers in hot water and let stand five minutes. Dip rubber bands in hot water but do not allow them to stand. New rubbers should be used each season.—Ed.

APPLE JELLY.—Wipe apples, remove stem and blossom ends, and cut in quarters. Put in a granite or porcelain-lined preserving kettle, and add cold water to come nearly to top of apples. Cover, and cook slowly until apples are soft; mash, and drain through a coarse sieve. Avoid squeezing apples, which makes jelly cloudy. Then allow juice to drip through a double thickness of cheese-cloth or a jelly bag. Boil twenty minutes, and add an equal quantity of heated sugar; boil five minutes, skim, and turn in glasses. Put in a sunny window, and let stand twenty-four hours. Cover, and keep in a cool, dry place. Porter apples make a delicious flavored jelly. If apples are pared the jelly will be lighter in color. Gravenstein apples make a very spicy jelly.

TO HEAT SUGAR.—Put in a granite dish, place in oven, leaving oven door ajar, and stir occasionally.

QUINCE JELLY.—Follow recipe for apple jelly using quinces in place of apples, and removing seeds from fruit. Quince parings and cores are often used for jelly, the better part of the fruit being used for canning.

CRAB APPLE JELLY.—Follow recipe for apple jelly leaving apples whole instead of cutting in quarters.

GRAPE JELLY.—Grapes should be picked over, washed, and stems removed before putting into a preserving kettle. Heat to boiling-point, mash, and boil thirty minutes; then proceed as for currant jelly. Wild grapes make the best jelly.

GREEN GRAPE JELLY.—Grapes should be picked when just begining to turn. Make same as grape jelly.

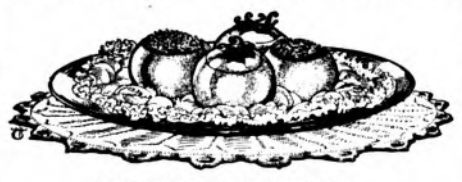
DAMSON JELLY.—Wipe and pick over damsons; then prick several times with a large pin. Make same as currant jelly, using three quarters as much sugar as fruit juice.

GRAPE MARMALADE.—Pick over, wash, drain, and remove stems from grapes. Separate pulp from skins. Put pulp in preserving kettle. Heat to boiling-point, and cook slowly until seeds separate from pulp; then run through a hair sieve. Return to kettle with skins, add an equal measure of sugar, and cook slowly thirty minutes, occasionally stirring to prevent burning. Put in a stone jar or tumblers.

QUINCE MARMALADE.—Wipe quinces, remove blossom ends, cut in quarters, remove seeds, then cut in small pieces. Put into a preserving kettle, and add enough water to nearly cover. Cook slowly until soft. Rub through a hair sieve, and add three quarters its measure of heated sugar. Cook slowly twenty minutes, stirring occasionally to prevent burning. Put in tumblers.

QUINCE HONEY.—Pare and grate five large quinces. To one pint boiling water add five pounds sugar. Stir over fire until sugar is dissolved, add quince and cook fifteen or twenty minutes. Turn into glasses. When cold it should be about the color and consistency of honey.

DAMSON PRESERVES.—Wipe damsons with a piece of cheese-cloth wrung out of cold water, and prick each fruit five or six times, using a large needle; then weigh. Make a syrup by boiling three quarters their weight in sugar with water, allowing one cup to each pound of sugar. As soon as syrup reaches boiling-point, skim, and add plums, a few at a time, that fruit may better keep in shape during cooking. Cook until soft. It is well to use two kettles, that work may be more quickly done and syrup need not cook too long a time. Put into glass or stone jars.



PEAR CHIPS.—Eight pounds pears, one quarter pound Canton ginger, four pounds sugar, four lemons. Wipe pears, remove stems, quarter and core; then cut in small pieces. Add sugar and ginger, and let stand over night. In the morning add lemons cut in small pieces, rejecting seeds, and cook slowly three hours. Put into a stone jar.

SWEET PICKLED PEACHES.—One half peck peaches, one pint vinegar, two pounds brown sugar, one ounce stick cinnamon. Boil sugar, vinegar and cinnamon twenty minutes. Dip peaches quickly in hot water, then rub off the fur with a towel. Stick each peach with four cloves. Put into syrup, and cook until soft, using one half peaches at a time.

SWEET PICKLED PEARS.—Follow recipe for Sweet Pickled Peaches, using pears in place of peaches.

CABBAGE SALAD.—Shred very fine a small head of cabbage, add a chopped onion, seasoning of salt and pepper, then pour over the vegetable the fat from a slice of fried, diced salt pork, the little brown pieces of pork are an addition to the salad. Heat a half cup of vinegar boiling hot in the frying pan in which the pork was cooked, and pour over the cabbage.

TOMATOES STUFFED WITH RICE.—Select smooth, well-shaped tomatoes. For every six allow three tablespoons of rice, one ounce of butter, one onion, chopped fine, one half a green pepper, cut into small pieces, salt and pepper to taste. Cut a slice off the blossom end of each tomato and scoop out the insides. Put the rice on in a dish of boiling water and cook for fifteen minutes. Drain through a colander and rinse with cold water. Melt the butter and add to it the onion and green pepper and six tablespoons of the inside of the tomato. Add rice and cook for five or six minutes longer. Fill the tomatoes with the mixture and place in a buttered baking pan with open ends down. Cook in a moderate oven until tender.

CANNED TOMATOES.—Peel and let come to a boil, without water; add considerable salt and can hot. I have never lost any by this recipe.

MRS. M. E. NOONAN, Greely, Nebr.

SWEET TOMATO PICKLES.—Use one gallon of tomatoes. Slice, salt and drain over night in a colander. Add one quart of vinegar, one pound of brown sugar, one heaping teaspoon of all kinds of spices, and the same of mustard and cayenne pepper. Boil until tender.

TOMATO SAUCE.—When ripe take off the green stalks from the tomatoes. Wipe them clean, and place in a slow oven, where they must remain till quite soft. Then work them through a sieve and take out the seeds; and add, to every two pounds of tomatoes, one pint of good white wine vinegar, one dozen chilies, quarter of a pound of garlic, quarter of a pound of shallots shred very thin, one ounce of ground white pepper, and a good handful of salt. Boil all together, till the garlic and shallots are soft; then strain and skim off the froth, and if too thick add a little more vinegar. When cold, bottle it in wide-mouthed bottles. This sauce may be kept several years, and will improve with age. In addition to the above ingredients half an ounce of ground ginger may be added.

JULIA TOBOLA, 1216 Jackson St., Houston, Texas.

GREEN TOMATO SWEET PICKLE.—Peel small green tomatoes, place on stove and cook a few minutes. Put in glass jars and have ready a mixture of one cup sugar, one cup vinegar, spice to taste, boil and pour over tomatoes and seal.

MRS. DELLA SIMMONS, White Lake, S. Dak.

CHILI SAUCE, UNCOOKED.—One peck of ripe tomatoes, chop and drain in sieve till water is all out; then add one cup of grated horseradish, one cup of white mustard seed, two large peppers, chopped fine, one cup of onions, one cup of sugar, one tablespoon of black pepper, one quart of vinegar, a little salt; by adding double the amount of horseradish it will keep better.

COOKED CHILI SAUCE.—Twelve tomatoes or one quart ripe or green, four onions chopped, one tablespoon of salt, four green peppers, one teaspoon each of mustard, cinnamon, cloves, allspice and ginger, one pint of vinegar, one half cup of sugar, boil one hour. A. B. C.

TOMATO CATSUP.—Scald and peel twelve large ripe tomatoes; chop fine two large onions and four green peppers; add four cups of vinegar, two tablespoons each of salt, brown sugar and ginger, one tablespoon of cinnamon and one of mustard, and half of a grated nutmeg; boil all together until thoroughly cooked, which requires nearly three hours, stirring frequently. Bottle while hot.

APPLE MARMALADE.—Simmer some apples in water until they become tender, then let them drain. Afterwards strain them through a sieve, and boil them with a strong syrup containing three quarters of a pound of sugar to each pound of fruit. Mix the whole together, putting it in pots or glasses.

BREADED TOMATOES.—Pare and slice the tomatoes and after seasoning with salt and pepper, dip each slice in beaten egg and then in bread crumbs; when all the slices have been treated in this manner, dip them again in the eggs and crumbs and place them in the frying basket. Cook for one or two minutes in boiling fat.

DRIED CORN.—Select ears in roasting stage, boil till done, cut thin slices from the ends of grain and scrape rest of corn from cob with sharp knife. Place in pans put in warm (but not hot) oven till it begins to shrink, and then place in hot sun, which will finish the drying process. The above method will be found both easy and practical.

MRS. BERTHA STOVALL, Freeburg, Mo.

PICKLED BEETS.—Boil the beets until tender; remove the skins and slice while hot. Cover with hot, spiced vinegar that has been well sweetened.—Ed.

SWEET BEET PICKLES.—Boil the beets till tender; peel and place in half gallon jars. Put on top of beets in jar one teaspoon of salt and one tablespoon of sugar. Bring vinegar to a boil and pour over beets in jar and seal. R. A. CLARK, Stephenville, Texas.

BEET RELISH.—One quart of boiled beets, chopped; one cup of chopped cabbage, raw; one half cup of ground horseradish; one cup or less of sugar; and two cups of vinegar. Mix thoroughly and pack in jars.

MRS. S. THOMPSON, Highwood Station, New Haven, Conn.

WATERMELON SWEET PICKLES.—Boil five pounds of fruit in clear water until tender; drain and put into one pint of vinegar and nearly three pounds of sugar. Use various spices put in a thin cloth. Cook until well flavored.—Ed.

LAST OF THE GARDEN.—One gallon green tomatoes, chopped fine, sprinkle a little salt over, let stand a few hours then drain; one gallon of cabbage, chopped fine; one half gallon of corn, cut off cob after it is cooked; one gallon of string beans, cooked; one gallon of hulled beans, cooked; one dozen of mango peppers, chopped fine; one dozen onions, chopped fine; four ripe cucumbers, quartered, cooked a little; six carrots, cooked; one gallon small cucumbers; one gallon vinegar; two tablespoons mustard seed; three pounds brown sugar, ginger and pepper to suit taste. Add all together and boil twenty minutes. Seal hot.

MRS. EMMA RUFF, Goose Bill, Mont.

GREEN TOMATO PRESERVE.—One half peck of green tomatoes sliced, three lemons sliced and simmered in water until soft then add to the tomatoes two thirds of a pound of sugar. Measure sugar scant. Simmer all together until soft and quite thick. Some add ginger root in small quantity to the preserves while cooking. This will be found a welcome change from the ripe fruit preserves.—Ed.

COFFEE CAKE.—One cup of sugar, one cup of molasses, two cups of raisins, one cup of butter, one cup of strong coffee, one egg, five cups of flour, one teaspoon of cinnamon, one teaspoon of soda, added to coffee, and one quarter teaspoon of cloves.

ETTA MAY BIRD, Iuka, Ill.

SPICE CAKE.—One cup sugar, one half cup shortening, beaten till creamy, one egg, one cup sour milk, one teaspoon of soda, one half teaspoon of cinnamon, allspice and nutmeg; beat well, then stir in enough flour to make stiff batter, add raisins and nut meats to suit. Bake in quick oven.

FRUIT TOAST.—Toast bread to a crispy brown. Crush any desired fruit with sugar and spread on toast, which has been buttered to suit taste. Serve with small amount of whipped cream.

BANANA CUSTARD.—Beat well together three eggs and one half cup of sugar. Add one and one half cups of milk and the grated rind of one lemon and enough mashed banana until it is of the consistency of thin batter. Bake till a light brown. When cool, cover the top with a meringue made of the beaten whites of two eggs and four tablespoons of sugar; return to oven to brown. Serve cold.—Ed.

GINGER COOKIES.—One and one half cups of molasses, one half cup of sugar, one cup of butter, three eggs. Beat eggs, sugar and butter together. Two teaspoons soda beaten in the molasses, one tablespoon cinnamon, one teaspoon ginger, one half cup sweet milk, flour enough to roll.

MISS LOUISA V. YOUNT, Shirley, Mo.

RAISIN SANDWICHES.—Chop a cupful of raisins to a fine paste. Spread bread with softened butter, then with a layer of the raisin paste. Cut the slices in strips and serve.

APPLE AND CHEESE SANDWICHES.—Chop a half cupful of good flavored apples and a half cupful of walnuts with a quarter of a cup of cheese. Mix well and use for salad filling, moistened with salad dressing.

NUT SANDWICHES.—Chop half a cup each of raisins and nuts, mix with salad dressing and spread on buttered bread.

ONION AND CELERY SANDWICHES.—Soak a good-sized onion and one head of celery in cold water for an hour. Drain and cut in small pieces, mix with French dressing and spread on well-buttered bread.—Ed.

That Dish

of Baked Beans may do once in a while. But the beans are broken. Some are crisp and some mushy. Sauce must be added to make them appealing.

The beans are not half-baked. They are hard to digest. That's why you who serve that kind do not serve them often.

This Dish

of Baked Beans is Van Camp's. The beans are whole and mellow. The sauce is baked in—a sauce of wondrous zest.

These beans are twice-baked, compared with the others. They easily digest. Folks who serve this kind consider Baked Beans a lovable, royal dish.

VAN CAMP'S
PORK & BEANS BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE

Also Baked Without the Sauce

10, 15 and 20 Cents Per Can

Here is a dish which costs like beans and feeds like meat.

Everybody likes it—men in particular. Thousands of restaurants buy Van Camp's for men.

It means better meals, lower food bills, less cooking. Van Camp's displaces meat. It means right cooking in place of wrong.

Don't class it with Baked Beans in general. It's a distinctive dish. It's a result of real genius, plus modern invention.

You will keep a shelf full of it when you find it out.

Buy a can of Van Camp's Beans to try. If you do not find them the best you ever ate, your grocer will refund your money.

Edna's Secret Marriage

By Charles Garvice

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Weston, old and wealthy, knowing he has but a few days to live, sends for Richard Burdon, his lawyer. Remembering a debt he owes Charles More, he revokes a will in favor of a younger brother's child and makes a new one, disposing of the lives and hearts of two, and leaves it for Mr. Burdon to carry out his bequests. The banker is found dead the next morning. Sixteen years later Sir Cyril More with wealth squandered and no aim in life, finds himself at Lucerne, Switzerland, where he meets Edna Weston, who has only Aunt Martha. Edna inquires of Sir Cyril if he knows Richard Burdon. Her father, on his death-bed charges her to go to him the first of the following September. Edna and her aunt board at the Pension, a Swiss boarding house and Sir Cyril leaves the Grand for the Pension Petre, where he gives his name to Edna and her aunt as Harold Payne. Seated in an arbor Cyril hears voices and recognizes Mr. Howley Jones, who admits being a chum of Cyril More, who has completely gone to the dogs, squandering all his money on Glitters. Edna listens and questions if he knows Sir Cyril and is it all true? He admits he has heard of him. Later Cyril meets Miss Glitters and requests her not to tell he is there. Passing on he sees Edna who has witnessed his greeting with Glitters.

A few days later, Aunt Martha, Edna, Sir Cyril and others go by train to the top of the Rigi. Returning, Cyril and Edna decide to walk down. A mist, preventing them from following the path, envelops them, and rather than have him leave her to find the path, she would rather die. Cyril clasps her in his arms, and she admits her love and promises to marry him. Without telling their secret, they go to a little Protestant church four hours' ride from Lucerne and are made one. Returning Edna realizes that Aunt Martha must be told. Coming to the Cathedral Edna recalls she has left her crepe shawl. Leaving her upon the Cathedral steps Cyril returns for it. Miss Glitters comes along and she remembers having seen Edna at the entrance of the Grand Hotel and knows she is waiting for the gentleman with whom she has seen her before. She tells Edna of his broken promises, shows her the face in the locket she wears, begs of her never to see him again and leaves her crushed with grief. Cyril returns and seeing the agony in Edna's face implores her to tell him the cause. She upbraids him for the wrong he has done. Filled with remorse he parts from her. She tries to call him back; it is too late.

Mr. Richard Burdon and Edward More, brother of Sir Cyril More, in legal consultation, learn the contents of John Weston's will and the fortune awaiting Sir Cyril More which Edward More regrets. Aunt Martha and Edna are announced. Previous to Mr. Burdon reading the will to Edna, he explains its purport, —John Weston, grateful to Sir Charles More, who saves him from financial ruin, and desirous to enrich his descendants devises the scheme of disposing of his vast wealth by the marriage of his niece Edna Weston to Sir Cyril More,—the fortune going to either Edna Weston or Sir Cyril More or to both in equal shares on one condition, that they become man and wife, leaving each free to decline or accept, without depriving the other of his or her chance of it. The choice resting with Sir Cyril, Mr. Burdon sends for him. He comes reluctantly not knowing a fortune awaits him or the conditions to which he must comply. Learning them he declines to marry Miss Weston and writes her a letter withdrawing any claim he may have had or may still have to the money accounted for in the deed. Edna insists that Sir Cyril shall share the fortune with her. Mr. Burdon, knowing Sir Cyril as he does, Edna must keep it. Mr. and Mrs. Edward More call and Edna and her aunt accept an invitation to visit at Acacia Lodge, preparatory to their going to Rosedene which adjoins More Park. Edna captures the love of Bertie More whose voice reminds her of another's.

CHAPTER XV.

ROSEDENE.

NEEDS must when money drives; and money, directed by Mr. Burdon, drove so hard that before the spring had well set in Rosedene was ready for its young mistress. Mr. Burdon had not exaggerated when he had described it as a magnificent place; indeed, there were few estates of its size so beautifully placed, and no residence of twice its size so complete in all its appointments. Upholsterers and decorators had received almost carte blanche, and the whole place was fitted throughout in the most princely fashion; almost too princely, for Edna was astonished at the magnificence and luxury of her new abode. In the spring, just before the London season commenced, she went down, and all the country was at once thrown into a mild state of excitement and curiosity respecting the new resident, John Weston's heiress. Long before this the romantic circumstances connected with her inheritance had leaked out, and all were anxious to see the girl, rather than marry whom Sir Cyril had cast away a fortune.

For some little time Edna and Aunt Martha were to be left to revel in their new glory alone, Mr. and Mrs. Edward More being unable to leave home, but they had promised a visit—a long visit—in which Bertie was to accompany them. Edna was sorry to part with the boy, even for so short a time, but she was almost glad that Mr. and Mrs. More had postponed their visit.

"I should like to get a little used to all this grandeur first, Aunt Martha," she said, as they stood in the hall, with its polished oak walls and ceiling and tesselated floor.

"I shall never get used to it, my dear," sighed Aunt Martha, in despair. "Why, it is a palace!—the drawing-room is something beyond description, and the dining-room is like a banqueting hall!"

"We shall lose each other, aunt!" laughed Edna. "I hope there are one or two snug, little rooms in which we can hide our heads occasionally."

There were two or three such rooms, and Edna found adjoining her own apartments a delicious little boudoir, hung with a warm damask, and furnished with a hundred little feminine knicknacks. There was an army of servants, male and female, but the steward and major-domo, together with the housekeeper, were responsible for the subordinates, and Edna had only to express a wish to find it gratified. Mr. Burdon had given her some idea of the extent of the grounds attached to the place, but Edna lost no time in investigating for herself. The spring had set in balmy and soft, with sweet breezes from the south, and it was quite warm enough, after the brisk air of Switzerland, for her to roam about the immense place in her modest straw hat and jacket. For the first few days little was done by either of them, excepting a cursory inspection of the house, settling where they should breakfast and dine, and which of the three drawing-rooms they should use, in each case both of them choosing the smallest of the rooms in question. At last Edna felt settled enough to look forward to the invasion of the neighbors, as Aunt Martha called it.

"I tremble, my dear, when I think of the duchess!" she declared.

But Edna laughed calmly.

"I suspect she will be very little more terrible than anybody else, aunt."

She had made the democratic assertion as she was standing on the broad steps that stretched from the hall down to the great lawn, and with the smile still in her face tripped lightly down the steps for her morning ramble. Two footmen and a porter stood aside statuesque and on the alert in case their mistress should have any commands for them, but Edna passed on, and drinking in the fresh morning air passed along the winding paths with a light foot, and made for what had, at first acquaintance asserted, a charm for her—the woods and preserves. These were approached after leaving the little stretch of ornamental garden, with its multitude of parterres, gay with tulip and hyacinths, and relieved by the gleam of white statuary and swiftly rising fountains, through a shrubbery in which the last tenant had succeeded in gathering as choice a collection of plants as any in the kingdom. At the end of the shrubbery the wood commenced. Edna passed two or three gardeners, who all touched their hats and seemed very gratified by the pleasant, kindly nod they got in response, and then snuffing at the odor of the pines, followed the narrow, beaten footpath.

It was the first time she had ventured into the wood, and she was conscious of that subtle pleasure which all of us feel when we are examining, for the first time, a newly acquired possession. It was difficult to believe, even now, that it was all hers—every gigantic elm and spreading oak, every hare that flitted across her path, and every bird that flew with a frightened rustle above her head. The reflection, the sense of possession, pleased, and yet saddened, her in a singular way, and the smile with which she had started, gave place to that pensive, abstracted look which Mr. Burdon had so particularly remarked. She was so lost in thought that the sudden appearance of a man on his knees at the foot of a magnificent fir, startled and alarmed her. At first sight, and judging by his brown, rough suit, she thought it was a keeper, and smiling at the idea of being alarmed by one of her own servants, she was about to pass on, when the man, hearing her light footfall behind him, turned his head, and Edna knew that it was a gentleman. He was on his feet in an instant, but without any appearance of hurry, and with due composure, raised his soft felt hat. As he did so, Edna was struck by the grand, masterful expression of the high forehead and the serene power of the rugged, plainly marked face. Instinctively she paused a moment, and the gentleman, partly feeling that something more than a silent recognition of her presence was required of him, said:

"A very beautiful morning."

"Yes," assented Edna, "very beautiful." Then, in her impulsive, unconventional way, asked: "Were you looking for anything you have lost?"

"No," he replied, adding, with a smile that appeared for a moment and seemed to light up his grave face in a remarkable way: "Nothing that I have lost—nor for a hare—although I must have looked like a poacher."

Enda smiled and shook her head.

"I was looking at these cones," he continued, coming a step closer, and holding out his hand in which was a large fir cone, half stripped of its scales.

"At a fir cone?" asked Edna, curiously.

"Yes," he continued, his interest apparently centered in the little object. "I don't know whether you have ever noticed—I had never done so until this morning—how singularly this seed is formed. You see," and he turned the cone over with his fingers with the air of an enthusiast, "the shells are perfectly regular, in alternate rows, with an irregular line in between; the germinating powers lie between the fifth and sixth row—just here where this little red spider has built its nest. The little fellow seems to have eaten away the vital portion of the shell; perhaps, but for him and his kindred, this spot would, in a hundred years, be choked with young firs, and all Rosedene a dense forest instead of the plaisance it is."

Edna started at this strange speech, made all the stranger by the speaker's evident unconsciousness of there being anything unusual in it. In spite of herself Edna was interested.

"I am afraid I am not botanist enough to offer an opinion," she said.

"Ah!" said the stranger, thrusting his hand into the large pocket of his old shooting coat. "I was just going to show you some fine specimens of the hart's tongue; I don't think they grow to such perfection anywhere as they do in Rosedene." Then as if the name had reminded him, he looked up with a little, sudden knitting of the brows.

"That recalls me to a sense of my ill-manners. I am afraid I am trespassing—indeed, I know I am. I have been so used to ramble through these woods as if they were my own that, being a creature of habit—painfully so, which is, by the way, no excuse for my intrusion—my feet strayed in here this morning against my will. I hope that I may be forgiven," and he removed his hat with a gesture that was striking in its dignified humility and high breeding.

Edna colored with a sense of pleasure; at least, there was one delight in being owner of Rosedene.

"There is nothing to forgive," she said, with her own frank graciousness. "I feel more like a trespasser than you, as I am a great stranger. I was going to ask you if you could tell me the way to More Park—I mean to some spot where I could get a view of the house. I know that it lies in this direction."

"Yes," said the gentleman, looking as if he were rather puzzled by the question; indeed, being a creature of more habits than one, and talking aloud unconsciously being one of his most marked, he explained his perplexity by muttering in a voice quite audible to Edna: "Hem! one of the visitors, I suppose." Then aloud: "If you follow this path until you come to the head keeper's cottage—Keeper's Lodge, it is called—and then strike to the right again until you reach the wooden cross——"

"Edna's smile of assumed confusion pulled him up.

"I see," he said, "you are indeed a stranger here, and my directions, like most of their kind, are more embarrassing than helpful. Will you allow me to show you the way?"

"I don't like to trouble you," said Edna. "One of the keepers——"

The gentleman bowed placidly, evidently too high bred to force his escort upon her; and Edna, half sorry that she had not accepted his guidance as frankly as it had been offered, bowed him an adieu and walked on. At a slight bend of the path she looked back and saw that he had seated himself at the foot of an elm, and was absorbed in the occupation of dissecting the fir cone with his pocketknife, and had evidently forgotten everything else.

"I wonder who that may be?" thought Edna. "Some enthusiastic botanist, who thinks that nature's grand secret lies in the petals of a daisy. A gentleman evidently, and not a stranger to the neighborhood, for he said that he was used to wandering about the woods. Yes, it is good to own all this, if only for the pleasure one derives from the power of granting the favor of full and free admittance to whomsoever one pleases."

In a very short time she came upon the keeper's lodge, a pretty, rustic cottage, with thatched roof, wide, sun-sheltering porch, and latticed windows. Two little children were playing on the little open space before the door, and the keeper's wife came out all excitement to courtesy and make obeisance.

Edna spoke to the children in her frank, girlish way, patting their rosy cheeks, and lifting the youngest, a bonny little girl, for a kiss, thereby winning the mother for all eternity, and having left a glow of delight and happiness on the group, went on her way. It was a rather round-about way, as she missed the cross; but suddenly she came upon what she sought. Before her, starting out into view between the tall pines, rose the red-bricked facade of More House. It could not have been seen to better advantage, and to Edna, associated as it was with a subtle sentiment of mystery and romance, it was intensely interesting. To her it looked like the palace of the sleeping beauty, with the spell still unbroken. The windows along its wide-stretching front turning their dusty, shuttered faces to the evening sun, that struggled through the thick belt of trees, and made the neglected garden and weed-grown terrace look weirdly cheerless and solemn.

Edna gazed and gazed until the spell which seemed to hang over the place fell upon her, and she felt a dim consciousness of being a part and parcel of it. Had she seen it before? Never, unless it was in a dream, or an engraving of it in some old, country history among her father's books. Anyway, it seemed familiar to her in a subtle, indefinite degree; and, with a distinct sense of relief, she gradually withdrew her gaze and turned away; but before she did so, she stretched out her arms toward it, saying, wistfully:

"What is there that draws me toward you, old house? Is it because we are both deserted, and left to stand alone in the world?"

"Ah, this is Miss Weston! How do you do?"

"What right have I to be sitting here among these people?"

Yes, it was under a spell—the spell of misfortune and misrule. Only one man at present could break through that harm, and wake the place into life again; and he could have done it easily if he had but consented to marry her; rather than do it, he had chosen to leave the home of his ancestors to ruin and decay.

Edna's cheek burned, her heart throbbed with a sense of humiliation and resentment that, for the moment, overwhelmed all other feelings, and sent her walking fast in her excitement.

She reached the shrubbery without meeting with any further adventure in the way of interesting trespassers, but on coming within sight of the house was rather startled by the appearance of an elegantly appointed carriage, which, with two gigantic footmen and a coachman, in handsome liveries, was standing at the door.

"The invasion has commenced," she thought, as she ran up the steps. "At least, it is no one very formidable; aunt is laughing."

Quite amused at so rare an occurrence, she walked into the smallest of the drawing-rooms, with her hat in her hand, and found a middle-aged lady, with a homely and comely face, and very plainly dressed, seated beside Aunt Martha, and talking away at a good pace. As Edna entered the visitor looked up, and, with an unmistakable expression of pleased surprise and admiration in her eyes, said:

"Ah, this is Miss Weston! How do you do?"

Edna gave her hand, and smiled in answer, looking at Aunt Martha for some information as to the name of the visitor, but Aunt Martha, for some reason best known to herself, sat smiling with amiable inanity.

"So you have been out in the woods, I dare say; I have heard all about you from your aunt. I think Miss Weston and I shall be very good friends, if she will allow me. Do you think you can manage to keep that Swiss color on your cheeks, my dear?—I hope you will. Let me look at you a little closer!" and she drew Edna into a chair beside her, and scanned her sweet and now smiling face intently. "Yes, I see the likeness to your uncle—grand John Weston!—one of the finest men I ever met, in an age of fine men, too! He might have been a peer had he chosen, but he always stuck to it that he was better where he was—plain John Weston, and I am not sure but that he was right. Yes, there is the same look—why, child, you are quite pale now!" she broke off. "That's better!" as Edna blushed. "Ah, we mustn't let you feel dull among us old fogies! I have just been asking Mrs. Weston to bring you over and eat your dinner with us, one day next week. How will Monday suit you? A quiet dinner, with a rubber for us old ones, and some music for you!"

"You are very kind," said Edna, charmed with the motherly tone and manner, which were irresistible, but wondering why Aunt Martha did not let her know who the visitor might be.

"That's settled, then," continued the lady, patting Edna's head. "I am very glad to see you, my dear, and I hope we shall make you happy among us. Bless me, we none of us understood that the great heiress was such a child. Why, my dear, you will have all the men fighting for you, and the worst of the lot running away with you in a post chaise and four. Ah! they don't do that now—more's the pity, sometimes. They did it in our day, Mrs. Weston."

"That they did," said Aunt Martha, starting off in a series of reminiscences. "I remember young Lady Mary running away with Capt. Parker and getting married in an out-of-the-way place, and coming back the same day to her people as if nothing had happened. Why, Edna, my dear, the sun has caught your face, you are quite burned, or perhaps it's the fire after the cold air."

"It's very becoming whatever caused it," said the lady. "Don't let your maid ever tempt you to use the hare's foot, my dear; they will do it if they can, but always stand firm; you have no idea what bother I have had with some of them, but I have always said: 'Cheeks are yellow, are they? I prefer them yellow; keep your rouge pots for French women and play actors'—to whom it is no shame to use it. Well, I must not sit gossiping here all day. You will not forget? Monday, at eight o'clock."

"At eight; very well, your grace," said Aunt Martha, with a look of mild triumph at Edna, who could not repress a little start.

And this chatty, amiable, homely lady was the great duchess! Edna was astonished by the great difference between the reality and the ideal she had imagined of that personage; she did not reflect that the duchess might have shown a very different manner if she had not taken a fancy to her new neighbors.

Her grace was not only pleased with the young heiress and her simple, single-hearted aunt, but charmed with the house and its surroundings.

"I always said it was the prettiest place in the country," she said, as she got into her carriage, and Edna stood at the steps quite at her ease, and making a pretty picture against the background of dark brickwork, "excepting More Park."

Then, as Edna colored, the good-natured duchess remembered the story of wicked Sir Cyril, and anxious to remove any pain her slip of the tongue might have caused, she bent her head and said:

"Good by, my dear; give me a kiss, will you?"

Edna put up her pretty, young face, and the duchess with a sigh—she had no daughter of her own, and she would have bartered her title and the Arleigh jewels for one—was driven off.

CHAPTER XVI.

COUNTY SOCIETY.

The invasion had commenced, for it was soon known that the duchess had called upon Miss Weston, of Rosedene, and that she was favorably impressed. Thereupon everybody else hastened to follow suit and be charmed in like manner.

Before the week was out most of the county families had called or left cards for Miss and Mrs. Weston, and when it was known that they were to dine at the castle, on Monday, the duchess was assailed on all sides with hints and almost outspoken requests for an invitation to meet them; it was not every day that such a romance occurred as that with which Edna was connected, and people were anxious to make the most of it. Monday came round, and Edna and Aunt Martha started for the castle.

It was a drive of an hour through the prettiest part of the county. The moon was fast rising behind the gaunt chimneys of More Park as they passed it, and Edna thought how beautiful it would look when they came back and the moon was high in the heavens.

"If I am asleep and you are awake as we come home, aunt, wake me just here," she said, with a laugh.

Through country lanes, just beginning to grow green, and along well-kept roads, the new carriage took them, and presently Edna saw a vast pile rise in the semi-darkness from a belt of elms with square patches of light streaming into the night; then the carriage rattled over a drawbridge and pulled up with a clatter of restless hoofs at the entrance door of the courtyard.

Instantly three footmen in the ducal livery hastened to assist the Rosedene footmen in the arduous task of letting down the steps and opening the door, and the whole five, with an air of the most profound importance, made a lane for Edna and Aunt Martha to pass through. They entered an enormous hall lined with suits of armor, on which hung portraits of dead and gone Arleighs. Edna noticed a great carved gallery for musicians before she passed out into a broad passage which led to the salons. Footman after footman heralded the way and ushered them, and at last they announced and entered the drawing-room. It was such a blaze of light, and gold and crimson, contrasting with the sober hues of the oaken hall, that Edna was almost blinded and confused, but she saw the duchess and a tall, white-haired man, with a kingly presence, coming toward her, and felt that the latter was the duke. There were about a dozen persons in the room, most of whom were unknown to Enda, and before she had quite recovered her composure.—it was all such a glitter of rank and natural magnificence—a bell rang, and dinner was announced. Eight o'clock to the minute, punctuality being a virtue much respected at the castle.

The guests paired and walked into the adjoining room, a dining-room, just large enough to be noble, and yet not too large for comfort, with paneled oak and walnut, upon which the light of numerous wax candles, held by antique bronzes, was reflected dimly.

Lord Portfield took Edna in, saying as she placed her hand on his arm:

"This is an honor that I did not expect; it was to have fallen to my son, but he is late, unluckily for him."

However, before they had all taken their seats the door was opened, and a footman announced:

"Lord Mersey."

Edna looked up and, lo and behold, there was the man she had taken first for a gamekeeper, and then for a professor on a holiday. Dressed in the regulation suit of sables, the air of high breeding and gentle birth was still more marked, and Edna felt a certain amount of pleasure when he took his seat beside her, and his father moved to another part of the table.

Lord Mersey bowed all round, made his apology to the duchess, and then sat contemplating the flowers with a placid air of abstraction.

Soup was served, and a gentle murmur of conversation had commenced, when he turned to Edna suddenly, as if he had just remembered her, and said:

"Do you know which is Miss Weston—is it that lady?" and he looked toward Aunt Martha, who was in a deep discussion on lace with Lady Portfield.

"No," said Edna, amused, "that is Mrs. Weston, Miss Weston's aunt. I am called Miss Weston."

"You!" he said, putting his soup spoon down to stare at her. "You are Miss Weston—why, how old are you?—I mean—I beg your pardon ——"

Edna laughed.

"I am glad you did not press the question."

"What an idiot I am!" remarked his lordship, in a perfectly audible voice. "Any other fool would have guessed at once that it was she. Such a child, too."

"I have been out of my pinafores some time, too," said Edna.

"Eh?" exclaimed Lord Mersey. "Did I say you were so young? Well, so you are. I had no idea that the Miss Weston we have all been talking about——"

"Was so insignificant a person," said Edna, with a naive smile. "Pray forgive me for not being older. Mine is a fault that will mend every day."

Lord Mersey looked at her as he would have done at a very rare and beautiful plant, and shook his head.

"I'd keep that fault as long as I could, Miss Weston," he said, and Edna bowed.

Fish that had been brought from the duke's stream in Scotland occupied his lordship's attention for some time, but every now and then he turned his grave, dreamy eyes upon the lovely young face beside him with an expression of interest. It was the prettiest flower he had ever seen.

Edna listened to the talk going on around

Comfort Sister's Corner

where we often have droughts, and sand storms, short winters, and pleasant summers, a very good farming country; crops were fine last year. The country is well watered; most every home has a fine well and windmill, some few use engines. We have fine gardens, most everything that can be grown in the East, can be grown here. Husband is a blacksmith (there I told you we are poor people) for most everyone knows that riches are seldom made at the forge. But it is no disgrace to be poor, just inconvenient; however we have much to be thankful for. We own our little home and have been blessed with health.

Sisters did you read Uncle Charlie's letter to his namesake? If you overlooked it, get your paper and read it, for it is fine.

With love to all, MRS. WALLACE HEDGES.

Mrs. Hedges. The hardship of your experience very naturally has prejudiced you against farm life, as appears from the fact that you complain, not unjustly, of the overwork, privations and discomforts which fell to your lot largely as the result of unfortunate circumstances, while you make no mention of the many comforts, pleasures and even luxuries that farm families living under fairly good conditions enjoy, but you seem to have been deprived of. Doubtless your mother's protracted invalidism made it hard for all the family and hardest for you, the eldest daughter. In a family dependent on labor for a living, whether on the farm or in the city, sickness of father or mother throws heavy burdens on the children forcing them to work when they should be at school, and it is a question whether it is worse for them to work in the cotton field, as you did, or in the cotton factory as thousands of children unfortunately have to. You are to be felicitated on having a good husband with a good trade and health and strength to do his work and provide a comfortable home for his family. There is food for thought in your remarks on social inequality and the duty incumbent on the rich to share their social and material advantages with their equally worthy but less fortunate neighbors. Volumes have been written on this subject, thus far with little effect on our purse-proud aristocracy which values people according to their wealth rather than character and personality. And usually the most snobbish are the newly-rich. Even though liberal in responding to the calls of charity, their giving is with such an air of condescension as humiliates the recipient of their bounty. To dispense charity in a manner that does not wound the pride of the recipient is evidence of true nobility, of genuine aristocracy of soul. Your suggestion, that the daughters of the wealthy families make a companion of the poor working girl, taking her to church, to the opera, and inviting her to social functions in their homes, is theoretically ideal but practically impossible so long as the world tolerates the tyranny of fashion and extravagant standards of dress that have prevailed since time immemorial. Shame for her clothes would prevent the working girl from appearing beside the elegantly and stylishly dressed daughter of wealth at her parties, on the street, at the opera or even in the same pew in the house dedicated to the worship of Him who loved the poor. If all other bars were removed dress would still remain an insurmountable barrier against the social mingling of the rich and poor so long as present standards of habiliment prevail, so long as fashion decrees that there must be a different dress specially designed for every occasion, so long as wealth is the foundation of social standing and the lavish expenditure of money on dress passes as the outward insignia of wealth and aristocracy. The social mingling of the rich and poor involves many unsolved problems, chief among which is that of dress reform. No doubt many of the sisters have considered this important subject and have ideas that would be worth printing in our "Corner."—Ed.

WEISER, IDAHO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I wish to thank all the sisters (and brothers too) who so kindly responded to my requests in the December issue, for songs, and as time passes I will try and answer each letter.

Warm weather is here and for the benefit of the sisters who are in the same position as I (not able to obtain ice) I will tell how I made an iceless ice chest. It requires only three articles, and the initial expense is small, compared with results, which will be a pleasant surprise. I obtained a box twenty-one by twenty-four inches, and fifteen inches deep, and a four gallon stone jar, with lid, and some sand. First, I placed the box in the cellar at the desired place, then filled in about two or three inches of sand; then the jar was placed in the center with lid on, and more sand put in all around, moistening the sand to help the packing. Fill within two inches of top of jar. Keep the sand wet with cold water, which in the evaporation causes the cooling.

Care should be taken not to spill anything in the jar as removing it to wash would displace the sand. The jar should be well scalded and sunned first, to insure sweetness. I keep my butter and milk, and, in fact, all things same as in a "real" ice chest.

Yours for success, MRS. I. D. GRAY.

GREENFIELD, CAL.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Will you please admit me again? It has been about ten years since I last came for a chat with you. At that time I was not married.

I live on a ten-acre farm in a wide, sunny valley. Our little place is under irrigation and is our own.

The homes here are quite close together and the neighbors are all nice, quiet people. We are only one half mile from the general store, church and school. This climate is adapted to the growing of all varieties of deciduous fruits and some kinds of nuts. There are many large apple orchards which present a beautiful sight clothed in rosy-tinted blossoms, and later, in the autumn, are a sight to inspire the poets, when loaded with their luscious apples of red or yellow colors.

Alfalfa fields stretch away on all sides with their wealth of luxuriant green, amid which the mild-eyed dairy cows are browsing in lazy content.

This colony is several miles from the nearest railroad. It is consequently, perhaps, more quiet than it otherwise would be. We have daily mail service, a large and pleasantly situated school building, a dear, quaint little church and many other things to make life what it should be.

This little spot seems to have been left untouched, as yet by the contaminating influence of the larger cities; there is no touch of worldly "get-rich-quick" methods of the outer world. We live on in our own way, in much the manner of one of the old English hamlets.

Here are many graduates of Eastern colleges and many retired from active business life, who are now interested in agricultural methods, in rotating crops and in discussing at the corner grocery the relative values of certain fertilizers.

There is rarely an afternoon in summer when we do not get the full benefit of breezes direct from the ocean. The pure air and country fare are conducive to the health of the people.

Now, a word to those who write of being lonely in the country.

Dear sisters, if you are in a lonely situation, treat each day as one step farther toward a contented mind. Endeavor to make your little ones contented. Tell or read to them a bedtime story with a good moral. Interest yourself in trying to make your surroundings more pleasant. And by all means have a garden! You will be surprised to find how much enjoyment you and the children will get from even a small garden which is all your own work. It is not how much we do in this world, but the spirit in which we do it that counts in making up the things worth while.

"To act that each tomorrow,
Find us farther than today."

I have read dear old COMFORT since I was quite small, when I used to enjoy the department of Aunt Minerva and her owls. With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and the entire COMFORT staff, Lovingly,

MRS. NELLIE I. IMWALLE.

HAMDEN, OHIO.

DEAR READERS:

I am writing this hoping it will benefit all readers of COMFORT who are afflicted with tuberculosis.

I have had the disease for years and have slept outdoors for four years. I have a shack nine by twelve feet in our yard. It has a good roof and floor, each side is screened in, and has a heavy canvas curtain at each side which works on pulleys. In summer time they are all rolled up, but in winter I keep only the east one up. I am under a good doctor's care all the time, and know medicine has helped me lots. I follow my doctor's advice and his only. I spent one year at the Ohio State Sanatorium at Mt. Vernon, Ohio, and was greatly benefited. It is a fine place for incipient cases, and teaches us many valuable things, among them are to take lots of outdoor exercise and rest regularly, and to use every precaution possible to keep from infecting well people.

We use pocket folding cups for expectoration and gauze for handkerchiefs which must also be held to our mouth when coughing. Patients who carry a normal temperature take walks every morning.

After leaving the sanatorium I spent three weeks in Grant Hospital at Columbus, Ohio, following an operation for chronic appendicitis, which was very successful. I feel very well now; am living an outdoor life, and go to bed by 7.30 most every night; never get up until 6.30. Then I eat my breakfast and put my dishes on to boil, feed my chickens, and make my bed. Then I take a long walk; am back by ten. I sit out in my shack from ten until eleven and read or write. If it is cold I go to bed to keep warm. We have early dinner and I go to bed at twelve (noon) and rest and sleep until one thirty or two P. M. Then I sit up in bed, and embroider until three thirty. By using a back rest I can work at my fancy work easily in bed.

I have taken my afternoon rest here for two and one half years now, and took forenoon rest here every day until Christmas. I very seldom go to an entertainment, but occasionally I do. I know that there are not many tubercular people who can lead a normal life and live long. For I have seen many apparently good cases leave the sanatorium and go to their homes in big cities mostly, and lead a gay life for about six months and then die. For years I took lots of raw eggs, would often take six a day, but am not taking any now. They are really delicious, to beat two up in a glass and add a few drops of flavoring extract and a teaspoonful of sugar. Then fill the glass up with rich milk and drink between meals.

I am a blonde and weigh one hundred and twenty-eight pounds. I am of a cheerful disposition and very seldom get discouraged. I read lots and never do any heavy work at all, am a lover of COMFORT, am especially interested in "A Thorn Among Roses."

Hoping that this letter will help others,

I remain your friend, MISS CLARA MYRTLE WORTMAR.

HUNTINGDON, PA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

The sun is just setting behind the hills, the hills of dear old Pennsylvania, the day's work is over, and I am lonely. May I join your charming circle?

Huntingdon, the town in which I live has a population of 7,500, twelve churches, one college, four good schools, hospital, Orphan's Home and no saloons.

The State Industrial Reformatory is also situated here. The location is ideal. On one side flows the Juniata river (of Indian fame), and on the remaining sides stretch out the farms, on which produce is raised to be used at the institution. I think the inmates are well treated, as long as they conform to rules. They have able instructors, and each can learn the trade to which he is best adapted. To prevent the escape of prisoners, a wall twenty-five feet high has been built around the various buildings.

Near the entrance, at the Superintendent's home, is a large lawn. It is well cared for, and filled with many beautiful flowers, and in summer when Nature has painted each one with a skill that no artist can equal, it is a beautiful sight. But I never gaze on them without thinking of the wretchedness that is so close to all this beauty. Then it seems to vanish and in its stead, comes visions of the sin-sick boys within, blighted lives; mothers' broken hearts.

Nearly all these boys have been attendants at Sunday School. There must have been something wrong somewhere. I hesitate to say, for I know all mothers want to be good ones; but I fear something was wrong in the home. Have you, the mothers of little children, ever noticed what little imitators they are? I think if all parents would cultivate a character, worthy in every respect of imitation, it would help a great deal. Then again, in order to gain their confidence, why not try to be interested in what interests them. They will appreciate this, and more readily make you a confidante. Tell them that you have their best interests at heart, and that you consider their good behavior a priceless possession. There is an ocean of love in a boy's heart, if we only possess a magnet powerful enough to draw it out. One thing I have often noticed that I very much disapprove of and that is, heaping criticism on children in the presence of neighbors and friends. Let us take a retrospective glance, back to our own childhood days, and think of how we dreaded to hear mother tell our faults to others; how we felt condemned and even prejudiced against her for it, when perhaps it was only meant kindly; but how much more good a little heart-to-heart talk with mother when alone, would have been, as each child has been given different tastes and inclinations, the disposition of each should be carefully studied, and governed accordingly.

To how many does life seem a mere round of existence? Why not read some of the soul-inspiring books, that are on the market? The best of all is, to know they can be borrowed free of cost, from the free circulating libraries in the Sunday Schools. I think everyone should find time to read good books. They help us to take a broader-minded view on many things, as dark days must come to all, and the noble thoughts of noble men and women, help us to see more clearly.

Have we not all at some time or other in our lives got disgusted, and thought the world cruel, when in reality it was only paying us for value received. If we would all try to make others happy, especially those we dislike, we would soon be saying, "the world gives us a square deal."

Have you a grandma in your home? Don't let her feel that she is in the way; invent something for her to do. It will make her happier if she thinks she can be of service to you.

In conclusion, I will say, I have three children, the oldest twelve, the youngest four. I am thirty-one years of age, weigh one hundred and ten pounds, am five feet four inches tall and have dark brown hair and fair complexion.

With best wishes for COMFORT's success and that of its readers, I am, your coworker, MRS. RUTH WEAVER.

Nobody Knows but Mother

(REQUESTED.)

Nobody knows the work it takes,
To keep the home together;
Nobody knows of the steps it takes,
Nobody knows—but mother.

Nobody listens to childish woes,
Which kisses only smother;
Nobody's pained by naughty blows,
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of the sleepless care
Bestowed on baby brother,
Nobody knows of the tender prayer,
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of the lessons taught
Of loving one another;
Nobody knows of the patience sought,
Nobody—only mother.

Nobody knows of the anxious fears
Lest darlings may not weather
The storm of life in after years,
Nobody knows—but mother.

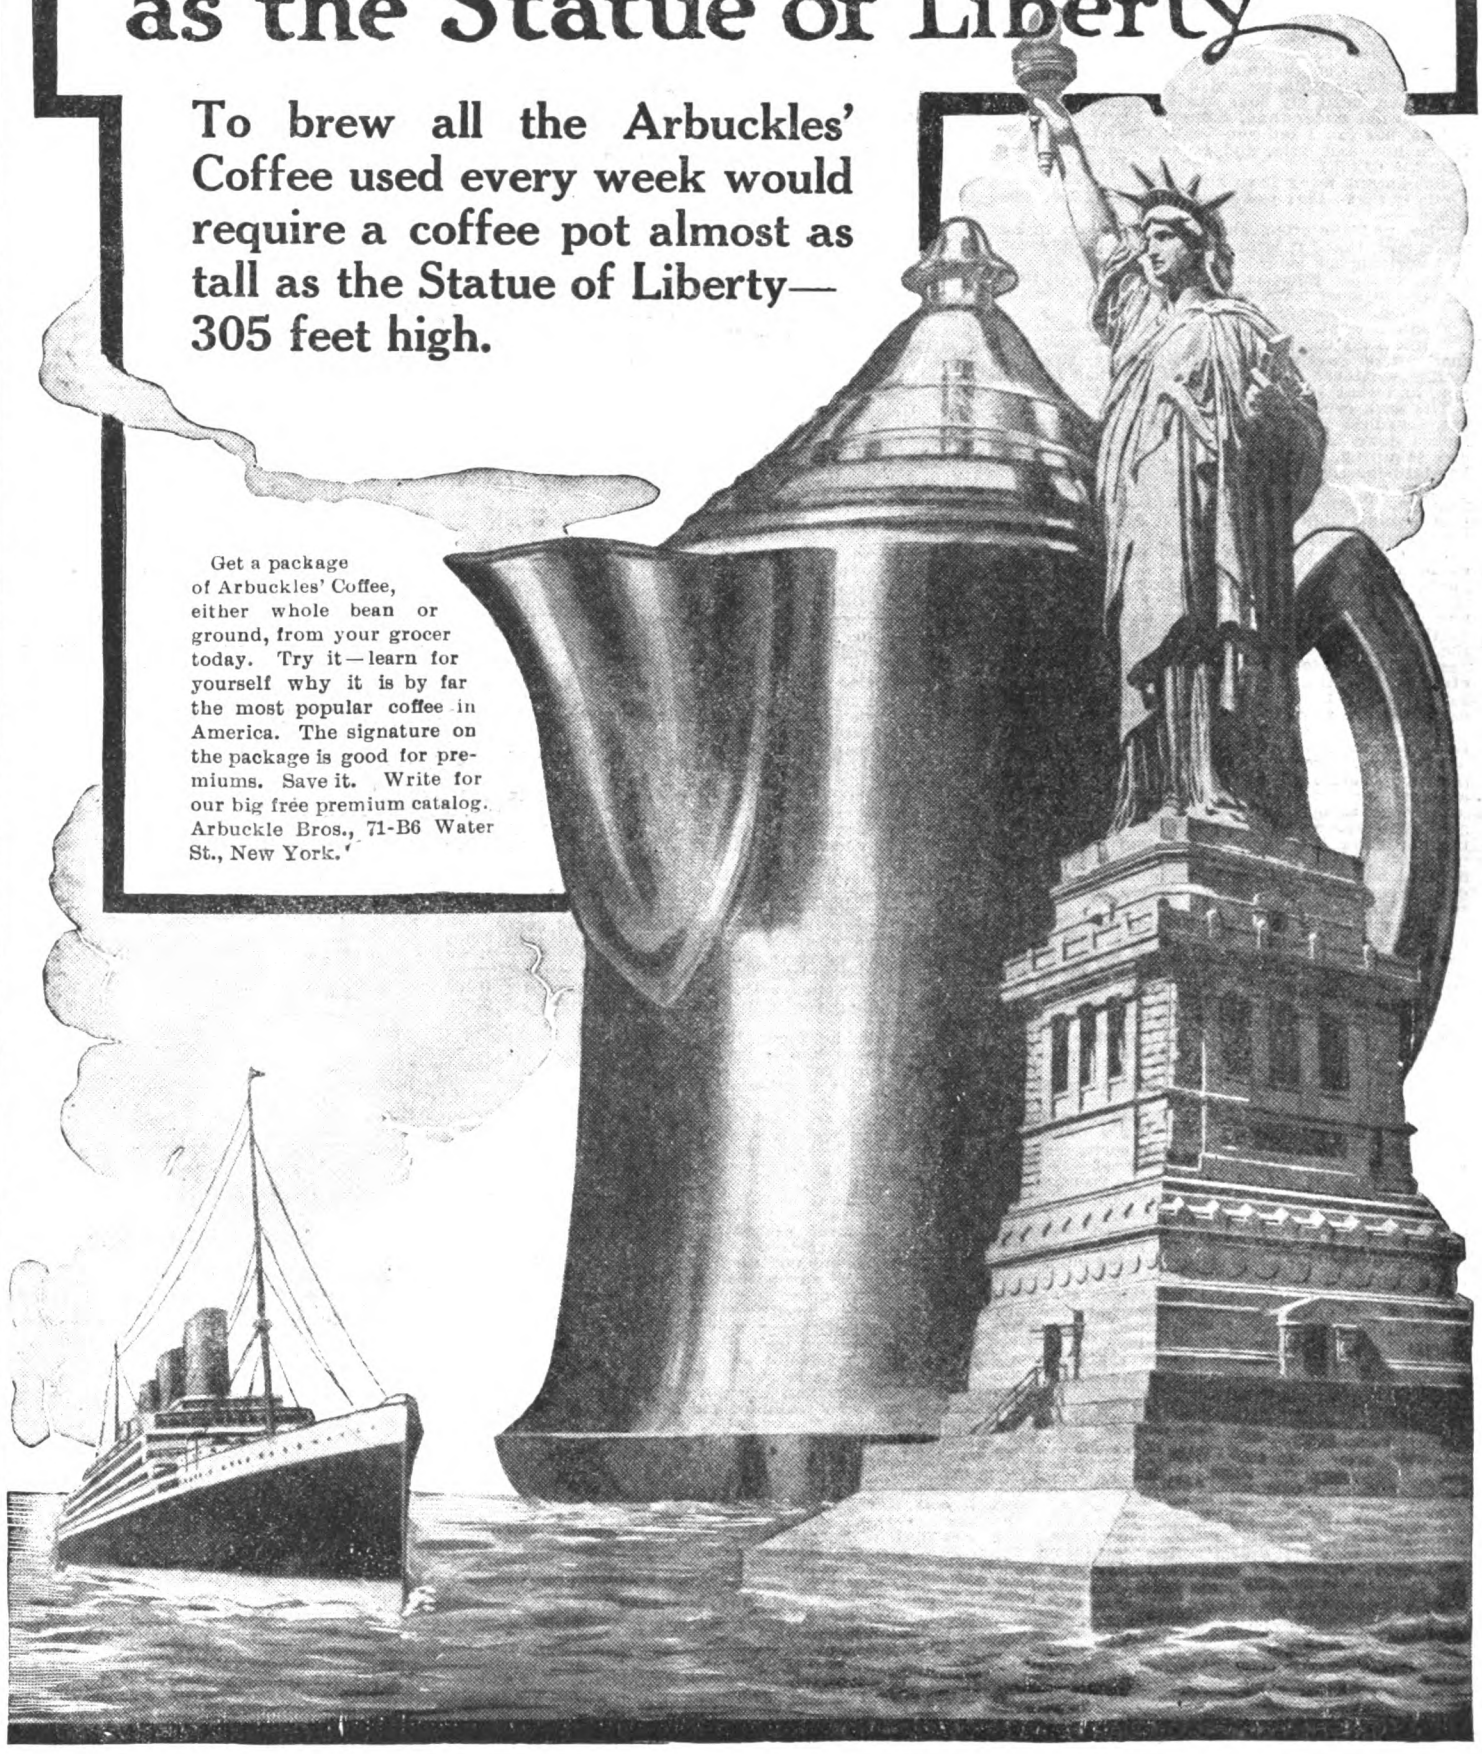
Nobody kneels at the throne above
To thank the Heavenly Father
For the sweetest gift—a mother's love;
Nobody can but mother.

CROWLEY, TEXAS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

First of all I want to talk a little while to the "Little Country Girl" who goes to the city to work.

Little country girl, you have read many very fine stories, no doubt, in each of which was a pretty girl heroine, and a fine Prince Charming. You have made believe that you were that lucky little girl, and that this wonderful hero was waiting for you somewhere; just beyond the bend in the old familiar road. Perhaps you have thought that, by coming to a great city, you would find him, where in reality he would rarely be found by little country girls. Then you would learn life down to its bitter corner stone, and you would grow extremely weary, and, maybe you would drift and drift until all the finer sentiment within you would be killed.



Here is a true story which I heard told several months ago by a teacher. A girl from a Wisconsin town was taking music lessons at one of the great conservatories in Chicago. One day, in a State street department store, she was accosted by a heavily veiled woman who professed illness, and asked assistance. The girl helped the old lady to the street. The old lady asked to be assisted a little farther, up some rickety stairs. The girl demurred, and then the poor old, sick lady grasped the girl by the arm and at-

The Lone Bandit

By Ella Martin

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

ON a wooded knoll in the far-away Klondike a small but motley throng was gathered. In the shade of a cluster of trees a man was preaching the gospel; while seated near him, in apparent unwilling submission, was his daughter, a girl in her teens.

The speaker's language was eloquent, convincing; but the men seemed only slightly impressed, as if the discourse was lacking in sincerity.

After a while, when the restlessness of the crowd was less marked, the girl was seen to lift her serious face and speak a few words in a low tone to her parent. He nodded in answer, and she quietly withdrew. Several of the men in the little audience forgot to listen to the words of the preacher while their eyes followed Nellie Witmore, the preacher's daughter, till her lithe figure disappeared from sight where the path made its turning around a clump of bushes.

Once out of sight of the gathering of miners Nellie sped swiftly along the trail till she came opposite a large boulder; then she paused and waited. A man stepped out from its shelter and confronted her—a man, young and slender, and utterly unlike the rough but honest miners she had just left.

"Sidney!" she cried, as he took her hand; "you waited—you knew I would come!"

"I hoped so, Nellie; I wanted to see you. And your father does not need you any more today. The miners will not be rude enough to desert him."

"As I have done," she said quickly, and laughed; but there was a nervous ring to her merriment. "Ah, Sidney, I am afraid I was not quite honest with my father. I told him the truth when I asked his permission to go home, but not the whole truth—I did not tell him you would be waiting for me here."

"Nellie, this deception, if it is wrong, will soon be at an end. What the end will be I cannot tell—I do not know yet. But my mission in this place is about over. As you know I did not come here to seek gold."

A cloud passed over the bright face of Nellie Witmore. Her head drooped until her gaze rested upon the ground, but not before he had caught a glimpse of the mist in her eyes.

"I must leave you soon," he went on, gravely. "But, oh, Nellie! I love you! Remember that always, dear one, and believe that it is harder for me to leave you than it is for you to see me go."

He drew her to his side, but he did not caress her. He did not kiss the lips that looked so tempting to him. She was as forbidden fruit, and he yearned for her as one does for that which he may not have.

"Then why must you go?" she asked wistfully, and the lips he wanted to kiss were a-tremole. A rigidity came over him. There was a tightening about his mouth as if his feelings were controlled by an effort.

"I cannot tell you, sweetheart—not yet. I may never be able to tell you. I am at war with myself today. Conscience and inclination are striving together within me, each for the mastery of the other, until my soul seems rent asunder."

"I do not understand, Sidney."

"No, nor can I tell you—only this; I stand between love and duty, and I know not which will gain the day!"

She shrank away from him.

"Is it that—that you are not free? Is there another——"

"No, no!" he cried, and there was pain in his voice, "not that! It is something entirely different. It is driving me mad, but I can give you no hint of what it is. Some day you may know. In fact, I fear you must learn everything, and that before very long. Unless——"

"Unless what, Sidney? You frighten me."

"Unless my conscience loses in the struggle, and inclination sweeps everything before it. But, Nellie, whatever happens, remember that I loved you, and that I could do no different!"

His dark eyes were full of pain, and the clear-cut, beardless features were twisted in agony. He looked down into the violet eyes that were wide and inquiring. Then he took her hand and led her into the road.

"You must go now, that you may be home before your father arrives. I will see you again this evening while he is away. It may be the last time we shall meet."

She departed without a word; only a lingering glance backward betrayed her reluctance to leave him without a better understanding of the strange things he had said to her. Sidney Phillips stood and watched the graceful figure until it was lost to view. Then he went back to his place behind the boulder and waited till Mr. Witmore should pass the spot. He did not want to meet the father of Nellie just then. He was in no frame of mind to go back to the open-air chapel where this man dispensed the gospel every Sunday afternoon to a gathering of miners, who had so little diversion that they were willing to go to hear him, though not deeply interested. Sidney seldom went himself; he could not bear to see the delicate girl a target for the admiring glances of a crowd of men, even though their admiration was genuine and their manner respectful. It hurt him to note the shrinking look in her eyes, and he resented the fact that this patriarchal-looking man, with his long beard, should insist upon his daughter accompanying him because her presence there insured him an audience.

"The hypocrite!" Sidney cried, striking his chest a blow, as if by that means the leaden weight in his bosom might be dislodged. "The hypocrite! If it were not for Nellie's sake—but there, I have not settled that question yet!"

He had hardly ceased speaking when Mr. Witmore came into sight. He waited until the preacher passed by and was lost to view around the bend in the road where Nellie had disappeared some minutes before. Then he went back to the collection of rude cabins that formed the mining camp.

For some reason—because of his superiority in education and manners, the miners thought—Mr. Witmore had chosen to live some distance away. And now that the restraint of his presence was removed the men gatherd in front of one of the huts and engaged in a game of cards, the recent sermon on the hill forgotten. They welcomed Sidney in their usual off-hand, good-natured manner. They habitually referred to him as "the tenderfoot," but they treated him with consideration.

The topic of conversation, as Sidney came up, was the new preacher, who held prayer meetings evenings in the cabins of the miners, and delivered sermons in the open on Sundays.

"Now I wonder whatever put that into his head," said one of the men who was watching the game. "Thinks he'll live on the contributions while he looks for the yeller, I reckon."

"He calls himself a fisher of men," volunteered Sidney Phillips.

"Wall, he has some mighty fine bait," drawled one of the players.

His words were followed by a general laugh. For it was no secret that the men looked upon the daughter of the self-constituted preacher as a beauty and a drawing card for her father. The contributions were conspicuously larger on the days when Nellie accompanied him, which were becoming more and more frequent as this fact made itself apparent to her parent.

"Yes, she is mighty fine bait! And innercent, fellers, the most innercent ever!"

It was Daniels who said that.

"I have just six inches o' steel to give the man who would harm little Nellie," he added.

Sidney said nothing. He never joined in the remarks when Nellie's name was mentioned. But at the allusion to Nellie as bait for her father in his fishing for men his face whitened.

"You may laugh all you please, but it is that man's elerquence that has nearly made me give up cards."

Another laugh, for the man who said that was one of the players.

"Nearly, but not quite, Jake."

"Wall, he's fished fer men's souls till he's got nearly all of 'em comin' to hear him, anyway. I just wish he could draw that lone bandit to hear him. Big Pete was held up last night on his way from prayer meetin', and had ter give up his watch and purse. I lost mine last week. Thar won't be a durned watch left in the diggin's if he don't catch that road agent with his elerquence purtty soon."

"We'll catch him ourselves yet, and a rope is the bait we'll use."

During these remarks Sidney stood silent.

"He never brings the gal to prayer meetin'; did ye ever notice that?" someone said, going back to the subject of the preacher with a jerk. And leaning back he eyed Sidney sharply. "An' ye never see Sidney thar, either—ever notice that?"

Sidney Phillips said never a word.

"An' what's yer conclusion, pard?" And one of the players slapped a card down upon the table and forgot to listen to the answer. However, it was delivered.

"The conclusion is that Sid is that thar lone bandit we're all so anxious ter git."

"More likely he's sparking the gal on the sly while her father is away prayin' fer the rest of us pore sinners."

"Don't blame him a gol darn bit!"

"Sid, that ain't fair!"

"You gentlemen are getting too personal. I believe I will withdraw," laughed Sidney. But his face showed he was ill at ease.

"Gentlemen!" mimicked one. "Listen to his language! No,hin' like eddication!"

"Wall, no, if it can make gentlemen out o' the likes of us!"

Then a poor play on the part of one of them drew the attention of the others, and Sidney slipped away unnoticed It was dark when he left the men and went on his lonely way toward his own hut some distance from the camp.

His head was bowed in meditation as he walked slowly along; for the problem he had come there to solve was nearing its solution. None of the miners who dubbed him a tenderfoot dreamed that he was, in truth, a New York detective, his reputation yet to be established. He had been given the work of running down an absconding cashier, and the trail led here. If he brought back his man his place on the force was assured, and the reward for the capture was a fortune in itself. Fame and fortune and a career in his chosen calling awaited him if he succeeded, and success was in sight—success that meant failure in another direction and heretofore would be dearly bought.

"Halt!"

As the word came sharp and clear, it fell like a bomb-shell upon his hearing. He was startled out of his musings, but was neither surprised nor afraid.

"Throw up your hands!"

Mechanically he obeyed. He knew the lone bandit had got him, as he had most of the miners in that immediate locality. There was not much in his purse (he had seen to that, anticipating this very thing), but it was taken along with his watch and chain. He did not mind the experience, but it served to deepen his gloom.

The hold-up was only what he had expected—what he had been waiting for almost unconsciously, and yet it had found him unprepared. He had meant to resist. A quick movement an his part, suspected by the other, a fierce grappling, and the struggle would soon be over, with the chances in his favor. It was not discretion or fear that held him back, but a thought of Nellie Witmore.

It was soon over, and no excitement on either side. He was not even surprised. He knew now who the lone bandit was; he had suspected it before. It was the last straw—this certainty. It was not the loss of his property that troubled him, for he knew it would be restored to him eventually. He could force its restoration.

Just then a temptation came to him—to throw up the game, sacrifice the reward, his career—everything, take Nellie with him and flee the country at once. It meant throwing aside his hopes of advancement for the sake of a woman. Still he hesitated between love and duty. The time had not yet come for him to decide so momentous a question.

He changed his mind now about going home and turned his steps in the direction of the hut where dwelt the preacher and his daughter. He knew that Nellie would be alone all the evening while her father was holding prayer meetings at the homes of the miners. When he arrived he received a cordial welcome from the minister's daughter. A reaction had shaken off the benumbed feeling that enveloped him when he discovered the identity of the masked road agent, and with some excitement he related the highwayman's descent upon him.

"I have heard of him," said Nellie, "and I am always afraid for papa; he is out so late nights. He feels it his duty to go to one or more of the cabins and pray. But I am sure the men would rather play cards.

"But Sidney, do you know, he would be very angry if he should learn that you called on me in his absence? I have drawn him out on the subject of acquaintances, and he has forbidden me to make friends with anyone. He says they are a Godless set, and that it is my presence on the hill that draws the men there Sundays. He does not need me evenings, he says, as he goes to them instead of their coming to him."

Sidney recalled the joke the men had got off about the preacher using his daughter for bait in his fishing for men, and his face flushed angrily.

"Why does he waste time on men who would not go to hear him if he furnished no other inducement than the things he preaches?"

"He says his mission lies here, that he must save the souls of these miners. I get very lonely sometimes; but we must not shirk our duty. Somehow, I cannot feel entbused with the work. There is something lacking in my father's discourses, though his eloquence is unsurpassed."

"It is that they are lacking in sincerity?" he ventured, without meeting her eyes. He did not want to destroy the girl's confidence in her parent. But how he wished he might in some way prepare her for the blow that was about to fall—that is, if he did not turn traitor to his calling. Would there be any peace for him, so long as he might live, if once he destroyed the happiness of the girl he loved? On the contrary, could he keep his self-respect and shirk the obligations his vocation placed upon him? What irony of Fate it was that he should love this man's daughter!

"Nellie," he said, as he was about to depart, "will you remember, when the times comes, that it was you who reminded me that one must not shirk one's duty?"

He caught her to his breast and kissed her gold-crowned head, and her white brow. But not her lips; they were sacred—he had no right to taste their sweetness; he never should have now! And it was she who had shown him how to decide, she for whose sake he had faltered. He had been leaving it to Fate, but Nellie in her innocence had shown him the right.

"Sidney," she cried, "you frighten me! I wish you might tell me what is troubling you. But I fear I cannot let you remain longer. It is nearly time for my father to return. At first I meant to tell him of these visits as soon as you gave me permission; but since I have talked with him about making the acquaintance of some of his flock, I dare not. He seems so bitter against the men he is trying to save."

Sidney turned to go, a last farewell upon his lips. But at that instant a step was heard outside. Mr. Witmore was returning! Nellie started in alarm, her hands clasped to her bosom. Her eyes sought his face in mute questioning. Sidney braced himself for the ordeal that confronted him. It had come sooner than he expected. But suddenly Nellie caught him by the arm and shoved him into a small closet near the door, that was partitioned off for the storage of provisions.

"Stay there," she whispered, "till he has gone up to bed; then unbolt the door and go away quietly. I will come down for a drink of water, as I often do in the night, and slide the bolt into place again."

She had barely closed the door of the closet and regained the other side of the room, where she was in the act of taking up the candle to retire when the door opened and her father entered.

"Up yet, Nellie?" he cried, cheerfully.

"You are home earlier than usual, aren't you papa?" she asked, steadying her voice with an effort. "I am just going to bed, though. I will light a candle for you before I go."

This done, and the good night kiss exchanged, she climbed the ladder to the loft, where a curtain separated her apartment from that of her father.

As soon as all was quiet overhead Mr. Witmore hung something thick over he two small windows, and then took the ladder carefully from its place, that Nellie might not descend upon him unawares. Then setting the candle near at hand he took up a loose board in the floor and drew from beneath it a long box. Sidney Phillips, through a crack in the partition, could see everything. He knew what the box contained, well enough. But he was not afraid, though he was bolted in the house with a desperate character; for in his hip pocket was a revolver ready to his hand. And besides, his presence there was unsuspected. A cough or a sneeze would betray him, and also decide his course of action. It was not necessary now for him to determine whether he should give up his career for the sake of the innocent girl whose faith in her parent once destroyed would cause her untold misery. Fate would decide it for him.

The box was quietly opened, while Sidney watched and waited, and the valuables taken from him by the brigand earlier in the evening were added to the miscellaneous collection within, and the cover again fastened into place.

The box securely hidden, the preacher replaced the ladder, and took up the light. Now was Sidney's chance! His hand sought the butt of the pistol in his holster. It would be easy to capture him now, the man he had trailed through the entire United States and on into the gold country. And it was Nellie who had placed him in a position to make the arrest—Nellie, whose influence because of her childish innocence, had affected him so powerfully. And the innocent would suffer with the guilty, doubly so, because she had unwittingly brought about her parent's downfall. Thus he reflected.

Mr. Witmore began to mount the ladder, the light in his hand. Sidney was a brave man; he had proved it many a time, and in many a place. But he let his hand drop to his side, while he watched through a crack the pseudo-minister ascend the ladder. When all was still he stole out from his hiding-place and shot the bolt noiselessly back. He at least had not betrayed Nellie to her father!

He had debated long as to what he should do, standing as he did, between love and duty; and at last Fate had stepped in and decided it: He could not arrest the father of the girl he loved at a time when she had unwittingly placed him in is power. It was more than could be expected of him.

The next day the preacher received by messenger a letter calculated to prove effective. It was short and to the point:

"Amos Churchill, Road Agent and Embezzler: Leave the country at once; the people here must be relieved of your predatory presence. Leave the box where it is."

The preacher could not know whose hand, among all the men he knew, had penned it; but it was signed with a name that was familiar in the eastern part of the states where he had come from, and he obeyed the injunction it contained at once.

When the fact became known among the miners it caused a nine days' wonder. And later it began to be remarked upon that the highwayman was inactive.

"The preacher must have converted him before he left," they said, and laughed. But no one mistrusted the truth.

After a while Sidney produced the box, which he had found, he told them, hidden in a cavern, and asked them to identify and claim their property.

"Wall, I declar'!" they said facetiously, "if the tenderfoot wasn't the robber, after all! Say, Sid, was it the preacher that converted ye? Or that thar piece o' innercence, Nellie Witmore? Come, own up!"

"It was Nellie," he replied gravely.

"Well, we'll fergive ye, then, seein' ye've gin it all back."

They were jesting, as a matter of course; but if either was suspected it was not the preacher.

Another thing was noticed: It was that the tenderfoot took more interest in prospecting after this, and he was jollied about having to work, now that he had reformed. He had never reported to them his own hold-up. He had possessed himself of his watch and purse when he removed the box to the cave where, later, he pretended to find it. He was more silent than ever now, but less gloomy. The problem was solved, and the load off his mind. Whether right or wrong, the die was cast—his career was at an end. But Nellie, his sweetheart, was spared the pain an exposure of her father's crime would have caused her. Where was she? Would she ever know the sacrifice he had made for her, he wondered. Would she blame him because he sought her not in the land whence her father had fled? Would Nellie believe now that he loved her, even though she remembered his words, uttered at a time when he believed a greater test would be applied to her faith in his love?

It was months afterward that Sidney Phillips struck it rich. He immediately sold out and made preparation to leave the country.

"He is going to find Nellie," the miners said to one another. And tenderfoot though he was, compared to the older settlers, they were loath to see him go.

Before Sidney started for the States he made a last visit to Nellie's deserted home. He could not have told why he went there, only that he wanted to see once more the place where he had parted with the girl he loved. For in all the broad earth he knew not where her father had hidden himself and her; or whether he should ever meet her again.

His thoughts were far away from the place, seeking in imagination the whereabouts of his lost love, when he pushed open the door of the deserted shack and stood face to face with Nellie Witmore.

"Sidney!" she cried joyfully.

With a few swift steps he reached her side and caught her to his breast.

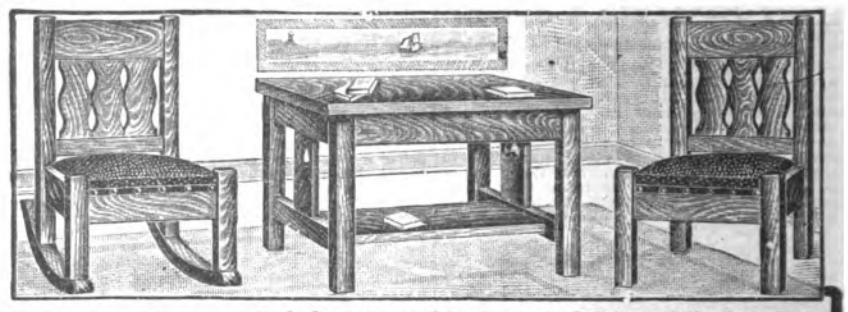
"Nellie!" he cried exultingly, at finding her thus restored to him. "Nellie, we shall never be parted again—nothing shall part us now!" And he kissed the lips he had so longed to kiss.

"Oh, Sidney, I had to come! He is dead—my father! He confessed everything, and I am here to give the things he took from them back to the miners."

"They have received their property, dear, long ago. There is only one article not restored. And that, Nellie, you took—and it belonged to me."

"I, Sidney?"

"Yes, you dear little bandit! Nellie, give me back my heart!"



"I would rather not," she whispered shyly. "If—Sidney—you would only take mine in exchange!"

By-Products of the Fruit Industry

CHEAP Fuel.—Apricot pits, $3 per ton. Excellent fuel. Cheaper than coal or wood.

Such advertisements may be seen in Southern California newspapers, and as fuel is always expensive in that part of the world the person whose eye catches the announcement will be tempted to make a test of the unique fuel. The rice seems satisfactory, especially as coal weighing the same amount is ordinarily quoted at about $13 per ton. Those who experiment with the fuel will have satisfaction so far as heat units are concerned; but the material has no lasting qualities. Those who buy may express surprise that each pit has been cracked and the kernel extracted. From these oil is made. Perhaps 5000 tons will represent the by-product of pits for a single season in California, and from these about 1200 tons of kernels have been taken. From these kernels as well as from those of the peach and almond, an oil is pressed and used extensively in the arts and medicine and in the preparation of toilet articles and cosmetics. Originally only almonds were utilized for this purpose, but owing to the persistent high prices the fixed oil of almonds has ceased to be prepared exclusively from that nut, being replaced by the cheaper materials, such as apricot and peach kernels. Peach and prune pits are utilized in like manner, and the resultant press cake or kernels, from which the oil has been taken, are being put to economic use as stock foods and fertilizers, being especially valuable by reason of their high content of nitrogenous matter.

The person eating seeded or unseeded raisins scarcely stops to think that the process of removing the seeds is today yielding a useful product that has until quite recently been permitted to go to waste. Ten per cent of the raisin consists of seed, and in the process of their extraction a portion of sugary matter adheres to each seed. From this a brandy is manufactured. From the seed a valuable illuminating oil is extracted, and the same oil may also be used as food. The meal from which the oil is pressed is eaten by cattle with a relish and is valuable as a food by reason of its high protein content. The oil has also been used as a drier in paints and varnish.

I THINK you know me well enough now to know that I have the interests of the masses of this country at heart. My one desire is and always has been, to see this land a paradise for the plain people. I don't pretend to have a mortgage on all the wisdom in the world nor do I pretend to be able to see more than a few million years ahead, but I feel it my duty to warn you of a certain gentleman whose persuasive eloquence and oratorical jim jams will doubtless deceive a whole lot of guileless people who are always ready to walk into any sucker trap and hike up any blind alley that is open to catch them. I warn the masses of the people, especially organized and unorganized labor to beware of those "peace at any price" doctrines that are being irrupted from the volcanic gas tank of one William Jennings Bryan. I don't think it would bother Bryan if a million Japs landed on one side of this continent and a million or two divine right king worshipping soldiers on the other side. You see if any trouble arose Bill could beat it for Lincoln, Nebraska, and climb into his cyclone cellar, where the grape juice is stored, until the fighting was all over. If Mr. Bryan lived where I do, right close to the sounding shores of the Atlantic ocean, well within the range of the guns of an attacking fleet, he would be singing a different song. You see the biggest gun in the world can't fire 1,500 miles so the Bryan establishment is quite safe. I'll wager if I were to nose around Mr. Bryan's Nebraska farm some night I'd find the doors locked, and I'll wager, too, if I tried to pry open a window a thousand burglar alarms would go off and the yawping of a hundred watch dogs would greet my marauding ears. I'll also wager if I ever reached his bedroom he would pull a gun on me with a barrel a mile long. Trust him or any other sensible man to look after himself and his property. Then why not protect the property of the nation? If you nosed into Mr. Bryan's bedroom, you wouldn't get a bottle of grape juice and a lecture on the Prince of Peace, nor would he ask you to stand there for one whole year and arbitrate and mediate. If he didn't blow your head off or throw you through the window, he would phone for the police and have you put in the pen mighty quick, for at home, at least, he would use common sense. He would try and protect himself, family and home from tramps and marauders, burglars and other wild beasts of prey. Mr. Bryan can see that this home needs protection, then why in thunder can't he see that my home, your home and all our homes need protecting? He'll tell you that to be prepared for war invites conflict. He will tell you that the nations of Europe were prepared for war, and that is why they got war. On the contrary it was because most of the nations of Europe were not prepared for war that they got war. If all the nations of Europe had been as well prepared for war as Germany was, there would have been no war. At the present moment Great Britain is paying a fearful price for her unpreparedness. It was because John Bull had a "contemptible little army" that Britain has been forced to pay in blood and treasure a hundred times more than it would have cost her to have kept up a force which would have so nicely balanced the military scales in Europe that the present dreadful conflict would never have happened. Mr. Bryan talks about the oceans being our only protection. That is in line with a lot more of the bunk that he has inflicted on a long suffering public. The oceans are today more of a weakness to us than a protection, just as the waters around Great Britain, that were once her strength, are now owing to submarines, her weakness. Destroy our fleet and nothing could save us. The latest submarines are capable of crossing the ocean and getting half way back under their own power. Within a comparatively short distance of New York lie nearly all the gun and ammunition factories of this continent. It would be the easiest thing in the world for any first-class military and naval power to land an army on these shores and destroy our gun and ammunition factories and exact a cash tribute from our cities, that would have paid for an army and navy sufficiently large to have stood off any force Europe could bring against us a dozen times over. It is far more economical, far more sensible and patriotic to be prepared than unprepared. Better pay a dollar for a lock than leave the door open and lose all you possess. After hundreds of years of painful striving, the little structure of semi-civilization we have so agonizingly reared has been ground to pieces beneath the barbaric heel of war. A ruthless war that respects neither young nor old, women or children; a war so hideous, so horrible, so vile and terrible that strong men who have experienced but a few minutes of it have gone stark, staring mad. No one knows what a day may bring forth. A raging madness has seized the world. A whirlpool of death is sucking the nations into its swirling depths. We can keep out of the whirlpool of war, not by being weak, but only by being strong. Might is the only thing that counts today in this world. Honor, righteousness and decency have been buried for the time being. Rome is burning. Instead of getting fire engines, and water and plenty of hose so as to keep the conflagration from our shores, Nero Bryan would tune up his peace fiddle, and invite the flames to come and destroy us. If Bryan's house caught fire he'd phone for the fire engines. But if an enemy sets the National House on fire, he wouldn't have an engine to put it out—he'd let it burn.

I thank God that there is a strong sentiment for peace in the world; I have done my share in creating that sentiment and I haven't had my eye on the $40,000 Nobel Peace Prize, while I was doing it as some peace at any price people have. I am as much a lover of peace as Mr. Bryan or any other man, but humanity hasn't advanced to that point where peace can be obtained by adopting the ideas of the gentleman who found it a hardship to live on $12,000 a year. Remember, our government is pledged to protect the lives and homes of its citizens, and to defend not only these shores from European and Asiatic aggression, but it is pledged by the Monroe Doctrine to protect the whole of this hemisphere, practically a third of the world. If democracy triumphs in this world conflagration, we may be able then to have a Court of Nations, in which all disputes can be settled, and a national police that will carry out the orders of the court in case any of its mandates are disobeyed. That is the dream and desire of all of us. We can't however in these murderous days forge our dreams into reality by mere talk. We must have force enough on hand to convince those who don't want peace and don't believe in peace that we are determined to have peace even if we have to fight for it.

As soon as autocratic, divine right, crack-brained militaristic monarchs see that the people who want peace are not long-haired enthusiasts and visionary theorists only, but strong men who are ready to shed their blood that war may be banished from the world forever, they will see the folly of continuing their fiendish medieval tactics and they will summon their duped and bleeding followers from the dark ages in which they have thrust them, and put them back again into the line of twentieth century aspirations and ideals. There are nations in this world today who respect nothing but force, and until the force idea has received a death blow, Bryan and his piffling pacificsm are the worst kind of a menace.

Just think what would happen if we knew that bubonic plague, cholera or smallpox were going to sweep this land. Suppose we knew that this awful pestilence was going to sweep five millions of people into their graves and leave two million homes desolate. Imagine the feeling of horror that would sweep the nation. At great expense we keep a quarantine service along our coast to keep out disease. Now what would you think if Bryan went stamping all over the country telling us we had no right to war on disease, that we should abolish our quarantine service and let bubonic plague and smallpox do their deadly work. If he did that we would think he was a madman. But today he is doing worse than that, for disease at least allows us to die in our beds and we know that after a while science will conquer it. Disease doesn't burn our homes, rape our women and blow our children into a million bits. We know that when the epidemic is past our country will be inviolate, but if the conqueror comes, those who survive death and torture and rapine, will live to see our cities in ashes, a foreign flag floating over our heads, and every gold dollar that we have taken from us. Then the conqueror will put a gun in our hands and make us fight his battles, make us destroy our brothers and those dear to us. This is what poor, bleeding Poland has had to put up with. Do you want Bryan and his piffling chin music to turn this fair land of ours into a Poland? I guess you don't.

Here is a sentence from one of Mr. Bryan's perorations on peace: "We not only do not need additional preparation, but we are fortunate in not having it." Think of it, and this to a country that has an army reserve of only 16 men and not enough powder to fight one battle. Now listen to what the greatest American of all, George Washington, said in his address to Congress, Dec. 3, 1783: "There is a rank due to the United States among nations which will be withheld if not absolutely lost by the reputation of weakness. If we desire to avoid insult we must be able to repel it; if we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war."

There, you can choose between Washington who would defend his country and Bryan who would leave it defenseless. In Washington's time it sometimes took months for ships to cross the ocean. Today they can get here in a week. Human nature hasn't changed such a very great deal in the last hundred years. Might is still right and those who have power are ready to grab and take anything that weaker peoples cannot defend. It's the advice of George Washington we should take and disregard the bunk of the Nebraskan phonograph. Let the masses of the people beware of the peace doctrines of William Jennings Bryan. If that gentleman will confine himself to prohibition he'll be all right, but the very people who are following him now if this country were invaded, and our defenseless coast cities laid in ashes, would be the first to turn on Mr. Bryan and rend him. He is playing politics. Why he even has an idea that he can stampede the socialists as well as the so-called labor party and hyphenated citizenship generally. It's wonderful what Bryan wouldn't do to get into the White House, but the socialists are thinkers and they are wise to the kind of politics that William is playing, and it's about time the rest of you got wise too.

This is the time when this country needs statesmen, and it's a mighty relief to me and should be to everyone who has the welfare of this country at heart that William Bryan has gone back to the woods to play politics and turn the phonograph loose on the Chautauqua circuit and left the serious business of managing the momentous problems of this western hemisphere to men who have a better idea of handling the affairs of this great nation in this terrible world crisis than any wild-eyed politician ever had or ever could have.

Beware of the man who has a single track mind. Beware of the man who can only think war or only think peace. Get a double track mind and strive for peace with all your might, but don't close your fool eyes to the fact that with three quarters of the world on fire, it's a mighty wise and sensible thing for Uncle Sam to have his hose in his hand ready to put out any flames that may stray in our direction.

Preparation for war doesn't mean war, it means peace. Unpreparedness doesn't mean peace, it means war, conquest, subjugation, slavery. If we were a poor people and couldn't afford ships and guns there might be some excuse for howling, but we've got more money in the U. S. and more material for the making of armies and navies than any country on earth, and to try and prevent us from protecting ourselves is worse than folly, it is raging madness.

They say that charity begins at home, but it shouldn't stay there. With that fact well established in our minds we got busy the other day and shipped three hundred pounds of food to the starving Belgians. It may interest you to know some of the things that went into that enormous box. There were several twenty-two pound boxes of spagetti and macaroni. The people in Europe prefer these edibles to our cereals, which few of them know how to cook properly. Then too there is a shortage of fuel over there. There was a four dozen case of condensed milk, a sixty pound bag of beans, some excellent bacon, raisins and flour. The Belgian Relief Commission in this city collects all articles of food and clothing, and promptly and gratefully acknowledges any gifts sent them. If you haven't done anything for these poor, unhappy people send a contribution of money to The Commission for Relief in Belgium, 71 Broadway, New York. All who render aid, no matter how small, receive a very beautifully engraved certificate of acknowledgment that is well worth framing. I know there are plenty of hungry people in the United States, you need not remind me of that. I have felt the pangs of hunger under Old Glory more than once myself. There is however, an enormous quantity of food in this country. Plenty for everybody, and if people don't get it it is absolutely their own fault. Every ill this nation suffers from could be remedied if the people would think right and vote right, but those who do the complaining and the suffering will do neither, so don't begrudge the wretched Belgians the scraps of food that are sent them. They can't get food unless we send it to them. Here the food is all around us and if we don' get our share of it the fault lies at our door.

We have a big League correspondence list which can be had free by League members who desire to make pen friends. Send a stamped addressed envelope and give your League number or you won't get the list.

Don't forget to send me those birthday letters, for on the 25th of this month I reach my fifty-second birthday, and in spite of nineteen years of invalidism I know you'll be glad to hear I still look like a spring chicken—more springs than chicken. The Goat says I look more like a fall rooster. You see a fellow can't have any secrets when a Goat is around.

To celebrate my coming birthday I have gotten out a new book which I have named "Uncle Charlie's Picture Book," as it consists chiefly of pictures of people, scenes and objects of interest connected with my life and the events in which I have figured. It is prettily bound in stiff covers and makes an attractive as well as interesting volume. It can be had free as a premium for two subscriptions. For further description see announcement on another page.

If you haven't a set of Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books your home is not complete and you are not equipped for the full enjoyment of life. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort,—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues.

I have had some very fine photographs taken. One of these shows me seated in a chair for the first time in nineteen years. Maria and the Goat are standing on either side to see I don't fall out. The pictures in Uncle Charlie's Poems and Story Book have been changed and some new and very stunning pictures replace the old ones.

Now for the letters.

ALVIN, TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have lived in the beautiful Gulf Coast country of Texas for over five years, and not having seen a letter from this locality, I send this one. As a description of myself probably would not interest you all very much, I'll just omit that and give you an idea of this Southern country and what the principal productions are. Alvin, is a very pretty little town of about twenty-five hundred people. The land is quite level and very fertile, producing most every kind of products, the principal three being cotton, strawberries and satsuma oranges. However, all other citrus products do well. Alvin, is in the center of the strawberry belt, and the fields vary in size from one to sixty acres. Usually there are from six to ten berry buyers here every spring, and the berries are shipped to the Northern markets in car load lots, as many as from five to twelve cars per day. Vegetables also are a profitable industry, and they do fine. We are twenty-five miles from Houston, and thirty miles from Galveston. These are both good towns and good markets for garden stuff. Galveston, will be remembered a long time by the 1900 storm, there being so many people drowned, about 15,000. Such a storm would not be so destructive now, as there is a great concrete sea wall extending the full length of the town on the gulf side, which cost over $3,000,000. Then there is the causeway across Galveston Bay on the north which is about three miles long, connecting the island with the main land. This causeway cost something like $2,500,000 and is the greatest cement bridge in America, I presume. There is room on this causeway for a railway track, an interurban track and a large driveway for vehicles.

I could tell you a great deal more about this Sunny South country, but my letter is getting long so I'll begin to close. I wish however, to say that I have been reading COMFORT for over eight years, and I think it is one of the greatest of magazines.

I like the cousins' letters, and enjoy reading them, and your answers to them are simply grand, some are quite masterpieces. However, Uncle, I am especially interested in your preliminary talk to the cousins before you take up the letters. I have been reading them very closely every month since I have been reading COMFORT, and I can't express myself better than to say they just suit me exactly. I realize the awful predicament we are facing, and as you say the ballot is the only remedy.

I trust that you may live a long time and continue to give us these interesting talks.

I have sent in several club memberships to COMFORT, and I have your book of poems. This is a fine book and all the cousins should have it.

I trust, Uncle Charlie, that you may have the best of health, that you may live many years yet to conduct the cousins' department.

With best wishes for you all, I beg to remain,
Your nephew, WALTER G. PUGH.

Thank you, Walter for your fine typewritten letter. I know just where you are located. So Alvin is the center of the strawberry belt. I wonder how it feels to be surrounded by a strawberry belt? If I had a belt like that I don't think it would keep my personal attire in position very long. What would happen to a man who ate his strawberry belt? It's too horrible to contemplate. Do you wear one, Walter? It is with interest we learn that vegetables in your vicinity do fine. Everything up here is so punk that it does my poor moth-eaten heart good to know that somewhere there is somebody or something doing fine, even if it's only a vegetable. Why, we can't even pick a potato up here, unless it's got a black eye, and even the corn has got sore ears listening for that wave of Republican and Democratic prosperity that has been sidetracked for the last million years. I am glad you drew our attention, Walter, to that big sea wall Galveston has built. Fifteen thousand people in Galveston had to die before its city fathers had gumption enough to build a decent wall to protect them, and there are millions of lives sacrificed yearly in this country because people have not sense enough to protect themselves, and our national government is too stupidly indifferent to take steps to protect them. After Galveston got one good soak from the sea and the tempest, she learned her lesson and learned it well, but though Galveston has erected a wall to protect herself from the raging waters, has she, I wonder, ever thought of erecting a still more necessary wall to keep out poverty, hard times, unemployment, vice, ignorance, superstition and the white and black plagues? By the way, I'll wager that not five people in a hundred, not only in Galveston, but in all the cities in the United State even know what I mean by the white and black plagues. The sea in all probability will never again rob Galveston of a single life, but every ten years, possibly every five, more than fifteen thousand lives will have been sacrificed in the city of Galveston for the lack of the wall of common sense which no city has as yet had the gumption to build. What a bunch of geese we human beings are. I write human beings, as I do not want to be disrespectful, but in this little home of ours, when we refer to the masses of the people we refer to them not as human beings, but as human beans. By the way you might all ask yourselves whether you are not more of the backward bean type than the real progressive human being. Wait however, until you have finished reading this article and then you will have a little better chance to know just where you belong. Now if the sea could hit every town and village in the United States a good big whack, just once, drowning a few scores, hundreds or thousands of people as the case may be, you'd see the sea walls bobbing up by the thousands in all

The difference between Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Smith

This is the way the wash-basket looks to Mrs. Jones—

and this is the way it looks to Mrs. Smith.

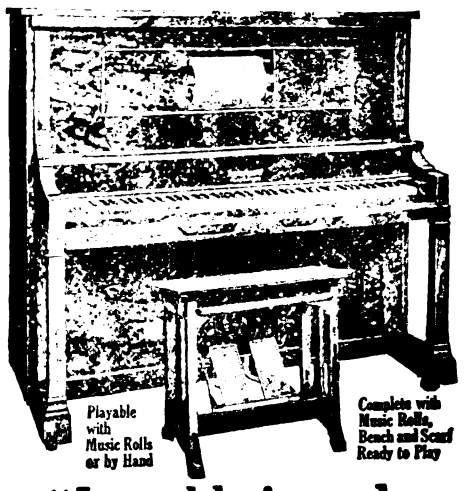
Mrs. Jones

is still doing her washing and all her work the hard, long way.

On washday she gets up hours earlier, starts a hot fire, hard-rubs and boils her clothes, not getting done till late afternoon.

Mrs. Smith

uses Fels-Naptha Soap. She gets up at the regular time, because she doesn't need to start her washing till breakfast is all cleared away. She gets done quickly and easily without having to boil or hard-rub the clothes.



Her wash is all on the line early, and she has the afternoon free to iron, to rest, or to do just what she pleases.

Mrs. Smith does just as much work as Mrs. Jones—in fact, she has a larger family. Her clothes are always clean and white, her house is always bright and shining—but she is never tired out or overworked. She uses Fels-Naptha Soap for her washing and all her housework. Cuts out all the drudgery and saves at least half the time.

"I could sit and play all day"

So exclaimed a music teacher after playing the Symphonic of an Albuquerque, New Mexico, customer. Little folks and grownups all love the Symphonic Piano or Symphonic Player Piano easy and delightful to play. You'll be agreeably surprised at the length of time one can play the Symphonic and not feel tired. The scientifically adjusted action responds instantly to the most delicate touch.

Symphonic Player Piano
Price $450 when sold alone or $75 less with Larkin Products or Groceries

At these Factory-to-Family sold-alone prices, $450 for the Symphonic Player Piano and $300 for the Symphonic Piano, great savings are secured. But greater savings of $75 on the Player and $50 on the Piano result when bought with Larkin Products or Groceries. Then the prices are, Player $375, Piano $250. Our Products and Groceries are 80 necessaries, as Flour, Sugar, Coffee, Tea, Canned Goods, Soaps, Toilet Articles, sold the Factory-to-Family way at savings of 35c to 60c on the dollar.

Symphonola
Price $70 Sold Alone

As in the case of the Symphonic we sell the Symphonola for less when purchased with Larkin Products or Groceries. Then the price is $60, far below the usual price for such instruments. Victor and Columbia records are playable on the Symphonola.

12 to 50 Months to Pay Without Interest

Whether you buy under the Sold-Alone Plan or with Larkin Products or Groceries you may take a year to pay for the Symphonola or over four years to pay for the Symphonic. And no extra interest charge. Subsoiling and Deep Plowing

NOW that the fall plowing is being started we cannot advise our readers to go to great expense in subsoiling land. By subsoiling is meant breaking up or turning over the soil under the bottom of the ordinary furrow. In some soils a "hard pan" forms there and may prove quite tenacious, so much so indeed, that roots have difficulty in penetrating for soil moisture. These pans commonly contain lime or iron in large quantities. Lime tends to work down through the soil and in time forms a binding pan. Iron found in the hard pans is poisonous to plants if brought into the working tilth. In time it becomes oxidized and then loses poisonous properties. Any system of subsoiling or extra deep plowing which brings the subsoil to the surface is injurious. Any admixture of subsoil should be done gradually and in some instances there is no profit in bringing such soil to the top. Indeed experiments have shown that under ordinary circumstances, or corn land on clay subsoil, subsoiling does not pay, nor can farmers be conscientiously advised to use deep tilling plows or implements. It is a mistake to merely skim the surface soil in plowing. When we speak of average plowing we mean a furrow at least six or seven inches deep and by deep plowing or ordinary kind we mean a furrow eight or nine inches deep. Deep plowing, that does not commonly pay is from ten inches to twelve inches or more in depth. To pay for plowing or subsoiling to the latter depths one would have to obtain at least three bushels extra of corn per acre and experiments do not show that such gains are common. The better way to tackle the subsoil is to see that the land is well drained, if draining is needed, and to make the growing of clover and Alfalfa a fixed policy of farm practise. The Alfalfa roots, or the roots of white clover, penetrate far into the subsoil and help drainage. They die there and help to furnish needed humus. At the same time the land is made less liable to washing. Turn a wide, deep furrow in the stubbles and the land from which corn has been cut; but do not go to the expense of subsoiling or extra deep cultivating or stirring and do not bring the subsoil to the surface.

Manuring and Weed Killing More Important

Far more important than extra deep plowing or subsoiling is it to see that weeds do not "cumber the ground." If they only cumbered the ground that would not be so bad; but the trouble is that they are plant food robbers and are much better foragers than is corn or any other farm crop. If the weeds are allowed to grow they steal the plant food from the corn, or cotton, or tobacco and a light crop results. Merely hoeing down the weeds, without cultivating, manuring or irrigating corn land, will increase the crop several bushels an acre. A combination of clean cultivation, heavy manuring and soil stirring brings the banner yields per acre. In fall this should be kept in mind when the plowing has to be done. To get sufficient fertility into the ground, for the next corn, tobacco, or cotton crop manure may well be hauled out on the sod and plowed under at once; or the manuring of sod fields may be done in winter, the plowing to be done in spring. Many farmers now put all of the manure on the sod land. It is more easily hauled out there. The sod does not cut up or pack so badly as the stubble and a combination of grass roots and manure makes the best fertility for the coming crop that is to be worked and kept clean. Manure tends to foul the land with weed seeds and so is objectionable upon land that is to be seeded to grain and grass. The weeds come up in the grain and again in the hay. If the sod is manured the weeds that come from the manure are killed by the cultivation of the green crop (corn, potatoes, cotton, tobacco, etc.), and the grain fields and meadows are cleaned in consequence. If rye was sown in the corn "the last time through" it may be pastured late in fall and again in spring and when the corn field is then plowed in spring the rye makes additional fertility and the land also is cleaner from weeds that were rye not seeded. Experience has taught us that it is a mistake to sow fall rye on land that is to be planted to corn or tobacco in spring, for the cut worms harbor in the rye sod and devastate the young corn and tobacco plants in summer. Make all the manure possible this fall and winter.

Enhancing Manure Values

If the cattle, horses, sheep and swine are not fed bought feed, such as bran, middings, shorts, oilcakes and oilmeal the manure they make will not fully return to the soil all of the nutrients (plant food) removed by the grain and forage crops. In time land is bound to become impoverished although stock is kept and well fed and all of the manure returned to the land. It will become impoverished even if no grain, hay, or straw or any other crop leave the farm. Selling milk, butter or meat remove a certain amount of soil fertility each year. Butter-fat (cream) is the least robber. That is to say that the farmer who sells cream and feeds his cows every particle of feed grown on the farm will be least liable to run down his land, and if the land before such cow-feeding is done has been abused by grain selling, improvement in crops will be noted. But the cream producer, as well as the man who sells animals, or grain, cotton, or tobacco must bear in mind that soil impoverishment is going on all the time and must be made up for in some way or the land will in time become "poor". Make all the manure possible. Grow clover whenever and wherever possible. Sell as little crop produce as possible. Put back into the soil all the manure from animals fed upon the crops grown on the farm and in addition to this grand work try to supply cheap fertility in the way of ground limestone and ground phosphate rock. These are true permanent improvers. Quick-acting, stimulating, readily soluble fertilizers and mixtures of chemicals help the crop this year, leave little benefit for the following crop and in some instances may be soil impoverishers in the end; but the lime and phosphate rock gradually yield up fertility and if applied right along, just as every good farmer uses manure each year and also seeds some land to grass and clovers each year, the farm will keep up and actually improve every year. Mix about eighty pounds of ground phosphate rock with each load of manure hauled out this fall and the coming winter. Apply a thousand pounds of ground limestone or more per acre, if it can be had cheaply, and in addition to these fertilizers use forest leaves, road scrapings and ditch cleanings in compost with lime for surface manuring.

Preparing for the Lamb Crop

While we are doing everything possible to insure a good crop of grain and grass for the coming season we are liable to forget that crops of young animals must, or ought to be, specially provided for at this time of the year. By "providing for" we mean adequately fed before birth. If the lambs are to come strong and numerous the ewes must be fed now. The extra feeding is termed "flushing" and the ram is included in such extra nourishment. The idea is that if a ewe is bred when thin and weak her lambs will come weak and puny, or she will be likely to bring forth but one weak lamb. This is an actual fact, proved by experiments, and the experiments also show that the percentage of twin lambs is greatly increased by abundantly feeding the ewes for a few weeks before the time of mating and during that time feeding the ram in the same way. Then, too, it should be understood that the pregnant mare and cow must be adequately fed if they are to bring forth strong young. The mare that is kept run down with hard work and made to subsist on straw, hay and fodder during winter may not have much milk for her foal next spring and the foal may come into the world weak and apt to succumb to navel infection or scours. The cow that is to be the future profit maker is the calf of the well fed cow that has herself been a great producer and such a calf is the get of a sire from an equally good producing family. The "flushing" of ewes and rams is done with mixed whole oats and wheat bran. A little oilmeal sometimes is fed, if it can be bought at a profit. In addition one should save a small field of rich grass for the ewes that are to be bred and they may there be fed in addition summer cabbage, turnips and green fodder. The ram may also have such feed, as a preparation for the season, but not when he is being used. The green feed is best allowed ahead of the mating season and the grain mixture takes its place at that time. Half to three quarters of a pound of a mixture of equal parts of whole oats and wheat bran fed daily will put the ewes in good condition for breeding and when they are bred they should be well fed during the winter, especial care being taken not to feed much coarse, dry, bulky fodder and at all times to keep the bowels active and the sheep abundantly exercised.

Turning Under Timothy Sod

Timothy is one of the most stable hay crops that the farmer can grow. When a field is once seeded down to Timothy there is a constant temptation to let it run as long as it can. It must be remembered, however, that Timothy is particularly hard on the soil. Year after year as the crop is removed the soil gets poorer and poorer until it finally refuses to produce enough hay to bother with. It is then that the farmer thinks of plowing it under.

Sod land should not be run to Timothy for more than two years in succession, the first year after seeding to hay, the second to pasture. It should then be plowed under and the best time to do this is in the fall. This will give the sod time to rot, will kill off the insects that are turned up to the weather, will store up moisture for the next season's crop and will give the weather a chance to get at the soil and break it down so that it will produce a good crop the following spring.

Plow up your old Timothy fields this fall and seed down a new one next spring if you must have Timothy hay.

Planting Trees and Shrubs in the Fall

Trees and shrubs are usually planted in the spring in all the Northern states but farther south both spring and fall planting is practised. Fall planting is possible in the colder climates, but there is more danger from loss in these sections. In general, trees and shrubs should be planted while dormant, that is after the growing season is past. A long continued dry spell, as well as the approach of winter, will cause a plant to go into the dormant state. Fall planting may follow a dry spell which in turn may be followed by warm, wet weather and a late fall. This will cause the newly set tree to renew its growth, but it will not have had time to mature its wood or become thoroughly established before winter sets in. Severe freezing will almost surely kill such trees, hence it is not a good practise to run this risk in the Northern states. Farther south it is entirely safe, because even if the wood does not mature under these conditions the weather is not severe enough to damage the young trees.

Care of Seed Grain

Few farmers stop to think that seed grain may be injured immediately after threshing and that there is therefore any special care that need be taken at threshing time of grain to be used for seed.

Grain for seed should be dry to login with and be kept dry. If damp grain is put in a bin it is pretty sure to heat or mold. Though it may not be heated enough to do serious damage to the market or feeding value of the grain, this heating may have a very decided effect on the vitality of the seed. Not every seed that grows is a good seed. It may be weak in vitality, make slow growth and develop a weak plant which will in the end ripen a few small weak kernels. There is no way of separating out these weak kernels from the strong ones. If they are in the seed bin they must be sown. Neither is there any way of selecting out kernels injured by mould, yet every moldy kernel is practically dead. Mold destroys the life of the germ in seeds. What, then, is the farmer to do?

Since the trouble cannot be cured it must be prevented. The time to prevent it is at threshing time. If the grain is not in first-class shape he should select that which is the driest, plumpest and best for seed. This should be stored in a bin by itself. After threshing it should be carefully watched and frequently turned to prevent heating and made to dry out as rapidly as possible, after which it should be kept perfectly dry. If it is so damp that there is danger of heating or molding it had better be spread out on the barn floor and shoveled over every day until it is perfectly dry before being put in the bin.

Insure Next Year's Corn Crop Now

All over the Northern tier of states unusual weather conditions have greatly reduced the corn crop. Not for many years has this crop had such a struggle to ripen its grain. As a consequence there is much soft corn and immature seed. This means a poor stand next year and a short crop unless special precautions are taken now. What are these very necessary precautions?

Select Seed Corn with Unusual Care

Seed must be selected with more than ordinary care this year. Only mature, well-filled ears can be depended upon to grow. Such ears indicate strong vigor and vitality. These cannot be safely selected at husking time. Such ears are borne on strong, vigorous, leafy stalks, hence the stalk needs to be taken into account in selecting seed for next year's crop. Seed corn should be selected as soon as ripe, from the standing stalks in the field. By the time that the September number of COMFORT reaches you, the farmer should begin to think about the selection of his seed corn.

Select More Seed Corn Than Usual

There is certain to be a lot of poor corn saved for seed. Such corn will fail to grow and the fields will need replanting. More than this, there are many farmers who will be without seed corn. These two factors will create an unusual demand for seed. The price will be high. The farmer who has an extra supply on hand is practically certain of a good market at a high price.

Give Special Attention to the Curing of Seed Corn This Fall

Immature corn will have its vitality improved by careful curing. Allowing it to freeze while still full of moisture will destroy the germ entirely. Since there is likely to be much soft corn, this corn will be full of moisture which must be driven off by careful drying if we are to have corn that will grow next spring. This means that seed corn must be carefully dried with some form of artificial heat. If no better place is to be had it may be hung up around the kitchen stove. This is a poor place, however, because there is so much steam escaping from boiling water that the corn will dry out very slowly indeed. An attic, over the kitchen, that is provided with windows to insure ventilation, is a better place. A smoke house, such as is found on many farms and used only in the winter for the smoking of meat, is a splendid place. Two holes should be cut in the gables, one on either side, to provide for the proper circulation of air. These should always be kept open except in stormy weather, when they should be closed to keep out the rain. A small stove, the size depending upon the size of the building, should be provided. In this stove a slow fire should be kept burning daily for three or four weeks. This will drive off the moisture and the circulation of air through the small windows will carry it away. After drying for three or four weeks the corn should be stored in some dry place where there is good circulation of air and where it will be protected from rats and mice. There is no good reason why it may not hang in the curing house provided there is no other use for the building.

Since it is necessary to write this several days in advance, we cannot predict what the weather at the close of the season will be. A warm, late fall, which is not now to be expected, may ripen more corn than now appears likely. Nevertheless, it is good practise to select seed corn according to the directions here given and to cure it with the greatest of care.

Evaporating Sweet Potatoes

Prof. Massey says that there is no vegetable grown that is so easily and rapidly dried as the sweet potato. Cut in slices and evaporated in any of the portable evaporators, they can be kept in sacks in winter without difficulty, and can be made into a variety of dishes and puddings, after being soaked over night to restore them; or they can be pulverized and used for many of the nice dishes that Southern housewives know so well how to prepare. The same author expresses his opinion that if some one would go into the business of evaporating and pulverizing the sweet potato, and then pack them in neat papers, such as corn-starch is packed in in the North a large and profitable trade could be established, especially if the packages gave the recipes for custards and pies and such things that the sweet potato makes so perfectly. There should be a fine opening in the South for an investment of capital in such a business, thinks Prof. Massey, for the potatoes can be contracted for as cheaply as Irish potatoes are contracted for at the starch factories in Maine.

Improving Farm Stock

Thousands upon thousands of hard-working farmers will soon be spending well-earned days of recreation at the state fairs throughout the country, where they will examine and admire the magnificent exhibits of live stock which are an inseparable and important feature of such events. But it is not enough to look with favor upon the well-filled coats of these fine cattle and sheep and swine. They should teach a lesson of value to all who delve in Mother Earth for a living and feed the products of their industry to live stock. Too often the average farmer is of the opinion that the show animals are freaks of nature—rarities that are beyond his reach, stock to be admired but not bred upon the farm of the hard-working man. Some of this is true, but most of it is false. We do not apprehend for a moment that it would be advisable for the average farmer to engage in the breeding of pure bred live stock upon a large scale. He has not the necessary capital, time nor experience, but he has all the requisites for the improvement of his farm animals if he will but use the means furnished for him in the pedigreed sires and females he is shown at the fall fairs. Let him banish the false idea that show animals are freaks. Let him take it for granted that, on the contrary, they are but fine examples of the possibilities for perfection of form and production possessed equally by all good representatives of the various breeds exhibited. Let him understand that he may make all of his animals closely approach the fine appearance of the show stock if he will but breed towards their purity of blood and feed and house them in fitting manner. Once upon a time the show stock were but good representatives of the average, unimproved animals of the farm. They were fitted by fattening and grooming and made a good appearance. Their excellence of form and condition led to emulation and this to general interest in feeding and showing. Naturally the show animals were preferred for breeding purposes and in time improvement was progressive and permanent. It is possible for every farmer to benefit by the improvements made through many generations in the breeding of live stock. At the fair he may choose a breed that to him seems best suited to his ideas and wants. By infusing the blood of this breed into the vein of his farm animals he may in time with certainty build up animals that to all intents and purposes are pure bred. It does not cost a great deal to do this. It is an easy matter to pick a pedigreed bull of the desired breed, and such animals can be found at reasonable rates if the buyer is not too particular as to the family to which the bull belongs. Five successive top crosses of this bull, or stallion, or buck or boar will work wonders upon the appearance and quality of the farm stock, and if the farmer will but stick perseveringly to the same breed he will in time have animals that it would be difficult to tell from pedigreed stock. It costs no more to keep such animals. They command better prices wherever offered. They look better on the farm, redound to the credit of the farmer, and give

TWILIGHT SLEEP

By Mrs. Mary Boyd

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THERE is no city in the world where the stork with his little burden, tied up in the knotted handkerchief we always see in the pictures, is so welcome as he is in the city of Freiburg in Baden, Germany. There in the last few years they have established a Kinderfest—a Children's Day—and the stork parades on every float. There the children are fat and healthy and the mothers are exceptionally well and happy. To most mothers the stork brings his comforting gift when they are sick. But in Freiburg the mother is hale and hearty and is up a few days after the baby is born, in fact the doctors have much trouble to keep her in bed at all for her needed rest. For convalescence after the birth of the baby has become for the Freiburg mother merely a rest after healthy labor.

Six years ago, an American woman stopped in her travels at Freiburg, and had her baby there. As the years went on she had two more children. Each time she went back as the time was coming on all the way from America to Freiburg, the home of painless babies. She had had five babies in America and she knew the difference.

From her I had often heard references to the wonderful work for women of Professors Bernard Kronig and Carl Gauss at the Woman's Hospital of Baden University. But her story was vague, so when I was hoping for a baby of my own about two years ago, I packed up my trunk and set out for Freiburg to find whether these two humane doctors could give me a really painless birth. I found that it was even beyond my expectations. I and my friend Marguerite Tracy who was with me, have spent our time, since my baby was born, spreading the news of this boon to motherhood among the women of America.

More than ten years ago, a German obstetrician named Steinbuchel found that if he injected in the mother a very minute quantity of the new au æsthetic scopolamin combined with a very little morphin, she could in many cases bring her child into the world with all her muscular vigor but with no pain. He used the same dose for all mothers, and not all, though a fair percentage, were relieved. Doctors all over the world took it up. Some followed his small dose carefully and had the same results; others paid no attention to the amount Steinbuchel used but heavily overdosed and in that way did injury to the mother and prolonged birth so that they asphyxiated the child. These men, having failed through their own recklessness, decided the method was no good and gave it up.

Among those, however, who were careful in their use of Steinbuchel's method were Kronig and Gauss, who will go down in history side by side with the discoverers of surgical anæsthesia as two of the greatest benefactors of humanity. For by careful patient work they improved Steinbuchel's method so that they could give painless birth to between 80 and 90 per cent of all the women who were confined in their hospital.

Their whole secret lay in not giving one fixed dose to all women like Dr. Steinbuchel but in adapting it to the physical and nervous and "anæsthetic" temperament of each individual woman. Some women had 1-130 grain—this was the largest—and some even as little as 1-200. This they called "individualizing" the dosage and this individualizing of a very minute dose produces the so-called Dammerschlaf condition of consciousness which we in America call Twilight Sleep.

Twilight Sleep is new to anæsthesia. Some times a surgeon as he operates will hear the patient cry out. He will deepen the anæthesia and go on with his work. But if the patient is asked about his cry afterwards he will be surprised, will say he knew nothing, felt no pain, did not know he cried out. In surgery this is an accident. It is because one half of the patient's brain is beginning to wake up; he is passing from painlessness to instantaneous forgetfulness of pain. His lower brain, the cerebellum, which animates the muscles and the nerves and the senses, is waking; his upper thinking brain, the cerebrum, which records the memory and receives the harmful shock from pain is still asleep. In surgery however both parts of the brain should be asleep so that the muscles shall relax and this is why the surgeon deepens the dose as the patient cries out.

For childbirth this Twilight condition is the ideal state between consciousness and unconsciousness, for the muscles must be kept awake and active. If the pain is forgotten as soon as felt, the birth from the mother's point of view, is painless. The act of birth is oblivion, and she has after the birth no exhaustion, no shock to recover from.

So the doctors in Freiburg did not trouble if the mother moaned or complained a little during the birth. They only saw to it that she kept forgetting—instantaneously forgetting each act or object or sensation—straight along from the very minute labor became regular (pains about five minutes apart) till the birth was over. This forgetting is called amnesia. To be sure that she kept forgetting, they used the Memory Test. If they asked her a question and though she seemed to be listening she answered irrelevantly, or if she did not respond to her own name when they spoke it, or in many other ways showed that what was going on around her was unnoticed by her, though she was active and did not seem unconscious, they knew that she was maintaining her Twilight Sleep.

One father, entering the room just after the baby's birth, remarked, "Why, there is the baby already in the cradle." The mother turned her head and said, "I shall move that cradle and plant potatoes there." She was still under the Twilight Sleep; she heard the sound but could not grasp the meaning of what was said to her.

If, on the other hand, the mother begins to notice what is said and answers sensibly, the doctors know that she is waking up, and it is then that they give her a new dose. Mothers, the doctors found, were different. Some got their doses one and one half and two hours apart, some three or four hours. But the use of the memory test kept the dose down to the most infinitesimal amount suited to each mother, and provided also that there was no accumulation of the anæsthetic in the mother. Each dose was used up before another was given and there was nothing left behind to gradually pile up and reduce the mother to too deep an anæthesia to perform her labor properly. This method the doctors at Freiburg found enabled them to make birth an absolutely normal physical act of the mother herself, painless and without danger to herself or her baby.

I must have given in this description some idea of the great care, the close watching, the understanding of the patient that it required to administer the Twilight Sleep. To do it the Freiburg hospital had to treble its staff of doctors; but to them this seemed none too much trouble for the sake of motherhood.

The condition of Twilight Sleep was so delicate that loud sounds or bright lights easily broke into it, so the hospital went to the trouble of equipping quiet rooms with double doors and twilight darkness, where each mother bore her child in seclusion, disturbed by no one but the silent moving nurses and doctors.

The doctors at Freiburg were cautious; they were highly scientific. They did not rush to conclusions. They made no report and urged no one to use their method till they had delivered 500 mothers successfully.

They studied those 500 cases in every detail and on them Doctor Gauss published one of the most important reports in medical history. In the ten years since then, they have published three other reports, covering in all over 4,000 cases. At first they were very careful to use the Twilight Sleep only for mothers who were strong and well. But as time went on they found that it was harmless for all mothers, and that it was a special boon to those who were sickly. The only people who today cannot have it at Freiburg are those whose births are too quick to come under its influence. For it takes about an hour to fall off to sleep, and furthermore, the severe pains of quick births prevent the drug from exerting its influence. These and a small class of patients who are temperamentally unable to come under the influence of anæsthesia except in too heavy doses for childbirth, make up the ten to fifteen per cent of women in the Freiburg hospital who do not enjoy the benefits of Twilight Sleep.

For the rest of the women, those who did enjoy the painless Twilight Sleep and wake amazed to find their babies on their pillow or in the cradle at their bedside, Doctor Gauss' careful reports show that Twilight Sleep:

Did not injuriously lengthen the birth process.

Did no injury to the mother, but saved her the nervous exhaustion and collapse that usually follow birth.

Did no injury to the child.

I have told already how well the mother feels after the birth, how it is hard to keep her in bed because she feels just like being "up and doing." A Chicago doctor, who has in recent months been using Twilight Sleep tells how one woman who had been in the hospital a few days waiting for her baby got up mechanically as usual the morning after the birth and was making her bed when the doctor came in and hustled her back into bed. She could not be made to believe that the birth was over for she felt none of the exhaustion she had felt when her other children were born. Such experiences are everyday occurrences at Freiburg. The mother has also less injuries and lacerations to recover from than in ordinary birth.

The baby too comes out of the Sleep into the world brisk and lively. One of the main impediments to ordinary birth is pain, and this is the cause of the large proportion of births aided by the dangerous high or medium forceps. These are more dangerous to the child than to the mother, often crushing his head, sometimes killing him, paralyzing the side of his face or doing him other injury. These two forms of the forceps were practically done away with by Twilight Sleep, only the harmless low forceps being used, and this very seldom. The Twilight baby was also spared asphyxia, that is the serious interference with breathing caused often by births excessively prolonged by pain. Perhaps it is due to these causes that the Freiburg doctors found, much to their own surprise that in the first six years of Twilight Sleep, they had cut the baby death rate to half what it was in the ten years immediately preceding the introduction of Twilight Sleep. Before that it had been 3.4 per cent of all babies; with Twilight Sleep only 1.3 per cent. Years before, when some doctors were discussing in Professor Kronig's presence the death rate among infants from the forceps, they dismissed the subject with the statement "We must save the suffering mother rather than the child." "We must find some method that will save the mother and the child," replied Doctor Kronig. In the Twilight Sleep he found the method.

Occasionally, the Twilight baby is born sleepy or as they call it oligopnoeic. Of late, doctors in America have set up a great alarm about these "blue babies." A doctor visiting Freiburg describes those he saw there as follows:

"This group of children were born fresh and rosy. They cry out at birth. The heart beats somewhat slowly and the child breathes very superficially. Once in a while it opens its eyes. Its appearance does not create any anxiety in the spectator and perhaps a minute or two afterwards, normal breathing sets in."

A very few were slower, took ten to twenty minutes to establish deep breathing but the condition was never as deep as asphyxia. No skillful specialist in childbirth is alarmed by a baby in this condition. I deed oligopnea, by preventing premature breathing sometimes prevents a still birth. The condition can be and is found in many births without scopolamin. The real fact is that doctors did not observe so carefully the baby's condition until Twilight Sleep began to be used. The more skillful the doctor is with his administration of Twilight Sleep, the less oligopnoeic babies he has. Doctor Gauss' second group of 500 had only seven per cent of sleepy babies as against over 20 per cent in the first 500. Today the percentage is lower still.

And Freiburg babies have well mothers to care for them and nurse them. Again and again Freiburg mothers say that hey could nurse none of their children except their Twilight babies. The Twilight baby also has a well mother to take care of him which appears to count in his favor. In the baby death rate in their first year of life of Twilight babies in Freiburg is much less than the general baby death rate in the state of Baden.

This was what I found when, stimulated by my friend's three successful births, I went to Freiburg. Before I left there, I had myself wakened from ten hour labor in Twilight Sleep to have a baby, born entirely by my own efforts, placed in my astonished arms. A few hours later, I got up for half an hour and later in the day I wrote a long letter to my family which afterward became one of a series of articles I and my friend, Miss Tracy, published in America on Twilight Sleep.

These roused American women and they urged their doctors to study the method. At first the doctors said it was all a fake. They had used scopolamin-morphin, they said, and found it a bad thing. Then they began to read Doctor Gauss' reports, and to realize how different his method of use had been from theirs. Many even travelled to Freiburg to find out. One hotel registered 50 American doctors in one week. They began to try Twilight Sleep carefully and exactly as he directed, and they were astonished with their results. They realized that they had been reckless before, where he was careful. They realized that they had overdosed where he had cut the dose down to the lowest terms.

Last September, at the meeting of a great medical society in Buffalo, two New York hospitals, the Jewish Maternity and the Lying-in, reported between them on over 200 births they had had under Twilight Sleep and expressed their satisfaction with the method. The Lying-in report said frankly that when that hospital had used scopolamin-morphin years ago, they had used it wrong and expressed surprise that American physicians had not long ago read Doctor Gauss' reports. These two hospitals have now not far from 500 cases to their credit. The doctors in the Lying-in compared 100 births under Twilight Sleep with 100 confined during the same period in consciousness. They found that, relieved from the impediment of pain, the mothers under Twilight Sleep had quicker births, less lacerations and less hemorrhages than the conscious mothers. They found that whereas eight of the babies born in consciousness were asphyxiated only two under Twilight Sleep were in this dangerous condition. A half dozen others breathed lightly but woke after a few minutes with a healthy cry.

Other doctors to report on a large number of cases were Dr. John O. Polak of the Long Island College Hospital, Brooklyn, and Dr. W. H. W. Knipe of the Gouveneur Hospital in New York. Both of these bore out the statements of the Lying-in and Doctor Polak found that by using Twilight Sleep he could cut down illnesses following birth 50 per cent, cut down lacerations 60 per cent, and for the benefit of the baby, do away entirely with the use of the dangerous high and medium forceps.

All these doctors comment on the fresh and vigorous condition of the mother after the birth.

Recently a group of doctors compared one thousand births in consciousness with one thousand births under Twilight Sleep in America and found in every respect that the mothers under Twilight Sleep were in better condition than those without. They found also that a very much smaller number of the Twilight babies were stillborn or died soon after birth than of the babies born in pain.

In other words, they found in the words of Doctor Kronig that Twilight Sleep "saves the mother and the child."

Since last September there is no large and few small cities in the United States whose doctors have not held conferences on Twilight Sleep. In all large cities six to a dozen hospitals are using it and in smaller cities or towns one or two.

But much of this use is not the best; not all doctors claiming to use Twilight are doing careful work. Then too, there are many women who do not know where to get it and many others who live too far from any center where it is being used. To meet these needs, two months ago in New York City we formed the Twilight Sleep Association which now has many hundred members and which hopes before long to take in all women all over the country who believe that this boon to their sex should become, for the benefit of mother and child, as universal in childbirth as anæsthesia is in surgery.

The Association aims to investigate all work in Twilight Sleep and keep it up to the high standard set by Freiburg, and to give out to mothers inquiring information as to where they can get it. Finally, to supply the needs of the districts where it cannot be got now and to make it possible for all doctors to learn the right method, the Association plans to found a large open teaching hospital where physicians can come from all over the Union to learn and carry back their knowledge to their homes, for the benefit of the women in our towns or villages.

tempted to force her up the steps, and in the struggle the veil dropped off, and the face behind it wore a beard.

Wolves stalk the city streets; vultures that look for innocent victims, and the prettier and more innocent they are, the more they are in demand. It often seems that God has nothing to do with girls in a great city. They just drift, until they have drifted out of hearing, and out of sight, and the world forgets and doesn't care, because the world is very, very busy.

Some of you will think I'm a preacher and quite a young one when I tell you I'm "only a little country girl" seventeen years old.

I haven't lived in the city since I was six years old, and I love the dear old country life where you can go fishing, swimming, boating and horseback riding in the summer, skating and pecan hunting in winter.

When I was little I would tell mother I was going to the city to work when I got older, but she taught me, as I grew older, the wrongs of the city and I can say now that I'll never go to the city to work. But am expecting to board with my uncle and go to school there next year.

We live on a large ranch near the Clear Fork river, and eight miles west of Ft. Worth, Tex.

I have been taking COMFORT two years and find it a dandy paper.

With best wishes to all,

MISS CLARA B. MEELY.

BECKLEY, W. Va.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Women have been making a superb fight in the cause of temperance and for the franchise as well. To correct existing evils is indeed a very necessary and a very praiseworthy work, abounding in blessing, honor and glory.

But it is well said, "An ounce of preventive is better than a pound of cure," so if we could only reach and remove the formation, cause, viz., bad home government and the poor training of children, if fathers and mothers would be faithful in doing their duty the crowning work would be done. Government would be safe, homes protected, and morals established on a firm basis.

It seems to me the home is a very much neglected place. I know mothers who seem very anxious about the other fellow, who spend much time to the neglect of their own homes and children, and in some instances their own children are neither moral nor respectable.

Somehow I believe in the home as the kingdom of woman and I think it safe to say when we have better homes we will have a better country and a better nation. We want some way to make the home better and to help the young, neglectful and wayward mother to do her duty.

To this end I suggest a mothers' and home institute, for the benefit of all.

Now, please don't call me a crank. I presume you all think well of the Teachers' Institute, of the work it has done and is doing.

As a rule, which are better qualified and equipped for their work, the mother or the teacher, and whose

OLD LACE

Worth $50 an Inch, Fairy-like Product of a Past Art—By Anna S. Ells

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

LACE in all its filmy loveliness dates from the fifteenth century, when it succeeded "cut worke" on coarse linen; and this in turn succeeded drawnwork. The very first attempts at open-work adornment of cloth were a sort of fringe, made by slashing the ends of the cloth. Later they pushed the threads apart with some rude needle, and caught them into crude designs, often with colored wools. After a time they learned to draw out certain threads, as we draw them today, working the strands left into designs. Still later, they began cutting part of the threads away, and filling in the spaces with threads of their own. This was "cut worke", and is not by any means a lost art.

When this work reached Italy, where the nuns sat long hours in their sunny gardens, and the ladies of fashion had not learned the art of sitting idle, it had a great rage, and when some ambitious person conceived the idea of departing from the rule of placing all their handiwork within the linen foundation, and extended it beyond, "into the air," in the shape of scallops and points, it caused great excitement. The new departure was called "Reticella Points," or "Venetian Points" for they originated in Venice, Italy.

Soon ambition soared even higher, and some inventive genius made the "Reticella" without its being attached to the cloth at all; this was the birth of real lace. Previously they had used many stitches, such as sewing-over, rope, wrapping, in-and-out stitches, but all real needlepoint lace is made entirely with buttonhole stitch alone.

They worked in this fashion: on a piece of parchment the intended design was merely outlined with linen thread which was caught to the parchment sufficiently to hold it in place. Over this thread the design was more closely outlined, and on these latter outlines the design was worked, entirely in buttonhole stitch. When finished, the threads holding the first outline to the parchment were cut from the back, and the fairy-like fabric was free—a lace made out of nothing, by a needle poised in the air, working on its own thread. In their astonishment, they called it "Punto in aria," which means "point in the air." Needlepoint lace has retained the name ever since. The illustration "Punto in aria" shows this the first lace made entirely with the needle, without foundation of linen.

As the first real lace was made in Venice, it is also called "Venetian Point." For a while they used a rather coarse linen thread, but in time this was changed to a finer thread, with much more delicate results. In Flanders there grew a flax which, when spun in damp, dark cellars, to which but a single ray of light was admitted, produced a thread so fine as to be almost invisible to the naked eye. This was imported into Italy, and was used for some of the finest lace made there.

VERY FINE EXAMPLE OF "GROS POINT DE VENISE."

All "Venetian Point" is either raised or flat; the former has a cordonnet, or cord, which outlines the design; the latter has no cordonnet. A striking example of the raised Venetian Point is "Gros Point de Venise." The cordonnet is heavy, the designs bold and striking. It has been said of it that it is "sculptured in relief." The lace from which the illustration of "Gros Point de Venise" was made was but forty inches in length, and sold to a dealer some few years ago for $725. Another piece of "Gros Point de Venise" fifty-eight inches long, sold in 1904 for $3,000.

Another example of "Venetian Point" is Rose Point, one of the most delicate and highly priced and prized of Venetian laces. Owing to its fragility there is but little of this exquisite lace in existence today, and that little is almost priceless. See illustration of "Rose Point." If possible examine it, as well as the other illustrations under a microscope. The cordonnet is lighter than in "Gros Point," the designs finer and closer. There was no ground net or "reseau" to lace in those days, the different parts of the design being connected by "brides," made of buttonhole stitches, resembling the chain stitch of the connecting links in crocheting today. On these "brides" in Rose Point, also scattered throughout the designs, are tiny "roses" or "stars," edged with "picots" or little loops. The effect is that of a tiny ring crocheted over with very small projecting loops; when these were made of the almost invisible linen thread of Flanders, and scattered through the delicate tracery of "Rose Point" the effect was altogether lovely. One variety of "Venetian Point" has so many of these ornamental "roses" with double and triple rows of "picots" scattered through the designs that the effect is that of snowflakes, and it is therefore called "Point de Neige."

All these laces are worked with a cordonnet, more or less heavy, outlining the designs, and forming a part of them; they are, therefore, "Raised Venetian Point."

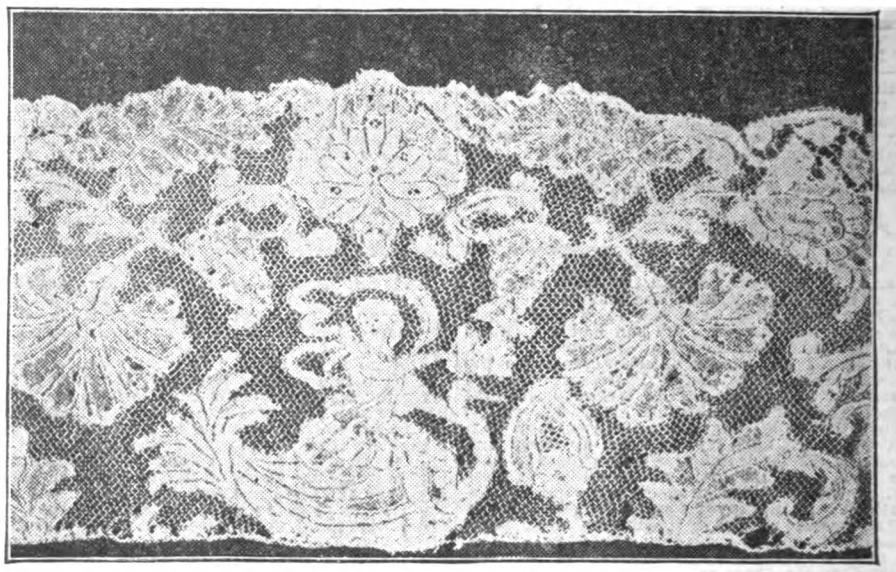
Among the Flat Venetian Point laces, namely those without a cordonnet, is one called Coraline, of which a pretty story is told. A sailor lad on going to sea gave his sweetheart a piece of coraline as a parting gift. It occurred to her to imitate it in lace before her lover's return. She was an expert lace-maker, and succeeded very well; Coraline lace had quite a vogue.

The French Court was very gay in those days, and the dress of the gentlemen vied with that of the ladies in daintiness and splendor; but until they heard of the wonderful new laces being made in Italy, they had no way of trimming their plain linen collars, cuffs, aprons and various articles of dress. Therefore, great was the demand for Italian laces, and vast sums of good French money found the way to Italy in exchange for the filmy loveliness. The people went quite frantic over the new fashion and the possibilities of dress that it opened. Plain linen was relegated to waiting maids and to widows, and the ladies and gentlemen of fashion adorned themselves with lace. They trimmed their collars, sleeves, cuffs, aprons, headdresses, table-cloths, coverlets, pillow-cases and handkerchieves with priceless lace, the gentlemen using it on the broad sashes which they passed across their shoulders, on their collars and wide cuffs, for rosettes on their low shoes, for knee-ruffles, and even the tops of some of the dandies' high boots were made of Venetian Point. Think of lace that would bring several thousand dollars a yard today adorning the tops of a man's boots!

But Louis XIV's Minister, Colbert, was a thrifty soul and it grieved, then frightened him to see so much French money leaving the country. He issued an edict forbidding the ladies and gentlemen to wear Italian laces, and stopping their importation. There were groans and tears. Laces they must and would have. This induced Colbert to bribe some Italian lace-makers to come to France and teach the art, and he soon had schools established there. In turn the Italians became alarmed when they no longer found sale for their laces, and French money ceased to travel into Italy. So they issued an edict of their own, demanding that all Italian lace-makers return to Italy, or, failing to do this, their nearest of kin would be imprisoned for life; if, however, they would return, they would be given work at fair pay for life. No doubt some did return to Italy, but lace-making had entered France to stay.

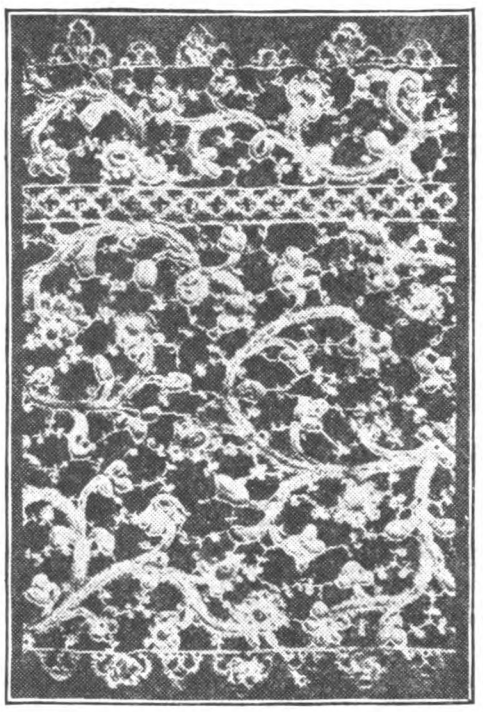
In 1665 Colbert had a flourishing lace school at Alencon, the lace made there being very beautiful; it bore the general name of the town, "Alencon Point" for many years, and is even so called today. For a long time the designs were those of Italy, but after a while French influence was felt, and they became more delicate and even finer than before. They, too, used the infinitesimal thread of Flanders, and the flowers and scrolls of the time of Louis XV were extremely lovely. It was around this time also that tiny figures appeared in the designs. Many of them were only three quarters of an inch in height, yet even the features can be distinguished. See the illustration of "Point D'Angleterre," which, although a lace made in Brussels, shows the tiny figure introduced in the French laces. I have not been able to secure a good illustration of the figured French lace.

It was at Alencon that horsehair was introduced for a cordonnet; this gave to the lace a brilliant appearance, but as it shrank when washed, the lasting effect was poor. Lace-making at Alencon continued into the nineteenth century, but gradually deteriorated, and is now a thing of the past.



For a long time French laces, like those of Italy, were also made with "brides" only.

While Needlepoint lace was being made in Italy in the fifteenth century, Pillow lace was also being made there and in Flanders. There is an unsettled question as to which country can claim the first honor. As the name implies, this lace was made over a pillow with bobbins. For a time it, too, was made with "brides" only, but the patterns, or "toile" were looser than those of Needlepoint, requiring more "brides" to hold them in position, thus giving the work a more solid appearance. More and more "brides" were added, until at last they grew into a continuous foundation, called "grounding," or "reseau."



After a time Alencon adopted the idea of grounding its Needlepoint lace, and later Italian laces followed suit. In Needlepoint all these meshes are made of crossed threads closely buttonholed, sometimes there being eight or even ten tiny stitches on each side of the fine mesh. In Pillow lace the grounding is made of plaited threads, giving a result like fine weaving. The shape and size of the meshes differ with different laces, often forming the real clue to their identity. See illustration "Point de France," which shows the French Needlepoint lace with the needle made meshground or "reseau." You will note that the meshes are not quite even, a characteristic of hand-made "reseaux."

Among the Pillow laces of Flanders are Brussels, Mechlin (called the "Queen of Laces"), Binche (said to be the most fairylike work made by human hands), Valenciennes (afterwards a French lace when Valenciennes became by treaty a part of France), and Antwerp. Often the latter shows a design of a pot of long, evenly balanced flowers, and for this reason is called "Potten Lace."

The lace made at Brussels was particularly fine. Much of it was made in damp cellars, as dry air made the fine thread brittle. The lace-makers grew nearly blind working in the dim light, and a very few years ended their usefulness. Brussels alone of all the towns of Flanders made both Pillow and Needlepoint laces. The designs were many and beautiful. Much of it was used for "lappets" which finished the headdress without which no lady was properly attired in those days, and to such extremes did the ladies rival each other in the use of this expensive lace that laws were passed regulating the lengths of the "lappets," the higher the rank of the wearer the longer her "lappet". Napoleon so admired Brussels lace that he ordered a christening robe of it made with N's and crowns, for his only son. Queens spent enormous sums of money for these laces until in 1760 George III, who was a rigid economist, advocated plainer dress.

Mechlin laces were also used for "lappets", and was a favorite lace. Valenciennes has been called "The Eternal Lace" on account of its durability, but that was when it was all hand-made; early Valenciennes was very beautiful. For a time it, too, was made with "brides" alone, but later was grounded.

Pillow lace-making extended into France and England, but the Pillow laces of Flanders are really only rivalled by the Pillow laces of Genoa and Milan, which are very fine.

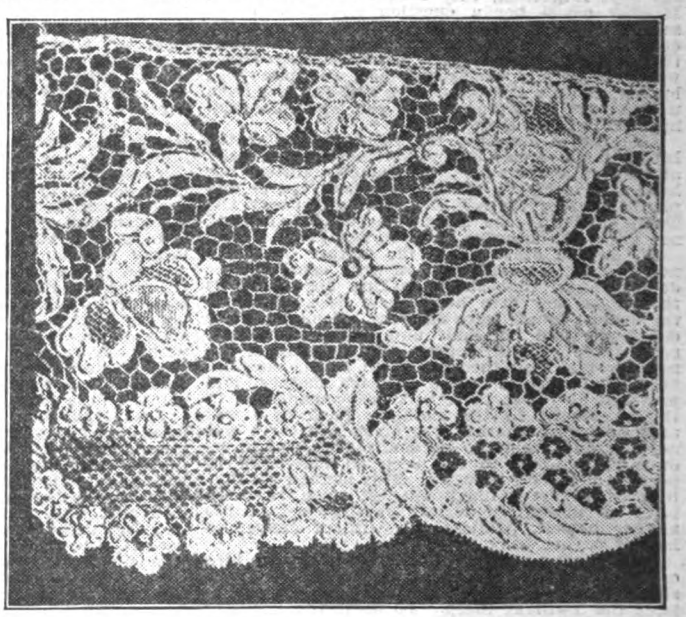
England used lace in vast quantities, making several inferior patterns herself, and importing the most, and all the best of it. Nearly everything was trimmed with lace in those days; it has been recorded that King James I had six hundred yards of fine lace on his night clothes. In time, however, the authorities objected to the importation of lace, and then smuggling began, and was carried to such an extent that coffins supposed to bring bodies of Englishmen back to their native land were found to contain only bundles of the most expensive laces; in one instance 6,000 pounds of lace were smuggled in this manner. Loaves of bread were sometimes but crusts covering the forbidden treasure. In 1764 nearly a hundred pounds of exquisite laces were seized and burned.

Honiton is the best of English made lace; Queen Victoria did a great deal to encourage its manufacture in England, but they did not possess the proper thread, nor the proper patience, and the introduction of machine-made imitations caused a never thriving industry to dwindle.

Ireland has never made much real hand-made lace. An attempt was made many years ago to introduce the art, but it did not succeed. Today we have Garrick-MaCross, which is very handsome, but is made on a foundation of fine linen, and is really more like "cutwork"; also there are so-called laces which are but applique, the designs or "toiles" being hand-made and applied to machine-made net. What is commonly called "real Irish lace" is, as a rule, real Irish crochet.

Today real lace is made, but not the exquisite laces of the past. At Burano, Italy, there are lace schools, where many new and some of the old designs are attempted, and where the old lace songs, now over two hundred years old, are still sung as they work. The writer recently saw a modern "Point de Venise," which, while beautiful, was not the fairy work of other days. The thread was coarse, and it was evidently made with an eye to commercial profit; its price was seventeen dollars per yard. In many of the modern "real" laces, only the designs are hand-made, and these applied to machine-made net, which is often of cotton and inferior.

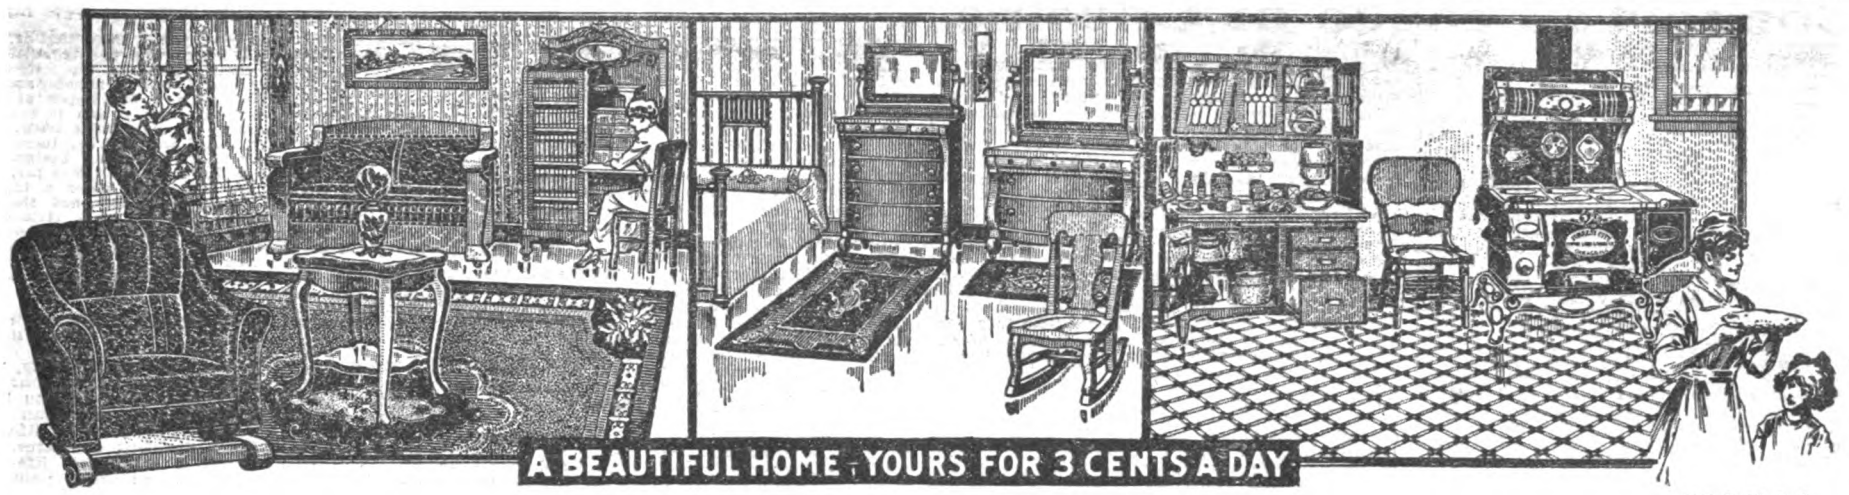
In 1760 a worker on a stocking-loom in Nottingham, England, studied the lace on his wife's cap, then invented a machine for making lace; this was improved from time to time, until in 1810 hundreds of people profited by making and selling the machine-made laces. You can trace in much of the imitation lace of today the stocking-stitch, reminiscent of the parent stocking-loom.



It was easier to make a machine which would produce the patterns than one which would make the ground, or "reseau," but in 1838 a man watched his wife embroider, then spent six months in learning the art himself. Next he invented a machine having six needles. In thirty years this was perfected, until now even Venetian Point lace is imitated with astonishing success.

It is interesting to note in all the laces of today, even the very cheap, machine-made kind, a trace of the real laces of the past. We find the "roses" with their tiny "picots," the "brides," the "cordonnet," the cloth-like fabric once made with bobbins only, the "wrapping-stitch" which has taken the place of the buttonhole stitch. The writer has an excellent imitation of Duchesse which cost fifteen cents a yard, and is perhaps four inches wide.

Among the "real" laces of today is "Point de Gaze," which is one of the finest modern laces. The ground is clear, the leaves and flowers often shaded. The "toile" is hand-made, and applied to the best machine-made net.



Ghent makes a good imitation of early Limerick, also a good imitation of Valenciennes, but even this is too expensive for most people, and the shops offer quantities of "real Val," all of which is not real at all, but entirely machine-made. Duchesse is a showy lace which is still made, and with "brides" only, but it is largely of cotton, and does not wash well.

We have, then, "real lace" still with us, but "Old Lace" is that which dates back not less than two hundred years. Owing to its delicacy, there are but few perfect examples left, and these are treasured by collectors and in museums. One piece of great value is so in tatters that it is kept between sheets of glass. The prices are prohibitive.

"POINT DE FRANCE."

When using your needle, your crochet-hook, or your knitting needle today, give a kindly thought to the people who, hundreds of years ago, sang as they worked the originals of the stitches you now employ, and gave their eyesight and their lives for that which we count so lightly now. Lace is now a pastime; once it was an Art.

Comfort's League of Cousins

directions. Not until the Almighty scoops up about half the ocean and bangs it slap in the eye of one of our cities will the people get busy and protect themselves. They do actually realize that an angry sea is a dangerous thing, but in comparison with the other enemies who are constantly waging war on mankind, storms, tempests and floods are as nothing. The Galveston and Johnstown floods broke up a good many homes, but every week in the United States there are more homes broken up, more hearts broken up, more lives broken up, more families scattered, than in the terrible calamities that befell those twin cities, and we think nothing of it. When a man cannot get work, or the nature of his work has broken down his health and given him consumption, or a bank has busted and left him penniless, or he has tired of the strenuous task of supporting a family of ten on twelve dollars a week, and his home busts up, no excitement is caused. The wood, bricks and mortar all stay in their allotted places, so nobody cares or takes notice But when the heavy waves of the ocean come along and the home goes somersaulting down the street, turning over and over in a most disgraceful and ungainly fashion to the great horror and astonishment of all beholders, there is great panic and excitement. You see when human hearts are broken and human lives crushed, nobody thinks anything about it. It's so very common, correct, proper and conventional, don't you know, that nobody is impressed and nobody cares. But when a conglomeration of lumber, lathes and plaster goes tobogganing down the street, all the community is hugely impressed and greatly terrified. Everyone knows that a lot of valuable property is being destroyed and a house on a rampage is a sight that would impress even the dullest and stupidest mind. But who cares for broken hearts and ruined lives? Bricks, lumber and mortar have a specific value. Human lives and human souls are worth nothing at all. So we build our walls to protect valuable property and to keep out raging waters which will probably never come, and never a brick or stone do we raise to keep out those greater enemies, want, worry, crime and disease that slay by the millions. Oh, Walter, I wish you could tell us of a city that had raised a big wall of common sense. You would not need any bricks or mortar to raise that wall. The only material you would need would be the bricks of love, sympathy, kindness and the mortar of education, truth and righteousness, held together by the enduring cement of eternal justice. Now will you democrats and republicans ever have sense to build any of those walls? You are all very handy in building an old wall of selfishness around yourself and your premises and storing within it every old thing you can lay your ungoldly hands on. We don't want those kind of walls. Those are what our friend Billy Sunday, would probably call "devil walls," and he wouldn't be far wrong. Those walls are smeared with human blood, and the winds murmur, a dismal dirge as they beat against their unyielding sides. Oh, no, we don't need any more of those walls. Tear them down, destroy them utterly, for they are the walls of death. Give us the walls of common sense and brotherhood that keep out the bad, and yield readily to all that is good. Get busy with your building, build not for yourself alone, but for humanity then I won't have to be lying here in a horrible wilderness of brick and mortar among selfish human "beans," envying a vegetable down in Texas, because it's doing fine.

TANNERY, MD.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am writing you about a wrong our government is doing. Now I do not think it is right for our government to allow the makers of war implements, to send their ammunition, etc., also our horses to the warring nations of Europe. Our government ought to forbid any such transactions. It only will prolong the war, when neutral nations are heaping coal upon fire, and then pray for peace, and think they will get peace that way. I don't think so. I think also it will bring the United States into war with those countries of Europe. (We are only doing what International law permits us to do.—Uncle.) Now I don't presume to know anything about governing a nation, but as far as I can see it is wrong for any neutral country to permit guns, etc., sent to warring nations. I read not long ago of a manufacturer of ammunition who refused an order for some thousands of dollars' worth of arms. I think he was a real man. (I think he was a boob.—Uncle Charlie.) We ought to have such men to rule our government; but we don't get such men. (No, and we don't want them. —Uncle Charlie.) Uncle, please give us cousins your opinion about the above subject.

People tell me there will always be wars, deception, and graft. I think if everybody would take Christ as their example and try to follow Him, they would not try to deceive and trample down their weaker brothers; but this will not come until we all are real Christians, and treat others, as we would be treated ourselves, not deceive them whenever we can, and I hear of this done every day. Just go to some store and buy all-wool dress goods, if you are not a good judge of the goods, they try to sell you some cotton and wool mixture for real wool goods and charge you for all-wool goods. The above instance is only one of many others; especially hucksters and commission men we farmers have to contend with. Then city people blame the high cost of living on the farmers, when the hucksters and commission men grab all the profit.

Dear Uncle I have learned more in three years reading your answers to the letters of the cousins then I ever knew before, on all kinds of subjects. Thanks, Uncle, for putting us wise.

Uncle Charlie, what do you think of Billy Sunday the evangelist? I think he is great, and doing lots of good.

With love and best wishes to you, Billy the Goat and the cousins, Your loving niece,

MISS ELLA AUDERFUHREN. (League No. 40,032.)

Ella, I quite understand how you feel about our country selling arms and ammunition to the warring nations of Europe, but if you had thousands of mules and tens of thousands of bushels of wheat that you could sell to foreign countries at a big advance in price over what you could get at home, are you quite sure you wouldn't seize the opportunity to make a quick turnover of some easy money? The farmer is not particularly careful where his wheat goes to as long as he gets a good price for it, and the cotton grower doesn't care where his cotton goes to as long as he gets a good price for it, and if the farmer and cotton grower have a right to send food to Europe, so have the makers and manufacturers of arms and ammunition. According to modern day ethics it is just as respectable to run a gun factory as it is to raise food, and by the way, there comes, alas, too frequently a time in the life of most nations when guns are more necessary even than wheat. Theoretically your remarks are all right, but they don't work out in practise. You have been giving this matter some thought and I'm glad you have, but like many millions of other people who have had this matter under consideration, you have not gone far enough in your thinking, and you haven't looked at the matter from any but the sentimental side, and likely a prejudiced side. Now suppose all the people living in your vicinity were to start shooting one another up. Your neighbors being warlike were armed, you being a peaceful woman were without weapons of defense. Now suppose your neighbors suddenly began to attack you, and you knew the only chance of saving your life was to kill the other people before they could kill you. Now the first thing you would do would be to send me a wireles message as follows: "Uncle Charlie, for heaven's sake send me a gun. I hate guns as you know, but these murderous wretches are attacking me, a peaceful person, and unless you hurry up that gun and some cartridges I shall be killed sure." Now suppose I send you word: "I am very sorry, but I don't think it would be fair to send you my gun. I shouldn't be strictly neutral if I did." Now tell me what you would say under those circumstances? I know just what you would say. With your last breath you would curse me for deserting a peaceful woman, and you would say: "You wretch, you call yourself neutral, but you're not neutral, for by witholding arms and ammunition from me who am unprepared, you are helping my enemies who for years have been armed to the teeth waiting only for a favorable opportunity to attack me." Now in this terrible conflict in Europe, certain facts have been demonstrated which admit of no argument, and one of them is that certain nations were prepared to the last shoe button, the last gun, the last horse, and last cat, for this life and death struggle, while other nations were almost without armies and practically no munitions of war. The more peaceful and democratic a nation, the more certain it is to be unprepared for battle, because democracies hate war. Now don't you see if we had refused to sell guns and shells to the unprepared nations we should be directly aiding the nations that were ready for the slaughter. In other words we shouldn't be neutral, we should be un-neutral. With conditions as they are at present any and all nations can buy war material here. The fact that some can get it and some can't, is none of our business. They would get it quick enough if they could, and if they could get it they wouldn't complain because the other fellows were getting it. Just now it looks as if one side is being favored to the disadvantage of the other, but that is not so. We are willing to sell to anybody who has got the cash and the chance. There is no sentiment in business unfortunately, and because one side can't get to our arms counter and the other can is no business of ours. Blame that to the fortunes of war and not to us. If we were to suddenly decide to shut up our arms and ammunition business, we should simply be aiding and encouraging the most warlike of the nations, and we should be putting a premium upon vast armaments, for if other nations knew they couldn't buy of us in an emergency, they too, in times of peace, would have to arm to the teeth. If some ten years before war broke out, we had notified all the world that neither arms nor ammunition could be bought here (and that would have been a very sensible thing to have done) the various nations of the earth would have made provision for just such an emergency in which they now find themselves. If we were to suddenly find ourselves embroiled with Japan, and you knew that Europe declined to send us the guns that we should be frantically trying to buy in case we were attacked, you would be wild with indignation, you would say: "Think of those mean wretches across the water refusing us arms and ammunition with which to defend ourselves. They know Japan is ready for this fight, and they know we are not; they know Japan is warlike and we are peaceful, and they know that we will be licked to a standstill unless we get guns, and yet they won't sell them to us." Oh, say it would be just lovely to watch how mad you would get. You would be just crazy to have done the very thing which you think so wicked for us to do. You see it all depends whose ox is gored. Now as regards the gentleman who, though a manufacturer of ammunition, refused to sell any of his stock. You think that man is a real man, I regret to say I cannot agree with you, for I think he is real foolish, and I don't think he is at all consistent, for the more ammunition that is used in Europe for settling thoroughly and completely the trouble that has long been brewing over there once and forever, the less likelihood there is of having that war brought to our doors here. If it is a crime against humanity to sell ammunition outside of the United States, it is a crime to sell it in the United States. It's a lovely thing to see our gunmakers getting a conscience, but if they are absolutely sincere they should go out of the gun-making business entirely. Personally I wish that such gun making as is done, was done by the government and not by private individuals, then the government would have to take measures to provide sufficient ammunition and guns for all emergencies. At present we rely largely on private manufacturers to supply our needs in time of trouble, and that being so, the larger and more prepared their plants are to handle any and all business that may come to them from within and without, the better position they will be in to supply our needs when the enemy is knocking at our gates, and the enemy may knock at any moment. Today we have to deal with conditions as they are and not as they ought to be. Conditions as they ought to be won't arrive for another generation or two. Humanity in the mass is still in the bonehead class. Right in this so-called republic of ours today, we alas, have millions of fanatical king worshipers, and you can arouse more cheers and more enthusiasm in a movie show, by displaying a crack-brained, parasitical kink, or king if you prefer it, in gold lace, than a simple plain American President in a sack suit. People are still worshiping the clothes, the outside things, the externals, the superficialities. They know that war brings ruin, famine, death, destruction, misery and everything that's horrible. They know that they have nothing to gain by war, and everything to lose. They know that there will never be any chance for the masses to get anywhere or be anything until war and the crack-brained kinks who make it are kicked off their thrones and banished forever. They know that the kinks they worship would kick them off the sidewalk as if they were dogs if they got in their way. They know that the countries they are so crazy about never gave them a couple of good meals in their lives, and yet when the kinks get quarreling among themselves and start sword rattling, drum beating and flag waving, the poor deluded boobs rush out and start killing one another by the millions, while the kinks look on and laugh at the slaughter, and when the fighting is over turn up their royal noses at the idiots the human vermin who have done the killing for them. Once more, "what fools these mortals be!"

PENFIELD, R. R. 114, PA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Your poem in February COMFORT "A Human Plea" is grand. I hope the bitter cry of the child slaves and that of old age as well will soon bring the Lincoln that will free them for all time.

Do you know Uncle Charlie, I would just love to hear your voice on a phonograph, giving some of the lectures we get in COMFORT. That would be great, for you could say what you liked without asking permission of anyone.

We are having some fine weather here now. I wish you could be here in the mountains for a while to enjoy the fresh air and sunshine.

With best wishes to all, I remain, Lovingly yours,

MRS. FRANK RHOADS.

Am delighted to know the Lincoln verses in the February issue found a responsive thrill in that big heart of yours. You can feed exploding firecrackers to some people and they won't even cough. Few hearts ever feel the thrill of a real emotion, and the only worth while emotion is that which is inspired by a great and grand passion, and the only passion worth while is a passionate love of our fellow creatures. When I go through the letters that reach me I can tell in an instant whether the writer is dead or alive, and there are about a thousand dead ones by the way to every live one. Mrs. Rhoads, I am greatly flattered by your desire to hear my voice on the phonograph. I have had hundreds of similar requests in the last few years, and these requests increase as the days go by. Nothing would give me more intense delight than to talk to some of you at least and also to sing to you through the medium of the phonograph. The only thing that stands in the way is the expense. Oh, yes, there is something else. More than half of you have cylinder record machines while the other half have disc records. I made some records about five years ago. Had a piano pushed up to my bed and making allowances for the disadvantages under which we operated, some of the records came out astonishingly well. A piano however, as an accompaniment for the voice, so far as canned music is concerned, is very unsatisfactory. To get good results an orchestra is needed. I still have a voice of great power, resonance and clarity and every word is enunciated so that a deaf man a mile off can hear it. The cost of making a master record from which other records can be produced is $350. One concern told me if I would go to them they would gladly pay me to sing for them, but if they had to come to me and bring all their apparatus and their orchestra, it would cost a lot of money. I figured it would mean an investment of at least a thousand dollars or more to get the thing in shape. The post-office too has not only an annoying little habit of losing things, but of breaking them, and if half a dozen records reached you in sections, you'd want them replaced and rightly so. Then too COMFORT would have to ask you for quite a big club for each record, for remember we all have to live, and the cheapest food you can get in the world is the brain food COMFORT hands you. If we were not living in panicky times, and a couple of thousand of you would get up clubs to cover the initial expense I might have the honor and privilege of talking and singing to you in your own homes, one of the greatest desires of my life. A great deal of time, trouble and expense has to be gone through to get perfect records, but I believe all the difficulties might be overcome except possibly that of expense, and that is nearly always the great difficulty in all undertakings. Anyway if nothing comes of it, I'm glad to have had the opportunity of discussing the matter with you, so that you may know why I haven't put through a matter that looks very easy, but which unfortunately is not so easy as it looks.

ATWOOD, ALA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I live in the country on one hundred and sixty acres of land, one and a half miles from the railroad. Atwood is a very small village and there is scarcely any society of any kind and no excitement, not even Sunday school, so you all may imagine my loneliness as I stay at home most every Sunday.

I am anxiously waiting for the winter months to arrive as I intend to teach school next winter. I haven't never taught any, although I am confident I shall enjoy the work and expect to put forth my best efforts to be a successful teacher. Guess I had better describe myself and tell my age or you all will be whispering to each other, she is an old maid. I am red-headed, blue-eyed and fair complexion, with one hundred and thirty-seven pounds and am twenty years young. My sisters tell me very often that I will be a red-headed old maid school teacher. Now, Uncle Charlie, bachelor maids are honorable aren't they? I believe in many cases if girls and boys too, would only take the second thought and not be in such a rush to get married, there would not be half so many destitute homes and heart-broken people. Uncle Charlie I have been reading COMFORT for a good while and surely a comfort it is too. Hoping to see this in print,

Your niece, ETHEL TAYLOR.

Ethel, I sincerely hope that you will be a successful teacher. Above all else the world needs teachers who can make a success of their work. To merely teach is not sufficient. The world gets piles of teaching, but there is not one teacher in a hundred who can make knowledge and precept stick and get home. The only kind of teaching and the only kind of writing that are worth while are brass tack teaching and brass tack writing. If an elephant were charging madly at you your only salvation would be to hit it with a bullet that got under the skin. All through life, ignorance and superstition, the wild beasts of society (bigger than any elephant that ever lived, or any mastodon that ever walked the earth) are charging at us full tilt, just as does the elephant in the jungle. How does society meet these destructive beasts? With puff balls or rifle shells? With puff balls of course, and so ignorance and superstition go charging madly through the world slaying their millions. Now the place to attack superstition and ignorance is in a schoolroom. In youth you can push the brass tacks of knowledge into the plastic receptive minds of youth, but if you attempt the same task forty years later when the children have grown up to manhood and womanhood, and the minds and brains are no longer plastic, the brass tacks will no more succeed in forcing an entrance and making an impression than a puff ball will puncture the armor clad hide of the tough old elephant. Ethel you have a glorious opportunity. The school teacher is unquestionably the most valuable social asset we have, far more valuable than the minister or the doctor. The minister only gets at the people one day a week, the school teacher has a chance to hammer them for five. If we only had the right kind of teachers and the right kind of tuition, and kept the instruction up, training hand and eye, brain and heart, body and soul, making character, morals and efficiency go hand in hand, until the age of twenty-one, then we would see some world, believe me. Two or three generations of that kind of schooling for life, would change the world into a paradise. Now Ethel, put a punch into your work. Don't adhere too strictly to books. An awful lot of old fossilized goats write books for schools, and a still more ossified bunch of human nanny goats decide what must and must not be taught. A pure, beautiful and innocent girl is in herself a greater inspiration than any book that was ever written. Now mind you keep your ideals high, your reputation untarnished, so that you, in the intervals between reading, writing and arithmetic and a lot of other junk that does not count, can do something to stiffen the moral fiber and deepen the spiritual consciousness of those charges of yours. You don't have to read the Bible to them. But if you tell them a little every day about love, virtue, mercy, honor, truth, righteousness, you will be doing all the Bible ever could do, and you will be building character and laying the foundations of successful careers and happy useful lives. All these things are more important than anything else that you can possibly teach, for they are the fundamentals of civilization and life eternal. Meanwhile you also continue to study. When I was at school there was one thing I couldn't learn, and for that matter there were a good many things I couldn't and wouldn't learn and I especially despised grammar. I was fortunately brought up amongst educated and refined people. All my school days I was surrounded by culture and refinement. It was what I absorbed from my environment and not what I learned in school (for I hated school) that helped me in after life. Now if I had said, "I haven't never taught" (and I couldn't have said it if I had tried), I'd have been cut into mince meat. You have used what is called a double negative, which makes an affirmative. You want to tell us you have never taught school, but by saying you have not never taught school, you change the sense of the whole sentence and imply that you have taught school. You often hear children say, "I ain't got none," or "I haven't got none." Now if they haven't got none they must have some. What they should have said was "I have none." Don't let your children trip you up with such errors as these or your influence will be gone. Though one may know nothing of grammar, still the ear ought to be able to detect certain vulgarities of speech, such as the double negative, just as the mind can detect errors of reasoning, and the eye that which is offensive and disgusting. I have discussed the questions about early marriage many times Ethel, and will take it up again at some other time. Now go ahead with your teaching and good luck to you.

ANNISTON, ALA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am sixteen years of age, weigh one hundred and five pounds, have dark brown hair and eyes. I recently finished a business course in shorthand and have taken a position. I love my new work and have an ambition to be a big stenographer some day in the sweet by and by. I formerly worked in a store before I began studying for my life work. A saleslady has the most miserable life in the world, I think. I have been at work for almost two months and have already taken that hurrying walk that you see most stenographers have. I live five blocks from my work and every morning I tell mamma I'll take dinner at the Silver Moon Cafe today, so yesterday she called me up and asked if I intended to come home and I said, "No!" then she said, "COMFORT came this morning" and then I said, "Oh, yes, I'll be home today." I would walk a mile to get COMFORT." Mamma laughed and she said she wished COMFORT would come every day and so do I. I think it is grand. They all sit around after supper reading COMFORT and after we have all read it, mamma rolls it up and snugs it down in a corner of her trunk where other COMFORTS are.

There are seven in our family, five children, one of my sisters is married and lives on a fine farm near Talladega. I visit her every summer and it's my greatest delight to get in the poultry yard and chase hens which number one hundred. Her oldest little boy is but four years of age, and chases the roosters to try to kill them, and the ducks follow him pecking off the buttons from his apron. It keeps his nurse busy sewing buttons on his aprons. I would love dearly to live on a farm, but I know that is impossible for I must sit before this big typewriter and peck away all my life. Sometimes the letters seem to all run together and I rest a minute and start again. My eldest sister is a bookkeeper at Woodstock Mills here, and my brother who is two years older than I, is learning the machinist's trade. Papa runs a barber shop, and Uncle Charlie, there is not one of us who hardly knows the others' business. My little sister goes to school and we all love her. Every night she sits in her baby chair under a big lamp with four or five books around her and she never raises her pretty head until the clock strikes nine, and then if she isn't through with her lessons she goes right off to bed. She is seven years old and she made a resolution New Year's day to study hard and I think she is keeping it faithfully. (Cut out the study and send her to bed at eight o'clock. Uncle Charlie.)

By, by, would like to exchange letters with cousins,

ROSA WILSON.

Thank you, Rosa, for your bright, chatty, newsy letter. Let me compliment you too on your handwriting. I'm a great admirer of all you bright, resourceful, business girls. Every woman should be able to hold her own in the battle of life. The spirit of independence develops character. You are quite right, Rosa, a saleslady's life is no cinch. It's nerve racking, miserably paid work, and it keeps a woman on her feet much more than is good for her and doesn't provide her with a living wage, and that is not giving her a square deal, and it is not giving society a square deal either. Every generation should be an improvement on that which preceded it. Every mother should pass on to her child a little more than her mother was able to pass on to her. Girls who are underpaid and underfed cannot pass on anything to the next generation that will be of help to it, but they can pass on much that will help to drag the race down. Society is too stupid, blind and foolish, too greedy and selfish to appreciate this vital fact, but nature takes heed and exacts a terrible penalty for outraging her laws. The great law of business is to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest, to get as much as possible for what you have paid as little as possible. This system works a frightful injustice on millions of people who for a mere pittance, put every ounce of their strength and vitality into the hard, monotonous tasks allotted to them. I do not believe in calling things by false names. That's a national habit that never appealed to me. I will not call mutton, lamb, nor watered milk, cream, nor a bum politician, colonel. There is enough sham and humbug in the world without my adding to it, and don't you add to it either. As a good beginning it might be wise to call salesladies, saleslaves, then we might rip the whiskey labels off the bottles and stamp them "Deadly Poison." We are never so happy as when we are trying to fool ourselves. The most dreaded thing in all this world is truth—and there is scarcely a man in this country who dares to speak it or write it. Oh, the pity of it, and the stupidity of it. I am glad to find Rosa, that you have such a profound appreciation of COMFORT. You see we dare to give you a little more truth than most of the other publications. We dare to show you things a little more as they are, than others find it profitable to do. And it's just that little, fragile strand of truth, more than all else, even though you may not recognize the fact, that binds you to us with an invisible but unbreakable bond. Now for some fun. I certainly should like to see you when you are visiting on that farm. You say: "It is my greatest delight to get in the poultry yard and chase hens which number one hundred." I am somewhat surprised that a dignified young lady would want to chase hens at any stage of the game. Hens are such busy, harmless, faithful creatures that I can hardly see what pleasure you can find in scaring the poor things out of their wits. One thing I am awfully glad to know and that is that you only chase hens which number one hundred. All the other hens from ninety-nine down, you seem to have taken compassion on. If I ever had the bad luck to be a hen in your back yard, I hope kind providence will see that I'm not numbered one hundred. No century mark for mine, if I go into the hen business. It's a good thing to know that the ninety and nine are left undisturbed, but you have your knife into those of the hundred variety all right. You seem to be laying for them. Well one good turn deserves another, for they have certainly done a lot of laying for you. The Goat says he feels confident you meant to say that your sister has a hundred hens and you chase them all. Worse and more of it. No wonder we are paying sixty cents a dozen for eggs in New York, with you, Rosa, stirring up the Southern poultry market and keeping the poor hens so eggscited, honestly its eggsasperating, and unless you mend your ways, I shall have to ask you for an eggsplanation, for I think you are *hen*tirely in the wrong. Oh, I don't care if you do call be a non*hen*tity. I know I am. Those button eating ducks are terrors. I hope if I ever come to see you and you have duck for dinner that you won't serve me a piece that is full of buttons. I don't care for ducks that keep button in. Billy the Goat says he has seen lots of ducks run, but he has never seen an ap (e) run. Isn't that awful? Rosa, you inform us that there is not one of you who knows another's business. That's sad because it would be so lovely if you knew your papa's business. Of course it's barbarous work, but just think how lovely it would be if you could just run up here and give me a hair cut, especially if you could find the hair to cut.

HILLSDALE, KANS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Is there room on your lap for a cousin seventy years old? Oh, I did not wish to crowd the boys and girls off so will take it Oriental style and sit on the rug at your feet. In my humble judgment there are few if any men in this country doing as much good as Uncle Charlie in his quiet, humble, Christ-like way. You have the grandest school in the world that I know anything about. You are reaching millions who will never receive advantages even of a high school education, and you are teaching and impressing upon their minds those broad Christlike and brotherly principles that will make them better citizens not only of this government as it is, but of that government soon to be, whose foundation principles and supreme law will be those taught by the annointed One. (To this end was I born and for this cause came I into the world. John 18-37.)

While my name is not on your list I have been a constant and appreciative reader of COMFORT for many years. It is growing better and bigger every year.

One question and I am done: If we disfranchise the man who cannot read what shall we do with the man who will not read, and the man who can read and who does read some, but will not think?

B. E. PRATHER.

Dear Friend: We shall never disfranchise the man who cannot read, for though there is an alarming amount of illiteracy in this country public opinion will not much longer tolerate conditions which breed illiteracy. There are some states that are notoriously backward from an educational point of view. They know how to exploit children, how to push them into mines and milis, and they know how to educate them, but they don't want to do anything that will interfere with what they call the business development of their state. A dollar looks bigger to them than all the children in the world except their own. There are ninety thousand white children of school age, and a quarter of a million colored in one state alone, who cannot read or write, and there are four million children of school age in the United States, who never go to school. Now all these children could and should go to school. Our government is in the hands of men who read and who could think big thoughts if they wanted to, and it's up to them to see that everyone is taught to read. We shall rectify all this within a generation and that is a very short space in the development of a race. The man who can read and will not read we must pity rather than punish. He is a type that is disappearing. Men have always had stomach hunger, but only for two or three generations have we cultivated brain,

One of the greatest general merchandise stores in the world

Other women have thought so much of our styles, have found our values so great, that our business has grown faster than you would believe possible. Two years ago we started in an eleven-story building. In one month we had to add a six-story building. The next year, our catalogs brought us so much business we had to spread out even more, and added a five-story and an eight-story building—now we have just added our fifth building, the sixteen-story building shown below—the world's highest building of reinforced concrete. All this since September, 1913, when our first catalog was sent out—in less than two years!

Surely you don't want to miss seeing our styles; you don't want to fail to compare our prices with those you have to pay elsewhere. Nowhere else can they be seen except in this Fashion Book. Write for it now. Find out for yourself why our business has increased so fast. Begin now to give your family the benefit of values far greater than it is possible to get elsewhere—even greater than you have ever before been able to get when you bought by mail.

Delivery free

Remember, we pay all mail or express charges. If your purchase does not entirely suit you, return it and we will refund your money. We will even pay return charges on any order which does not please you.

Customers need not write

If you are already one of our customers, if you have bought from our stores within the last year, don't write for your copy. It will not be necessary. We mail our Fashion Book to all our regular customers the moment it is off the press.

Read what these people say:

Saved $1.75 on one waist

"I received my waist for $1.00, and think it is just lovely. Could not have bought it here for less than $2.75."—Mrs. Earl Helm, Paducah, Ky.

Superior to all other mail order houses

"My suit and waist arrived today. I am certainly pleased with both. I have ordered goods from other mail order houses, but have found your goods to be far above the others—superior both in style and quality, so hereafter you may expect other orders from me and my friends."—Mrs. W. R. Holloway, Paragould, Ark.

Delighted with styles and prices

"Have just received your catalog; such styles, such prices and bargains! I am delighted, so look for some orders from two young ladies, myself and possibly other friends."—Mrs. Emma Bremigem, Detroit, Mich.

Find bargains really ARE bargains

"I received your order last Thursday and was surprised to receive such good material in the petticoats and drawers. You advertised bargains and when a customer receives the goods, they surely are bargains."—Mrs. Earl C. White, Hamilton, Ill.

Received the best value from the Charles William Stores

"The goods you shipped me were received in good condition and were not crushed. I received the best value for the money I ever received from any other mail order house. The shoes I got beat the Chicago mail order houses to a frazzle for equal money."—C. E. Zeigler, State College, Pa.

Will show Style Book to all her friends

"Your catalog just received and I am delighted with it and shall show it to all my friends."—Mrs. Phaus, Indianapolis, Ind.

The roll when completed is straight, with a thread the length of roll along its side. The length or size of a roll is regulated by the number of times the thread is thrown over; o., over, thread over hook the number of times indicated; k. st., knot stitch, draw out loop about one quarter inch, catch thread and pull through, then put the hook between the drawn loop and the thread just pulled through, catch the thread, draw through these two stitches to form the knot; blk., block, a st. in each of a given number of sts., preceded and followed by a space; sp., space, a space is formed by making a chain of 3 or 4 sts. and omitting the same number of sts. in preceding row; sk., skip, to miss or omit number of stitches indicated in preceding row; p. c., padding cord; * stars mean that the directions given between them should be repeated as indicated before proceeding.

Terms Used in Knitting

K. knit plain; o. over; o. 2, over twice; n. narrow 2 stitches together; p. purl, meaning an inversion of stitches; sl. slip a stitch; tog. together; sl. and b., slip and bind; k. p. knit plain; stars and parenthesis indicate repetition.

Terms Used in Tatting

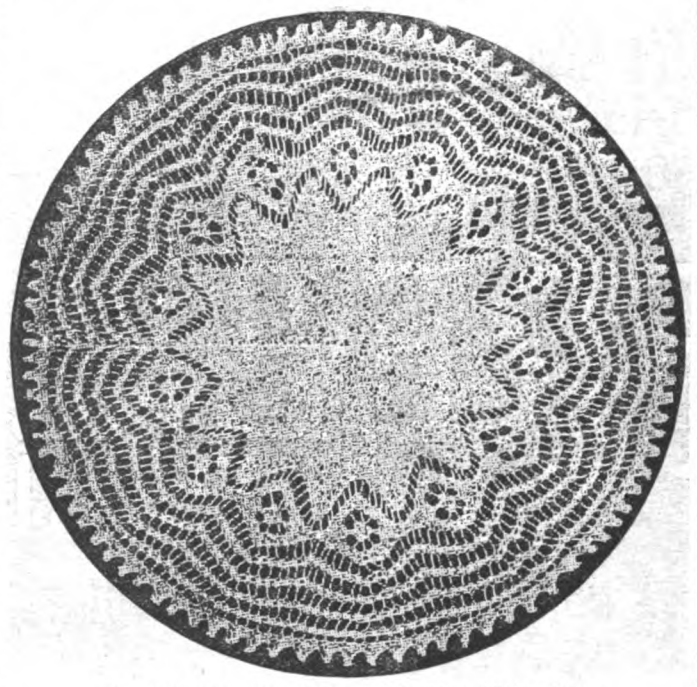
D. s. double stitch; p. picot; l. p. long picot; s. p. shorter than usual picot; ch. chain, a succession of double stitches made with two threads; pkt. picot and knot together. * indicates a repetition.

Crochet Centerpiece

MEDIUM coarse crochet cotton makes this centerpiece a little over twelve inches wide.

Begin in the center and make a tiny ring of ch. 5. In this ring work 8 groups of crossed doubles. Begin with ch. 3 to count for 1 double; now 1 d. c. in the ring but not in front of the chain that stands for a double, but back of it; you take the needle and pass it beneath and back into the ring and make the double, your ch. 3 will be on top. This is the direction for the beginning of each row that starts with a crossed double. After this d. c. make (ch. 1, 2 crossed d. c., as directed for making the first) repeat until you have 8 groups of 2 doubles crossed. Join the last one chain on top of the first ch. 3.

2nd row.—Ch. 3 for first d. c., the next d. c., back of it under the last ch. 1 made. Now the next d. c. ahead under the chain and the next back of it into the top of d. c., ch. 3: (now a crossed d. c., on the next crossed d. c. and the one to it by going under the ch. 1, for first d. c.) repeat this over each d. c., ending with ch. 3, joined on top of the first ch. 3.



3rd row.—Sl. st. over the first crossed d. c. and the one extra begin with ch. 3 (and make the crossed double right over the crossed double below and two alongside of it, ch. 3, sk. first crossed d. c. on next arm), repeat around, join on top of first, ch. 3.

Repeat the 3rd row with the exception of the number of crossed doubles on one section or arm, this increases one more crossed d. c. on an arm every row. Continue in this way until there are 18 crossed doubles on each arm.

Points

1st row of points.—Begin the rows the same; work (a crossed double on each crossed double of arm except the last, then ch. 5, 1 s. c. on ch. 3, between arms, ch. 5, sk. the first crossed double), repeat around.

Repeat this row in the manner of working until reduced to 1 single crossed double and 9 spaces between each of ch. 5. The next four rows are ch. 5, 1 s. c. on the ch. 5 below. Over each crossed double make an extra ch. 5 and 1 s. c., each time for 4 rows.

Baby Afghans

(For Mrs. L. M. Briggs)

Puff Ball Afghan

Crocheted

Two stripes of this afghan are of pink or blue and one of white. Material required, 18 skeins Germantown in color, 12 skeins of white, medium-sized bone hook.

Begin by making ch. 34 stitches.

1st row.—34 s. c., ch. 1, turn.

2nd row.—34 s. c., working through both loops of st. in 1st row.

3rd row.—* Make 5 s. c., in 6th st., throw thread over the hook and draw through a long loop, make 5 of these loops in the 6th st., thread over hook and draw through all. Ch. 1. Repeat from * to end of row.

4th, 5th and 6th rows of s. c.

7th row.—2 s. c., * 1 raised ball 5 s. c. and repeat from * to end of row.

8th, 9th and 10th rows of s. c.

11th row.—Same as 3rd row.

12th, 13th and 14th rows of s. c.

15th row.—Same as 7th row.

Repeat 3rd and 7th rows with 3 rows of s. c., between until the stripe is the proper length.

Make 2 more stripes in the same way and then fasten all together by row of single crochet on the right side, using the colored wool.

This forms a cord of finish between the stripes.

This afghan can be finished with a satin ribbon binding or a crocheted edge made as follows.

Border

Use white wool.

1st row.—Beginning on a corner 2 d. c. in last st. on one end, ch. 2, 2 d. c. in end st. of 1st row, ch. 1, 2 d. c. in end st. 3rd row, ch. 1, 2 d. c. in end st. 5th row. Repeat all around, turning each corner by working 2 d. c. in last st. of the sides and 2 d. c. in first st. on each end. Join to first 2, ch. 3.

2nd row.—3 d. c. between first 2 d. c. made in first row. * 1 s. c. between next 2 d. c., shell 4 d. c. between next 2 d. c., repeat from * all around.

3rd row.—Shell of 5 d. c. on each shell, 1 s. c. on s. c.

4th row.—1 s. c. in each st., 1 ball between shells in previous row.

5th row.—With pink make row s. c. with 1 ball over center each shell.

Knitted Afghan

Made of 4 stripes of white and 3 stripes of color.

Materials 12 skeins colored Germantown, 12 skeins white, No. 5 knitting needles.

Set up stripes lengthwise, casting on any number of stitches divisible by 10 and add 3.

1st row.—With white, * p. 3, k. 7. Repeat from * ending with p. 3.

2nd row.—* K. 3, p. 7. Repeat from * ending with k. 3.

3rd row.—* P. 3, k. 7. Repeat from * ending with p. 3.

4th row.—Knit across plain.

5th row.—K. 5, * p. 3, k. 7. Repeat from * ending with k. 5.

6th row.—P. 5, * k. 3, p. 7. Repeat from * ending with p. 5.

7th row.—K. 5, * p. 3, k. 7. Repeat from * ending with k. 5.

8th row.—Knit across plain.

Repeat from 1st row to 8th row twice more.

25th row.—knit across plain, next with color: knit forward and back white: knit forward and back with color: knit forward and back with white: knit forward and back with color: knit forward and back with white: knit forward and back with color: knit once across.

Now repeat the pattern from the beginning, using colored wool in place of white, and white in place of color.

This blanket should be bound with a wide satin ribbon to match the color used, feather stitched in place with white.

Small Spoke Center Doily

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Fall Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

BECAUSE of their intimate association with sport and utility coats the separate skirts have been granted a new lease of life, and yet indeed the reputation of the coat depends on the sort of skirt worn with it.

Many of the skirts are plaited, usually in box-plaited style, but the simple gored models are nice and easy to develop. A four-gored skirt model that still retains its circular cut, is mounted on a yoke that may be round or in any other desired outline. No matter how wide the skirt at its lower edge, the hip line must be smooth and slender.

The extreme blouse or shapelessness is passing and waist lines are more snug and fitted than during the past season.

Corsetieres are enthusiastic over the return of the slim-waisted figure, not the pulled in wasp waist, but the figure of graceful well-moulded curves, for good by to the slouch, the hollow chest and drooping shoulder effects.

If only the new corsets will avoid cramping the vital organs. Choose a corset for your new fall gown, high enough in the back, to support the flesh around the shoulder blades, and with enough height in front to make a smooth line from waist to bust, soft enough to avoid pressure. Have it well boned but keep the hip space free, with curves evident at waist and hip. Keep the back as flat as possible.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated.

1413-1418—A Jaunty Suit for early fall. The coat is loose fitting, and finished with a smart collar. The skirt has graceful attractive lines, with plaited fullness at the sides. The pockets may be omitted. It will require two and three quarter yards of 44-inch material to make the coat for a medium size.

The coat pattern 1413, is cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. The skirt pattern 1418, is cut in the same sizes and requires three and one half yards of 44-inch material. Two separate patterns. 10c for each pattern.

9937—Ladies' Corset Cover with peplum. Lawn, nainsook, dimity, crossbar muslin, crepe, cambric and silk are suitable for this design. The peplum may be omitted, and the fullness at lower edge finished with a beading or band.

Cut in seven sizes, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requi s two yards of 27-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1194—Girls' One-piece Dress with sleeve in either of two lengths. As here shown blue and white checked suiting was used, with white pique for collar, cuffs and belt. Galatea, gingham, percale, chambray, poplin or voile are all nice for this style.

Cut in four sizes; four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires three and one half yards of 40-inch material for an eight-year size.

1068—Girls' Apron with long or shorter sleeve, and with collar or "V" neck edge. This model is easy to make and completely covers the dress, and may serve as a little play dress or "pinafore." It is suitable for cambric, percale, gingham or chambray.

Cut in five sizes; two, four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires three and one eighth yards of 27-inch material for a six-year size.

1381—Ladies' Shirt-waist with convertible collar, and with sleeve in either of two lengths. The waist is attractive in either style illustrated, with high neck or low neck closing. It is nice for linen, corduroy, pique, lawn, batiste or organdie, also for gingham, chambray, taffeta, crepe and voile.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. Size 36 will require two and one half yards of 44-inch material.

1412—Costume for misses and small women with sleeve in either of two lengths. As here shown, white serge was used with black and white striped satin for trimming. The waist has deep pointed yoke sections to which the full waist portions are joined. The skirt is a four-gored model, with gathers over the hips.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires six and one quarter yards of 40-inch material for a 16-year size.

1393—Ladies' Maternity dress with stay, and with sleeve in wrist or elbow length. The lines are simple and becoming, and the stay is a practical feature, since it provides for widening the garment, without making alterations at the waistline. The pattern is good for serge, voile, faille, repp, gabardine, linen, tub silk, gingham, chambray, corduroy or pique.

Cut in seven sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure, and requires six and five eighths yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1387—Girls' Dress with Middy Blouse, having sleeve in either of two lengths, and with separate skirt, joined to an underwaist. This design is good for linen, lawn, crepe, taffeta, pique or corduroy. The skirt may be of serge or suiting, and the blouse of white madras or other wash material.

Cut in five sizes; six, eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires three and seven eighths yards of 36-inch material for a 10-year size.

1420-1421—A Pleasing Costume especially good for mature figures. The waist fronts are full at the shoulders where they join yoke extensions of the back. The waist is fitted in basque style, and provides a lining, which, however may be omitted. The gored skirt has plaits at the seams. This model is nice for gray, black or blue serge, green or sand-colored taffeta, or gabardine.

The waist pattern 1420 is cut in six sizes; 36, 38, 40, 42, 44 and 46 inches bust measure. The skirt 1421, is cut in six sizes; 24, 26, 28, 30, 32 and 34 inches waist measure. It requires three and one eighth yards of 44-inch material for the skirt, and two and one quarter yards for the waist for a medium size. Two separate patterns. 10c for each pattern.

1364—A Simple and Becoming Dress, suitable for house or business wear, with sleeve in either of two lengths. This desirable model has a popular four-piece skirt, made with a neat lap tuck at the back seam. The waist shows a square yoke, a new style feature, with plaited fullness at the fronts. This design is fine for gingham, chambray, percale, voile, linen, galatea, seersucker if used as a house dress. For business wear, tub silk, voile, crepe, poplin or taffeta would be nice.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires seven yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1385—Ladies' Five-gored Skirt with or without bias fold. This style will be nice as a separate skirt, and equally attractive to form part of a costume. The front is stitched in tuck effect above the hips, and has plaited fullness at the lower edge.

Cut in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30 and 32 inches waist measure. It requires four yards of 44-inch material without the fold, and five yards with the fold, for a 24-inch size.

1195—Boys' Blouse Suit with straight trousers. Of all boys' suits there is none so comfortable as the blouse style. The model here portrayed has the skirt portion attached and for simpler neck finish may be made without the collar facing. Blue serge with braid trimming or brown velvet bound with braid would be nice for this style. Cheviot, tweed, corduroy, galatea, drill or linen are also good.

Cut in four sizes; three, four, five and six years. It requires three and one eighth yards of 44-inch material for a four-year size.

1380—Ladies' Apron in sack or belted style. Dotted blue and white percale was used in this instance, with facings of white. The style is good for seersucker, gingham, lawn, sateen, denim, drill, jean or alpaca. In belted style it may do service as a "slip on" house dress.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires six and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1228—Girls' Coat with or without belt. The comfortable raglan sleeve and deep yoke, are new style features. The fullness of the skirt portions may be confined by a belt, that is furnished in the pattern. Velvet, serge, cheviot, corduroy, mixed suitings or broadcloth are splendid for this model, likewise poplin, faille, taffeta, or linen.

Cut in four sizes; two, four, six and eight years. It requires two and three eighths yards of 44-inch material for a four-year size.

1370—Ladies' Petticoat, with gathered or habit back, with or without yoke and flounce. This style shows several ways of development each equally practical and attractive. The design is good for sateen, lawn, cambric, muslin, crepe, seersucker, moire, taffeta or linen.

Cut in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30 and 32 inches waist measure. It requires five and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for skirt with flounce, or three and seven eighths yards for skirt without flounce. For flounce of embroidery three and three eighths yards of 17-inch material will be required. The skirt measures about two and seven eighths yards at the foot. The flounce about three and one eighth yards.

1365—An Attractive Apron Model. The apron is good for gingham, percale, lawn, cambric, sateen or drill. If desired the back portion of the bib may be omitted.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires four and one half yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

9380—Mens' and Boys' Shirt, ith two styles of collar and with regulation or coat closing. Suitable for madras, percale, linen, cambric, silk, soisette, or flannel.

Cut in eight sizes; for men; 36, 38, 40, 42, 44, 46, 48 and 50 inches breast measure, and in four sizes for boys; 10, 12, 14 and 16 years. It requires four and three eighths yards of 27-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1238—Ladies' Apron, with sleeve protector and cap. As here shown white drill was used for this set of serviceable garments. The models are also suitable for gingham, chambray, sateen, percale, lawn or seersucker.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It embraces all styles illustrated, and requires five and one eighth yards of 36-inch material for the apron, three quarters yard for the cap and seven eighths yard for one pair of sleeve protectors.

1171—A Stylish and Becoming Frock for the growing girl. The sleeve in wrist length with a band cuff, or in short length with turn back cuff, is equally good. As here shown Burgundy cashmere with striped silk for belt and trimming was used. In linen, ratine, voile, crepe, velvet or corduroy it is equally attractive and desirable.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires three and one half yards of 44-inch material for a 10-year size.

1388—Ladies' Skirt with Stay, and with or without suspenders and pockets. This style is nice for taffeta in plain, striped or checked patterns, and for corduroy, pique, serge, gingham or chambrey.

Cut in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30 and 32 inches waist measure. It requires four and one eighth yards of 44-inch material for a 24-inch size.

9999—Ladies' House Dress with long or short sleeve. For utility, comfort and convenience, this design has much to commend it. It closes in coat style, with the entire fronts overlapping. This assures easy and practical adjustment. The pattern is good for gingham, percale, lawn, seersucker, soisette, madras, dimity, drill or linen.

Cut in seven sizes; 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1179—Ladies' Night Dress with sleeve in either of two lengths and neck edge in either of three outlines. As here shown, white batiste was used embroidered in self color and trimmed with "Val." lace. This model is also good for lawn, nainsook, dimity, crossbar muslin, crepe or silk. Empire effect may be produced by ribbon beading as illustrated. The gown may be made with a front closing for high neck style, which is very desirable for warmth, if made of flannelette or flannel.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires five and five eighths yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1369-1336—A Pretty Summer Dress. The tier skirt is a fashionable model. It is mounted on a gored foundation to which the lower flounce is joined. The costume is good for silk, wash or woolen goods, or combinations of silk and cloth.

The waist pattern 1369 is cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. The skirt 1336 cut in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30 and 32 inches waist measure. It requires four and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for the skirt, with one and one quarter yard of lining for the foundation. The over blouse requires one and one quarter yard, with t ree yards for the underwaist of 36-inch material to make the costume for a 36-inch size. Two separate patterns. 10c for each pattern.

9819—Infant's Short Clothes Outfit. Composed of a yoke dress to be finished with long or short sleeves. A simple double-breasted coat with round collar and Bishop sleeve, a cap in Dutch style, a nightdress, a petticoat with added waist, a feeding apron, drawers, rompers and a play dress. Lawn, muslin, gingham or chambray, also flannelet may be used for the dresses and rompers. The coat is good for all cloaking materials. The

Buy Some Good Birds Now to Improve Your Stock

I WANT our readers to make a special effort and try to buy cockerels now to head their breeding pens next season, for this is the season of the year when the big breeders of thoroughbred stock commence to select their birds for the show season, and put them into separate coops to develop, take the young pullets off free range, and place them in permanent winter quarters and cull out the year-old birds, and divide them into flocks for next year's breeding pens. All this means that house room becomes so precious that they are willing—nay—anxious, to dispose of extra cockerels, and will sell good birds now for almost half what they would ask for them in the spring. Such a golden opportunity should not be neglected, and I advise you to sell off all the old hens or your own young cockerels and use the money for the purchase of one or two really good birds, for if you have only mediumly fair stock, and mate a few of the hens to a good bird next spring, you are sure to get some youngsters who will more than pay you for your trouble. Look through the advertising columns for the addresses of well-known breeders of whatever variety you are keeping, and write them for prices of cockerels; or, better still, quote what price you can afford to pay; remembering always that you can't expect to get something for nothing, and that even a cull bird from a breeder, who has for years kept nothing but full-blooded stock, is of more value to breed from, than a splendid looking bird which may have all sorts of mixed and poor varieties among his ancestors. For, as I have before explained to you, the individual bird or animal is not half as important as his parents and grandparents, as far as his influence is concerned on future stock.

When writing to breeders about cockerels, you should give a clear description of the hens you want to mate him to, because the breeder will then be able to select a bird with such characteristics as will counter balance the weak points in your birds.

To illustrate: If the hens happen to have legs rather too long for the breed they belong to, the male bird chosen to mate with them should have legs a trifle too short, and, of course, the same throughout the points. There are very few perfect birds, so matings must be arranged to counterbalance the faulty points. And it is impossible to get perfection from one mating, so it is positively necessary to breed the pullets back to the sire, even to the third and fourth generation.

Now, many people run away with the idea that it is only conformation and plumage that one does such mating for, but it is quite as necessary when one is trying to build up a strain of heavy laying birds. Roosters must be the offspring of prolific layers, no less than the hens to which they are to be mated, and it is only by remating to the progeny of the original sire that the breed can be firmly established. Of course, the same is to be said if your ambition is to raise specially good table birds with deep breasts and heavily meated thighs. So you see, even for the general purpose bird, it is well to devote some thought to the subject, and be careful to select not only hens that are known to be good layers, but males who are known to be the sons of heavy layers; and once having established a good pen, it is well to be very careful how you introduce a strange male bird.

I am emphasizing this subject now, because so many of my correspondents seem to be convinced that all that is necessary to get good layers is to select their best hens. I use "hens" in writing, but of course the same principles apply to ducks and geese, and, to a smaller extent, turkeys. It is quite time to consider breeding flocks of ducks and geese now, for if strange birds have to be bought, it takes time for them to get accustomed to their new surroundings, and as they are early layers, there should be no delay about the purchase.

Both ducks and geese are such easy keepers when they have a wide range that it is advisable for every small farm to keep a flock of either one or the other. Imperial Pekin ducks start laying in January, when hens' eggs are bringing very big prices, so the ducks' eggs are a great convenience and economy, as they can be used at home, and usually sell to neighbors for cooking purposes, even if they don't like to eat them. Ducks' eggs make better cakes and custards than hens' eggs, and people who are living near towns or cities can always dispose of any surplus quantities to confectioners and candy makers.

I give you this hint, as it is not advisable to hatch ducks before April in most localities, and by that time hens' eggs have gone down in price to such an extent that one does not mind using them in the kitchen. If you have raised any number of ducks or geese during the last season, now is the time to fatten and market them. Confine them in rather small yards; boil and mash any waste, green vegetables, small potatoes, or any other root crop that you may have on hand. When cool, mix about a quart of wheat middlings or cornmeal through a panful, and you will have a good fattening mash for twenty birds, and give them all the skimmed milk you can spare in a dish they can only get their bills into, and they will be ready for market within three weeks.

Old ducks and geese which are to be kept for breeding in the spring, must have a dry place to sleep in, and good food. Chopped corn stalks or fodder, well steamed, and a little bran, make a good, inexpensive mash. If skim-milk is plentiful, give them some every day, to take the place of insects which they can no longer find for themselves. If there is no milk to spare, get some commercial meat scraps, and mix about a tablespoonful for each bird in the mash three times a week. Also, be careful that they have plenty of grit and water. Ducks and geese often suffer for water on a general farm after outdoor pools and troughs are frozen.

The care the birds receive now, will influence their laying, and the strength of the ducklings and goslings next spring. Don't lose any time in getting your young pullets into winter quarters. The sooner they are settled, and winter rations started, the sooner they will commence to lay. Don't forget that to produce eggs, they must have plenty of water to drink, and as they have no teeth, need grit to grind the food after it passes into the gizzard—animal food, vegetables, and lime in some form. Brooks and outside drinking troughs are sure to be frozen; small stone and sand ditto. So when the farmer throws down the corn, which is greedily eaten, the hen profits little, for she cannot digest it properly, and in consequence is unprofitable. Insects (the natural animal food supply) are not to be had, nor is there any vegetable matter available. So the fowls return to natural conditions, which means no eggs until springtime, when they are again able to find the different ingredients from which eggs are formed.

Now the real poultryman, who depends on his fowls for his living, knows by experience that it pays to provide Biddy with all these things when she cannot find them for herself. Besides, there is another advantage; the chicks which will be hatched in the spring will be stronger, and make quicker growth, than those hatched from eggs laid by poorly fed hens.

During the last two years we have almost entirely changed our plans for feeding the laying hens, and find the new method much better than the old. Instead of a wet mash, at eight o'clock in the morning, we now give the following dry mash at 2 P. M.: Ten pounds of wheat bran, ten pounds of ground oats, ten pounds of ground corn, ten pounds of white middlings, ten pounds of old process oil meal, and ten pounds of freshly cut green bone. If you can't get freshly cut green bone, use twenty pounds of any one of the commercial brands of animal feed specially prepared for poultry. Mix the above quantities very thoroughly, and keep in a barrel for daily use.

When fresh green bone is used, don't mix more at one time than will be used within the week. Feed the dry mash in shallow pans, as much as the birds will eat up clean in fifteen minutes. At supper-time feed a mixture of corn, wheat and cracked corn, in the following proportions: Whole corn, twelve pounds; cracked corn, eight pounds; wheat, eight pounds. This mixture we scatter over the litter about 4 or 4.30 P. M., according to the light.

The birds are always eager for the whole corn, and in rushing about to pick that up, push the smaller grain down into the litter—so rarely get any of it at night. But when they get off the roost the first thing in the morning, they are hungry, and start in hunting for the small grain, which compels them to take just the vigorous exercise which they need early in the morning to set their blood circulating, and to warm them after the long night on the roost. About eight o'clock in the morning we fill up the drinking fountains with water hot enough to insure its being warm after it is poured in the cold galvanized pans. At twelve o'clock the drinking fountains are again filled with water, and about a pint of cracked corn is scattered on the litter for every forty hens. They also get their vegetable food at noon. In the early winter this is usually cabbage, turnips or beets, but later in the season we depend entirely upon sprouted oats, each bird being given about a square inch of the sprouts and matted roots. If you have no regular cabinet for sprouting the oats, and don't feel like going to the expense of buying one, a few shallow boxes will do almost as well.

A shelf behind the kitchen stove, or some other warm place, is a good spot to keep them. Make several holes at the bottom of the boxes for ventilation, and cover with burlap or wire cloth to prevent the oats falling through. Soak the oats in a pail of water over night, and in the morning spread them about two inches thick in the boxes and cover with a double thickness of newspaper. Each morning, remove the newspaper and stir the oats with your hands; spread out evenly, and sprinkle with water until the sprouts begin to show, after which, don't disturb the oats, but still sprinkle every morning. Replace the paper after sprinkling, until the sprouts are over the edge of the box, as it keeps them from being dried and toughened by the dry outer air of the kitchen. In about nine days the oats will be a thick mass of fine roots, and the sprouts two or three inches high, and ready to use. Break into small pieces, so that each hen will get a share. The whole mass of roots is to be used, as well as the sprouts, for there is as much food value in one as in the other. A piece about seven inches square is enough for twenty hens. After once commencing to use the sprouts, start a box every day or every other day, according to the size of the boxes and the number of hens to be fed, so that you will have a continuous supply.

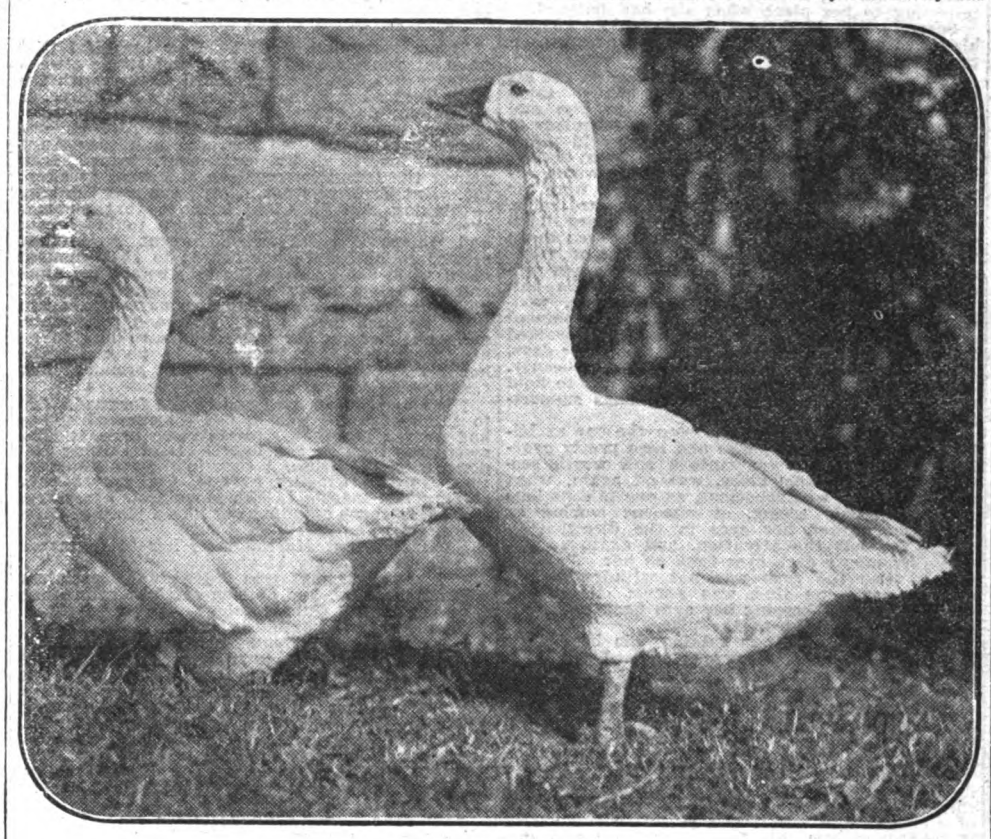
The quantity of night feed you will have to gauge by what the birds will eat. Hens must go to roost with full crops, or they get cold and miserable before morning, when the egg basket will suffer; but there should be no whole corn left on the floor for them to get early in the morning, for if they can fill up on whole corn when they first get off the roost they will just stand around all day without taking any exercise. Our plan is to go through all the houses, give what we think is a good supply, then start in at the first house again, and give a little more when it seems to be needed. After watching the birds for a few nights you will soon be able to gauge the right amount. The quantity of feed is one of the points on which personal experience is the only teacher.

When eggs are to be marketed, it is advisable not to allow any male birds to run with the layers. But, of course, about three weeks before eggs are wanted for incubation, your best hens should be selected, divided into small flocks of from seven to fifteen, according to the breed you are keeping, and as good a rooster as you can afford to buy introduced to each flock.

Don't keep more hens than your house will comfortably hold. I don't mean in fine weather when the birds only sleep in it. Calculate for their having to spend several days at a time shut up. They must have room to move about and scratch among the litter to keep healthy and profitable. Better have twenty hens laying regularly than fifty moping around and not laying more than one or two eggs a week.

Turkeys

I want to give you a few hints about the care of the old turkeys at this season of the year, in the hope that it may help in raising young ones in the spring, for during the past few years the number of letters telling about the loss of young turkeys in all parts of the country has been positively appalling, and it all springs from an intestinal disease commonly called "blackhead," and which is spread through the droppings of affected birds. For this reason I want you to do a little doctoring right now to get the old birds in good condition if possible.



First of all, plow the yards or grounds where the turkeys have been in the h bit of congregating and thoroughly disinfect the roosts or fences which they frequent; then once every week put forty grains of Epsom salts in half a pint of water, and place it where the birds are likely to drink from it in the early morning. And before you give them their regular feed in the morning mix one grain of sulphate of iron and one grain of silicate of soda and make it into a pill with a little curd cheese or bread which has been moistened with milk. The above amount is for one pill, and each bird should get one of them. At night again try to force them to drink the water with Epsom salts in it. Or, if you only have two or three birds which are pretty tame and easily handled, give them a teaspoonful of Castor oil night and morning instead of the salts. Sweep up and burn all the droppings from under the roosts as early as possible in the morning. Repeat this treatment once a week for four weeks. After that time add seven grains of catechu to every two quarts of drinking water every day for another month. After the first of the year give the turkeys some of the laying hens' mash every morning, and all through the winter give them a good feed of corn at night.

Correspondence

H. D. B.—I have gone to you before and received help. I want to ask about a sick turkey hen I have. She has a rattling in her throat and one side of nose is closed up and swelling near the eye. I can press the water out, but it fills up again. It seems difficult for her to swallow. There is no disagreeable odor from her breath. MRS. H. D. B.

A.—I should think that the turkey had a very bad

EMBDEN GEESE.

NOTE DIFFERENCE IN SHAPE OF GOOSE AND GANDER. GOOSE TO LEFT NEXT THE WALL.

G. S.—I would like to know a remedy for cholera in young turkeys. MRS. G. S.

A.—Cholera in young turkeys is usually a symptom of the disease commonly called blackhead. Please refer to the March number of COMFORT for full particulars of the disease and the means of prevention. There is so little chance of curing a bird that has contracted the disease, that I advise you to kill it before it contaminates other stock.

E. E. C.—Could you tell me why my canary birds do not raise young? I have a pair that will be two years old next month. Is it because they are related? They are of the same hatching of birds, their father and mother are the same. A year ago last month they started to build a nest in a box I put in the cage and the male bird sang fine and before they finished the nest quit building it and the male quit singing and did not sing all summer. I feed the mixed bird seed and lettuce, cabbage or apples and occasionally hard-boiled eggs, give plenty of water to drink and for bathing, and bird gravel. They have never been droopy. The male sings all right now and they act as though they would build a nest, but have laid no eggs. (2) Where can I get a book on canaries?

A.—Are you quite sure that the bird that does not sing is a hen bird? If so, try giving it special food. Chop half a hard-boiled egg very fine, and mix thoroughly with powdered cracker crumbs, then moisten slightly with milk. Give a very little of it each morning in a small dish, remove what has not been eaten after two hours, as it is dangerous for the birds to eat it after it has become sour. (2) I don't know of any book on canaries, but suppose you could find one at any bird store.

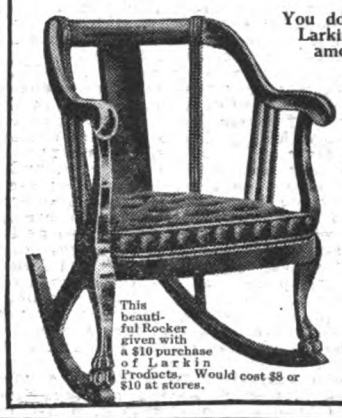
C. E. W.—Can you tell me what is the matter with my small chickens and what to do for them? They have something like asthma, stand in the shade with their heads thrown up, as though they will lose their breath. Some of them appear puffed with wind and look like a ball. The large chickens are not troubled with this disease.

A.—Young chickens in the condition you describe are hopeless. The only humane and profitable solution is, kill them, for even if they seemingly recover, they will be susceptible to disease, and their progeny would lack constitutional vigor.

L. W.—Would rabbit meat be as good for chickens as beef scraps? Is fish good for poultry? (2) What is the cause of a White Leghorn hen laying brown-shelled eggs? (3) What kind of rocks are best to crush for poultry? (4) Is there any way to get the husk off oats so they can be fed to poultry?

A.—Yes, rabbit meat would be as good as beef scraps. A medium amount of fish is good food for poultry, but if given in any quantity it will affect the flavor of eggs and meat. (2) Probably the Leghorn hen has some Wyandotte blood in her veins. (3) Any bright, hard stone which retains sharp edges when crushed, is suitable for poultry. (4) Your local grist mill will be able to hull oats, or you can buy them already hulled at most of the stores.

E. P.—I would like to know why so many of my chickens were hatched blind this year. The chickens hatched out well and they seemed to be strong, only some were blind. (2) Will you also tell me why the yolks of the eggs are so dark they are almost brown. They taste all right, but they are so dark I dislike to use them.



A.—If the chickens were hatched in an incubator, the blindness may have been caused by uneven heat in the machine. If under hens, it is undoubtedly due to the condition of the hens who laid the eggs, unless you used some strong insect powder in the nests or on the birds just before hatching time. The dark yolks are due to something the birds are eating, or to excessive fat. You can decide which it is by examining the birds. If they are very heavy in the lower body or between the thighs, reduce the amount of grain and other fattening foods. Feed only wheat and oats in deep litter, so they will have to scratch for it. If they are not too fat, try to discover what they are getting that might affect them in such a way. If a her, and amused herself by trying to fit each person with a character conjectured from their voice. Presently Lord Mersey looked round.

"I took that cone home with me, Miss Weston—very interesting under the microscope—showed an inner circle of petals and a wonderful germinating system. I should very much like to show it to you."

"Thank you!" said Edna; "I should like to see it."

"I'll show it you some day, when you call on my mother. Perhaps you take an interest in butterflies and moths? I think I have almost a complete collection, most of them procured, by the way in Rosedene, a great many in More Park as well. Wonderful place for white moths. By the way, did you make a collection of the Alpine flowers while you were abroad?"

"I am ashamed to say I did not," said Enda. "My father was very fond of botany, and often tried to instill a love of it into me, but in vain. I love flowers, of course, but I like them better before they have been pulled to pieces and dissected. That is a piece of femininity, is it not?"

Lord Mersey accepted the challenge, and took up the argument with a will, and for the first time in her life Edna listened to a scholar, who added to his learning a rare and delicate fancy, expressed with an eloquence as natural as it was unusual, and a voice so full of modest dignity, which is the acme of refinement. She forgot all about the gossip going on around her, was scarcely conscious of the ministrations of the noiseless and well-trained servants, and was sorry when the duchess rose as a signal that the gentlemen were to be left to the Chateau Lafitte and the castle ports.

Edna was compelled to wait for a moment while Lord Mersey finished a sentence—indeed, he laid his hand on her arm to keep her, in his strange, abstracted way, and, as she rose, she caught a glance from a pair of dark eyes that were fixed on her, the eyes in question belonging to a handsome young lady who sat at the lower end of the table. The glance was averted in an instant; but women are quick at reading the language of the eyes, and Edna knew that the owner of those flashing orbs was not too well pleased at seeing the friendly gesture of Lord Mersey.

The duchess led the way into a smaller and less brilliant salon, took her seat beside the fire, and proceeded to make tea in the homeliest of fashions.

"I'm fond of a cup of tea," she said to Aunt Martha, who was seated near her, "and I don't call the lukewarm mixture the ser ants bring round on their trays a cup of tea; it is more like medicine. Tea, to be in perfection, must be made by one's self, and drank hot. I hope you know how to make tea, my dear," she said to Edna.

Edna laughingly confessed her ignorance.

"We rarely had tea in Switzerland. Holland is the only place on the Continent in which one can get anything like pure tea."

"Come and see me make it," said the duchess, and Edna seated herself on a footstool, and watched the operation.

"There!" cried the duchess, pouring out a cup. "That is tea—properly made. Lady Jane, you take sugar, I know; Grace you do not," and she smiled across at the tall, dark girl, whose glance Edna had caught, and whom she remembered to have been introduced as Miss Bromley.

The ladies all gathered round the fire and the tea table—the duchess would not let Edna move—and a friendly chat immediately commenced, in which Edna was the principal listener. Presently the duchess said:

"Grace, will you give us some music?"

Grace Bromley looked at her teacup—it was not yet empty, and the duchess, respecting the cause of her refusal, turned to Edna.

"Come, my dear," she said, "some little Swiss ballad."

Edna felt nervous, but with true tact at once complied, singing a little Swiss s prettily, and returning to her place when she had finished.

Scarcely had she done it when the duke's clear, high-bred voice was heard, and the gentlemen entered.

Lord Mersey came up to the table, and got his cup of tea from the duchess' own hands. Edna noticed that her grace looked up at him and treated him as if he were some great schoolboy to be humored and petted. He scarcely said thank you, but took his cup and made for a distant part of the room, where he sat, his whole expression that of a man whose thoughts were far away. The footman wheeled out the card table, cards were produced, and the duke, Lord Portfield, Aunt Martha and Lady Bromley sat down to whist. Edna found a great album of views upon a side table, and was lost in that when suddenly Lord Mersey's voice sounded beside her.

"Cologne Cathedral, isn't it? Yes—ah, wonderful place! But I remember being disappointed at first sight: it was not until I had walked round it two or three times, on two or three days, that I got an idea of its magnitude and beauty. Inside it is as wonderful; the roof seems to hold up the columns, instead of the columns supporting the roof."

Edna asked him if he had seen the one at Milan; and Lord Mersey, who had seen pretty nearly everything that was curious and worth seeing on the habitable globe, was off again, when suddenly Edna was conscious, as one is conscious without actualy seeing, of someone looking at her. She turned her eyes in the direction in which she felt the attention, and again caught Grace Bromley's dark eyes fixed on her.

This time the gaze was not withdrawn, but changed into one that was almost one of defiance; and still keeping her eyes fixed on Edna, she rose and glided to the piano.

Lord Mersey went on talking, his head bent forward, his dark, dreamy eyes fixed on Edna in his impressive way.

Suddenly a chord of music rose in the room—a true musician's fingers glided along the keys, playing the prelude to a song, and presently a voice, low, but exquisitely musical, commenced singing.

Lord Mersey fidgeted with his hand, and evidently strove to be deaf to the music and continue his conversation, but the charm was one he of all men could not resist; gradually but surely it told upon him, his talk grew loose and disjointed; he looked abstractedly in Edna's face for a minute or two, then rose slowly and walked straight toward the piano, as if he were drawn thereto by some subtle sorcery.

Edna comprehended the meaning of those dark eyes then and knew that Grace Bromley had deliberately and of malice prepense drawn Lord Mersey from her side. For a moment the color rose to the pale cheeks and a light shot into the clear eyes, but both died away as suddenly, and Edna Weston bent her head over the album as the thought came flashing down upon her:

"If she knew how little cause she had to fear me." This thought was followed by another: "What right have I to be sitting here among these people—a living falsehood? I am not Miss Weston; every time I answer to that name, every hour I sit here concealing the truth, I am acting a lie."

The duchess' voice made her start.

"Come and sit here, my dear," she said. "Why, you are all alone!"—All alone, indeed! thought Edna, bitterly—"Where is Lord Mersey? I saw him sitting there just now, lecturing in his usual style. Ah! I need not ask. Do you know that he is music mad, my dear, as well as flower mad and mineral mad, and subject to a hundred other madnesses? He cannot hear a musical instrument played without being drawn toward it. Grace sings well, does she not?"

"Exquisitely," said Edna, warmly.

"Yes," said the duchess, looking across the room where Lord Mersey stood leaning both arms upon the piano, and staring down at his coat sleeves. 'Yes, Grace is a favorite of mine; I hope you will like her, because I like you."

"Your grace is very kind to me," said Edna, simply. "I think I shall like Miss Bromley. We have not spoken as yet. Isn't she very beautiful?"

"Yes," said the duchess; "I think so. Look at Lord Mersey now! I suppose you are a botanist—no?"

"I don't know the names of half the common flowers," said Edna.

"What is it—minerals, air currents, shells, or what, my dear? Something has attracted him."

Edna blushed under this cross-examination.

"Then it must have been my supreme ignorance, your grace; no doubt that is it. He looked upon it as curious, quite phenomenal."

"Hem!" said the duchess. "He tells me you and he had a conversation in the Rosedene preserves the other day."

"I met him in the woods," said Edna.

The duchess smiled, and taking up Edna's hand, turned it palm upward.

"I am an old witch, my dear, and am particularly clever at reading the past lives of people. Let me see——" and she began tracing the delicate lines on the soft little palm. "What do I read there——"

Edna drew her hand away suddenly, with a look almost of fear.

The duchess stared at her with an amused smile.

"My dear child, I was only joking! One would think you had committed a murder, or had some deadly secret you were afraid would slip out. Why, what a strange child you are! First pale, then red, and now pale again! Tut, tut, if I were your mother"—and she sighed—"I should send you to bed at nine o'clock for a month or two."

There was something so motherly and affectionate in the trifling that Edna lowered her face and had to struggle with her tears. If she had had a mother! Why should they all treat her like an innocent schoolgirl? If they only knew!

Miss Bromley could not go on playing all the evening, and presently the music ceased. Lord Mersey leaned against the piano for fully five minutes after it was silent, and then raised his head and looked round as if he was surprised to find himself where he was.

Then without a word of thanks he turned away and strode over to Edna. But there was a storm in Edna's bosom that warned her she had best beat a safe retreat while there was time, and with a feeling of thankfulness she heard Lady Portfield murmur that her carriage was waiting.

Edna had to wait until it had gone, and while she stood looking on at the card table Lord Mersey came up beside her.

"I'm going," he said, in his straightforward way. "Now that I find that it was Miss Weston who found me trespassing on her preserves I had better make a further apology and get a formal permission to repeat the offense."

Edna laughed.

"The Rosedene preserves and park, and anything else that interests you on the premises, are at your service," she said.

"Eh?" he said, with a quick upraising of his eyebrows. "Miss Weston, that's rather comprehensive."

Edna blushed, half with annoyance at her own want of skill in framing her sentence.

"Come as often as you please, my lord," she said; "that is what I mean."

He took her hand and bowed low over it.

"I shall avail myself of that gracious permission," he said, gravely, "for I love the Rosedene woods. Good night!"

The Rosedene bays came dashing over the courtyard stones, footmen swung back curtains and stood ready to fling open doors and dash down steps, and Edna found herself in the carriage, half wondering whether she had spent the evening sitting at the feet of a duchess.

Aunt Martha was enthusiastic in her praise of the castle and its illustrious inmates.

"As for the duchess, my dear Edna, it is impossible to feel anything but at one's ease with her. I have always heard that the higher one goes in society the more natural and simple-hearted one finds the people. And so it must be when you come to consider it. Have you enjoyed yourself, dear?"

"Very much, aunt."

"I am very glad of that. How beautiful that dress of yours looked! Black and silver always suited you. And that was Lord Mersey with the high forehead and the dark eyes? Very clever, is he not, my dear?"

"Very, aunt," said Edna, dutifully, as she leaned back and closed her eyes, and then Aunt Martha, overtired by excitement, leaned back among the luxurious cushions and went to sleep, too. But Edna was not asleep; she was thinking—thinking and traveling back to that summer eve when he had taken her close to his breast and whispered those sweet, fervent words that seemed to burn into her heart; to that summer morn when she knelt by his side before the altar and heard him swear to love and cherish her for better and for worse; to that summer eve, again when he stood before her, stern and passionate, and bade her go her way and leave him to go his, promising that never would he claim the honor and obedience that she had promised him that day.

Edna opened her eyes and leaned forward. Oh, to think of it all was to court madness! They had neared More Park, were close upon it. The moon was high in the heavens, and shining full down upon the house. A turn in the road brought them to the winding avenue, the gravel path shining like marble in the moonlight, every tree and every shrub standing out like a piece of carving against the soft blue light.

Suddenly Aunt Martha feels her arm grasped and hears a low cry of alarm.

"What is it, my dear Edna?" she exclaims, waking suddenly, and staring straight before her.

"Look, aunt! Quick! quick! Do you see?"

"See—where—what?" asks Aunt Martha.

"There, in the avenue—a man! Look!"

Aunt Martha looks and sees, quit plainly, a tall man standing in the avenue of More Park, looking up at More House.

"Yes, my dear. I see him! It's very strange. What can it be? Perhaps it's a gamekeeper."

"No, no!" breathes Edna, and she is trembling terribly, "it is not a gamekeeper. I know it! I am sure of it! He is there for no good; how can he be at such a time of night? He has no right there! No right there!"

"My dear Edna!" remonstrates Mrs. Weston. "You are overstrung, excited. The most natural thing in the world for a stranger to stroll up the avenue on such a night to see the house in the moonlight."

"He was no stranger!" retorted Edna, with a trembling air of conviction. "I—I—feel as if I had seen him before," and she looked out of the window fearfully, but the carriage had left the avenue far behind by that time, and they were entering the Rosedene drive.

Edna fell back with a low, terrified sob.

Hush, my dear!" soothed Aunt Martha; "overtired and excited, very naturally, too. My dear child!"

No right there? Surely if any man had a right to stand in the avenue of More Park, Cyril More, the owner, had that right, for it was he and no other. And why had he come there on that moonlight night? Possibly to say farewell to the home of his forefathers before he turned his back once more, and perhaps for the last time. For that—to say farewell, and also for some other object. What was it?

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

Headaches a Foe to Beauty

MOST of us have an idea that beauty comes from without—that if we can make our skin smooth and white, chase away those annoying little freckles, add a pound or two of flesh here and take away a pound or two there, we shall have done all that is necessary to turn a plain face and figure into a pretty one.

But that isn't entirely true!

The thoughts you think will do even more to make your face beautiful than all those sweet-smelling creams and lotions I have been advising you to keep on your toilet-table. But I preached one little sermon not so many months ago about thoughts—didn't I, Pretty Girls?—and I'm not going to repeat myself. I am just going to ask you to look in the mirror and find out whether there are some unpleasant wrinkles going up and down and criss-cross on your forehead.

Those may be caused by irritable thoughts and the worry habit—and I've already told you how to get rid of this sort of beauty blemish—but it is just possible that they may be the result of frequent headaches, and that's why we are going to have a cozy chat this month on preventing headaches.

MASSAGING A HEADACHE AWAY.

A headache can make hollows beneath your eyes, mar your forehead with permanent wrinkles, take the sparkle out of your eyes, and do deadly deeds to your hair. So, even if you didn't object to those excruciating or wearisome hours of a throbbing head, you should certainly resolve, for the sake of your own good looks, to cure yourself of headaches at once and forever.

But can you?

Yes, I think so, unless there is something very seriously wrong with your health. Headaches come, in a majority of cases, either from the eyes, the nerves, the stomach, or congested circulation.

Getting the feet damp or chilled may produce a splitting headache. In damp weather, see that your shoes have good soles, that the ankles are protected by high shoes or gaiters, and that the legs are kept warm. If you will do this, you will save youself many aches and pains—including a dull disagreeable beauty-marring headache.

Should you be caught out in a storm not sufficiently protected, make it a point, on reaching the house again, to take off wet shoes and hose at once, rubbing the feet briskly with a Turkish bath towel; then, remove your damp skirts or other damp clothes, and take a steaming hot footbath. I don't mean you to use just warm water, but water as hot as the feet can bear. If you have a bathtub, let the water run constantly while you are soaking the feet; if not, keep adding hot water from a pitcher. Let the water extend half way up the legs, and keep moving the feet or splashing the water. Stay in five minutes, being careful to keep the water at the same high temperature by adding fresh hot water; then rub yourself thoroughly dry, put on some warm clothes and drink a cup of hot water. You will not only ward off a headache, but keep yourself free from many pains and cramps which you have gotten used to thinking are unavoidable.

This advice applies to getting chilled as well as wet. If you have been obliged to sit in a draft, or have been out driving when the weather changed and you find yourself feeling chilly, then take the hot foot-bath and all the rest of the prescription, just as if you had been caught in a storm. The object of the foot-bath is not so much to make cold feet warm as to start the blood circulating all over the body.

Sometimes—very frequently—a hot foot-bath, followed by a nap of fifteen minutes, under a big fat warm comforter, will cure a headache for which neither rain nor cold have been responsible. The reason for this is that it relieves congestion. Sometimes the head aches because it has too much blood in it, and sometimes because it hasn't enough, and the hot foot-bath starts the blood running merrily through the veins, equalizes the circulation, and scares the headache away.

An excellent exercise to practise daily to keep the circulation in good order is the following:

A Headache Preventive

Holding the body erect, advance the left foot eighteen inches. Raise the arms above the head, elbows rigid, and throw them out and down, as if attempting to touch the floor by the right foot. Do this five times, then advance the right foot eighteen inches; extend hands above head, then throw them down as if attempting to touch the floor by the left foot.

After a time, it will be more than an attempt, as you will succeed in reaching the floor with the tips of the fingers; but long before that you will find the waist improved by the exercise, the circulation made normal; and your whole body freer of movement and more graceful.

A nervous headache can work almost more havoc in your looks than the sort of headaches which come from getting chilled. Whenever you feel all the little nerves in your body jiggling up and down like loose telephone wires, and the temples seem tied up in bowknots, and two fretful wrinkles appear in the middle of your brow, go to your room and shut the door, though the morning dishes stay unwashed for an extra fifteen minutes. Sit down in the most comfortable chair you have, or lie on the bed with clothes loosened. Now say something pleasant to yourself: "After all, happy things are coming to me. I know," or "The little cares which trouble me, I cast them all away." Say this, or something else which is hopeful and happy, or peaceful, over and over in your mind, really thinking about it; at the same time curve the corners of the mouth upward, and keep them so, and you will find the tension at the temples will relax. Keep the eyelids closed and smile inwardly, and all the tangled nerves will begin to smooth out. Fifteen minutes spent like this will go a long way toward curing the headache, and a fifteen-minute nap to follow will make you normal again. When you come out of your room, do not hurry, hurry, hurry, but move quietly about your work, and keep thinking pleasant thoughts.

When the headache is very bad and the tension doesn't seem to yield to this method, use this headache movement on the brow, around the eyes, at the temples, and the base of the brain.

Massaging the Headache Away

First, put the first three fingers of each hand below and back of the ears on the neck, and pressing firmly, rub up and down, to the edge of the hair, and the base of the neck; then use a rotary motion all along the top of the neck where it meets the hair; next press the first two fingers of each hand firmly against the temples, and use a rotary movement for two or three minutes. Then, placing the thumbs on the cheekbones, and the first finger of each hand above the corresponding eyebrow, follow the line of the brow with the finger as far as the temple, pressing as firmly as possible so the movement will be a vigorous one. As you reach the temples, go under the eye with the very lightest possible movement, to the bridge of the nose; then back above the brow again, making a complete oval, and repeat this for several minutes.

If this massage precedes the quiet relaxation in your room, it will take a very tenacious, nervous headache, indeed, to survive.

By far the large majority of headaches come from the stomach; we eat the foods which overwork our liver, are not careful about mastication, do not drink enough water, and forget that a certain amount of exercise is almost essential to keep the eliminative functions regular.

Whenever you have a headache some time after eating, or find yourself waking with a headache, begin to keep a watchful eye on your diet. Your liver has to take care of all the fat, greasy, buttery things you eat, and all the sweets. Don't overwork it; and when you begin to feel headachy with more or less regularity, just try cutting out the sweets (preserves, cakes, pies, candy, and much sugar in your food), for a while. Drink a couple of glasses of hot water the moment you get up in the morning—which will be at least half an hour before breakfast—and six or seven more during the day, but none at meals. The reason for this is that the stomach provides certain juices to digest the food you give it. If you insist on diluting it with water or other liquids, it doesn't do as good work, and indigestion may result. So don't drink until an hour or two hours after meals.

The saliva is needed to digest some foods, especially potatoes, breads, etc., and that is the reason you should chew every particle of food until it is almost fluid before swallowing. I would be almost willing to say that if you would do that, you would never have a doctor's bill—perhaps that is a little extravagant, yet it is not far from the literal truth.

If you will take these few precautions, about the circulation, the digestion, and the nerves, you will not only drive most of your headaches away, but work a big and beautiful change in your personal appearance—which is certainly worth while, isn't it, Pretty Girls?

By the way, tight corsets, collars, sleeves or shoes can produce headache and wrinkles—because they interfere with the circulation. That is why the suspender skirts which have been so popular are such sensible things to wear—there is no pressure at the waist, and all the weight hangs from the shoulders. Besides, they're mighty pretty, aren't they?

Answers to Questions

Dot.—If your eyelids are covered with white scales in the morning, it shows your eyes are not in a healthy condition. Pay particular attention to them for a time. Be careful not to read in a bad light, nor by artificial light. Buy yourself a glass eyecup, which is a little oval cup with a stem. Fill it half full of a four per cent solution of boric acid, which you can buy at your drug-store, and wash the eyes out two or three times daily—especially just before going to bed, and again on rising in the morning. To use the eyecup, throw the head forward, and fit the cup to the eye-socket. Then holding the cup firmly in place, throw the head away back. Now, open the eye and wink it many times. In this way the liquid will wash out the eye thoroughly. In addition to this, anoint the lids with a very little vaseline at night, on retiring. Keep the bowels open daily, and look after your general health.

Brown Eyes.—If your joints "creak" and are stiff to move, your whole body needs attention, and the joints themselves special exercise. Begin to drink eight to ten glasses of water a day, and to eat plenty of nourishing food, chewing every mouthful of food until it is liquid, before you swallow it. Drink milk, eat cream on your cereals, plenty of butter on your bread, but avoid salt meats, salt fish, vegetables like turnips and cabbage. Eat, instead, spinach, and onions, and string beans, and corn, and peas, etc. Canned vegetables will take the place of fresh ones, though they are not so desirable. And try to get a certain amount of fresh fruit. Eat an apple every night before going to bed, an orange in the morning when you can get it. If you can't get fresh fruits, then eat stewed prunes, stewed figs, canned pineapple, canned peaches, etc. It is evident that your body lacks certain elements which must be supplied by your food. In addition, exercise the joints daily. You will always find plenty of exercises in this column, and just recently I gave up one whole article to this subject. A good exercise for you would be to stand with hands on the foot of a low bed; then slowly sink until the body was resting on the heels; then rise again, without removing the hands from their first position. Repeat this ten or twenty times. Another good exercise is to stand with hands on hips, then slowly rise to the very tips of the toes; slowly sinking to the heels again, or, rather, letting the foot go back to a flat position on the floor. For the jaws which are so stiff, practise for five minutes at a time opening and shutting them. Only open them a little way at first, and as you find that becomes easy, open a little more, then a little more. But your main consideration must be your food; be sure your bowels move freely every day.

THE SUSPENDER SKIRTS ARE SENSIBLE ONES TO WEAR.

Hazel.—Painting the freckles with peroxide of hydrogen is often effective. Use a little brush like a mucilage brush. Another method is to dab each spot with the following paste, just before going to bed:

Freckle Paste

Mix a tablespoonful of dry mustard with lemon juice, then add a teaspoonful of oil of sweet almonds. Be careful not to get the paste in or near the eyes. Leave it on the skin only until the latter begins to feel warm, then wash off thoroughly and massage with cold cream. After a few days, the skin will peel off.

Snookums.—The very bad case of blackheads and acne that you have demands persistent and constant attention. To begin with, how are your bowels? See that they move freely daily. I expect my Pretty Girls will get tired of hearing that advice, but, my dears, you simply cannot have good complexions unless that function is fully taken care of. Notice what I say in regard to the amount of water to be taken daily, and be sure to go thou and do likewise. Then, you must begin to use some soap at once—which you say you have not been doing. The whole trouble has come, originally, from your not keeping the face quite clean. I know you have washed it several times a day, but you can't keep skin clean with just water! So go to your druggist's, or write to a department store in your nearest city, or look up an advertiser in COMFORT, and buy a camel's-hair complexion brush. It will cost you twenty-five or fifty cents. Then, every night before you go to bed, scrub your face thoroughly in plenty of hot soapy water—real sudsy water. Use a pure soap—no kitchen soap will do, although some of the white toilet soaps which are also used for the kitchen, will be all right. After you have scrubbed the face many times, empty out the water, and fill the bowl with fresh warm water—no soap; rinse the face thoroughly in this, then in another bowl of warm water, then in cool water. The habit you have formed of pressing out the blackheads is scarring your face, I am afraid. Probably many of the blackheads will go away, after a few nights' scrubbing; but if many, or some, are still left, rub cold cream into the face, then very gently indeed use a comedone extractor. This is a little instrument almost like a glove buttoner, except that it has a tiny hole in one end, just big enough to press over a blackhead. Don't use this unless you just must, and not until you have given the blackheads a chance to disappear of themselves. After using the extractor, dab the spot with alcohol at once. Every night slap the face all over, none too gently, to stimulate the circulation. Also practise every night and morning the exercises I have given in these columns for constipation. You say you are troubled with other special physical conditions. Be careful about getting your feet or ankles chilled, at any time; constipation is bad for you in this way, also, so if you keep the bowels in perfect condition you may find some of the other difficulties disappearing.

Elise.—Your letter did not arrive in time to be answered in either July or August COMFORT. You know magazines have to print their material a long time ahead of the mailing date, when they have such large circulation as COMFORT has. Yes, peroxide of hydrogen and aqua ammonia will destroy superfluous hair. The peroxide bleaches it, and the ammonia in time kills the roots. It takes a lot of patience and perseverance, however; sometimes many months. But it is worth it. It does not disfigure the face in any way. If at any time, the skin becomes irritated, stop the treatment for a couple of days, and rub in some cold cream; then resume. The ammonia that your druggist can furnish you is all right.

Blue Eyes.—See answer to "Elise." For the tan, try the following bleach:

To Remove Tan

Fifteen drops of tincture of benzoin, one ounce of strained honey, white of one egg, enough ground barley to make a paste.

Cover the face with this paste at night and tie on a cheese-cloth mask, in which you have cut holes for eyes, nose and mouth. In the morning, after removing mask, bathe the face thoroughly in warm soapy water until the paste has been entirely removed, then rinse, dry gently but thoroughly. You could weigh a little more than one hundred and thirty pounds, if you are five feet eight inches in height. Eat good healthful, nourishing foods, and you will gain.

Bertha.—If you have enlarged glands in your throat, that is a matter for a physician, not a beauty department, my dear. But if you will take the milk diet for six or eight weeks, being, oh, so conscientious to drink the full amount of milk you should, I think you will find your condition improve, and your appearance and health will profit in every way. I have given full directions in COMFORT recently.

Unhappy.—Your bust will probably become normal in size, if you are just sixteen. But you can improve its appearance by wearing a brassiere, which you can buy of your dry-goods store or a mail-order house. A brassiere, as you probably know, is a simple support made of cambric, or net, or embroidery, which holds the bust firm. This makes it seem smaller. A very tight-fitting underwaist would have almost the same effect. Exercises with the arms will help to reduce the superfluous flesh. Put your palms together in front of you at arms' length, then throw the arms back vigorously as if trying to make them meet behind you. Do this fifteen or twenty times in succession. Dash cold water on the bust after bathing each morning and night, except when you are not feeling well, when cold or even cool water should be avoided.

Denzel.—Why, you fortunate girl, to have "yellow" eyes! Didn't you know poets write about them, and authors rave about them, and artists paint them? I should be sorry to have to tell you that nothing can change the color of one's eyes—except age, which sometimes fades or darkens them—if the color you have was not so very much to be desired. What you should do is to try to choose colors for your clothes that will harmonize with your eyes—yellows and browns ought to be becoming to you—if they are not, then try colors that look well with yellow—shades of blue, and green. Probably you should wear rather light colors; when you choose brown it should be a golden brown, or an orange brown; when you choose blue it should be a turquoise blue, etc. Just study yourself a little and decide which colors are best for you and go best with your eyes. No, you can't change your eyes by drinking "iron dust," and while I hate to cast any doubt on the young woman who changed from a blonde to a brunette by drinking certain water, I should hesitate a long while before I believed this story.

Hattie.—The chafed spots which after so many years have turned brown, will be a little hard to get rid of. Perhaps moistening them with peroxide may bleach them, or you could use a bleach, such as the one I have given to "Blue Eyes" for tan. You should be very careful not to get the bleach on any sensitive skin near at hand. Massaging nightly with a good cold cream may also help, or rubbing with lemon juice. A freckle remover—which usually causes the skin to peel off—might be your remedy, to be followed by careful masage every night with cold cream. I hardly like to advise you about this, not knowing the conditions exactly, and because of the location of the spots.

X. Y. Z.—Yes, I should wear a low bust corset, if my bust was rather large, but I should also wear a brassiere. See answer to "Unhappy." Cultivate active exercise of some kind. If you played tennis frequently, or rowed, or swam, or played basket-ball, you would soon note an improvement in your bust. About your hair, which used to be wavy but is so no longer since you cut it and used curlers, I think the best thing to do is to stop using the curlers, and, after shampooing every time, pin the hair in what is known as a "water wave." For this, take a strand of hair, and, holding it loose, pin it to the head in a little wave; an inch farther on pin another wave in the same strand, etc., etc. Do this with all the visible hair, while it is damp. Pin very firmly, and leave until the hair is entirely dry. It is quite possible that, since your hair was once wavy, it will only need a few such treatments to get it back into its old habits. You have of course straightened it with the curlers. Be careful not to draw it tight, and in doing it up try to pin it here and there in wavelines.

Brown Eyes, Roanoke, Va.—Man's vanity is one of his weak spots and the girl who can strike him hard there will knock him out, no matter how much he tries to deceive her with mushy moonlight talk. You slighted him for another and that hurt his vanity much more than it hurt his heart. P. S. Delays in replying are unavoidable.

Blondie, Joliet, Ill.—Receiving only one dollar and fifty cents a week for working in your father's store and doing housework besides does look small enough, but if you worked in somebody else's store and got the usual pay of girl clerks, would you have as much as one dollar and fifty cents at the end of the week after paying all your expenses? Besides you have a comfortable home where you are and parents to look after you, even if they are exacting and not quite what you think parents should be. If you will devote all your spare time to preparing yourself to do a class of work that will pay you from eighteen to twenty-five dollars a week, and then get a job at that rate, you might do better than staying at home, but we hardly think you would better yourself by doing so now. You are far more satisfactorily situated than thousands of girls and if you fully realized that, you would be more resigned to what you think is a very hard lot for a poor working-girl. Very few working-girls have one dollar and fifty cents left after paying board and other living expenses of the week.

Anxious Boy, Carden Bottom, Ark.—You don't mean that you have decided to postpone marrying a sixteen-year-old child for the present. What you really mean is that her parents, having better judgment than you have, have objected and done the postponing for you, and you ought to be thankful to them for it and ask them to please keep the embargo on until their daughter is twenty-one years old. We have now in hand a letter from a wife and mother, eighteen years old, married at sixteen, which if your sweetheart could read we feel quite sure she would postpone the marriage until she was older, if she didn't make the postponement permanent. Foolish young people will not realize that marriage is a very serious matter in all its phases until it is everlastingly too late and then what should have been the very best thing in life becomes a disappointment and an evil. Why won't you understand that forty or fifty years of married happiness waited three or four years for is much better than that many years of unhappiness rushed into in a hurry? Give the engagement ring to the girl as a token of your conversion to common sense and tell her if she wants you five years from now and you want her, it will be all right.

Distressed, Leslie, Ark.—A widower with two children should marry; but we would not advise him to marry a widow in delicate health and having two children. Still, love is a wonderful power and if yours is strong enough to make merry over all obstacles, marry the widow and take the chances. If you are sure you can't be any more miserable with her than you would be without her, you needn't be afraid.

Brown Eyes, Freedom, Okla.—When you have entirely forgotten that you are just as handsome and good and smart and ladylike and as well-dressed and jolly as any of the other girls who are popular, you will also be popular. Nobody can be popular who thinks more of herself or himself than they do of other people. Don't think you are a superior being and there will be no occasion for you to be asking what to do when people tell lies on you. You see you never do anything for other people and they can't do anything for you except to lie about you and they've got to do something.

Troubled, Ashland, W. Va.—You can't make yourself grow any taller, nor can anybody else make you. Read your Bible and find out about addition to the human stature. (2) If there is something you want the young man to give you, innocently steer him up to a shop window where it is and tell him you are perfectly crazy to have it. Maybe, rather than to see you lose your mind he will respond to your appeal. Young men have often been worked in that guileless fashion by girls quite familiar with the rules of etiquette usually observed in such cases.

Troubled, Elba, Ohio.—We think that it is risky for a widower with three children to marry any woman; riskier when the woman is a widow with one child and still riskier when the widow has divorced one husband and is having trouble with his successor. However, we may be mistaken. (2) A girl of fourteen and a boy fourteen may sit together in church if the parents of either or both of them are in the same pew.

R. E., Cleburne, Texas.—You might be able to make your own living and not work as hard as you do on the farm, and you might have to work even harder, but we think if your husband can be made to realize that you are his wife and not his work-animal life on the farm will become tolerable, if not exactly easy. Your little girl is to be considered, and if you leave your husband you will have troubles other than making a living. A man with a farm of one hundred and fifty acres certainly should be able to do better than work his wife to death. Simply refuse to do the heavy work and compel him to treat you right or lose you entirely. If he has no sense of justice or spirit of manliness and will not understand a husband's obligations to his wife, then you may leave him, and when the community learns the kind of man he is, he will be sorry enough to bring you home again and be fair to you. The day has gone by when women must submit to men as to their masters and it is a good thing for men and women.

Blue Eyes, Middle Granville, N. Y.—Your proposed wedding dinner at half past two o'clock is really a luncheon and with the oysters, salads and the usual additions including dessert of cake and ice cream, meat and vegetables will not be necessary. You might have consomme soup and some cold chicken, sliced, or tongue. Cold asparagus fits in nicely; and that in cans is usually very good and not expensive. Use linen napkins by all means. Paper napkins are ornamental, but not useful, though they might be if they were four times their present size and not printed in colors that come off.

Lonely Heart, Kylo, Ohio.—Possibly if you were married to this man, your heart would not only be lonelier than it is, but would have other troubles to disturb it. In any event, he does not marry you and we think you are making your life miserable by permitting him to be near you. Send him away and turn your thoughts in some other direction. A young widow with a good farm is an attraction to win a first-class husband, which we don't think this man is, or he would not neglect his opportunity. Besides, we believe that when he found he was about to lose you, he would come to his senses and claim you for good.

G. B. M., Dederick, Mo.—Engaged couples are permitted to kiss each other. (2) If you care so little for either man that you would as soon marry one as the other, take our advice and never get married until there is only one man in the world you would marry. Marriage just to be marrying is a very dangerous proceeding.

Dimples, Carbondale, Ill.—No doubt an engaged young man living in a different town from his fiancee gets lonesome, but he should not attempt to relieve it by devoting himself exclusively to another girl. It wouldn't be so bad if he were attentive to all of them, for there is safety in numbers, but he is not fair to his fiancee, nor to the other girl, if he devotes himself to one. Neither is he acting honorably to either of them. It may hurt you just now to lose this young man, but we think if you do give him up, you will not regret it so much as if you married him. A man of his type is not the kind that makes a safe and satisfactory husband, for he would be no more considerate of his wife than he is of his sweetheart, and you know how that is.

Brown Eyes, Lincoln, Kans.—When a gentleman has treated a lady to ice-cream or other refreshments, it is not necessary for her to make any acknowledgement of the courtesy beyond saying it was very nice and she enjoyed it. She should not extend formal thanks for it. (2) If the lady does not wish to accept a gentleman's invitation she should tell him she was sorry, but it would be impossible for her to accept. Ladies always have some excuse or other to offer on such occasions, even if they have to invent one.

Curly, Georgetown, Ky.—The "most proper way of expressing thanks" for a linen shower or anything else is the simplest way. Sincerity counts for more than elegant language and if you will thank your friends simply and with all sincerity, you will be doing most properly.

Troubled, Atlanta, Ga.—You would be quite justified in considering that the man wanted to marry you and had asked you to be his wife, though he had not said so in just that many words. As you cannot very well ask him if you are to consider yourself engaged, you can suggest that an engagement ring would be very nice and suitable and if he does not give it to you very soon, you may conclude that he is inclined to be shifty and unreliable. Many men are that way and lose what they really want and should have. Most girls are shy about directing them properly, but they should not be, if they care very much for the man.

Brown Eyes, Roanoke, Va.—When an engaged couple have broken their engagement, it is not usual, for the lady to write asking the man to call on her, still, if she has some matter of importance to talk to him about, there would be no impropriety in her asking him to call. If, however, he does not answer her letter, she should by no means write again to him. In asking him to call make your letter as brief as possible and state what you wish to see him about. Otherwise, he will be quite sure to think you are trying to get him back again and if he does not care as much for you as you do for him, he will not answer your letter.

Anxious, Springfield, Mo.—When the person to whom you are introduced says: "How do you do?" the usual reply is the same, though just why it should be so, nobody knows. Or better still, "Very well, thank you." Of course, it is all form, and any greeting words are permissible. (2) When you are at your own gate with a girl and her beau, he should open the gate and let the ladies pass in. Then, as it is your house, you lead the way for the visitors.

Blue Eyes, Lenair, N. C.—If the lady is not using her parasol the gentleman may carry it for her, if she wants him to. He should not carry it over her, though, as he would carry an umbrella. (2) The lady may take the gentleman's arm when walking with him, but that is not done as much now as it used to be. Women are becoming more independent and don't care to hang onto a man unless there is good reason for it.

C. D. M., Nelsonville, Ark.—To begin with, Charlie, when a young fellow of nineteen is writing to three young "ladys", he should know how to spell ladies, shouldn't he? But let that pass. As long as none of them objects to your writing to the others, keep them all on the string. By and by one will be an ample sufficiency and maybe you can't get even that many. (2) It was not necessary for the lady to ask you to call again, though we think it is more hospitable to ask callers to come again. Everybody doesn't do it, however.

Ike, New Ulm, Texas.—When a lady sends a gentleman a letter in two sealed envelopes it is a sign that she wishes him to be doubly careful in not letting anyone see the precious letter.

Brown Eyes, El Paso, Ill.—It is not proper for the lady to make overtures to the gentleman even if he does greet her "Hello, Kid," and she must wait for him to make further advances. And while she is waiting she must not get silly about him and give him a chance to throw her over for the next girl he takes a fancy to. The Hello-kid kind of gentlemen find the sixteen-year-old girls so dead easy that they laugh at them as they throw them over one after another. If you ask us why sixteen-year-old girls don't have more sense, we can't tell you.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I want to come in for a little chat this morning. I agree with Mrs. W. S. Graham, I wish more of the sisters would write about flowers. I know all the subjects they write on are interesting and helpful, but few ever mention a flower of any kind. It is a part of woman's nature to love flowers, but it is not every one that knows how to care for them, therefore we might exchange our ideas and experiences on the subject and be a help to one another. When some of you find a good way of germinating different kinds of seeds, or rooting any kind of shrub, or treatment and soil for different kinds of pot plants, send in your experiences to the Sisters' Corner for I am sure it will be appreciated by all.

I have often heard that gloxinias were very hard to cultivate, but I found that to be a great mistake. About two years ago I ordered a bulb, planted it in soil composed of well-rotted cow-pen fertilizer and common garden soil; after potting I placed it where it would get plenty of air and light, but not much sunshine for it is a plant that cannot stand the hot sun in summer. It will do well on your porch or in a north window. It has very showy foliage and a beautiful bloom; mine is a dark purple. In the fall, after the blooming period is over, the foliage will begin to turn yellow, quit watering and let the bulb dry off, then lift out, put in a paper sack and hang in a warm, dry place, where it will not freeze till spring.

The prettiest foliage plant I have is the Leopard plant, which has dark green leaves dotted all over with yellow spots. All wishing a showy foliage plant, try one.

I am a very busy woman, but I always find time to work with my flowers. I have about forty varieties, including perennials, lilies, geraniums of all colors, dahlias, cannas, abutilons, crimson amaryllis, lantana and ever so many more. One more plant I want to tell you all about, is the double yellow oxalis. My little plant fills the whole pot and is literally covered in blooms. I counted sixty-one open blooms on it the other day; it is the admiration of all who see it. I have been working with flowers for fifteen years and have learned a great deal from my own experience.

MRS. G. A. MARTIN.

VALLEY FALLS, KANS.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been a subscriber, off and on, for twenty-five years and have received so much benefit and encouragement from Uncle Charlie and Mrs. Wilkinson I will add my mite,—it may help someone.

In reply to Mrs. Marie Haggerty, would a person on a farm be expected to have the same patience and strength to bring up five children, with her housework to do, as one with one or two children?

Yes, they can have the same patience and I believe more than the mother with one or two, and sometimes I believe they have more strength. From my own experience I know I had. I am the mother of seven children, all living and healthy. I have four boys, all an honor to any mother, and three girls I am proud of. The boys are seven, sixteen, eighteen and twenty years old and the girls nine, eleven and thirteen.

We lived on a farm when they were small and I did my housework, sewing, washing, ironing, milked one cow, had a big garden, raised lots of chickens, put up fruit of all kinds, in its season, pieced quilts, crocheted, took a short nap every day, did quite a little reading, went to town every Saturday afternoon, to church every other Sunday and took all the children and I was happy and am happy all the time.

I taught my boys to cook, wash and iron and they help me now when they have the time. The three oldest work away from home. They give money for me to get nice clothes, cologne and fine soaps, a little pin or hair pins. They bring choice fruit and candies every time they come home, and I do appreciate it. They bring their company home, both boys and girls and the little ones bring children to play with them. I enter into all their sports. Just step in and we will show you that we have some fun.

My two oldest girls are good cooks; they make lovely bread, cakes and pies, can cook any kind of vegetable, meat or fruit you want. They wash their own clothes and do most of the ironing, and do it well. They make their aprons, crochet and embroider.

They all love their papa and mamma and we dote on them. They tell us where they are going, and kiss me before they go to bed or to town, even my big boys do the same.

I have always insisted on obedience and very seldom whip. I do not believe in it only as a last resort. I am rearing them as far as I can in the love of the Lord, and my neighbors and those I am very little acquainted with speak of them kindly.

We are poor people and all work for a living. My husband has not been well for four years and I have a goiter,—it affects my heart and nerves so I cannot work hard all the time. Our greatest trouble is debts brought on by sickness and at sixty dollars per month with rent to pay and the children to clothe we can hardly make ends meet. I don't worry and manage the best I can and trust God for the rest.

Mrs. Haggerty, Please don't whip those poor, little deaf boys. Just be patient with the children; they will repay you.

With love to Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters,

MRS. H. T. LEWIS.

KORN, OKLA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

May I join your club? I enjoy COMFORT so much. If some enjoy describing themselves through COMFORT I am sure there are a few that enjoy reading about them, so I say don't find fault with what others say or do as long as it brings them joy and does you no harm.

Why don't the dear grandmas put in a word once in a while, and then if they are sixty-five and not gray let them say so and if their hair is white tell us. I am sure there will be one that will enjoy reading it. I am and always have been a lover of old people and always try and make them comfortable. There is nothing sweeter to me than a good kind-hearted grandma. I have been called the old hen because I take so much interest and enjoy old people's company.

We have one little girl five years old this month; she is large for her age and is lots of help to me. I couldn't get along without her, she is so much company. We were married ten years when she came to live with us.

I can't agree with Mrs. Berta Wilson as I have lots of work to do but sometimes it is six months before I see a woman to talk to and I get hungry to see someone to chat with besides the men folks. I have hired men to cook and wash for and I raise turkeys and chickens, milk cows sometimes, when the boys are busy. I take care of the hogs so you see I have plenty to do and I get lonesome just the same. If all would read the poem, "Stand Aside and Watch Yourself go By," I am sure it would start them thinking. I help the shut-ins all I can. We can find plenty of such people to do little things for if we will look around, and we do not have to advertise either. I am ready and willing to help all I can; it doesn't take a fortune to make a bright smile flicker over a sad face. Remember sisters that just a few words if spoken right will accomplish wonders. Don't ever frown on one no matter how low or how high; it will gain you nothing. With love to all and many good wishes,

GERTIE MAY OGLE.

16 Morgan St., BINGHAMTON, N. Y.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

May a poor old cripple shut-in hitch her chair into your circle for a little while? I will only describe myself as a helpless old woman fifty-five years old, I have had rheumatism ten years, have not stood on my feet for over five years, my hands are badly crippled, I cannot even dress myself. I truly know what it is to suffer and I sympathize with all sick and suffering ones. I have two good sons, a dear kind daughter-in-law and one little granddaughter. I am dependent on them for everything. I read much as that is my only way of passing my time. I enjoy my letters and if any of the sisters will write to me I will answer as long as I am able. I enjoy reading COMFORT. I have read it many years. I admire and respect Uncle Charlie very much and I sympathize with him. I only wish I could bear my shut-in life bravely as he does his.

I too have read "Pollyanna" and I do try to play her game. Sisters, I want to tell you that you who are well don't know the good you do when you cheer us poor, lonely shut-in ones, or how a letter, a few flowers, or a book to read will brighten our dark days. God is good to me and I have great blessings to be thankful for. Wishing COMFORT success and praying God to bless you all,

MRS. LUCY MIDDOUGH.

RINGWORM.—Annoint several time a day with Castor oil.

TOOTHACHE.—Two drams of alum, powdered, and one ounce of nitrous spirits of ether; mix and dissolve and apply a little to the tooth and in the tooth. Applied frequently it generally stops toothache.—Ed.

BURNS.—Equal parts of olive oil and lime water, well mixed together and applied thickly will be found soothing as well as healing.—Ed.

BURNS.—Mix the white of an egg with lard and apply twice a day. Will prevent scar.

INEZ WILES, Whitetop, Va.

CURE FOR JAUNDICE.—Two ounces of barbary bark, the inner bark preferred and two quarts of water. Simmer slowly until one quart remains, then strain. Give a small wineglassful three times daily, between meals for two or three days.

Flax seed poultice is good applied to bunions. It takes out the inflammation.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

Slice pineapples before paring and the task will be much easier and much of the fruit saved.

To remove grass stains, dip the cloth in molasses and wash in clear water.

If moths get into the closet, saturate a cloth ten inches square with formaldehyde; place cloth in closet and close tightly for one day. This may be used, in smaller quantities, in chests, trunks, etc.

To keep meat in hot weather, remove the bones and place the meat in an air tight glass jar and set in a cool place, or it may be lowered into a well or cistern.

Heat lemons before squeezing and almost twice the usual amount of juice can be secured.

A large spoonful of turpentine put in the water when washing fabrics liable to fade, tends to preserve the colors.

In making starch, if a spoonful of salt and a little lard or wax is added, it will not stick to the irons and it gives a gloss to the clothes.

Common baking soda will clean dishes as well as a more expensive cleaner.

When silverware becomes tarnished from long standing, try this: Make a sponge as you would for bread from wheat flour and put the discolored silver into it; let it stand over night and in the morning the silver will have lost every trace of tarnish. When silver is to be put away for any length of time, sprinkle it well with wheat flour and it will not tarnish so quickly.

Gleason's Horse Book

520 Pages Fully Illustrated

All That is Worth Knowing About Training and Treating Horses

Premium No. 443

EVERY person who owns, handles or manages horses and all livestock keepers and breeders should have a copy of this great book because it tells about all the known methods of treating diseases of horses and other domestic animals—methods that are based upon the results of actual practice and not mere theory. It also contains Prof. Gleason's famous system of horse breaking, taming and training therefore, it is in reality two books in one and positively the most authoritative work of the kind ever published. There are in all 520 pages, many of them illustrated and dealing with the cause and cure of practically every disease known to horses, cattle, sheep, poultry, swine and dogs with the right remedies for each disease. Among the many subjects covered in Part 1 of this book are causes of diseases, how to observe diseases, treatment of diseases, Cerebro, Spinal Meningitis, distemper, dysentery, eye diseases, fistula, glands, internal diseases, kidney diseases, poisons, stomach and bowel diseases, worms and literally hundreds of other horse and live-stock ailments, which for lack of space we cannot enumerate here. In Part 2 of this book Prof. Gleason gives to the world for the first time his method of breaking and training horses and there are are also special chapters on how to buy, how to detect unsoundness, feeding, breeding, horse-shoeing, general care of horses, etc. Gleason's Horse Book is actually worth its weight in gold to every horse owner or breeder in the land, yet by special arrangement with the publishers we are enabled to give it away without cost to all who will accept the following

FREE OFFER. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you Gleason's Complete Veterinary Hand Book and System of Horse Taming exactly as above described free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 443.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks, the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

THRUSH.—I have a mule eight years old. Last summer he became lame in his left hind foot; pus discharged from the frog. There was a disagreeable odor. I used liniment and carbolic acid. This spring the front feet were affected. Can you tell the cause and cure for same? MRS. V. T.

A.—The disease is caused by wet and filth in the stable. Cleanse the affected parts and keep the stable both dry and clean. Pack calomel into the cleft of the frog and cover it with oakum to keep it in place. Renew the dressing once daily.

SICK DOG.—I have a Scotch collie dog, four years old. He was taken sick and failed to eat, and apparently became lame in the right shoulder and hip, gnawing his hip and shoulder and frothing at the mouth. At first the froth was white, then it turned to a greenish shade with an offensive odor. In the beginning he was very thirsty, now he can't drink and his mouth and tongue seem stiff and sore. MRS. N. E.

A.—Rabies is to be suspected in such a case and the dog should have been chained or locked up. The disease ends in death inside of a week and is incurable. Black tongue, a disease of dogs met with in the South, shows somewhat similar symptoms and also is incurable.

WARTS.—I have a beautiful six-year-old colt, that never was sick, but he has a large wart, or what appears to be a wart on his side, also one on fore leg, never sore, but no hair grows and they are rough and make ugly-looking spots. They are flat and about as large as a half dollar. H. A. S.

A.—It would be best to have the warts cut out and then treat as a common wound. If you cannot have this done smear lard around the growths and then wet them once or twice a week with dilute nitric acid applied by means of a flat stick.

SHRINK IN MILK.—Can you tell me of a good, harmless milk producer? I have a fine Jersey cow and last year she gave four gallons of milk a day until her calf was over nine months old. She freshened last January and now I don't get over one and one half gallons of milk. I feed the same feed and the same amount as I did last year. She is as fat as any beef cow I ever saw. I measure her feed and milk her night and morning. I give two quarts of cottonseed meal and two quarts of wheat bran and one half bushel of cottonseed hulls night and morning. Her calf died when it was three weeks old. Did it cause the milk to fall off? (2) What can I do for bowel trouble among calves? (3) What is good to keep flies off of stock? MISS N. G.

A.—The cow has fattened herself instead of making milk and too much cottonseed meal is the probable cause. Stop that feed and feed succulent green feeds and roots. Continue feeding bran and add such feeds as dried brewers' grains and gluten meal. The death of the calf would not have any effect upon the cow. (2) By "bowel trouble" we take it that you mean diarrhea (scours). For that give a two or three tablespoonful dose of Castor oil in milk and then give half to one teaspoonful of subnitrate of bismuth two or three times a day, as found necessary. (3) The commercial fly repellants will keep flies away, but you will have to use them once or twice every day.

STIFFNESS.—I have a fine Jersey heifer about eight months old. When about three and one half months old she began to show signs of being weak in the loins. She has no use of her hind legs and is stiff in the joints and cannot walk. The calf is not weaned yet. She is hearty and growing fast. MRS. J. E. E.

A.—Joint disease might be due to infection of the navel at birth or to tuberculosis. In some instances rickets occur, but the legs are distorted at the joints. Swab the joints with tincture of iodine two or three times a week and feed the calf generously. It might do better if weaned. To find out if tuberculosis is present the tuberculin test would have to be applied by a veterinarian.

CORNS.—Please advise me what to do for corns on mule's feet. E. D.

A.—Have the corns pared down thin, also have the heels lowered and the waalsat the sides of the heels (bars) cut down; then turn the mule out on low, wet pasture for two or three months. Once a month blister the hoofbeads of both fore feet, one at a time, with a mixture of two drams each of biniodide of mercury and powdered Spanish fly (cantharides) and three ounces of lard.

LAMENESS.—I have a mule eight years old. She has been lame in her right hind leg for two weeks. Her heel is cracked and there is a hole in the center of it from which pus comes. C. R.

A.—Standing in wet and filth may have caused the frogs to rot and possibly thrush also is present. Cut away all loose, rotten and underrun horn or sole and frog; then swab exposed parts with a 1-500 solution of corrosive sublimate and afterward cover with boric acid, cotton batting and a bandage. Renew the dressing once daily.

BRAIN DISEASE.—Will you tell me what ailed my three-year-old heifer? She was in the pasture when she began going around in a circle trying to bite her side. She fell over, still biting, and lived about half an hour after the attack. R. H.

A.—A clot of blood or effusion of serum or pus on the brain would be a likely cause of such an attack; or it might be due to apoplexy from heat or plethora, or to a lightning stroke, or acute indigestion. Similar symptoms also are seen in rabies, from the bite of a mad dog. It would be impossible for anyone to assign the exact cause without a post-mortem examination and investigation on the spot.

RINGBONE.—I have an eight-year-old horse which has ringbone and is so lame at times I can hardly use him. Is there a cure? L. H. DeS.

A.—If the ringbone is on a hind pastern the lameness may disappear if you have the ringbone puncture-fired and blistered by a qualified veterinarian and then tie the horse up short in a stall for a six weeks' rest. The operation should not be done in very hot weather. If you cannot have this done clip off the hair, tie the horse up short and blister the ringbone every ten days with a mixture of two drams each of biniodide of mercury and powdered cantharides (Spanish fly) rubbed up in three ounces of lard. If the ringbone is on a fore pastern unnerving will be necessary to remove the lameness. This operation cannot safely be done to a mule.

LAME MULE.—I have a mule that is lame in left hind leg. He doesn't show any signs of lameness while at moderate work, unless leg is thrown in an unnatural position. He has been this way five months. MRS. J. H. E.

A.—The mule probably interferes at the times mentioned and if so an interfering boot should be put on the ankle. An examination would be necessary to determine the exact cause of lameness in such a case.

FLEAS.—Please give me a remedy to destroy fleas on puppies. E. D.

A.—It is customary to kill fleas by dipping the dogs in a solution of coal tar dip made according to directions given by the manufacturer. It also is necessary to provide the dogs with clean beds and to repeat the dipping at intervals, as found necessary. Pyrethrum powder may be dusted on the coat of a small puppy and proves fairly effective.

DEPRAVED APPETITE.—What is good for cows that eat old wood and boxes? Quite a number of our cows are doing that, chewing old sticks or bones. What is good for them? (2) We have a horse that has the heaves. What is the best remedy for it? F. R. A.

A.—Indigestion is present when a cow has a depraved appetite and it sometimes is due to tuberculosis so that always it is well to have the tuberculin test applied by a graduate veterinarian. Feed mixed rations including wheat bran. The cows crave some missing ingredient of a complete ration. Mix ground bone or phosphate of lime in the feed once daily, allowing a tablespoonful at a dose and increasing the amount and number of doses if found necessary. (2) Heaves is incurable; but the distress may be relieved by feeding on grass in summer and wet oat straw in winter in preference to hay; never working the horse soon after a meal and not feeding any bulky feed at noon when work has to be done. Give half an ounce of Fowler's solution of arsenic night and morning. Tallow will do no permanent good.

SNIFFLES.—My rabbits sneeze and there is a discharge from the nose. Some of them are quite thin. Is their flesh good for food? J. G.

A.—Rabbits and Belgian hares are much afflicted with this disease which the owners term "sniffles" or "snuffles." It is a contagious disease and most often present in overstocked hutches and among rabbits that have been weakened by in-and-in breeding and lack of exercise. In some instances we have found the disease to be tuberculosis and never have we found it profitable to treat. The meat is quite unfit for use. It would be best to destroy affected stock and start with new, strong, nonakin stock allowing them large, clean hutches and runs.

SICK COWS.—I have three cows that have the same symptoms. They did well at calving, but when the calf of each was about eight days old each cow quit eating and seemed weak in hips,—had staggers and appeared to be blind. They became constipated and lost flesh. J. G.

A.—Do not breed from such cows. They should be tested with tuberculin as it is quite likely that they have tuberculosis. The test should not be applied in very hot weather and a graduate veterinarian should be employed for the work. Depraved appetite often is present in tuberculosis or in indigestion from improper or inadequate feeding and causes the cow to eat bones, earth or other foreign bodies. The free feeding of wheat bran sometimes stops the trouble. Feed mixed rations and add a tablespoonful of precipitated phosphate of lime once daily and increase to two doses a day, if found necessary.

Comfort's League of Cousins

mind and soul hunger. Before you can have brain hunger, you've got to have a brain and vast numbers of human beings have only apologies for brains because they were born as millions are, of brainless parents. These men have been wronged all through the ages. Education denied to the masses, has been the carefully guarded privilege of the few. If education had been universal and if men had been Christ-like instead of hog-like, the people of two thousand years ago would be as advanced as we are today. Every age has produced great men, men greater in many respects than those we are producing today, but the hogs saw it would be dangerous if knowledge were scattered broadcast, so it wasn't spread. A great deal of the best knowledge is still considered dangerous, and half the world is whispering under its breath what it dare not say publicly. As soon as men do begin to read and think and start to disseminate real vital knowledge, everything is done to discredit their teachings because a little knowledge is dangerous and a whole lot of knowledge is still more dangerous. We find our big billionaires today pensioning our university professors and teachers, building universities, and by their millions, influencing education as thoroughly and completely as if they themselves wrote the text books from which the students are taught. There is a preposterous idea abroad that if all men were educated no one would do the dirty work, but science will free us from drudgery and make all work a joy. Men are what they are because they haven't had a chance to be different. It's the rule of gold instead of the golden rule that dominates the world. It is hard to find any human act that is not prompted by selfishness. Men as a class are not willfully lazy or willfully ignorant. In the Pittsburgh steel mills, men work twelve hours a day, seven days a week—thousands of them. Shall we punish them because they do not read, or scorn them because they do not think? There is a cause back of every effect, but people don't look for causes, they are too superficial—they only look at effects. It's no good doctoring a man for a cold, if you are going to make him stand all day in a draught. Get him out of the draught which is the cause, and the cold which is the effect will disappear. Educate all men and give them time to read, and give them things to read that will make them think, and they will think. Some will think more than others, because some through the ages have had more opportunity than others. Each individual should be able to pass on to his son or daughter or both, more than his parents passed on to him. As knowledge and education spread, the illiterate man will disappear, and the men who now storm saloons will storm libraries. The men who read will not only read and think, but they will think right, and thought isn't any good unless it is right thought. Probably no class in the world does more thinking than the criminal class, and it requires a lot of thought to know how to successfully rob a bank. That thought is misdirected thought. Most thought is misdirected, and that is largely due to the fact that the majority of men seldom get hold of any real, worth while literature—literature that develops right thinking. A certain party once said that he didn't care who made the laws of a nation as long as he wrote its songs. For my part I would not care who made the laws or wrote the songs, if I could direct the reading of humanity for a few years. Don't worry my dear friend about the man who will not read, and the man who will not think. In a few years these benighted folk will have passed away, and in this nation you will find not one who cannot read, and in a generation after that not one who cannot read and think, and think correctly, and by right thought I mean unselfish thought, That thought is coming and it will leaven the earth. I believe I have made a lot of you do some of that kind of thinking and the fact that I have is largely due to another fact and that is that I have never wasted any of my precious time reading and passing on to you second-hand machine made literary dope that is specially prepared to paralyze and eternally put to sleep the think boxes of those who waste their time voting for Mr. Rockefeller's party one year or the party of Messrs. Ryan and Belmont the next.

POLO VERDE, ARIZONA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

This is my third attempt to write to you and the COMFORT cousins. I expect Billy the Goat ate the other two letters, but I will try again. There is nothing like trying is there? I am eleven years old and go to school. I am in the sixth grade and I walk a mile and one half to school. I wish you were here to enjoy the warm and delightful Arizonian climate with us. We often have flower picking parties and go two or three miles from home. We usually get many kinds of beautiful flowers. I can help do housework. I can sweep floors, iron clothes, sew and do fancy work. I can play the piano. I am assistant organist in Sunday school. The organist is at Sunday school all the time and therefore I don't get to play very often. Papa, mamma, and I belong to the Baptist church. Papa is assistant supperintendent.

Uncle Charlie, what do you think of a girl who wants to be a preacher? I want to be one. Please don't let Billy the Goat eat this letter, but tell her to correct mistakes. Hoping to see this in print. I remain, Your sincere niece, IONE GRAY.

You see, Ione, persistence has won for you a place in our columns at last. As you say there is nothing like trying. If you fail you have the satisfaction of knowing that you did your best. Nobody however should try to do impossible things. Round pegs should never attempt to fit into square holes. Millions of people ruin their lives by attempting the impossible. People sometimes write me red hot letters calling me over the coals for discouraging would-be writers, poets, artists, etc. They have an idea (poor foolish things) that it is cruel to discourage anyone from doing anything, no matter how foolish their self-imposed tasks may be. Thousands of lives are thoroughly and completely ruined by stupid, unmerited praise, but no life ever could be marred by merited criticism and needed rebuke. There are in New York City at the present moment not less than fifty thousand country people who are wasting time and money attempting the impossible. They have been sent here by the foolish praise of hen-brained friends and dough-headed relatives. Mary Jane squawks three notes at a church entertainment and her friends knock the callous off their paws applauding her, and Mary Jane's ma is so tickled to death at Mary Jane's success in the squawking business, that he mortgages the home and sends her off to New York to have a vocal plumber at five dollars a clip try and convert her into a prima donna. The vocal plumber jollies her along and gets away with the bacon. When the family is completely busted friends and relatives are levied on and the vocal plumber gets away with more easy gravy. A little later the local newspaper in its sassiety column announces that Melba, Homer, Gluck, Farrar, Terfrazini and Mary Garden, were all so jealous of Mary Jane's shrieks that they paid the manager of the Metropolitan Opera House a million dollars to keep her off the stage. A year later you find Mary Jane is married to Bill Snooks the "well-known and prosperous young business man" and has temporarily at least shelved her ambitions of becoming a prima doughnut. The artistic bug is a disease of youth just as are measles and whooping cough. Sensible people get over it without going to New York and bankrupting their friends. Others spend all their lives cussing fate for not having given them the chance that would have made them truly great. Real talent needs no encouragement, it will find its mark but don't be crazy enough to mistake mediocrity for genius or real ability. Genius will do a lot of starving and suffering, but eventually it will get there. This world needs efficient people to do practical work. I can tell with half an eye when there is real talent and I never discourage those who have God-given gifts. Remember though, I am not a literary bureau, and do not examine, criticize and report on manuscripts

NOVELTY CUTLERY CO., 76 Bar St., CANTON, OHIO

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S HOME LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

Mrs. J. H., Missouri.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that a son-in-law, or a daughter-in-law has no intestate rights in their father-in-law's estate, except that upon the vesting of the real estate, or an interest therein, in the children of the man who died, such children cannot by voluntary deed convey their interest in the real estate without the signature of their respective husbands or wives to the deed of conveyance; we do not think the husband or wife of the child who predeceased the man owning the property has any rights in such man's estate.

W., Ohio.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that in the absence of an express bargain or contract to the contrary your brother is not entitled to anything from your father's estate as pay for services performed by him for your father during his minority.

Ellen D., Washington.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that mortgages are generally made to secure promissory notes, and that in cases where there is no express agreement and no separate note or agreement given for the payment of the money the remedy of the mortgagee is confined to the property mortgaged, and he could not proceed or enforce his claim against any other property belonging to the debtor.

S. S. D., Ohio.—We are of the opinion that the laws of both Indiana and Illinois require that a license to marry be procured by the parties to the marriage before a marriage ceremony can be legally performed.

J. S., West Virginia.—Under the laws of Nebraska, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a man, leaving no will and leaving no widow, child, descendant, issue, parent, brother nor sister his estate shall descend to his next of kin in equal degree, excepting that where there are two or more collateral kindred in equal degree but claiming through different ancestors, those who claim through the nearest ancestor shall be preferred to those claiming through an ancestor more remote.

Mrs. J. M. D., California.—In a proper case and acting under a proper appointment or designation, we think a probation officer can legally compel his ward to report his or her conduct to him, and could report or turn such ward back to the court for punishment in case such ward refused to obey him.

A. E. W., Montana.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that a married woman has no right in her husband's property during his lifetime, except that he must support her and that she has an inchoate right of dower in his real estate; we think he can, by will, bar her from all interest in his estate, except dower, but that upon his death intestate she would receive an interest in both his real and personal estate, the exact proportion depending upon whether children were left and the number of them; we think both parents have material rights to the custody and control of the children, and that in cases where the parents are legally separated or divorced the custody of the children is a question for the courts to decide taking into consideration as to just what disposition would be for the best interest of the children.

W. M. M., Tennessee.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of a man, leaving no will and leaving no widow, child, descendant, parent, brother or sister, and if his property was acquired by him, his personal estate would go to the relatives nearest in blood to him in preference to those of more remote relationship and that in personal property there is no representation among collaterals after brothers' and sisters' children.

J. D. M., Texas.—Under the laws of Louisiana, we are of the opinion that children or their descendants may be disinherited by will for any one of a number of specified causes, but that except for such specified causes they are forced heirs and are entitled to receive a certain portion of the deceased estate called their "legitime"; community of the acquest and gains, if there be no stipulation to the contrary, exists between husband and wife and upon the death of one leaving issue and no will the surviving spouse is entitled to one half of such community in his or her own right and takes the income of the share of the deceased in the community inherited by the issue; this income ceases if the survivor enters into a second marriage.

Z. F., Tennessee.—We think it will first be necessary to discover the identity of the person who is writing you the scurrilous letters, after you do this we think you should complain to the postal or your local authorities; perhaps if the practise is long continued it might be well to complain at once.

Mrs. M. B., Texas.—Under the laws f your state, we are of the opinion that all real and personal property owned by the wife at the time of her marriage, together with all acquired thereafter by gift, devise or descent and also the increase of all such lands, remain her separate property, and she is entitled to the whole management of the same; except that she cannot dispose of the same without her husband joining in the conveyance; but that all property acquired during the marriage, except in the manner above described, is considered the common or community property of the husband and wife, and during the marriage may be disposed of by the husband without the consent of the wife.

Comfort's League of Cousins

to oblige anyone. That is the work of a literary bureau and you'll have to put up good money for the services they render. I'm not in that line of business, I'd starve if I were. Ione, I'm somewhat startled to hear that the organist is at Sunday school all the time. I thought a Sunday school organist would only be at Sunday school on Sunday. A Sunday school that lasts all the week is a new one on me. Think of the poor man or the poor girl blowing that organ seven days a week. They say every day will be Sunday by and by, but I didn't know that every day was going to be Sunday here and now. Sunday school is awfully nice, but I don't think I'd care to have it every day of the week all the year round. I'd want to go home and eat and sleep once in a while. You tell that organist Ione, to quit this all the time Sunday school and give you a chance to do your little stunt. If you have any oratorical gifts, a gas tank full of slang, a megaphone voice, a convincing manner and a real desire to uplift humanity and improve the condition of the masses physically and spiritually, you've just as much right to be a preacher as a man has. I should like to see at least half our pulpits occupied by women. Good-looking girls in the pulpits would be about the only way you could get boob men to church. Churchianity is a dismal failure. There are seventy million people in this country who never see the inside of a church, and yet there are some people foolish enough to call this a Christian nation. Don't however, Ione, attempt to be a teacher until you have thoroughly demonstrated your ability to preach. The world needs good preachers. Be sure you are a good preacher or don't attempt the job, as not one preacher in a hundred has a real message, to give to the world, and not one in five hundred, if he has the message knows how to get it over. You've got to put a punch into your work to succeed at anything. It's the punch that Billy Sunday puts into his work that pulls the crowd. Not many are after religion, but they do like to see a man who is in real earnest, and listen to a man who isn't afraid to tell the crowd what he thinks, and very few ministers dare do that without losing their jobs. You must always remember (thanks to our folly and indifference) that this is neither a real Republic nor a genuine Democracy. In this country money controls, and where money controls, the people have little to say and if they dare to say anything they are not listened to. A minister starts out with the best intentions in the world. He intends to do to graft and sin, privilege and wrong what David did to Goliath, or as Billy Sunday puts it "soak him between the lamps, hit him on the coco and send him to the mat for the count." But the young minister finds he must first be sure of his living. Here's where economic determinism as the sociologists say comes in. The minister has to live. For him there is no such thing as independence, because others control his job, and those who control your job control your bread; and those who control your bread control your life. Those are unpleasant truths but no one can refute them. Then too, your young minister marries and soon has a wife and family to support. These responsibilities still further increase his dependence and sober his thoughts. After preaching a few real live, radical sermons and putting a punch in his talks, discussing wrong and abuses right here in the United States, to the huge delight of the more progressive element in his congregation, and to the consternation and disgust of the local mill or factory owner and other big employers of labor—child labor at that—he is quietly informed by the wealthy pillars of the church that hereafter he must attack wrong in the abstract and not in the concrete and confine himself to the musty doings of the Hebrews and other ancient folk and cut out the United States and "stick to Mesopotamia and other Biblical lands." The minister's very soul rebels. He wants to fight, but he finds if he does he will stand alone and starve alone. He is poor, his family must have bread, his sympathizers have neither money nor influence, and his clerical superiors are conservative and stiff necked. They despise radicalism. With them, too, it is Mesopotamia and five thousand years ago or nothing; for as many a minister has told me above all else "we must keep the organization going," and the organization can only be kept going with money, and it is the wealthy reactionaries who hold the purse strings. Now Ione, you know what you are up against, if you want to be a real minister. I know some of the greatest churchmen in the U. S. and what I have told you comes from their lips. Now you know why the church is losing its hold on the masses. Its message has to be filtered through tainted dollars ere it can reach the crowd.

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a 15-month subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

League Shut-in and Mercy Work for September

Wright St., Greenville, Texas. Invalid. Would like cheery letters and postal cards.

Here's your chance to do good. Remember all you are put on earth for is to do good, and the only worthy way to do good for yourself is to start and do good for others. You'd hate to have anyone call you a hog, but you spend all your life looking after yourself, and that's exactly what a hog does. Try and be human. Help these poor souls and you'll be more than human, you'll be divine.

Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

Uncle Charlie's Souvenir Picture Book

A Chance to Visit Uncle Charlie in His Home

IT will, I am confident, be a great pleasure for the millions of admirers of our friend, Uncle Charlie, to know that at the urgent request of a great number of those who are interested in him and his work, he has gotten out a souvenir picture book which shows him and his devoted workers in various scenes of their home life.

You see the outside of that famous chicken coop of his, up the steps of which more letters have been carried than probably to any other living human. Then from the inside of his room you see the big bay window from which he gets a tiny peep at the great world beyond. Then there is a wonderful picture of his room and of the dining-room adjoining with Maria serving tea to the Goat and an ex-Goat.

There are several pictures that show Uncle Charlie on the narrow cot on which he has lain for nineteen years, with his faithful nurse and bewitching Billy on either side. Then there are two pictures which, unless we are mistaken, will cause profound interest. One shows Uncle Charlie sitting in a chair for the first time in nineteen years and the other (and this surely will interest) is a picture of Uncle Charlie with his only son Herbert, now in his 23rd year, by his side. Uncle Charlie was keeping this little secret for his biography.

There are also pictures of Uncle Charlie in his youth; also as an actor, an Indian, a soldier, a vested chorister; pictures of the college where he received his education and of the grand old church he attended as a boy and a faded picture of the noble mother who gave him birth, also picture of some of his famous and charming Goats.

The photographs have been made by the greatest operator in New York, Charles Albin, of the Press Illustrating Service, and are about six by eight inches in size. The half tone cuts which are the finest made are printed on thick, glossy heavy coated paper.

The book is beautiful and artistic, as are all Uncle Charlie's productions, for he is a lover of the beautiful and if you secure this book you can visit his pretty little home almost as thoroughly as if you were with him in the flesh. Two thousand of these handsome, artistic picture albums have been struck off. The cost of producing them has been exceedingly heavy.

Uncle Charlie's birthday is on the 25th of September, and his picture book is a worthy souvenir of this memorable event, and best of all it can be obtained by our readers without cost of anything more than a little trouble. Send in a club of two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at only 25 cents each and Uncle Charlie's Picture Book will be mailed at once, postpaid. Here is your chance to obtain a beautiful souvenir of one whose life is devoted to the cause of humanity.

Send the subscriptions to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and you will receive the book direct from Uncle Charlie, by mail. This is his venture; he has published the Souvenir Picture Book at his own expense and I pay him for all that are used as subscription club premiums. If the entire edition goes quickly there will be a small profit in it for him. Two subs at 25 cents each, 50 cents in all, gives you the book.

Our readers will surely prize such a souvenir of this wonderful man whose masterful will power sustains his spirit in a weak and helpless body while carrying on his great work for the betterment of the world.

W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

A Corner for Boys

By Uncle John

WELL boys, I am back again, after a summer's absence. But I have not been idle. Most of my time was spent planning things for you to make during the coming winter and fall. How are all of you after the heated period? I sincerely hope that each of you has had a proper share of pleasure and of work. One is quite as essential to happiness as the other. Honest toil gives one a keen appetite for enjoyment, and play, in turn, gives a zest for work. The great lesson in life is to learn to enjoy your work, to sense the outcome of it, to see, as it were, the flower, while planting the seed. You can do this if you try. Look about you. This is the month of September. It is called the harvest time, the season of fruition, of compensation, of fulfillment. The earth has plentifully yielded up the things we need. All over the land a gigantic miracle is in progress. If, in some distant country, at a certain witching hour, the ground would open and pour forth fruits and flowers and vegetables, how wonderful it would seem. How the people would flock to that land to see the great mystery. How they would fight and scramble to get a big share of the good things. The weak and the sick would suffer and go hungry, unless great, strong, generous men rose up to take their part. At the present time, in a sort of way, greedy men and sets of men are struggling to get all the resources of the earth. In our own free country, wrongs are perpetrated and unnecessary suffering permitted. We need many strong men to right those wrongs. The present cries for them, the future demands them. If you intend to do your part, begin to prepare yourself, heart and soul, body and mind. Useful work is the best training I know of. It will give you a strong body and enable you to think clean, noble, orderly thoughts.

A Shoe Tree

The picture accompanying this article is a shoe tree which will prove to be a great family convenience. It will firmly hold shoes of any size while they are being shined. Three main parts are used in the construction. They will be referred to as the wall piece, the swinging arm and the bent steel rod. Fig. 3 shows all parts properly assembled and gives required measurements. A seven-inch piece of sound, tough scantling ripped to a width of two and one half inches is to be shaped into the wall piece. Draw a bisecting line lengthwise on the center and lay off a point on it one inch from the top and another one inch from the lower end. Bore a one half inch hole at each point. Insert the blade of the coping saw in one hole and saw on the center line till you reach the other hole. Saw across grain at right angles to the first cut, at top and bottom and thus loosen out the block which will measure on the face five inches by one and one quarter inch. This cutting might also be done with a common hand saw and wood chisel. The end of the swinging piece which engages with this wall piece is five inches wide and dressed down enough to swing freely. Its rear edges, five inches in length, are rounded with a plane or knife to provide clearance for sidewise swinging. On the upper two-inch edge bore two one quarter inch holes. The first, bored at a good slant, is started three inches from the free end and comes out at a point, on the under side, two inches from the end. Start the other hole from the top, placing the spur of the drill on a point one and one half inches from the center of the slant hole. A springy steel rod, one quarter inch in diameter is bent to the right shape and the ends forced down through the holes, as shown. Such rods are used for braces on the under part of farm implements, and you can probably find one in the scrap corner. It should be twenty inches long and preferably have thread on each end. The toe piece, "a" in Fig. 4, and the heel piece, "b," are whittled out of pine and bored to receive the ends of the rod. The holes should be one and one half inch deep and as large as the shank of the rod, which means that part of the threaded section that would remain, if you filed the thread down smooth. The thread must sink into the wood in order to hold fast.

The wall piece is screwed to the outside of the house near the kitchen door and the swinging piece is hinged to it by inserting it in its natural place and driving a wire nail down through the top and another up from the bottom, of the wall piece, through it and into the swinging piece. A bolt running the entire length may be used. In either case holes are first bored to prevent splitting.

When not in use the holder can be swung flat against the house. It should be about waist high. Put the shoe on, toe first, pushing back hard enough to let the straight end go down in the heel. The tension of the springy rod will hold it firmly.

Stilts

A pair of stilts made according to the method suggested by the diagrams herewith attached will be extra strong and lasting. The poles are two inches square and eight inches long. The lower ends are tapered a little, as shown in Fig. 3. Tough, hard wood like ash, hard maple or hickory should be used. Fig. 1 is a plan of the foot block. It fits into a notch in the pole and is firmly held by two bolts, one four inches long, the other five inches. They are one quarter inch in diameter and the holes that receive them are the same. Grease the bolts and they will slip in more easily. The black piece on top of the foot block, marked "a" in Fig. 1, is a strip of rubber intended to minimize the danger of slipping. Fig. 2 is a front view of the pit or mortise which receives the inside edge of the foot block.

Perhaps some of my readers will be able to work out a good way to give the stilt spring or resiliencey. I would be pleased to hear of such a plan or of any other idea that you think could be used in this department. If in need of any special information concerning anything run in the Boys' Corner, you may write, enclosing stamped, self-addressed envelope.

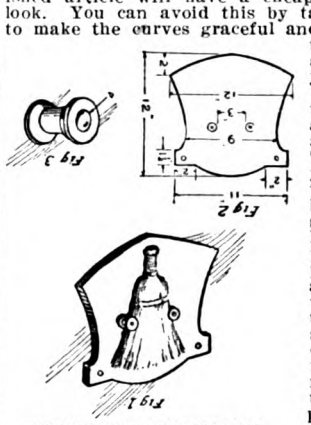
A Button Tree

One of the queerest trees in the world is a species of palm caled "tagua". It grows chiefly on the Pacific coast of Ecuador, Colombia, Panama and Central America, and produces an ivory-like nut which is manufactured into buttons. Tagua buttons are in general use all over the world, for Ecuador alone exports more than $2,000,000 worth annually. The tree grows from ten to twenty feet high and at the base of the leaves bears a cluster of nuts resembling cocoanuts. Each nut contains seeds about the size of small potatoes, hard, fine-grained, milky white and very much like ivory. They are called vegetable ivory and serve as a good substitute for the elephant's tusks which are scarce. They are easily shaped and readily absorb dye of any color. Some of the larger ones are made into umbrella handles, chessmen, hatpin heads and other small ornaments.

The "taguaros," who gather the nuts pole their canoes up stream into the dense, public forest, build rough shore cabins, and weave baskets, each to contain two hundred pounds of button fruit. Working in pairs, they fill the baskets and carry them to the river bank, sometimes a distance of miles. When they think they have enough, they build a raft out of a very light, cork-like wood called "balsa." Upon such a raft, the season's harvest of the gatherer, sometimes as much as ten tons, is floated to market. The "taguaros" are very poor and barely manage to eke out a living by their strange pursuit.



Do Flowers Sleep?

Scientists tell us that night is the time of repose for the vegetable kingdom as well as for men and most animals. The common daisy closes up its blossom in the evening and opens its "day's eye" to greet the early beams of the morning sun. The dandelion has a longer work day, for it opens at five or six in the morning and remains so until nine in the evening. Many plants are so sensitive that their leaves will close during the passage of a cloud. The morning glory seems to have a dislike for bright sunshine. One must be about quite early to see their gorgeous blossoms expanded. The crocus, four o'clock, tulip and many others close at different evening hours. Whether or not the actual process of growing is suspended, we may be sure that some restorative change occurs, perhaps a renewing of cells like that which takes place in the human body. While there are many plants which do not appear to sleep at night, it is certain that some change comes over them, too subtle perhaps to be detected. Nature has a way of taking care of her own, and the bright dew of the morning is in truth, a delicious drink which she distills for the elfins of valley and wood and glade and hill. Also, as there are night birds and animals, so there are plants that bloom only at night and others whose blossoms give off their fragrance at night to attract the night-flying insects.

A Whisk Broom-Holder

I hope you will find time to make this neat and serviceable whisk broom-holder. It will please the older members of the family and may induce them to aid you financially in adding to your tool kit.

Although extremely simple in design, if each part of the holder is not carefully made, the finished article will have a cheap and amateurish look. You can avoid this by taking great pains to make the curves graceful and uniform. With the aid of plates and round objects of different sizes, mark out the design you are to follow on a piece of paper. The more time you spend at it the better it will be. When fully satisfied with it, lay the paper pattern on your piece of wood and mark around the edges. Now use your compass saw, but never cut on the line, for that leaves no chance to true up and finish properly. Saw outside the line, and, in smoothing or trimming with knife and sandpaper, cut to the center of the line.

USEFUL AND SUBSTANTIAL.

For material choose a piece of oak or black walnut. It is very likely that the attic holds a discarded table leaf or old bed end that will provide just what you want. Yellow pine, finished in dark oak stain, is very handsome. The piece to begin with is fifteen inches across and twelve inches high. All other dimensions are shown in Fig. 2. The spools which hold the broom in place are fastened to the main part with round-headed screws, for which holes have been previously bored. Similar round-headed screws, in each upper corner, hold the holder permanently to the wall. To finish, brush on two thin coats of dark oak or walnut stain and then two of varnish, allowing one day between each coat. Take care to have the spools as dark as the other part.

The Value of Books

Books are the registers of other men's thoughts. It is through them that we are enabled to enjoy intercourse with superior minds. Nowadays, this valuable means of communication with the world's greatest thinkers is within reach of all. In books, men give us their most precious thoughts; they pour out the longing of their souls; they explain and make clear for us what they have discovered or proven to be true, after years of patient study and experiment; they spread before us the richness of their fancies, the delicacy of their imaginings; or, after garnering accounts of others' great deeds, they sift and winnow and arrange and collate them for us. Milton and Dante, who, in imagination, visited Paradise are outside your door waiting to be asked in to tell their marvelous story. Shakespeare, who sounded the depths of the human heart, is ready to converse with you. Others, just as great, are praying for leave to enrich your mind with their practical wisdom. Whatever your favorite subject maybe, there is an authority on it. They are willing to be consulted and their fees are small. Indeed books of the best intellectual quality are so cheap to day that you need not long seek companionship in vain.

A Riddle

She washed her hands in water
That never rained or run,
And dried them in a towel
That 'was neither wove nor spun.

Answer

She washed her hands in dew and dried them in the sun.

A Hoop Roller

The younger readers of this department will find the hoop-rolling device pictured here, easy to make and practical to use. It consists of two parts; a handle, and a crosspiece fastened to the end thereof. The dimensions of each piece are plainly marked in the drawing. When I was a boy, the liveliest and most prized kind of hoop was the discarded steel rim of a buggy wheel, and as these are rather heavy, I have planned the roller to be extra large and strong. For a wooden hoop, lighter and smaller pieces may be used.

THE BOYS' DELIGHT.

The first part of the work is to square up the corners of the twelve by four inch piece of board which is to form the end. Next mark out the curve, using some round object like a saucer or tin can, to aid in getting it uniform. It may be sawed with a compass saw or whittled out with a knife. The ends of the curve are two inches from the corners of the board. At the crown or highest part, it is two inches deep. The half mortise in the end of the handle is two inches long and seven eighths inches deep. It is cut with a saw and finished with sandpaper. Two screws are used to fasten it to the crosspiece. To prevent splitting, bore a hole for each screw. The hand hold or grip is whittled round and rubbed smooth with sandpaper.

The device is used to steer or propel the hoop by running along with it held in the position shown.

Before bidding you good by, I want to give you a bit of advice about making things. The quality that ranks highest in importance is good, old-fashioned patience. Proceed carefully with each step of the work you are doing and the result will be satisfactory. If any real difficulty arises, I will be pleased to help you conquer it, but, I believe the directions given, cover every point of construction. Next month I will have four or five plans suitable to the season, and I will try to make them even better than this month's. Until then, good by, and good luck.

The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

Musquito, Grady, Ala.—As you never feel well except when you are eating and for a short time afterwards, did it ever occur to any of the doctors whom you have consulted to diagnosticate your case as tapeworm? If not, suppose you have yourself examined for tapeworm. If that is it, the rest is easy.

Mrs. L., Palatka, Fla.—The stomach noises which embarrass you are quite common and usually result from poor digestion forming gas which rumbles internally. It is more common among women than men as the tight dressing of woman a bund the stomach interferes with the digestive functions. A glass of hot water containing half a teaspoonful of cooking-soda will frequently relieve in mild cases. But in some cases it is very stubborn and will require the attention of a physician. Diet yourself for a few weeks and take the hot water and soda whenever the noises begin. If not relieved, consult a physician.

B. K. A., Bryan, Texas.—Dental surgery can accomplish almost anything with the teeth these days and much might be done with the resetting those of your lower jaw, though a complete change might not be effected. We advise you to let a good dentist examine your teeth and get his advice as to readjusting them. If he is in doubt about getting good results, you had better let them remain as they are. You can't afford to sacrifice comfort and use for the sake of appearances.

Mrs. O. S., Moody, Ark.—You have let your little girl suffer nearly all her life with catarrh and now her ears are so bad that she will probably become deaf and you say the doctors you have tried have not done her any good. How much have you tried them? Catarrh is very common and in your part of the country especially so and if your doctors know anything at all about diseases they know about catarrh. They may not be able to cure it in that climate, but they can relieve it and if you had given your child proper treatment at the beginning she would not be in her present condition. Advice in print and by guesswork is worse than useless and you must have a doctor and let him do the best he can, unless you are willing for your child to be a sufferer as long as she lives. Other COMFORT parents with sick children make a note of this.

C. C., Caney Spring, Tenn.—A young man of seventeen or eighteen who is five feet ten inches in height should weigh one hundred and fifty-four pounds. (2) The climate for consumptives is where the air is dry and Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico and the North Carolina and New York mountain regions are held to be the best. (3) You have waited too long already with that throat of yours and unless you see a doctor at once it will be in such condition that all the doctors together can't do any good. Why have you waited four years, suffering more or less all the time?

Daisy, Fresno, Cal.—Your food that now all goes to fat will go to muscle and strength if you will take proper exercise and plenty of it. Eat lean meat only, and no sweets or starchy foods and drink no tea or coffee. The operations you have undergone have affected your nerves and time will be required to bring you to normal condition.

U. S. B., Scales, Cal.—Worms in children are, usually, not serious and they are rather the result of a low condition than the cause. For their expulsion give the patient a cathartic, such as citrate of magnesia, and after it has operated give, on an empty stomach, a teaspoonful of the fluid extract of senna and spigelia, which is the recognized specific for round worms. As it is believed that the worms are from eggs which are taken in drinking water, it will be wise to see that the patient drinks pure water, boiled if necessary.

Mrs. B. E. H., Milburn, Okla.—Pellagra is a disease which appears to have come to this country from Southern Europe and its character is not yet fully known. It was thought at one time to result from the eating of corn in which there is a fungus growth, but that is doubted now. It is neither leprosy nor bubonic plague, and is not supposed to be contagious. When it has once got a fair start it is very difficult to treat successfully and patients suffer with it for years, and often die from it. The government has been making extensive investigations into its origin and treatment and much has been done in ameliorating its ravages. Write to Dr. Rupert Blue, Surgeon-General Public Health Service, Washington, D. C., for detailed information.

H. G., Quinton, Okla.—After a cold, noises in the ears are quite the common thing, indicating a catarrhal condition of the mucous membrane of the ear passages. Taking quinine may remove them and may not, as you discovered. If they are only slight, the better way is to forget them, as they are not amenable to ordinary treatment. If, however, they are annoying and there is any pain, you must have a physician examine your ears and prescribe the proper treatment. If it is any satisfaction to you to know it, we may tell you that the great majority of people at times have the same sort of trouble with their ears that you are having.

H. A. A., Ashmoor, Mont.—A great many people have what they think is catarrh and which will develop into catarrh, but it is due in many instances to obstruction of the nasal passages such as we judge you have. It is a growth in them which you should have a doctor examine and remove. The operation is disagreeable, but not at all dangerous and when the passages are opened up for free breathing we believe that your general health will at once improve, and your catarrhal symptoms will disappear. You have fifty years to live before your three score and ten is reached and the older you get the greater will be the growths in your nose, finally closing it entirely. For that reason have the doctor examine it at once and operate when necessary. We are guessing at conditions and we may be wrong, but it will do you no harm to have an examination made, because something is wrong and it should be righted.

Mrs. R. M., Foard City, Texas.—The sharp pains in your husband's breast muscles are neuralgic and about all that can be done for them is external applications of liniment, chloroform liniment being the best, we think. Apply it on a cloth, holding the cloth over the part that pains, and removing it when it feels like blistering, for it will blister. Tablets of salicylate of soda are helpful, five grains three times a day for two or three days, but not continued as they are bad for the stomach. The muscles of the inside of the chest are affected as well as the outside and this is called myalgia. These diseases are nervous and thus far the physicians have not been able to do a great deal for them. Dampness and cold should be avoided as much as possible.

Blue Eyes, Waterbury, Conn.—The red nose you have is a natural condition of the blood circulation there and you can't do anything for it, except to ignore it. You think about it all the time and imagine it is redder than it is and that makes it redder. Worry about something else, if you must worry, and give your nose a rest.

C. P. S., McCoysburg, Ind.—The itching of your arms and face is from sensitive nerve terminals on the skin and if you will rub your skin night and morning with cocoa butter—to be had by the pound at drug-stores—we think you will find very considerable relief, if not complete cure. It may be used oftener if you need it and is excellent for the skin. For the warts use lunar caustic—buy a stick for a dime at a drug-store—touching the warts with it once a day and be careful not to let it touch the surrounding skin as it will burn and make a sore.

V. C. M., Genet, Ky.—When a frost bite, and a good many people have them, has been neglected for so many years that it has become a running sore it is almost time to go to a doctor with it and have him treat it as it should have been treated in the beginning. Such neglect as this is inexcusable and when an incurable sore results nobody is to blame except the neglectful person. Many people think that frost-bite is nothing much, but the experience of those who have had real frost-bite is wholly to the contrary.

S. D., Orange, N. J.—To the best of our knowledge and belief fishing and close contact with fresh water would not have a bad effect on a man suffering with ulcerations of the stomach. However, he would have to take his meals regularly and exercise proper care of his diet, as most fishermen do not.

H. D. M., Brashear, Texas.—Nature has her own way of carrying out her plans and if she intended that you should not perspire, or perspire very little, as she does with a great many people, it would be injurious for you to take anything to force perspiration. Exactly as it would, if you did perspire, and took something to stop it. What you must do is to talk to a physician who can ask questions and learn what treatment is necessary. We think your health would be better, if you dieted and reduced your flesh. An active woman should not carry an excess of weight.

B. R., Pattonsburg, Mo.—Babies are often born with physical peculiarities which they outgrow and we think your baby, whose arm is not active now, will come around all right in a few months. The fact that it can use its fingers indicates that the trouble is not permanent. You might have an X-ray photograph taken of it, if that would quiet your worry, but we hardly think it would do much good. Talk to your own doctor who brought the baby into the world and take his advice.

Mrs. L. M., Beaverton, Mich.—The lump on your neck is not a cancer, nor do we think it is a wart. We think it is one of the usual lumps that happen to everybody and you have been picking at it and disturbing it until it has become almost a running sore. Try a salve on it composed of diachylon ointment one ounce and vaseline one ounce. If that does not cure it in two or three weeks, have a doctor examine it.

Western Girl, Kooskia, Idaho.—The bad taste in your mouth and the bad breath are due to poor digestion, which thus far has not developed into positive indigestion, or dyspepsia. You are young and now is the time to realize that your health depends upon what food you eat and how you eat it. Be regular at your meals, don't eat what does not agree with you, though you may like it, and never swallow a mouthful of food until you have chewed it to a pulp. By a little attention to your eating you will be saved a lot of suffering and have very good general health.

Minerva, Tucson, Ariz.—The hardening and thickening of the nails is a very common result of tetter (psoriasis) and it may be remedied, or cured, by treatment with arsenic in some form. Arsenic, however, is a dangerous poison, and you must have a local physician prescribe it for you, according as the needs of the case may be.

M. M., West Point, Miss.—For a torpid liver take one quarter of a grain of podophyllin night and morning for three days, eat sparingly and take open air exercise every day with deep breathing. The liver is charged with a good many offenses of which it is entirely innocent. Give it a fair chance and it will make good.

M. D., Sarles, N. Dak.—If you had some real trouble you never would think about your skin turning red when it is touched, but as you are perfectly well you do just as everybody else does who is well, that is, you want something to be the matter with you. Probably your skin is a little over-sensitive, but as long as it is painless and practically normal, don't bother about it. Bother will start the nerves going and by and by you will have a case of eczema or something worse.

Anxious, Allentown, Pa.—An alcohol bath is good for tired feet. You can also get at drug-stores proprietary preparations which are very good. (2) It doesn't make much difference whether you mix the peroxide and ammonia or not, the amount of superfluous hair it will remove will be about the same. Ordinary ammonia will answer.

The Modern Farmer

him a name in his community for progressiveness and thrift. The dairy cow bred up by successive top crosses of pure blood returns larger yields of milk or butter and her calf sells for more money several times over than the scrub. The graded horse looks far superior to his scrub brother, yet he costs no more to raise and sells for much more when the time comes to market him. He works better if he is intended for heavy draft work, trots better if he is of that kind and taken in every way is an improvement over his common bred companions. It need hardly be said that the improved breeds of sheep are superior to the scrub kind that were once kept for the purpose of clearing land of brush and weeds. It is a fact that well-graded sheep furnish a quality of meat that everyone can enjoy as compared with the bad tasting stuff which once brought mutton into bad repute in this country. Of swine the same things may be said and looked at from every possible point of view it becomes apparent that it will pay to improve farm stock by infusing the blood of pure-bred animals of recognized breeds.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and paste them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming, but it is hardly reasonable to expect us to waste valuable space in answering the same questions month after month for the benefit of those who need not have asked the questions if they had read and remembered the answers which we had previously printed.

Questions and Answers

SWEET POTATOES—PEA VINE HAY.—I am planting quite a lot of sweet potatoes this year and hope to get a fairly good price for my earliest ones but after they get plentiful they will be worth but little here as most people are trying to cut the cotton acreage and are planting quite a lot of potatoes and other food stuff. Now if we could bank or house them without much expense so we could keep them from decaying until spring we could realize a better price for them. I would appreciate it if you would advise me when to harvest and proper methods of housing them. (2) Another subject, I think, would prove interesting and profitable to the farmers of this section is when to cut and how to cure pea vine hay in order to save both leaves and peas.

H. W. F., White Hall, Ala.

A.—Sweet potatoes should be planted so that they will not mature too early. If they are to be stored they will not keep so well in warm weather. They require a moderately cool and very dry place for storage and should be harvested with great care not to bruise or injure them. They must be provided with free circulation of air. For this purpose it is necessary to store them in rather small bins made of slats. Of course they should be carefully protected against freezing. When first standing they should be kept at a temperature of about 90 degrees F, to drive off the moisture while going through the sweating process for two or three weeks. When thoroughly kiln dried the temperature should be gradually reduced until that of about 55 to 60 degrees is reached. The store house should be held at this temperature. (2) Pea vine hay should be cut about the time the peas are well formed. At this time the plant contains a maximum amount of easily digestible food material. These vines may be cured like Alfalfa, under caps or wilted, piled in small bunches and left to cure naturally for two or three days, when they may be turned over, dried for an hour or two in the sun and then hauled to the mow.

HOW TO SLIP LAVENDER.—Will you kindly advise me how to slip lavender and at what time of the year to do so for replanting? I have two beautiful plants which were given to me and am very anxious to raise it quite extensively. MISS C. E. H., Anacortes, Wash.

A.—Lavender is best propagated from cuttings of one season's growth with a heel of older wood. Set these three or four inches apart in moist soil, shading them to prevent evaporation. The cuttings should be taken after the plant has had a rest, that is during the dormant period, and set in early spring.

LIMA BEAN CULTURE.—I have under cultivation five acres of lima beans and being my first year, I would like to know how I may realize the most money out of the same. I have heard many complain regarding the pests on this plant, also cultivating in wet weather. Any information I may receive on this matter will be appreciated. R. D. K., Benton Harbor, Mich.

A.—Lima beans are of two types,—the bush and the pole beans. The pole beans must be supported to do well. Beans should be cultivated much like corn. The two pests that afflict them most are bean rust and weevils. Rust must be avoided by planting clean seed that has been disinfected with formaldehyde and may be controlled by use of Bordeaux mixture, as described elsewhere. Bean rust is spread from plant to plant by cultivation when dew is on or in wet weather. Weevils cannot be controlled when once in. They are carried forward from year to year in the seed. Weevils in seed beans may be killed by use of carbon-bisulphide, as explained in former number of COMFORT.

BEAN RUST.—Can you tell me what is the matter with my garden? I cannot raise string beans, they come up and then stand still and the stem and root are all rust spotted. I have put lime and salt on but it does no good. MRS. H. S., Pottstown, Pa.

A.—Your plants are doubtless affected with bean rust (Anthracnose.) This is caused by using diseased seed. Remedy. Use only hand-picked seed from which rusty beans have been rejected. Treat this clean seed with formaldehyde solution, one part formaldehyde to 400 parts of water. Soak in this solution for ten minutes before planting. Plant on disease-free soil. On growing beans that show rust, spray with Bordeaux mixture three or four times two weeks apart. Do not cultivate while beans are wet with dew or rain as this spreads the disease.

CORN MIXES.—Please tell me whether or not the cutting of the tassels from corn would prevent it from mixing. W. K., Point Marion, Pa.

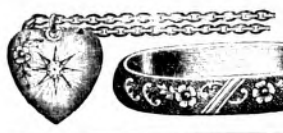
A.—Corn is a cross fertilized plant. Pulling the tassel before the silks appear forces corn to mix rather than prevents it, for this reason: If seed is to be produced, pollen from the tassel must fall upon the silks. If the tassel is removed the pollen must be obtained from other plants. This forces crossing.

QUACK GRASS AND OTHER WEEDS.—How can I get rid of quack grass? I have six acres of it. (2) How can I clear my field of wild oats and mustard?

C. L. B., Hastings, N. Dak.

A.—The field should have been plowed very shallow in the hot weather of July to dry out the roots and stems and then should have been plowed very deep as soon as rains allowed. While waiting for a chance to plow deep the quack grass should not be allowed to come through the surface. The field should then be worked to a crop like corn, or potatoes next season and kept perfectly clean by cultivation and hoeing. If you cannot do this better work the field without a crop for an entire season, never letting the quack grass come through and next time seed to corn. (2) Land will have to be cleaned of wild oats and mustard in the same way and then you will have to be careful to use clean seed. Mustard may be killed by spraying with a sulphate of iron solution, but a special spraying machine would have to be used.

SMALL FLIES IN CELLAR.—How can I get rid of the small flies that infest my cellar? I have tried various methods without success. The cellar windows are screened and I can't imagine how they get in.



MRS. A. J., Forest Jct., Wis.

A.—Mix half an ounce of formaldehyde in a saucerful of water and place on the window-sill. Often these little flies are introduced on plants, vegetables or fruit. Pyrethrum powder, burned on a shovel with the windows closed, also would kill them. Sticky fly paper on the widow-sills would help.

ABNORMAL CREAM.—What can be the trouble with my cow when the milk will hardly turn and when the cream is churned it swells up and sometimes runs over? I don't get any butter when it is that way.

MRS. J. R. N., Terrell, Tex.

A.—The cow is not to blame in a majority of such cases, still it would be well, on general principles to give her a pound dose of epsom salts in three pints of lukewarm water administered slowly and carefully from a long-necked bottle and afterward to mix in her feed twice daily a tablespoonful of granular hyposulphite of soda. Change the feed. If you are feeding cotton-seed meal or hulls stop that feed and let her have green feed, roots, hay and wheat bran adding some corn meal. Bacteria in the milk utensils are often the cause of churning troubles so be careful to perfectly scald, cleanse and sundry all milk vessels. You will also have to cool the cream and have it at the right temperature and degree of acidity at churning time. Ask your state experiment station to send you a free bulletin on butter making.

Panne Satin Petticoat

Given For Three Subscriptions

THIS is one of the best bargains we have been able to offer this season. These handsome latest style colored skirts were actually made to retail for $1.50 but owing to financial difficulties the manufacturer was obliged to sell them at a greatly reduced price. We were very fortunate in getting hold of exactly one hundred and twenty-nine dozen of them and while they last will distribute as free premiums among our readers. They are made of finest quality mercerized panne satin which has all the sheen and brilliancy of the highest grade satin. The deep flounce is trimmed with four rows of cording and a 4½ inch knife plaiting. They are well made in every respect with finished seams. We have them in colors of mahogany, orange, green, king blue, American beauty, tango and navy blue and in sizes from 36 to 44. Remember the value—a regular $1.50 petticoat—when you read our offer below. And also remember that when our small stock is exhausted we shall withdraw this offer because it will be absolutely impossible to secure any more of the skirts at such a low price. When ordering be sure to specify size and color wanted.

CLUB OFFER. For a club of three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you one of these fashionable high-grade panne satin petticoats free by Parcel Post prepaid. Re sure to mention what size and color you desire. Premium No. 7223.

Sister: Read My Free Offer!

I am a woman.
I know a woman's trials.
I know her need of sympathy and help.

If you, my sister, are unhappy because of ill-health, if you feel unfit for household duties, social pleasures, or daily employment, write and tell me just how you suffer, and ask for my free ten days' trial of a home treatment suited to your needs. Men cannot understand women's sufferings. What we women know from experience, we know better than any man. I want to tell you how to cure yourself at home at a cost of about 12 cents a week.

If you suffer from women's peculiar ailments causing pain in the head, back, or bowels, feeling of weight and dragging down sensation, falling or displacement of pelvic organs, causing kidney and bladder weakness or constipation and piles, painful or irregular periods, catarrhal conditions and discharges, extreme nervousness, depressed spirits, melancholy, desire to cry, fear of something evil about to happen, creeping feeling along the spine, palpitation, hot flashes, weariness, sallow complexion with dark circles under the eyes, pain in the left breast or general feeling that life is not worth living.

I INVITE YOU TO SEND TODAY FOR MY FREE TEN DAYS' TREATMENT

and learn how these ailments can be easily and surely conquered at home without the dangers and expense of an operation. When you are cured, and able to enjoy life again, you can pass the good word along to some other sufferer. My home treatment is for young or old. To Mothers of Daughters, I will explain how to overcome green sickness (chlorosis), irregularities, headaches, and lassitude in young women and restore them to plumpness and health. Tell me if you are worried about your daughter. Remember it costs you nothing to give my home treatment a ten days' trial, and does not interfere with daily work. If health is worth asking for, then accept my generous offer and write for the free treatment, including my illustrated booklet, "Women's Own Medical Adviser." I will send all in plain wrappers postpaid. To save time, you can cut out this offer, mark your feelings, and return to me. Send today, as you may not see this offer again. Address

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

M. G., Charlotte, N. C.—You cannot paint violets around a picture and color the picture properly unless you have had experience. Many persons cannot do it right after years of practise. To do it right is Art and Art is only for those who are born to it. Allowing that you could do the work to get the materials would cost you more than it would cost you to have an artist do it, if he understood that you prized the picture and could not pay much to have the work done. Some artists would make no charge at all.

Mrs. J. H., Waverly, Tenn.—We hardly think a woman, with grown childen all married and supposed to be able to care for their mother, would be eligible to a pension in any state where there was a widows' and mothers' pension law. The state is willing to help widows and mothers who have no one to depend upon, but it feels under no obligation to support widows and mothers with children whose duty it is to support them.

L. S., Bellevue, Iowa.—At last accounts the Liberty Bell was on its way to the San Francisco Exposition, but when this appears in print it will no doubt be again in Independence Hall, Philadelphia. The bell was cast in London for the State House in Philadelphia and was placed there in 1752. It was cracked in being tested and was recast in 1753. It rang out the message of the Declaration of Independence in 1776 and for fifty years thereafter it was rung on special occasions until it cracked again. This crack has never been repaired and the bell for ringing purposes is of no value. But as a landmark of liberty it is precious to the people of this country and thousands go to see it in Independence Hall every year where it stands on the original timbers that supported it in 1776. It was taken to the Chicago Exposition in 1893 and in 1915 went to San Francisco. On each occasion its journey was an ovation all along the route. The bell as cast weighed 2,000 pounds and cost $500 at the foundry.

E. S., Bee Creek, Ill.—Don't attempt to write for publication until you know enough about newspapers and magazines to know which of them use short stories. Read the papers and the magazines and inform yourself of their requirements, then when you know where to send your pen products you can send them to editors and find out what they will do with them. While you are learning these things you will also learn that a copying pencil will not do to write for the press. Other COMFORT readers with literary aspirations please make a note of this.

O. D., Granite, Okla.—Some years ago the government issued a Horse Book which caused considerable comment. Whether it is still in print and obtainable you can learn by writing to the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. As we recall, it was not a free book. While asking for the Horse Book, ask for any other literature on the horse the Department may have for public distribution. Most of this departmental literature is interesting and valuable, whatever the subject may be.

L. F. S., Brownsville, Minn.—The Arizona, the latest U. S. warship launched, we believe, is the largest fighting ship afloat, but England leads all nations in the number of big ships. The United States is third in naval power, being inferior to Great Britain and Germany, and Japan is fifth, France being fourth, Russia is sixth, Italy, seventh and Austria-Hungary, eighth. At the beginning of the war Great Britain had 96 submarines, Germany 39, France, 93, Japan, 15, Russia 43, Italy 20 and Austria-Hungary, 14. The United States had 58. What additions have been made to the foreign fleet of undersea vessels is not known, but Germany is doing more with hers than all the others.

Mrs. G. B. W., Reedy, W. Va.—As you understand debt, the United States is not in debt to any other nation, though it is a debtor nation, or was until the European war put it in line to become a creditor nation. The government debt question is too complicated for anybody to understand, but an expert in finances. The net government debt Oct. 1914, was $1,961,752,997.48.

B. W. A., Dunn, La.—Unless you feel that you were born to be a barber, don't select that as your life work. There is not enough glory or gold in it to justify years of effort. There used to be a barbers' training school in Cincinnati, but we do not know whether it is in operation or not. We know of none in New Orleans. Most barbers learn their trade in the shop, which is the best place to learn it.

Jack, Auburn, Ga.—The fairy story of Cinderella and the Glass Slipper is of unknown origin, but was current in Germany as early as the sixteenth century. It is believed to be of Eastern origin as a similar story comes from Egypt several thousand years ago. There are numerous versions of Cinderella and it is known in every language of Europe. The glass slipper should not be glass, however, but fur slipper, the mistake resulting from the substitution of the word verre meaning glass, for vair meaning fur. The mistake probably grew out of telling the story, not writing it, as vair and verre sound much alike in pronouncing.

F. C., New Milford, Pa.—Don't try to sell your old furniture to dealers, or any other antiques you may have. Dealers risk so much in handling antiques that they cannot afford to pay much for them. They get good prices when they sell, but sometimes they don't sell and always they have to wait for a buyer. Your best plan is to find a collector and the way to do that is to advertise whatever you have in your nearest city newspapers, or in some of the art journals—Arts and Decoration New York, for example. It may cost something, but you will more than get it back in the price you receive above what a dealer would pay.

X. Y. Z., Callas, Va.—The leading papers of Dallas, Texas, are The Dispatch, The News, The Times-Herald, all daily. In addition there are some forty odd publications in the weekly and monthly class. Too many for us to mention.

Mrs. B. C. Y., Essex, Mo.—There is no sale for the Lincoln number of The New York Herald at more than current rates. (2) Give up the idea of trying to raise pearls by putting shot in the shells of fresh water clams. If you have shells a plenty you might get something for them from the button manufacturers, but you couldn't raise pearls enough in a thousand years to trade for a calico dress.

Mrs. C. P., Spencer, Iowa.—Iowa has a widow's pension law but as you are not a widow, though your husband is unable to support you, we doubt if you would be eligible under its provisions. You will have to consult some one of your local lawyers or officials.

L. L., Horse Guards, Can.—Petrified wood is very common and unless you have a very unusual specimen it is of no interest or value to scientists. You might give it to your local library if you have such an institution, or to some college geological collection near you. We would suggest to COMFORT readers who find natural specimens of various sorts that they could not do better with them than to give them to the nearest college, or large school, most of which have collections of this sort and would appreciate such specimens.

L. P., Chattanooga, Okla.—To get the address of any soldier write to Secretary of War, Washington, D. C., giving full name, regiment and company and location when last heard from. A letter sent to him with his company and regiment would probably find him in the Philippines, but it is surer to get the address from the Department.

CUBBY BEAR Meets the Dreaded Moose

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"PLEASE, Cubby Bear, will you do an errand for me this morning?" called Mamma Bruin, from the doorway.

Cubby Bear looked up from his play.

"Oh, yes," he answered willingly; "where do you want me to go?"

Mamma Bruin always asked politely when she wanted Cubby Bear to do things for her, and so Cubby Bear was more willing to do them.

"Go to Dr. Squilly Porcupine, and ask him how to make the cough syrup that cured Grandma Bear's cough last winter. I have forgotten what was in it. Then get what he tells you to, if you can, and bring the things to me. Take a little basket to put them in. Perhaps you can get one of your friends to go with you."

Cubby Bear started out with his little basket, and called at Chirpy Chipmunk's tree. Chirpy was not playing anywhere in sight.

DR. SQUILLY PORCUPINE

"Chirpy!" called Cubby Bear. "Are you at home? Chirpy Chipmunk,, I want you!"

Two bright eyes peeped out at Cubby Bear. "Tell me what you want quickly, so I can go back again to the very bottom of my house! I am not going out today."

"Why not?" asked Cubby. "I wanted you to go on an errand for me."

"No, no!" answered Chirpy. "Go back home, Cubby Bear, and let the errand wait. It is not safe to be out."

"But why?"

The bright eyes looked about fearfully. "Come nearer," said Chirpy. "A great, fierce creature is in the forest! He has terrible horns and big, big hoofs, and would think nothing of crushing us all into the earth. His voice can be heard for miles and miles!"

Cubby Bear looked troubled. "Who told you?" he asked.

"Foxey Reynard."

"Perhaps Foxey may be mistaken," Cubby said. "I must do my errand, anyway!"

So he went on, until he came to Bunny Rabbit's house.

"Bunny Rabbit!" he called.

"Who is there?" asked a frightened voice from within.

"It is I, Cubby Bear! Open the door."

The door was shut and locked after Cubby Bear went in.

"I wanted you to go on an errand with me to Dr. Squilly Porcupine, and take the babies in their little cart."

"No, no!" cried Bunny, with a shiver. "I shall not take my babies out today. Run back home, Cubby Bear, where you will be safe. A great, fierce creature is in the forest! He has terrible horns and big, big hoofs, and would think nothing of crushing us all into the earth! His voice can be heard for miles and miles!"

"But who is he?" asked Cubby. "I never heard of him."

"Mr. Big-horn Moose," answered Bunny solemnly. "Hush, Baby Bunnies, do not make a noise, or he may come and get you!"

"Who told you?" asked Cubby Bear.

CHIRPY CHIPMUNK

"Foxey Reynard told Busy Beaver, and Busy Beaver told me."

"Well, good by," said Cubby Bear sadly. "I must go alone."

He saw no terrible creature in the woods, and reached Squilly's home in safety.

"My cough syrup has cured many forest people," said Squilly, "and ought to be used by men and women. It is a pity they do not know about it, but they speak a different language, and could not understand. You must get the topmost twig from a little fir-balsam tree, a pawful of Balm-of-Gilead buds, some gold-thread roots, a few wintergreen berries, a small piece of the inside bark from a tamarack tree, and ten grains of sand from the bottom of the Big Brook. Tell your mother to boil them all together in water from the time the moon comes up in sight until it is straight overhead in the sky."

Cubby Bear said this over many times, until he was sure he could remember.

"I would like to have you come with me to find the things, if you please," said Cubby Bear, rather timidly.

"No, no!" answered Squilly, in haste. "Not today!"

"Are—are you afraid of Mr. Big-horn Moose?" asked Cubby. "Have you heard that he is near?"

"I am not afraid!" answered Dr. Squilly, frowning angrily. "I am never afraid—but I am busy today, and it is not wise to be careless if there is danger about. I have some gold-thread roots and Balm-of-Gilead buds here which I will give you," he went on, "and you can find the other things without trouble."

Cubby Bear went slowly on his way, looking for a little fir-balsam tree—looking, also, for a great, fierce animal.

By and by he found the tree, and setting down his basket, tried to think how he should get the topmost twig. It was far beyond his reach.

FOXEY REYNARD

"I must climb the tree," he said, "and bend it down with me."

He climbed carefully, and when he was half way up, the tiny tree bent over with his weight. But before he could seize the topmost twig to break it off, the little tree straightened, leaving Cubby on the ground, with the top as far out of his reach as ever.

Again he tried, but fell, and hurt his nose on a sharp rock.

"I shall not cry," he thought, "and I must keep trying until I get it."

"Poor little bear!" said a kind voice, but it was a strange voice, and Cubby Bear looked up in fear.

A large animal stood close by. An animal with great horns and hoofs. It was—oh, it must be—Mr. Big-horn Moose!

Cubby Bear wanted to run away, but was too frightened to move. He did not notice at first how graceful and beautiful were the branching horns, or how soft and gentle the large eyes.

"Poor little bear!" said the kind voice again. "That was a bad fall. Why do you try to climb a little tree like that?"

"Tell me first," said Cubby Bear, who was not now so much afraid, "did you come to our forest to crush us all under your big hoofs? And do you get so angry that your voice can be heard for miles and miles?"

BUSY BEAVER

"I did not come to hurt anyone," answered Mr. Big-horn Moose sadly. "Why are you all afraid of me?"

"I am not afraid now, I think, at least, not much," said little Cubby truthfully. "I would not like everyone to be afraid of me. And your eyes and your voice are kind. I would like to be your friend, Mr. Big-horn Moose."

"That is good," said the big animal gladly. "I will never hurt you, Cubby Bear, and perhaps the time will come when you will be glad to have me for a friend. Now tell me what you were trying to do, and I will see if I can help you."

Mr. Big-horn Moose was so tall he could easily reach the little tree's topmost twig, and he broke it off for Cubby Bear.

Together they found a tamarack tree, and while his new friend was getting a piece of the inside bark, Cubby picked some wintergreen berries which grew near by.

"Now ten grains of sand from the Big Brook!" cried Cubby gleefully, "and that will be all! I will tell Busy Beaver, who lives by the brook, how you have helped me, and then he will not be afraid. It is not pleasant to be afraid."

But when they came near the Big Brook, it was only to see Busy Beaver plunge into the water and swim for his home. He only hurried the faster when Cubby called to him.

Little Cubby Bear got the sand from the bottom of the clear stream.

"Now, Mr. Moose," he said, "you must come with me to my home, where Mamma Bruin will be glad to give you some dinner."

Mamma Bruin was not afraid of Mr. Big-horn Moose, and Cubby Bear had a happy day with his new friend, who went away when the shining sun said good night, but who promised to come again.

"I must tell Chirpy Chipmunk, and Bunny Rabbit, and all my friends how kind and good Mr. Big-horn Moose is," said Cubby Bear. "I am sorry they are so frightened. It makes them unhappy."

BUNNY RABBIT

"Yes," said Mamma Bruin. "All the little forest people might have been working and playing happily today out in the warm sunshine, instead of shivering with fright in their houses. There was nothing to be afraid of—it was only what they thought. Almost always, it is not danger that makes us unhappy—it is just being afraid without any reason. Remember that always, my little Cubby Bear, and be brave. See, now, the light in the Eastern sky, where the moon is coming up. Put more wood on the fire, Cubby Bear, for the cough syrup must be put on to boil. Tomorrow you may take some of the good medicine to poor little Polly Partridge, who is sick."

New Mesh Purse

Given For Two Subscriptions!

THIS is the new "Fish Scale" mesh purse with gate top and a ten-inch wrist chain, made throughout of German Silver, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. You can have one of them free by taking advantage of the following

CLUB OFFER. For a club of two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you this handsome and stylish German silver mesh purse free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 7362.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

WELL, well, my dears and cousins all, the summer is over and here we are with the first month of the autumn. My, but doesn't time fly? And the more years you number the faster they seem to fly. You are too young to notice it now very much, but by and by you will. Still, the years go by just the same and if you fill them with good deeds and happy spirits it matters little how fast they speed, or how slow. I hope all of you had a perfectly lovely summer, and I wonder how many of you lost your hearts. I'm sure some of you will be asking me about it before very long. And now I'm to stop talking and go to work.

The first letter I open is from Blue Eyes of Gonzales, Texas, and she is in much trouble because the young man told her he loved her and said if she loved him she would let him kiss her. She didn't think so at first but he persuaded her and she let him kiss her. Now he doesn't come to see her any more, but is kissing another girl. I don't think I am very sorry, because I have so often warned all of you against just such young men as this one is and if you won't listen to me, I don't see why I should be sorry. Of course, Blue Eyes can do nothing except to learn to beware next time and I sincerely hope she will.

Baby Doll, Kingsville, Texas.—It's all right to love a soldier, but don't marry him until his time is up. Three years of army discipline should make very good husband material of him. You are both young enough to wait until he has completed his service.

Brown Eyes, Anthon, Ia.—If you like the man well enough to marry him, even if your family don't like him because he is too "talky," having no other bad habits and being a good worker, I think you should marry him. You are the one to be suited in marrying, not your family. Besides, a man who is "talky" is ever so much more company than one of these silent and stupid ones. They are simply awful to live with always.

Puzzled, Staten Island, N. Y.—Some day, maybe, the right man will come along to touch your hitherto hard heart, but if he should not, then you were born to be a suffragette.

Troubled, Brodhead, Ky.—When a fifteen-year-old girl is so pestered with beaus that she doesn't know what to do, she should ask her father to use his boot on the entire bunch of them. Or her mother might use a broomstick. Try either of these and let me know the result.

Texas Girl, Merita, Texas.—It is good to be a Christian girl, my dear, and to have faith, but I don't think the good Lord will send that young man to you who drinks and gambles and if you are praying for him to come back I would advise you to stop your prayers. Why do you want the Lord to send you a man like that? If you think you can reform him, stop thinking that, too. Why not love and marry a decent man? Some of you girls make me positively weary.

Just-for-fun, Venus, Nebr.—You are not cranky, but unusual. Most of the cousins would have been writing to me about falling in love with that stupid schoolteacher, and worrying about him. You have acted very sensibly and I wish to congratulate you. I think though, that while the teacher may be stupid and slow in some ways, his wish to have the pupils acquire a better knowledge of physiology, anatomy and hygiene is commendable.

Bob and Billie, Texasam, S. Dak.—If it is true love the marriage will be a happy one, but nobody can possibly know whether it is true love until it has been tried for many years. (2) Why should you ask me if it is right to accept the attentions of one man when you are already promised to another? Are you so dull of conscience that you have to be told what is right?

Slick, Live Oak, Texas.—Don't worry about him and that will make him worry about you. Why don't all of you girls learn this great truth in managing the young men?

Blue Eyes, Newark, Texas.—My dear, my dear, don't ask me about beaus until you can do it correctly. In your letter of twenty-eight lines there were thirty mistakes of grammar, spelling, punctuation, and capitalizing, not to mention the poor penmanship done with a pencil. You live in an intelligent community, too.

Constance, Rochester, Minn.—As he did not answer your letter or your card, do you think he would be any less neglectful if you wrote again? As he does not want to write to you, why annoy him with your attentions? Do you think that will make him like you better?

Dimples, Norway, Kans.—If a girl thinks a young men is good enough to take her home, I suppose she might also think he was good enough to kiss her good night, but it seems to me that before a great while every young man in town would have kissed that girl. Of course, if you like such promiscuous kissing, I can't help it. (2) As to a man's making education the first requirement in seeking a wife depends on how much education the man has. Some men who have been quite successful in business don't seem to care at all for education. In my opinion a certain amount of education is as necessary as food and clothing. I am glad you are sticking to your school, but why do you write it "pardner?" Look in your dictionary.

Gray Eyes, Geary, Okla.—You and your sweetheart are so young and sincere in your love and it is a long time to wait to be married, so I will give my consent to his kissing you, but it must not be oftener than once a week and only one kiss. That makes fifty-two a year, and isn't fifty-two kisses enough for anybody?

Brown Eyes, Willard, Mont.—Certainly, if you have only friendly feelings for the young man, you shou d tell him not to come West to see you expecting anything else. To deceive him is dishonorable. (2) Your mother is mistaken in saying the evening is not the proper time for a young man to call. If he works during the day, as most do and all should, the evening is the only time he has to call. I should think your mother would not want young men to call on you who hadn't anything else to do during the day but go to see girls.

Lonesome, Neponset, W. Va.—Where there is every reason to believe, as in this case, that your letter has failed to reach him, it will be perfectly proper to write again. At the same time, if he were as true as he said he was, he would not have let all these weeks go by without writing, even if he had not received a letter from you at his new address. I'm afraid he doesn't want to hear from you.

C. B. R., Lodi, N. Y.—Unless your health makes it impossible to continue at school, don't stop. Just now education is worth more to you than anything else except health. You can't ever be a stenographer without it.

Lonesome, Jamestown, N. Dak.—You are making a serious mistake in marrying at sixteen because you are afraid if you don't get this man you never will get one. You had better never marry than to marry with no higher motive than that. It is marriage of this kind that makes for so much unhappiness and I most earnestly urge you not to marry until you are four or five years older and don't marry at all, if you are marrying for no other motive than to have a man support you.

Patience, Pocahontas, Tenn.—Why not marry the one you can be happy with, even if he does drink and is otherwise no good. You say you love him and don't love the good man and what else is there to do but marry the one you love? After a while when you are paying the price of your folly, you will wish you had done differently, though you won't believe it now.

There, my dears, all of you are answered who asked questions for me to answer and I haven't scolded any at all, hardly, have I? Isn't it nice not to scold or be scolded? Isn't it nice to be nice, anyway? Now that everybody is happy you may run along and have a good time while you are young, but be careful not to have so good a time that you will be sory for it later. I don't know why anybody does that, but lots of people do. By, by.

COUSIN MARION.

great deal of commercial fertilizer has been used on the land where they run, they may have eaten up a quantity of it.

V. R.—For the new method of feeding turkeys, please refer to COMFORT for last March.

A. G. M.—My chickens have the feathers off their necks, some just in front, others all around, some almost to the breast. One evening I noticed a hen crouching on the ground. She tumbled around and could not use her legs. The next night I found her dead. I enjoyed your article on turkeys. It has been helpful.

A.—The hens are suffering from the effect of vermin. Clean and disinfect everything inside the chicken-house, and powder the birds every third night with Dalmatian or other good insect powder, being careful to rub it well into the feathers, especially the fluff under the thighs and underbody. Rub the bare places with carbolic vaseline or lard and sulphur. The hen that died in the spring had peritonitis, which is an inflammation of the membranes covering the lower bowel, and is a fatal disease in poultry. One-grain opium pills will ease the pain and quiet the bird, but seldom effect a cure. Thank you for your appreciation of the poultry department.

E. H.—Being a reader of COMFORT, and liking it very much, will you tell me what is the trouble with my pigeons. They get a large lump in the neck and cannot eat, and vomit a greenish fluid. They have a looseness of the bowels. They cannot fly, sometimes cannot walk. They sit in a corner and peck around the neck and after a day die.

A.—The pigeons are suffering from canker. Too much cracked corn or white wheat is the most frequent cause, but dirty houses and water dishes will also cause it. The best cure is to let the birds out on free range for two or three weeks; putting a little ground ginger and powdered alum in their drinking water will ward off canker, but cleanliness and a variety of grains is the best prevention. Always use red wheat for pigeons.

A. G. S.—I have two hens which have lost the use of their legs and yet their combs are red and they sing and seem lively. One of them tries to walk but her toes are all doubled up, so she hobbles. The other one was taken with falling on her head and gradually grew worse. Is there a cure? What is the cause?

A.—Please read answer to A. G. M. in this issue.

J. C. R.—I have one hundred chickens from two to two and one half months old. Twenty-five of them are nearly naked. They eat very little but drink a great deal. About one half just droop around. This has been an unusually wet summer. I keep the old hen up till the grass is dry, but the little chickens run out in the wet grass around the coop.

A.—I imagine that the breeding stock from which the eggs came hadn't been given sufficient animal and vegetable food during the winter, and so the chicks hatched from their eggs were wanting in constitutional vigor, and then your method of feeding them has not helped, and of course the wet season has complicated matters. Keep the chicks in until the dew is off the grass in the morning. Feed nothing for the first thirty-six hours; then hard-boiled egg, chopped fine, and mixed with sharp sand and wheat bran. Feed four times a day just what they will eat up clean in five minutes. After the first week commence to feed chick-feed, but continue the mash twice a day, adding ground oats, corn, wheat and wheat bran, moistening the whole with sweet milk. Mix only as much as you can use at one time, as it sours very quickly. After the second week you can replace the egg with finely chopped liver or commercial beef meal. Pot cheese and clabbered milk are also very good food for young chicks.

R. J. M.—What is the matter with my chickens? At first they drooped around, their combs became pale and their droppings very thin, white with a greenish tinge. I lost several in this way.

A.—The hens show symptoms of canker or roup, which are kindred diseases, and contagious, so every sick bird should be removed from the flock and quarantined in small coops. Dissolve one teaspoonful of permanganate of potassium in one quart of water, one tablespoonful of which must be diluted with four tablespoonfuls of water for use. From a medicine dropper or a small glass syringe, with the diluted solution, spray the bird's throat, nostrils and eyes twice a day. Feed on light, nourishing food.

Mrs. W. C. C.—I would like to know what is the matter with my hens. One of them died suddenly without any warning, except that her comb was pale the evening before she died. Another has been sick several days. The only symptoms I can see are they are very weak and the droppings are whitish, milk-white color. Should the sick fowls be isolated?

A.—It is always advisable to quarantine sick birds at once, for if you wait to be sure that it is a contagious disease, the whole flock may be affected. If the hens were over eighteen months of age, or any of the heavy breeds, like Rocks or Rhode Island Reds, which are apt to get lazy and fat after they leave pullet age, it is probable that they succumbed to liver trouble. But if they were young hens, I fear it was cholera. In all such cases, give a dose of Castor oil to clean out the intestines, then administer a tablespoonful of carbolic solution twice a day. The ordinary pure carbolic which you buy at a drug-store is usually the five per cent solution, and one part of it should be diluted with five parts of water. To safeguard the rest of the flock, clean and disinfect house and yards, and give the birds buttermilk or the whey from curdled milk to drink for about a week.

M. B.—I would be thankful if you would tell me what was the matter with my hens. One died about a month ago and the other one today. There was a swelling at the bottom part of the crop. She couldn't stand very long on her feet, and held her head down. The droppings were thin and white in color.

A.—Please read answer to W. C. C. in this issue. It looks as if the ducks and chickens had been poisoned by drinking stagnant water, or eating some decomposing matter or mouldy grain, and have what is called limberneck. A dose of Castor oil when you first noticed them would have helped.

M. T. C.—My chickens have two different diseases. First they have a wheezing noise in their throat. They rattle when they breathe. At times they are much worse. Their gills and combs turn black and they die in a few weeks. I have them on free range in summer. I have lost several roosters with a foot disease.

A.—The symptoms as given in your letter, suggest roup and rheumatism. Is their sleeping-place well ventilated, and on dry, well-drained ground It is not wise to allow ducks and chickens to use the same house. Read answer to R. J. M. in this issue. Rub the feet and shanks with oil of turpentine.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Apply to the hair twice a week until it becomes the desired shade. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and removes dandruff. It is excellent for falling hair and will make harsh hair soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off. —Advertisement.

Four Wheel Chairs in August

295 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

The three August wheel chairs go to the following applicants. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their respective friends in their behalf.

Dewey Wilson, 424 Green Ave., Greenville, S. C., 200; Miss Ellen Young, Carnagie, Okla., 148; Mrs. Margaretta Ellis, Date, S. Dak., 88.

Mrs. J. I. Wilson sent the entire 200 subscriptions all in one bunch for her son's wheel chair. She wishes me, in her behalf, to thank all those who gave her their subscriptions for the noble way in which they responded to her appeal for help in getting this chair for her boy. She says that, although crippled in his legs, he is otherwise robust and bright intellectually, and that this wheel chair will enable him to attend school and get an education. She also writes that she "had no trouble in getting people to subscribe, but plenty of hard work for an old woman this hot weather going after them."

C. A. Garrett sent the entire 148 subscriptions all in one club for Miss Young's chair. Miss Young is sixteen years old and for four years has been paralyzed in her lower limbs as the result of curvature of the spine.

Mrs. Margaretta Ellis is unable to walk as the result of a fall causing internal injuries from which she has suffered for about a year.

This interesting picture shows little Odessa Rasure seated in the wheel chair which I sent her last December and is a source of great pleasure to her. Though seventeen years of age she is no larger than a child of seven should be. Ten years ago she was stricken with paralysis which almost completely crippled her and checked her growth. Although able to sit up only part of the time she is a very patient and uncomplaining sufferer.

Now that the hot weather is nearly passed I hope the wheel-chair subscriptions will come in faster for the benefit of the shut-ins.

The month's Roll of Honor and a few touching letters of thanks follow.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some worthy, destitute, crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

Crippled Boy Likes His Wheel Chair Awfully Well

DEWEY, OKLA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am writing on behalf of Russell Harrison, and wish to thank you, COMFORT'S publisher and many friends who made it possible for him to get the COMFORT wheel chair. It came safely, and we are sure all are delighted with it. Russell is practically helpless, and has been from birth, from spinal affections. His mind is not in any way affected and he learns easily, and though he cannot use his hands, he is learning to write, holding his pencil between his teeth. He says "tell Unle Charlie I like the chair awful well." Respectfully yours,

MRS. JENNIE HARRISON.

Very Thankful for COMFORT Wheel Chair

KINGFISHER, OKLA.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

Today we received little son's wheel chair in good order, for which we are very thankful. We are much pleased over it and shall continue to work for your Wheel-chair Club, for I want to aid other afflicted shut-ins to get chairs free by the aid of COMFORT subscriptions. Words cannot express our appreciation to you. Always your subscriber, MRS. CALVIN HALE.

Can Roll Herself in COMFORT Wheel Chair

MARATHON TEXAS.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I received my wheel chair the 1st of this month in good condition and I like it so much. I can roll myself and am very thankful for it.

Yours truly, MRS. CARRIE GRANGER.

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

Children's Happy Hour

HERE we are again with a cut-out doll and another nice story about Cubby Bear for you little folks. I know you will be glad to see them because so many of you were kind enough to write me last summer telling how much you enjoyed these two features of COMFORT and how sorry you were that they were to be omitted from the three summer issues. I thank you, all who wrote me, for your good letters which are well written and do credit to little children of your ages—mostly little girls from five to thirteen years of age—and I promise to give you a cut-out picture and "Cubby Bear" story or other equally good story in every issue of COMFORT through the fall, winter and spring, and perhaps next summer, too.

The Cubby Bear story is illustrated this month and you will find it with pictures of him and his friends on another page.

Story of the Jumping Jack Doll

The name of this smiling doll which waves its arms and kicks its feet in such a comical way is Happy Jack. Not very long ago he was a sad boy and very seldom smiled but now he is smiling and dancing about nearly all the time. I will tell you how this great change came about. Jack had a sister Nanny whom he dearly loved and played with all day long. One day a circus came to town and they both followed it a long way from home. Jack had on his white play suit and Nanny was dressed in blue. In the crush and jam of crowded streets they became separated, and poor baby Jack wandered alone in the dark crying and sobbing. At last he got tired and lay down in the meadow to sleep. His white suit was all stained green in the morning, but a kind lady gave him breakfast and told him where the circus was, for you see it moved to a different town each day and Jack had actually gone from one village to another. When he arrived at the grounds, he was too late for the circus had gone on and with it his sister Nanny. He was too tired to go further so he crawled into a wagon and soon fell asleep. Alas for his white suit, the wagon had been just painted a bright red, and it put many big red spots on him. Again he got breakfast at a farmhouse and hurried on and again he was too late. For many days this continued and each night his suit got stains of a different color. One rainy Sunday the circus did not travel and Jack caught up to it. When the men saw him they laughed, and the visitors laughed and the children laughed and even the elephants and tigers and lions seemed to laugh at him. When he caught sight of Nanny, he too laughed, and then he found out that the people were laughing at his funny suit for it had spots of every color on it. Nanny told Jack that she had been searching for him all the time and they hugged each other, and the head man, learning their plight sent them home in a cozy car. Ever since that day, clowns who wish to make people laugh wear spotted suits and some even put daubs of paint on their faces. When Jack thinks of how funny he looked, he just cannot help smiling and that is why they call him Happy Jack.

Directions For Jumping Jack Cut-out

Paste the Jumping Jack picture on a piece of cardboard and after carefully smoothing out all wrinkles and air bubbles, place it in a big book to dry. The next day cut out each of the five parts with scissors. On the body you will notice four little round rings marked A, B, C and D. Those at the hips or lower corners are A and B and those at the shoulders are C and D. On each arm and leg piece you will find similar small rings, marked A, B, C and D. Now all you have to do is to place the limbs on the body so that the point A on one is exactly opposite point A on the other. Punch a hole through with a darning needle and pull a piece of string in, knotting it on both ends. The string thus knotted, holds the limb to the body and permits it to swing freely. Hole B on the right leg fits over hole B on the right hip and so on.

The other holes, at the extreme ends of the arms and legs, are to fasten the string that works the dancing clown. A small stick or extra heavy piece of cardboard one half inch wide and six inches long is glued to the back of the body, the top of the stick being even with the neck of the figure. A short string connects the ends of the arms and another the ends of the legs. One long string is fastened to the center of both of the shorter ones and when it is pulled the doll will jump and kick and wave its arms in a lively fashion.

It will look nicer if you color it with crayons, using bright red, yellow, blue and green. Study the small rear view which shows the handle and working string.

Have a good time playing, but don't forget your lessons, for school begins this month most everywhere; and remember to help mamma all you can, because she gets very tired working so hard to make you and the rest of the family comfortable and happy. Good by until next month,

UNCLE JOHN.

Free To Every Little Girl!

Golden Locks And Her Lovely Twin Babies!

All Three Dollies Given To You Without Cost!

Premium No. 463.

Mothers, Don't Fail To Read This Offer!

COMFORT wants to give free to your little girl and every little girl this handsome doll Family stamped in beautiful colors on strong cloth with full directions so that you can cut them out, stuff and sew them up in less than ten minutes. "Golden Locks" is almost as big as a real baby, for she stands one and one half feet high and her cute little twin babies which you see in the picture stand over half a foot high. These dolls cannot be broken no matter how much they are thrown around or dropped on the floor and you can make them bend their arms and legs, stand up and sit down in a chair and assume all sorts of natural positions. They have beautiful golden hair which hangs in the dearest curls you ever saw and fastened with a bright red ribbon bow that cannot get lost or become untied, handsome red cheeks, rosy lips and lovely blue eyes which smile at you in such a life-like way that you would almost think they were ready to speak and say "Mama." As shown in above illustration they are dressed in dainty lace-trimmed underwear with bright red stockings and black buttoned boots. The three dolls together—"Golden Locks" and the two sweet Baby Dolls—make the cutest and prettiest Doll Family any little girl ever had to play with. They are lots better for the little folks than the more expensive bisque and china dolls because they will not break or snarl their pretty hair or lose their eyes. There is no little girl who will not instantly fall in love with this beautiful Doll Family and spend many happy hours with it, so we hope that every mother who reads this offer will take advantage of it at once. Pocket Flashlight

Premium No. 708

Given For A Club Of Three

THERE are so many occasions when a flashlight is a necessity it would be impossible to name them all but there is one thing sure—it is the handiest and safest means of illuminating ever devised. We offer here one of the best pocket flashlights made. It is known as the "Eveready," which is certainly an appropriate name as it is always ready when you want to use it. But the greatest feature of this flashlight is its safety around inflammable material. In the house it lights up the darkest rooms or clothes closets, dark corners in the basement, in the garret; it may be used around gasoline, or powder, in the stable, in the barn, even in the hay mow, and there is not the slightest danger of fire. It throws a shaft of steady brilliance right in the teeth of wind or rain. The mere pressure of your finger starts and stops the light at your will and it is so small and compact that you can carry it around in your vest pocket where it does not take up any more room than a cigarette box. The "Eveready" is beautifully finished in polished nickel with a hinged bottom which opens to replace the battery and is equipped with a push button as well as a sliding switch for a flash or continuous light. It is equipped with a Tungsten battery and bulb and gives a surprisingly powerful bright light and the battery with average use will last from two to four months. When one battery becomes exhausted you can easily buy another one anywhere as they are on sale in every city and town in the United States. Or, if you prefer, we will furnish you with additional batteries free of cost in return for a few subscriptions to COMFORT. We will send you this flashlight with battery and bulb complete, ready for business as soon as you receive it, upon the terms of the following

CLUB OFFER. For a club of only three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you one "Eveready" flashlight as described above free by Parcel Post prepaid. (Premium No. 708.) We can also supply you with extra batteries for the "Eveready" at the rate of one battery free for a club of two one-year subscriptions at 25 cents each. (Premium No. 709.)

Genuine Gold-Filled Ladies' Rings!

WE show here six of the latest styles in ladies' and girls' rings. They are not solid gold rings but they are genuine gold filled so that they are just as handsome and will wear just as well as if they were solid gold. They are beautifully made and finished and set with imt. stones so exquisitely cut and mounted that only an expert can distinguish them from the real gems which would cost from $5.00 to $25.00. Remember that these are not cheap "electro-plated" rings which always look brassy after you wear them a little while. They are filled with enough real gold to give them genuine wearing qualities, and being fashioned in style and design to exactly correspond with the latest styles of expensive solid gold rings not one person in a thousand will realize that you are wearing anything but the solid gold article. Please read the following descriptions then you can easily tell which one of these beautiful rings you prefer to have us send you as a gift. ORDER BY NUMBER THE RING OR RINGS WANTED.

No. 52005

No. 52005. A very elaborate genuine gold-filled chased design set with one beautiful Imt. Sapphire and two sparkling Brilliants.

No. 51429. Genuine gold filled, set with beautiful Imt. Amethyst.

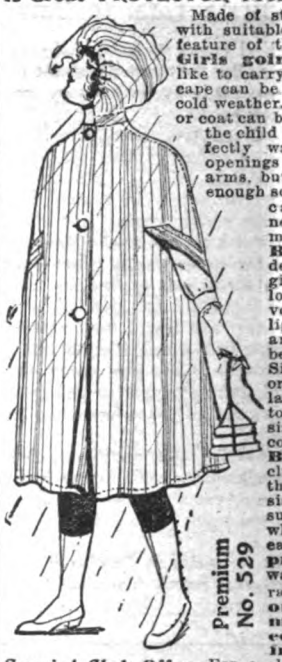
BE SURE TO SEND YOUR RING SIZE!

No. 51726

No. 52028

By using the above diagram you can tell exactly what size ring you wear if you will follow these directions: Put a stiff piece of paper around the second joint on your ring finger. Cut the paper off so that when drawn tight around your finger the ends exactly meet. Then lay the paper flat on the diagram, one end at the line O and the other end will indicate correct size. By following these instructions your ring will be a perfect fit.

No. 51723



Free Offer!

By buying a large quantity of these rings direct from the manufacturers we did not have to pay two or three middlemen's profits but secured them at the factory price and this enables us to make a great offer that none of our readers can afford to overlook. Send us only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents and we will send you FREE AND POSTPAID your choice of any one ring illustrated and described above. Remember our guarantee that these rings are genuine gold filled and that they will wear indefinitely and give splendid satisfaction. Do not forget to specify by number the ring or rings you want.

Girl's Waterproof Cape

A Great PROTECTOR From WIND and RAIN

Premium No. 529

Made of striped rubberized cloth with suitable lining, and the best feature of this cape is the hood. Girls going to school do not like to carry an umbrella, and this cape can be worn either in hot or cold weather. If in winter a sweater or coat can be worn underneath, and the child is not only dry but perfectly warm. There are two openings in the cape for the arms, but the garment is large enough so the books or packages can be carried underneath, which makes it much better than a Rain Coat. The shoulders are shaped so as to give it a very attractive look. This cape comes in a very dark drab color with lighter drab stripes. They are so pretty any girl will be proud to wear one. Sizes 6 to 14 years. When ordering better order it larger than necessary so to have it of sufficient size to go over a heavy coat or other garments. Boys can easily get up clubs and thus get one of these Rain Capes for their sisters. Girls like to get subscribers to COMFORT where they can so easily earn such a sensible premium so as to keep warm and dry during the rainy season. When ordering be sure to mention size wanted. It comes in sizes from 6 to 14 years.

Special Club Offer. For a club of only seven one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you by parcel post one of these serviceable Rain Capes. State size wanted. Premium No. 529.

Prem. No. 691 Lady's Watch

For A Club Of Eight!

HERE IS a watch that we are proud to offer and one that any lady or girl should feel proud to own. It is known as the "Leonard Duchess" and is a perfect little beauty. We show both the front and the back of the watch so that you can gain some idea of its real appearance, especially the handsome engraving on the back. It is a thin model, 6 size, stem wind, pendant set, with antique bow and flat stem. The movement is damaskeed, quick train, hardened steel cut pinions, straight line escapement, every part carefully made and adjusted by skilled watchmakers in one of the best watch factories in the United States. The case of this watch has all the appearance of solid gold and it will wear like solid gold because it is made of solid composition gilt metal that is the same color all the way through so that it will never tarnish or change color, but the longer it is worn, the brighter and better it will look. This dainty little timepiece is refined and stylish enough to satisfy the most exacting taste. We guarantee that it will keep perfect time and otherwise prove satisfactory or it may be returned to us any time within one year and we will either repair free of charge or send you a new watch in exchange. The factory's guarantee will be sent to you along with the watch and in addition we ourselves guarantee that this watch will give you unlimited satisfaction. We have just added this elegant new watch to our list of premiums and are giving it away free on the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of only eight one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or four 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this handsome lady's watch exactly as described free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 691. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Powerful 3½ Ft. Telescope

Premium No. 602

This is not a worthless toy but a real telescope made by one of the largest manufacturers in Europe. When closed as shown in the illustration it is 12 inches long with a circumference of 5 3-4 inches, when all five sections are pulled out its full length is over 3 1-2 feet. It is well made of the best material, brass bound throughout; the lens are carefully ground and adjusted by experts. With this telescope it is really possible to pick out and identify houses, barns, horses, cattle, streams, ponds, bits of scenery, etc., at a range of from 1 to 5 miles. Such a telescope as this is an absolute necessity to farmers and ranchmen, as a matter of fact it is something needed in every home whether in city, town or country. The young people always enjoy the use of a good telescope and they are just fine to take along on hunting, fishing, touring or vacation trips. As a rule a telescope of this size sells for a very high price but COMFORT has contracted for an enormous quantity of them thus bringing the cost down low enough so that we can give them away as a premium. If you really want a good telescope do not hesitate to order this one because it is fully guaranteed by the manufacturers and that guarantee is backed up by us. With this telescope we also send you a Solar Eye Piece which you can use to study the sun and solar eclipses and you get the whole outfit free and prepaid on the terms of the following

Club Offer. For a club of only six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this big forty-two inch long Telescope with Solar Eye Piece by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 602.

Three-Piece Nottingham Lace Bed Set

Given Free And Sent By Parcel Post Prepaid For A Club Of Six.

Premium No. 702

WE believe that there is nothing much more desired and appreciated by the average woman than a handsome and serviceable bed set so we have just purchased a quantity of the Three-piece Nottingham Lace Set shown in above illustration and will distribute them free as a premium among lady readers of COMFORT. Our illustration cannot, of course show the real appearance of the set but it gives you an idea of the design which is a beautifully executed array of flowers, bow knots and ribbons scattered on a mounting of Duchess Lace and set off by Festoon effects on all sides. The material is Nottingham Lace substantially woven for strength in laundering and finished with buttonhole stitched scalloped edges for added strength and convenience in cleaning and stretching. The spread is 72 inches wide to 90 inches long which is large enough to cover a full size bed and leave a valance effect to hang over on the sides. The two shams are each 28½ inches square. This is really an extraordinary offer when you stop to consider that we are giving away this set for a club of only six subscriptions, but please do not think that because we do offer it for such a small club that it is cheap in any sense of the word, because the material is of the very best and it is made and finished in the finest possible manner on the latest improved looms in the largest lace mill in the United States. This same bed set is on sale in the stores at a good round price, but because we buy direct and eliminate all middlemen's profits, we are enabled to make the following very attractive

Free Offer. For a club of only six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this handsome. Large Shaggy Teddy Bear

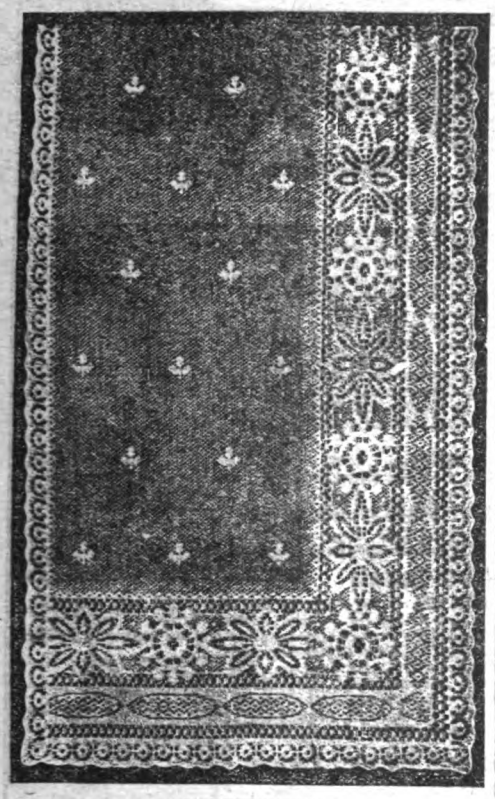
The Best Playmate A Boy or Girl Ever Had

10 Inches High And Full Jointed

Premium No. 699



FREE FOR A CLUB OF TWO!

EVERY little boy and girl wants a Teddy Bear and here is an opportunity for every father or mother who reads COMFORT to get one without expense. "Teddy" looks exactly as you see him in the picture above. He is a big shaggy fellow, nearly a foot tall, made of rich, handsome brown plush, paws lined with felt, carefully stitched and finished and his head, arms and legs are jointed in such a manner that you can place him in almost any position. He will stand up, sit up, stand on his head, go on all four feet, in fact, you can make him assume all kinds of positions that are so comical and lifelike that it makes the children scream with delight just to look at him. "Teddy" is so well made that no matter how roughly he is handled he cannot become broken and with ordinary care should last for years. Teddy Bears like this one generally cost a good round sum in the stores, but as we have imported a large quantity of them from Germany at a special low price we can well afford to give them away on terms so liberal that there is no reason why every boy and girl should not have one of them at once. We will send you "Teddy" free if you will accept the following special

31-Piece Princess Violet Dinner Set

Premium No. 461.

Free And Express Prepaid For A Club Of 12

THIS splendid set of dishes is full size for family use and consists of 6 Plates, 6 Cups, 6 Saucers, 6 Cereal or Fruit Dishes, 6 Individual Butters and large Meat Platter all handsomely decorated with clusters of purple wood violets surrounded with rich green foliage and bordered with lovely tracings of gold. Unlike the ordinary dishes that are usually offered as premiums, every piece in this magnificent set is (with the exception of the decorations) snowy white in color, dainty in design, light in weight and finished with a Haviland glaze which gives it that smooth, velvety appearance so much admired by every woman. The decorations will last a lifetime because being burned into the ware and underneath the glaze it positively will not wash, rub or wear off. Our illustration does not give you any idea of the real beauty of these dishes because it fails to show up the pleasing color combination of purple, green and gold which is so finely set off by the flawless white of the ware itself. This is by far the handsomest, daintiest dinner set we have ever offered to COMFORT readers and we are positive that it will more than please every woman who secures one of them on the terms of our very liberal offer. No matter where you live, we will ship you this set direct from the pottery in Ohio by express, all charges prepaid.

OUR FREE OFFER For a club of only twelve one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or six 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this handsome 31-Piece Violet Decorated Dinner Set carefully packed to prevent breakage, by express all charges prepaid. Premium No. 461.

Wizard Water Pistol

Given For One Subscription

Premium No. 716

TO all appearances this is a regular, full size, "six shooter" but instead of shooting the deadly bullet it squirts a solid stream of water 30 feet straight to the mark you aim it at. To load this pistol you stick the muzzle into water and pull the trigger three or four times. After it is loaded you discharge it by pulling the trigger just the same as you would an ordinary revolver. After it is loaded it is good for ten shots (of water) before it is necessary to load it again. Boys and girls can have loads of fun with this water pistol by giving their friends surprise "shower baths" and as it shoots nothing but water it is of course perfectly harmless to the smallest child. The "Wizard" is shaped exactly like a regular revolver; is 5 inches long, handsomely nickel plated and beautifully finished. You can obtain this water pistol free upon the terms of the following special offers:

Offer No. 716 A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents, we will send you the Wizard water pistol free by Parcel Post prepaid.

Offer No. 716 B. For your own subscription, or renewal or extension of your present subscription, to COMFORT for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all), we will send you the Wizard Water Pistol free and prepaid. Premium No. 716. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Congoleum Rug

Premium No. 7206

Given For A Club Of Six!

A YARD and a half long and one yard wide. Water cannot rot it, sun cannot fade it. It lies flat on the floor without nails, tacks or paste and positively will not curl up at the edges. The Congoleum Rug is something new. It is not oil-cloth or Linoleum or made of grass, fiber or fabric—it is not like any other floor covering in the world. It is absolutely waterproof, not affected by heat or cold, neither fades nor rots indoors or out. When you wash the floor or porch you can wash the Congoleum rug at the same time without taking it up. You can leave it outdoors the year round, and it will not rot, fade or get that dingy look that other rugs do after exposure to sun and wear. In doors you can use it on your bathroom, hall, pantry or kitchen floor, under the refrigerator or stove or in any room in the house. No matter where you place it it will outwear a dozen ordinary rugs and give years of service. These rugs come in many different designs and beautiful combinations of colors and we have selected the one illustrated herewith as the most suitable for all-round purposes. It will make an attractive appearance regardless of whether you use it as a porch rug, or in hall, kitchen, pantry or chamber. We are positive that every woman who secures one of these rugs will want more of them at once so we have arranged to supply you with as many as you may need upon the terms of the following Club Offer. For six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you one Congoleum Rug free by express or parcel post prepaid. Premium No. 7206. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

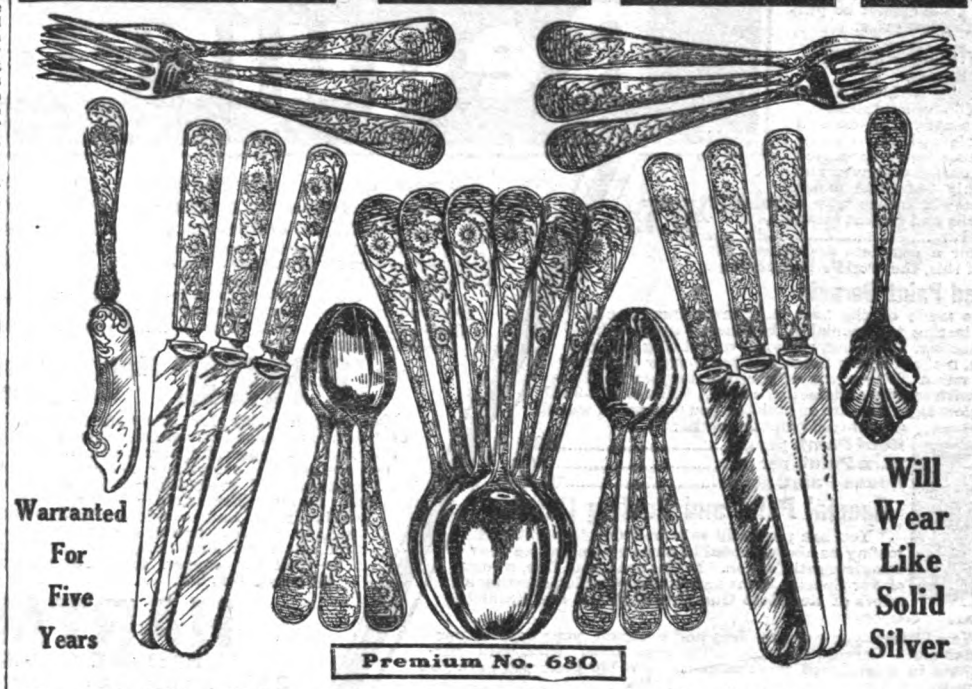
SILK MUSLIN SCARF

Premium No. 331



A dainty shoulder throw and head covering for Summer, or for evening wear the year round. For trimming Summer Hats there is nothing so practical or so easily and attractively arranged. For every-day use such a scarf is indispensable and for car or boat riding, pleasure or otherwise one or more of these scarfs will be found useful. Being ready to wear, the saving of time in hemstitching is worth something to every woman, and the busy Mothers will find them so convenient for a quick method of trimming the children's hats. When ordering be sure to mention color wanted.

Club Offer. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you this Silk Scarf free by parcel post prepaid. Be sure to mention color wanted. Premium No. 331. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

26-Piece Daisy Silver Set

Warranted For Five Years

Will Wear Like Solid Silver

Premium No. 680

Sent To You Prepaid For A Club of Six

WE have in the past made many fine premium offers of silverware to readers of COMFORT, but this is the first time we have ever been able to offer a complete silver set in return for such a small club of subscriptions. And please don't think because we are giving away this splendid set on such liberal terms that it is the ordinary cheap silverware which is plated on a brass base and consequently changes color and has that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. This Set which we offer you here is silver plated on a white metal base therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will never show signs of tarnish or wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use the handles are handsomely embossed and decorated with the beautiful Daisy design which is now so popular and the blades of the knives and bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have ever offered, in fact we are so sure that it will please and satisfy all who accept our offer we are going to guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this beautiful 26-Piece Daisy Silver Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, you will receive this 26-Piece Daisy Silver Set Free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 680. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Drawnwork Scarf

67 Inches Long 16 Inches Wide

Premium No. 332

Made of PURE FLAX woven into a silver damask of superior quality, finished with heavily fringed ends

EVERY woman reader of COMFORT who wants a handsome, serviceable dresser or sideboard scarf should answer this offer at once. We have imported from Germany a large quantity of these large sized, pure linen scarfs, 67 inches long and 16 inches wide, and secured them at a price so low that we can well afford to give them away for less money in subscriptions than you would have to pay outright for a much inferior scarf in any store. As shown in illustration, the pattern is a large attractive zigzag drawnwork design and both ends of the scarf are finished with a handsome wide combed and knotted fringe. Being made by skilled workmen of pure flax, the texture of this scarf is such that it should last a lifetime and in appearance it is one of the most beautiful dresser or sideboard covers you ever saw. We are giving away this scarf free on the terms of the following CLUB OFFER. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one 3-year subscription) not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you this large handsome, pure linen, imported scarf free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 332. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Fitted House Gown

Premium No 7254

Made Of Finest Percale In All Colors. Checks, Stripes, Plain Blues, Browns, Tan, Black And Blue And Polka Dots.

A LARGE wholesale concern found it was overstocked and sold us a limited quantity of these handsome percale house dresses at a low price. They are regular $1.98 value but we bought them cheap for cash and are going to give our lady readers the benefit of the bargain. As shown in our illustration the design of the dress is simple yet attractive, in fact it is pretty enough to be worn as an afternoon dress. It has a low neck, three pearl buttons in back, the sleeves, neck and pockets have a one and a quarter inch facing of plain percale in colors to match, the waist is fitted with an elastic tape covered with the same facing as neck and sleeves. Perfect fitting, easy to slip on, stylish yet cool and comfortable they make about the most desirable summer house dress for any woman. Remember, however, that this is a short time offer only as we have but a limited quantity of these dresses on hand and it is not likely that we shall be able to secure more of them at a sacrifice price. When ordering please state color and pattern wanted, also give your bust measure and we will guarantee a good fit.

Club Offer. For a club of four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or two 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you one of these fine percale house gowns free by Parcel Post prepaid. Be sure to say what pattern and color you prefer and give your bust measure. Premium No. 7254.

Hercules Never-Leak Flint-Surfaced Roofing

Most Durable for Any Climate

Don't confuse this strong, durable roofing with the flimsy stuff that masquerades under the name of "prepared roofing." Most of it is made from ordinary paper, soaked with tar and given a thin gravel coating. Hercules Never-Leak is made from highest quality, long fibre wool felt, thoroughly saturated with pure asphalt. Both sides are thickly coated with very fine sharp particles of crystals which are firmly imbedded under enormous pressure. Each roll is complete—32 inches wide, contains 108 square feet (enough to cover 100 square feet). Nails and cement included. No skill required to lay. As low as, per roll..... $1.15

Crumbs of Comfort

The most terrible of all things is terror.

Waste time if you want time to waste you.

There is no worse robber than a bad book.

Wisdom is to the mind what health is to the body.

Ignorance shuts its eyes and believes it is right.

Malice may darken truth, but it cannot put it out.

He who does not look before finds himself behind.

God enters by a private door into every individual.

Work is the only universal currency which God accepts.

He never did a good day's work who went grumbling at it.

There is a cry at the beginning of life and a groan at its close.

Kings may create noblemen, but they cannot create noble men.

Brain women never interest men or women as heart women do.

The richest man in the world does not own a single minute of tomorrow.

The less tenderness one has in his nature, the more he requires from others.

Many people, who would not do ill, speak ill without realizing that such speaking is doing.

An unkind word falls easily from the tongue, but a team of horses cannot draw it back again.

Tears are the softening showers which cause the seed of heaven to spring up in the human heart.

Though we travel the world over to find the beautiful, we must carry it with us or we find it not.

Next to God, man is indebted to woman, first for life itself, and then for making it worth having.

COBELLA LOVINGWELL was perched on the top of the summer-house feasting on the last of the ripe grapes. The luxuriant vines hid her from view. Her mother came to the door, glanced about and sat down on the step for the brief resting-spell of the farmer's wife. Steps came rustling through the grass and leaves in the door-yard. Husband and son were coming home. The long day's work was done. Lewis, the son, sat down beside his mother. She pushed the hair from his damp forehead with mother touches. "What does Ingham say?" she asked.

"He talks smooth. Says he prefers to hire a man who has no home interests. He can control all his time then, I suppose. Guess I'll stick to farming, muz! I have tried to fly in the face of fates and am beaten!"

There was a laugh on the young man's frank face but wise "muz" knew that a shadow of disappointment lay behind the laugh. "We could sell ——" she said slowly.

"No, muz. Decidedly not. Ingham shall not shove us out of our home that way. Who is he to lord it over us? I can wait. A man can be a man whether he carries a book or a hoe. Cobsie will be a woman soon, and then—why, we'll see further. We'll keep the old nest yet a while. It's ours. Never mind, muz! We will all be happy while we may and you will be glad to have your boy with you, I know."

The young sister among the vines dropped a bunch of grapes as she listened to the conversation. She understood the drift of it fairly well. There had been other talks in her hearing. Years before Cobella took possession of the old-fashioned cradle at Laughing Brook Farm, Wheat County, was one of the most beautiful farming districts in the state. The farms were more numerous than large, and splendidly cultivated. Their owners formed a community of men and women that was unique in its thift and neighborly spirit. How it began none could tell, but a fever for city life and trade awoke in the blood of first one and then another of these farm owners. One by one they sold their property and lost themselves in town. By and by it was rumored about that their acres had all passed into the hands of one Charles Ingham, a man whose ambition it was to own and cultivate the largest single farm in the state. Indeed, it was whispered that in some careful way he had inoculated the younger people with the city fever and waited for its outbreak. He had done no wrong in the eyes of the law. He had taken full advantage of his rights. He put "a straw across a trickle" and smiled when the river's channel changed.

Laughing Brook Farm was the last and best of the group of farm properties. Charles Ingham desired it with great desire. To include it with his already magnificently proportioned wheat fields was something he thought about day and night. The "old people" were not as "keen" as they once were. The son had ambitions. Even the little girl might throw her mite of influence in the balance. They were not rich. A loan? A mortgage? A square cash offer for the place? A casual conversation with the young man—city advantages, etc? Well, time would lead him to the best method. That farm he wanted!

And Lewis—he wanted an education. His health was not vigorous. The sharp winters and sweltering summers tried him severely. He had begun to think perhaps he had better look away from the fields for a life-occupation. His inclination pointed to the law. As far as self improvement could take him he had gone. The town library was a fair one. The little family of four were among its best patrons. One day Lewis heard that Ingham wanted a man to oversee the interests of his big farm, a sort of farmer-secretary. The young man thought he could fill the position and spend his evenings at a good night-school in town. He went to see Charles Ingham. The rich land owner was pleasant, cautious, keen. He led his caller to tell his heart and then was "Very sorry" not to be able to accommodate him. "Why don't you folks sell and move to town?" he asked in a tone of friendly disinterest. "Might even buy the place myself. Pay cash, you know. City life is the thing for wide-awake fellows like you! Or—I only suggest—would you like a loan? I admire men who have dare in them."

Lewis took an abrupt departure. He understood Mr. Ingham. He would wait.

Cobella heard nothing more of the subject. Colder weather came. There were longer evenings for reading and study. But there was a weary look in Lewis' eyes and Cobsie had to remind him or he would have forgotten the Jungle Tales they were reading together. The child was, in some things, wise beyond her years. "He's bothered about that old night-school and his 'college fund.' I know! Wish I was a woman. I'd work and make money and then he'd go! He's just the splendidest brother. Old Ingham might have taken him. I'll tell him so some day."

One afternoon, a few weeks later, Lewis brought home a book for his little sister. It was wrapped in a page of a religious weekly. Cobsie never overlooked anything in print and she turned the wrappings about in search of a possible story or poem. The following advertisement arrested her attention:

Wanted.—Christians for one year of service. Work most delightful. Wages paid in jewels that will shine through all eternity. Address THE LORD OF THE HARVEST.

The little girl studied over the "ad." It was either the beginning or middle of an article, but the sheet was torn, and she thought it was a bona-fide "business opportunity." Presently her face cleared and she spoke to herself scornfully: "Well, you are a goose! 'The Lord of the Harvest'—that's Mr. Ingham. Lewis said he shouldn't lord it over us and he's got an awful big wheat harvest. * * Well, Mr. Ingham, I know what I'll do. Oh, if brother just could go to school!"

That afternoon the child was out hunting for belated treasures of tree and bush. Trotting hoofs arrested her attention.

"There he goes now!" she said aloud, and, darting by a crosscut toward the road, she reached it in time to wave a signal to the vehicle that spun toward her.

Charles Ingham spoke to the mare and drew up to the roadside, wondering what Farmer Lovingwell's little girl wanted. He was not a man children were afraid of because he had not yet denied all his better impulses.

"Hello, little one! What's up?"

Cobella pulled off her hood and unpinned from its crown a crumpled scrap of paper. She handed it to him and waited. Then, as he knit his brows and looked from the slip to herself, she said:

"I found your advertisement and wanted to talk about it." She spoke as if she had been trained in business ways. "Could you hire me for one year? I am a Christian. I can do all sorts of work. Is it dl'monds you pay in? I'm 'most sure mother would let me."

"Where did you get this?" asked the puzzled man. "What do you mean, child?"

"You're the Lord of the Harvest, aren't you? Isn't that your ad? Father put one in the Farmer's Friend when we wanted a girl. Lewis wants an education ever so bad. He wanted to work for you. I s'pose you didn't hire him 'cause he isn't a Christian. He told mother he was going to be some day. I was converted last year, so I'll do, won't I? Lewis would sell the jewels—dl'monds, aren't they? Don't you think brother is a dear? You know he isn't real well. He's going to be a lawyer. They don't have to work as hard as farmers. Won't you hire me? I want to help brother, and mother's been praying about it. She told father she was sure the way would open."

Mr. Ingham's face was a study. He pushed his hat back and incidentally rubbed his eyes. Cobella caught sight of a diamond ring. Would it not be lovely to have a whole lot of shining jewels for brother?

"Don't you want to get into the buggy, child? We'll ride a bit and you can tell me more about it." Cobella chatted on, nor did she suspect that she was being drawn out. Perhaps she did not know of such a process. Before long her listener was in possession of many details of life at Laughing Brook Farm.

When the ride was over, Cobella still supposed she had been talking to the "Lord of the Harvest," and with a charming sense of her own dignity she promised to keep the whole conversation a secret until she heard again from Mr. Ingham.

The following Sabbath day dawned in a shriek of wind and a swirl of snow. On account of the severe storm of the night before, leaving the roads almost impassable, none of the family had gone to church that morning, as was their usual custom.

Cobella was standing at the window a little before dinner time, watching the snow, when a jingle caught her ear.

"Oh, mother, it's the Lord of the Harvest!" she exclaimed, jumping up and down in delight.

Her mother stared at her in wonderment. "The Lord of what? Hurry, Lewis, whoever it is and let them in; the wind and storm is awful."

It was Charles Ingham, cold, breathless, laughing. He burst into the big kitchen like an agent of the storm, threw off his furs, greeted them all with laughter and genial hand-clasps that puzzled the woman and the two men, who had never thought of him as a friend.

"I came to ask you for an invitation to dinner," he said looking at Cobella. "I am a lonely fellow—neither folks nor friends, except in business relations. And I have something I wish to say to you people. Will you let me in on this Sabbath day—for this little girl's sake?"

They could not find words—what did it mean? Mother came to the rescue.

"We are plain people, Mr. Ingham. This has been a Christian home for half a century. Please God, it is going to be that for many years more. A real home always has an open door for folks who are really lonely." It was a stiff little speech with caution behind it, and Christian courtesy all through it.

Throughout the dinner the man of the world kept his host and hostess interested in his conversation. As for Lewis, he listened with a reserve born of a sense of injury, but Cobella was in a state of delight pure and simple. When it was over they carried their nuts and apples to the big open fire in the kitchen.

A pause came in the fireside talk. Cobella's heart beat faster. Lewis frowned. Mother and father waited. Something was coming. It came when Mr. Ingham pushed back his chair, laid down his nut-pick and stood before them.

"I cannot make speeches," he began awkwardly. "And I hate scenes. I came here today for neither. I owe a debt. I am here to pay it." He drew from his breast pocket the wallet where bills of high denomination were wont to lie. No one spoke or stirred. Lewis frowned again. Cobella held her breath. Mr. Ingham drew out with careful fingers a scrap of paper and read it aloud:

Wanted:—Christians for one year of service. Work most delightful. Wages paid in jewels that will shine through all eternity. Address THE LORD OF THE HARVEST.

"I do not know," continued the speaker, "Where this strange advertisement was printed or why. It came under the notice of this child," touching Cobella's head gently, "and she, by some logic of her own decided that I was the Lord of the Harvest. She met me and offered herself for a year's service that her brother Lewis might be able to to go away to school. We had a long talk. Her artless words were a revelation to me. I took the slip home. I shut myself up with it. I had new thoughts. I hunted up mother's old Bible and read words long ago familiar, words about the Lord of all harvests. I cannot tell you all the change that has come about. You know something of me. The acres of this section of the country are mine. I have coveted your farm, too. God has changed all that. Mr. Lovingwell—friend,—Brother Lovingwell,—before God, if not before the law, I am guilty of more than one changed and scattered home; I am guilty of an endeavor to drop seeds of discontent into your son's mind. But God sent an angel to me—an angel in a little hood! I am here to confess."

Looking into his face, the elder people thought they never had known what a noble-appearing man Charles Ingham was. Gentle-hearted, big-souled mother could stand it no longer. She went up to him, holding out her hands, just as if he had been her own boy.

"And you've come to the Lord, Charles Ingham?" she asked with tears.

"Dear mother of this home, I have come to the Lord of the Harvest."

"For a year?"

"For all years! I was brought up in a Christian home. I knew the way but had forsaken it. * * * Lewis, do you still want that job?"

"Yes, sir, if you want me."

"But," and the visitor drew the wondering Cobella to his side, "this dear child says that I want Christian men to work for me—how's that? Oh, my boy," his voice trembled with earnestness, "I did just what you are doing—I put it off. Give yourself to Him this Sabbath day."

He did, and they had a "gathering" about the old fireplace, a gathering unto the Lord.

The next morning, the excitement over and Lewis off to his new duties, Cobella opened her precious Jungle Book. An envelope addressed to herself lay between the pages. It was sealed. She ran with it to her mother. Inside was Charles Ingham's check for a sum of money that took away the child's breath, it seemed to her so great and wonderful. With it was a slip of paper on which was written:

"Cobella Lovingwell will please find enclosed a very small part of the value of the service done by her to the undersigned this day.

"(Signed) CHARLES INGHAM.

"Laborer in the Vineyard of the Lord of the Harvest."

"You will give part of it to brother, darling, will you not?" said mother, wiping away her tears.

"Part of it? I just guess not! It's all his! I'm going to keep the note, though."

And she has it yet.

HOME-MAKERS NUMBER FOR NOVEMBER

will be a big, specially featured issue to celebrate COMFORT'S twenty-eighth birthday anniversary.

As the result of his offer, in May COMFORT, of prizes for photographs of most attractive homes of COMFORT subscribers Mr. Gannett has acquired a of hundreds of COMFORT homes and many pictures of the owners with their families and pet animals, illustrating how they live in city, town and on the farm in every section of the country, showing the luxuriously appointed farm mansion, the sod house of the Western homesteader, the hospitable home of the Southern planter, the log cabin of the Michigan pioneer, the California Bungalow, the ranch house of the owner of a princely domain of 3520 acres in Colorado, the modern city dwelling, and even the houseboat of a family that live and make their living on the water, and in fact all kinds and conditions of homes. A large and varied assortment of

WONDERFUL COLLECTION OF PICTURES

with the interesting letters of their owners describing how they made their way in the world, raised their families, built up their homes and acquired and improved their properties.

The reproduction of so many of these pictures makes the coming November COMFORT more expensive, elaborate and interesting than any previous issue, for besides this great, special feature it will also contain all the regular departments, serial stories and some fine short stories.

THE COTTONSEED INDUSTRY.—The annual output of the cottonseed industry is in value close up to the $300,000,000 mark. Until recently, the seed of the cotton plant, except what was required for planting, was practically worthless, in the opinion of the Southern cotton farmer. The seed was hauled away or dumped in some stream. Today, the once despised byproduct of the cotton fields is steadily looming into importance. This industry of the byproduct which only a few years ago was unknown, is now a gold mine. COMFORT predicts that eventually the sawdust of the great mills will also become a valuable byproduct in some way or other, and rival the success of the insignificant cottonseed.

A Million Automobiles to be this Year's Product of American Factories

A PROMINENT authority on the automobile industry says that the American makers have planned an output that will total a million cars this year, and the prospect is that they will realize their expectations. He remarks that this is equivalent to one new car to each one hundred people, men, women and children, in the United States. Based on the number manufactured this ratio is correct, though it will not quite hold good as to the number of new cars that go into use in this country this season because a small part of the output, perhaps one-tenth, is for export to fill foreign orders.

After discounting a liberal allowance for export the figures still are amazing, for it seems incredible that so many—about nine hundred thousand autos could be sold for use in this country in a single year. It is, indeed, an enormous increase over the product of any previous year; yet the makers of medium and low price cars, though some have doubled or quadrupled their output, have been unable to keep abreast of their orders.

The reasons for this surprisingly large and growing demand, which indicates a great economic development, are well worth considering.

The makers of high price cars, who cater to the patronage of the select few to whom money is no object, have had little if any participation in the extraordinary boom that has hit the manufacturers of medium and low price automobiles. The former have improved their cars and maintained their prices at figures that are prohibitive except to the rich, while the latter have adopted all essential improvments and at the same time dropped their prices to a parity with the resources of the average well-to-do citizen, thereby greatly increasing their sales and enabling them to reduce the cost of production as their output has grown apace.

This process has gone on until a handsome, thoroughly practicable, reliable and serviceable car fully equipped can be had for $750 to $800, better than could have been bought five years ago for five times the money.

Class such a car as a luxury, if you like, but it is a luxury that will soon pay for itself in pleasure and improved health of the family, besides it is pretty likely to prove a practical utility in a business way, saving time and car fare when any member of the family has to go anywhere, for the wife and daughters can operate it as well as any of the men folks.

Nowhere is the automobile more useful or of greater economic value than on the farm where it can be made to do the duty of one or two horses, and do it better and at a lower cost. Of course the auto will not plow, harrow, mow, or reap, and therefore horses are indispensable on most farms for the purpose of farm work. But the farmer and his family have to do a great deal of traveling over the roads in going to and from market and for many other business purposes, as well as to attend church, grange meetings and other social gatherings, not to mention pleasure drives.

For these purposes an extra horse is needed, or perhaps a pair, besides those required for working the farm. Quite likely there is not driving enough to keep the extra horse or horses busy all the time on the road and yet the work horses cannot be spared or are too tired to perform this service.

It is here that the automobile makes good its utility and economy by taking the place of the driving horse or horses. It is always ready, never tired and covers the ground in a quarter the time a horse could. When men and horses are busy with the farm work the automobile enables wife or daughter to do the errands anywhere within a radius of fifty or sixty miles without fatigue. When a piece of farm machinery breaks down, think how much time of man and horse is saved by sending the woman and the auto to town for a new part or to have the broken part repaired. Another great advantage that the auto has as a substitute for the driving horse is that it requires no feed when it is not working.

So much for the business side; but the social and recreation side—call it pleasure if you will—is quite as important, though some may not regard it so. All work and no play on the farm wears out the old and drives the young folks to the city. The opportunities for social enjoyment, recreation and change of scene with a broader knowledge of the outside world which the automobile brings within the reach of the farmer and his family make for contentment, happiness and health and result in better work and more intelligent and successful farming.

More automobiles are owned by farmers than by any other one class of citizens, and COMFORT subscribers, according to their letters, are not backward in their appreciation of the utility value of the motor vehicle, many of them being owners and many others planning to purchase one.

Canning Compounds Dangerous to Health

AFTER all that has been said, written and published in denunciation of chemical preservatives in the nine years since the Pure Food Law took effect one would suppose that the women of this country must be very generally enlightened as to the unwholesomeness of such preparations. Nevertheless the U. S. Department of Agriculture has found it necessary to issue a special bulletin of recent date warning housewives that the use of preserving powders is harmful and useless. Among other things the bulletin says:

"Information has come to this Department that the canning season has brought the usual demand on the part of housewives for salicylic acid and boric acid. These preparations are sometimes sold in the form of powder under various trade names and are recommended by the promoters for use in preserving canned goods in home canning. While it is true that these compounds may retard the decay of the fruit or vegetable, it is pointed out by the experts of the Department that their use may be attended by serious disturbances of health."

After explaining that Federal and State food laws forbid the SALE of foods that have been preserved with harmful substances, but do NOT apply to foods that are canned in the home and consumed there, the bulletin adds:

"It would seem, however, that the housewife would not knowingly use, in foods she provides for her family, substances that she could not use in foods for sale without violating the law, because these substances are injurious to health."

"Artificial preservatives are not necessary," declares the bulletin. "Fruits and vegetables can be kept indefinitely if they are sterilized by heat and properly sealed, and there is no excuse for running any risk by using preserving powders."

Write to Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., for Farmers' Bulletins No. 203 and No. 521, giving instructions as to best methods of preserving and canning fruits and vegetables without the use of preserving powders or canning compounds; also for Forms N. R. 22, 23, 24, 34 and 37 of the Office of Extension Work; all to be had free for the asking, and you do not even have to enclose stamps for postage.

Back to The Land

IT is reported that Secretary of the Interior Lane and Secretary of Labor Wilson are working on a plan to relieve the congested condition of the large cities by removing a part of the great army of unemployed from our commercial and industrial centers and placing them on the farms where their labor is needed.

It is to be hoped that their efforts may be successful, for something must be done to check the ever growing tendency to concentration of population in the cities where the labor market is already overstocked to the extent that tens of thousands of men are idle because there are no jobs for them there while the rural sections are suffering because of the scarcity of farm laborers. All previous efforts in this direction have failed, and the failures were due to a considerable extent to the preference of these idlers for a half starved existence in the most squalid quarter of a city rather than work under the isolated conditions of farm life.

Most of our unemployed laborers are foreign born, and the trouble starts, or rather started long ago in our government's handling, or rather neglect to handle the million or more immigrants that the steamship companies have been permitted to dump annually on our shores. Care should have been taken in the beginning to distribute a large part of these immigrants through the rural sections and give them employment on the farms instead of allowing them to concentrate in the large cities. But as they flocked together until each city of any size now has a separate colony of immigrants from each country of Europe and Asia, it is only natural that all new arrivals should seek out and settle down to live with the people of their own nationality.

So strong has this tendency become that even the peasants from the farming sections of Europe, who are skilled agriculturists and would naturally look for employment as farm hands here, stop in the cities with friends that have there preceded them and turn their hands to unfamiliar lines of work and live crowded together in most unhealthful conditions. The strong constitutions which outdoor life in the old country gave them usually enable them to stand the strain, but their children born and raised here under such unfavorable conditions are likely to be, and in many cases are weak and puny if not actually diseased physically and depraved morally.

The city dweller though once sturdy, in periods of unemployment inevitably gravitates to the slums, and in this deadly and depressing environment, manhood, character and health disappear, and shiftlessness, hopelessness, degeneracy and crime take their place.

To rescue those who are headed slumward before the evil influences of the gutter have done their blighting work, is surely the highest form of philanthropy, or rather the highest form of statesmanship, for there can be no loftier national ideal than maintaining a high standard of physical and moral health among the citizens of any country.

The country makes men, the city destroys them. This truism has been brought home with crushing force to the people of Great Britain. A little over a century ago the people of the British Isles were essentially an agricultural people. It was the sturdy country lads, wagoner and plowman, that comprised the thin red line against which the mighty Napoleon, at Waterloo, hurled his invincible Old Guard in vain. But the call of the cities, the lure of higher wages, stripped the countryside of the brawny sons of Britain, and in two or three generations, the descendants of the lusty plowman have become narrow-chested weaklings, drink saturated degenerates. The close air and the monotonous toil of the factory, the reeking odor of the slum, the substitution of alcohol for nourishing food, have done their work. These evil influences have so lowered the physical standards of the nation that Britain finds it impossible to fill her battle line with men physically fit to stand the fearful strain of the trenches and meet in combat the soldiers of conscript nations who by enforced military service have been kept in a high state of physical efficiency.

In the event of war we shall find, even as Britain has found, that the slums of New York, Chicago, Patterson, Fall River, Lawrence, Lowell and other great industrial centers, hold but few men physically capable of striking a blow in defense of these shores.

There is a lesson in all this for the people of these United States. Get the people out of the crowded, unhealthy cities, get them away from the saloons and brothels where men are destroyed, to God's green countryside where men are made.

Rural Credits

MUCH as our government has done to promote the agricultural interests of the country it has been inexcusably negligent of the financial needs of the farmers. Ample capital is necessary to the success of any business enterprise. and farming is no exception to the rule.

Most business depends more or less on borrowed capital, and to insure an ample supply for business men at reasonable interest rates Congress recently revised our currency system and created twelve National Reserve Banks with power to issue bank bills to meet the financial needs of the country. This has not helped the farmers who still have to pay exorbitant interest rates for loans.

European governments have what is called a "rural credit" system whereby the farmers can borrow money at four per cent interest.

The last Congress had the matter under discussion, and it is confidently expected that the present Congress, at its coming session next winter, will establish a rural credit system whereby American farmers will be enabled to borrow necessary capital, at a low interest rate, for improving, equipping and operating their farms.

The Chimney Sweeps of Berlin

Among the sufferers from the war now raging are the chimney sweeps of Berlin. Ever since the reign of Frederick the Great, a practise has existed of entertaining the chimney sweeps at a huge dinner at Christmas time, several hundred guests enjoying the feast.

As a pleasant ending to the function each sweep is given a monetary gift from a fund existing for the purpose. It is feared that this dinner will not take place this Christmas. It commemorates the fact that the son of a nobleman, who had been kidnapped as a child in England, was later discovered in Berlin working as an apprentice to a chimney sweep, who had adopted him treating him with marked kindness.

This nobleman was a great friend of Frederick the Great, so great a friend that Frederick always kept him near and at his death, Frederick attended his funeral in person. It was at this funeral that Frederick the Great is said to have shed the only tears that he was ever known to have shed in public.

On our side of the Atlantic chimney sweeps are little known now nowadays, but in Europe the sweep with his grimy clothes and sooty face continues to be a familiar and picturesque figure, both in actual life as well as in fiction.

In England the chimney sweeps have lots to do and there is a London firm known as Chimney Sweeps to King George, who have the task of caring for the 600 chimneys of Buckingham palace.

Their work is done entirely by feeling, for their eyes are blindfolded and they climb up the chimneys in the old-fashioned way, sweeping the chimneys of the royal kitchens regularly once a week, but the other chimneys are swept only three times a year.

Chimney sweeping has realized a fortune of over $15.000 for one of its exponents in England.

Gold and Silver of U. S.

Statistics compiled by the U. S. geological survey show that the gold mined in this country in 1913 amounted to nearly 4,300,000 ounces, valued at $88,884,000. The silver produced amounted to 66,800,000 ounces, valued at 40,300,000. In order of their importance in gold production, California ranks first, Colorado second and Alaska third. The silver producing states, in order of their importance, are Nevada, Montana and Utah.

This Department is conducted solely for the use of COMFORT sisters, whereby they may give expression to their ideas relative to the home and home surroundings, and to all matters pertaining to themselves and families; as well as opening a way for personal correspondence between each other.

Our object is to extend a helping hand to COMFORT subscribers; to become coworkers with all who seek friendship, encouragement, sympathy or assistance through the interchange of ideas.

Any abuse of this privilege, such as inviting correspondence for the purpose of offering an article for sale, or undertaking to charge a sum of money for ideas, recipes or information mentioned in any letter appearing in this department, if reported, will result in the offender being denied the use of these columns.

Do not ask us to print letters requesting patterns, quilt pieces, etc., for the purpose of, or with the expectation of receiving the equivalent in return, for this is not an exchange column.

Do not ask us to publish letters requesting money contributions or donations of any sort. Much as as we sympathize with the suffering and unfortunate, it is impossible to do this as we would be flooded with similar requests.

Do not request souvenir postals unless you have complied with the conditions which entitles you to such a notice. See postal request notice in another column.

We cordially invite mothers and daughters of all ages to write to COMFORT Sisters' Corner. Every letter will be carefully read and considered, and then the most helpful ones chosen for publication, whether the writer be an old or new subscriber.

Please write only on one side of the paper, and recipes on a separate sheet.

Always give your correct and full name and address, very plainly written; otherwise your letter will receive no attention.

Address all letters for this department to MRS. WHEELER WILKINSON, Care COMFORT, AUGUSTA, MAINE.

THE following letter from Ethel Williams, wherein she writes of the pleasure given and received from story reading, or telling to children, brings to mind the manner in which a young friend of mine endeared herself to the children and parents of the community in which she lived and which might be satisfactorily carried out by any of my COMFORT girls.

The youngest of the family, her parents were loath to have her leave home, but the work there occupied so small a part of her time that the mother saw signs of discontent and being a wise mother knew that idleness was, in this instance, "the root of all evil." As the girl was expert in the use of the needle, a sewing club for the little girls was suggested and a room set apart for that purpose in the girl's home.

The plan was hailed with delight, not only by the children but by the mothers for it is a generally recognized fact that anything as work is tiresome to the average child, but is pleasure under any other guise.

At first, the dolls were the only ones to benefit materially but as soon as the little hands became more accustomed to the needle and the stitches fine and even, articles of wearing apparel were made.

Each child, by her own personal efforts, earned a certain sum of money and with this was purchased material necessary for a complete outfit for a small child. In addition to the fun of making, and the knowledge gained thereby, the children experienced the joy of giving when on the completion of the clothes they were given to a poor child of the neighborhood. Truly charity is a lesson many grown people have yet to learn.

The harmonious blending of colors was indirectly taught and as a special incentive for good work an exhibition was given to which parents and friends were invited to inspect the result of the small seamstress' labors.

Lest it should become tiresome, the teacher, remembering her own childhood, devoted a short time to exercise and recreation, joining in the games with the children.

This is merely the idea in outline and doubtless better ideas will suggest themselves to the girl with an afternoon to spare and she may feel sure that her efforts will be rewarded.—Ed.

MINIDOKA, IDAHO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have taken COMFORT several years and enjoy reading the sisters' letters and get a great many good ideas from them.

I enjoy the sisters' letters so much more when they give a description of their personal appearance, and cannot see that it is in any manner frivolous or vain, as one of the sisters seemed to think.

Don't you think it seems more like reading a letter from one's own friend when the writer describes herself? I do, so I will give a description of myself. I have dark brown hair and brown eyes, am five feet four and one half inches tall, weigh about one hundred and thirty pounds and am twenty-five years old.

How many of the sisters tell stories to the little folks in the evenings and at bedtime, especially in the winter when the evenings are long? I think they enjoy being told good stories at bedtime even more than most grown-up people realize. I love to get several little people together in the evening and tell them stories, and have had some that were too young to understand what was being said sit and listen as attentively as the older ones.

If any of the mothers who are unfamiliar with good story books for the little folks wish me to I will send a list of them together with the publisher, if they will enclose a stamped envelope. I am familiar with a good many, having had several years' experience as a teacher.

How many of the sisters memorize the pretty lines and pieces of poetry that they find in the various papers and magazines? I memorize a lot of them and here is an especialy pretty one that I found in a little floral magazine:

"Who daily treads within the path of duty,
And heeds its careful promptings every day;
His eyes shall see the King in all His beauty,
They shall behold the land so far away."

Isn't the present war a terrible thing—so many thousands of lives lost and homes destroyed. I think if the mothers of every land would teach their boys and girls that there is no honor and glory in war—only death, destruction and desolation,—that it would not be very long until war with all its horrors would be a thing of the past. Considering the great amount of time, money, and care it takes to raise a boy up to manhood and then to have him shot in a few minutes, war seems one of the most foolish things that a civilized people can engage in. If all parents would teach their boys never to go to war unless their country was actually invaded or was being oppressed as ours was at the time of the Revolution it would help to eliminate war.

How many of the COMFORT mothers are trying to help develop any special ability or talent that their own children possess? I think if a boy or girl shows any special desire or talent in any certain thing that the parents should by all means give them all of the help and encouragement they can, even though the parents had had their hearts set on making something else out of the child. This is an age of specialization and it seems too sad to see so many people drifting around for lack of a development of their own talents or abilities.

I would enjoy letters from the sisters as I am a bachelor girl and am living alone on a homestead and the days sometimes seem long.

Comfort Sisters' Recipes

LEMON PIE.—Grated rind of two lemons, two cups of sugar, three and one half tablespoons of flour. Stir them all together, then add one egg and yolks of two more beaten. Beat thoroughly, then add the juice of two lemons, two and one half cups boiling water, butter the size of an egg. Boil in double boiler until thick. Make pastry for pie and bake with one crust twenty or twenty-five minutes. Beat the whites of two eggs light, add two tablespoons of sugar, pour on pie when cold. Put in oven and brown.

SHORT CAKE.—Two cups flour, two teaspoons cream of tartar, one teaspoon soda, one quarter cup of butter or lard, worked into flour. Milk enough to work well. Bake with batter between.

WATER FRITTERS.—One egg, well beaten, one and one half cups cold water, one quarter of a cup of lard or butter, melted, one half teaspoon soda, one teaspoon cream of tartar and one half teaspoon salt in flour enough for batter.

SQUASH MUFFINS.—One cup of squash, one half cup sugar, one cup milk, one egg, heaping teaspoon of butter, two cups of flour, one teaspoon of soda, two teaspoons cream of tartar, salt. Bake in gem pans.

CHOCOLATE PIE.—Three tablespoons of grated chocolate, one teaspoon of flour, one cup of sugar, three tablespoons of cold water, and yolks of two eggs, beaten light. Stir until smooth, pour over the mixture one cup of boiling water, cook three minutes, add a pinch of salt and flavor with vanilla. Line a pie plate with paste, bake until done in hot oven, pour the mixture in and beat the white of the two eggs stiff with three tablespoons of sugar, and pile on top of the pie. Return to oven to brown slightly.

WHOLE WHEAT BREAD.—Two cups milk, one half cup molasses or brown sugar, salt, one half yeast cake, four and one half cups whole wheat; mix at night; in morning, beat well and turn into bread pans; let rise again, about half as much as first time and bake.—Ed.

MOLASSES LAYER CAKE.—Cream two tablespoons of butter and two tablespoons of sugar; add one egg and beat well, then one cup of molasses, one half cup of warm water in which one teaspoon of soda has been dissolved, one half teaspoon of cinnamon and two cups of flour. Beat well and bake in layers, with any desired filling. MRS. BRYANT, Smyrna, Maine.

COFFEE CAKE.—One and one half cups sugar, one half cup molasses, one cup butter, one cup strong coffee, three and one half cups flour, one cup raisins, two eggs, one teaspoon soda, one teaspoon each, cinnamon, nutmeg and cloves.

MOCHA FROSTING.—One cup powdered sugar creamed with one eighth pound butter, two tablespoons strong coffee and four teaspoons cocoa.

MOLASSES COOKIES.—One half cup molasses, one half cup sugar, one egg, one half cup milk, one quarter cup butter, two and one half cups flour, three quarters teaspoon soda, one teaspoon cinnamon. Drop from a teaspoon onto greased tin.

PUMPKIN PIE.—Cut the pumpkin in slices and boil until tender in as little water as possible. Drain, mash and rub through a sieve, adding a little butter while warm. To every quart of the mashed pumpkin add one quart of milk and four eggs. Sweeten to taste and add cinnamon and nutmeg as desired. Pour into crust and bake in hot oven.

CHOCOLATE COOKIES.—One half cup butter, one tablespoon of lard, one cup of sugar, one egg, salt, two squares of chocolate, one half teaspoon cinnamon, two and one quarter cups of flour, two teaspoons baking powder and one quarter cup milk. Cream the butter and lard together and add the sugar, then the egg, well beaten. Beat well and add the flour, mixed and sifted with the baking powder, salt and cinnamon, alternately with the milk, then add chocolate, melted. Roll very thin and bake in moderate oven.

RAISIN PIE.—Soak one half cup of large, soft raisins, seeded, in one cup of water for two hours. Beat one egg with one cup of sugar, add the juice and part of grated rind of one lemon, with one tablespoon of flour and one teaspoon of corn-starch, then the raisins and water in which they have been soaking. Cook until the mixture thickens. Cool and bake in two crusts.—Ed.

ORANGE MARMALADE.—Two oranges, one lemon. Wash, remove the seeds, and run all through the meat grinder. Measure and to every cup of the orange and lemon add one and one half cups cold water, more if you like the clear jelly, boil thirty minutes, covered. Set away for twenty-four hours, then measure, and to each cup add one and one half cups of sugar and boil thirty or thirty-five minutes when it should jelly. This will make eight glasses.

MRS. BULAH ZIEGLER, Arnold, Kans.

CREAM OF PEARS.—A dainty cold dessert is cream of pears. To make it, boil one cup of rice until very soft; drain off all the starchy cooking water, if any remains, but if properly washed and cooked it will be a white mass. Cool, then add one half cup rich milk, a small cup of sugar, a pinch of salt, and two pears which have been cut in small pieces and steamed until tender. Canned pears will need no more cooking. Simmer all for a few minutes, mash the pears and pour all in a wet mold. Serve with cream and sugar. JANIE SCHNELL, Canton, Ill.

SOFT GINGERBREAD.—One egg, one half cup sugar, one half cup molasses, one quarter teaspoon ginger, one third cup butter, one half cup cold water, one half teaspoon soda dissolved in the water, one and one half cups of flour.

INDIVIDUAL APPLE SALAD.—Well colored, red apples are more effective in appearance for this salad. Cut a slice from the stem end thick enough to include the stem, which answers as a handle. Scoop out the center of the apple, being careful not to cut the pieces too small, and also leave a perfect shell. Mix the apple with an equal quantity of celery, one half cup chopped walnuts, one half cup grapes, Malaga grapes are best, chopped and seeded. Mix with a mild salad dressing. Fill the apple shells with the salad and cover the tops. Serve on salad plates with lettuce leaves.—Ed.

BAKED APPLE PUDDING.—Into a pint baking dish peel and slice two medium-sized apples and add sugar and spices to taste, one half cup of water and cover with a soft dough made of three quarters cup of flour, one teaspoon baking powder, one tablespoon sugar, a pinch of salt, and milk to make a thick batter. Bake thirty to forty-five minutes in moderate oven.

MRS. W. B. ELMORE, Mt. Pleasant, Iowa.

STEAMED APPLE PUDDING.—One cup milk, two cups flour, two teaspoons baking powder, a little salt, beat quickly; put one spoonful batter into each cup, then sliced apples, a little sugar, and cinnamon if liked, another spoonful of batter until the cups are full. Steam three quarters of an hour.

MRS. N. H. GARDINIER, 1026 Orange St., Youngstown, Ohio.

DROP BISCUITS.—Take one quart of flour, two heaping teaspoons baking powder, two tablespoons melted butter or lard. Stir in enough sweet milk to make stiff batter. Drop in hot gem pans and bake in quick oven.

CREAM BISCUITS.—Sift together several times one quart of flour, two teaspoons of baking powder and one level spoon of salt; work in one tablespoon of butter and a tablespoon of cream. Roll about an inch thick and bake in hot oven.

ENTIRE WHEAT BREAD.—Two cups scalded milk, one quarter cup of sugar, or one third cup molasses, one teaspoon salt, one yeast cake dissolved in one quarter cup lukewarm water, four and three quarters cups coarse wheat flour. Add sweetening and salt to milk, cool, and when lukewarm add dissolved yeast cake and flour; beat well, cover, and let rise to double its bulk. Again beat, and turn into greased pans, having pans one half full. Let rise and bake.

DELICIOUS CAKE.—One cup sugar, piece of butter size of an egg, one half cup milk, one half teaspoon of soda dissolved in milk, two cups of flour, one teaspoon cream of tartar put in flour, one teaspoon vanilla. One square of melted chocolate added makes a delicious cake.—Ed.

CANNED PUMPKIN.—Wash outside clean and cut up. Place in a kettle and put plenty of water on and cover. When cooked tender, take off cover and dry down, stirring often. Put through sieve and fill cans nearly full adding a little salt, then put in boiler or deep pan, being careful that cans do not touch and just lay tops on and pour cold water in boiler or pan about half way up the can and boil fifteen minutes; tighen covers and boil one hour; remove from boiler and set away but do not touch tops.

MRS. FRED CARPENTER, Hermon, N. Y.

CHEESE CROQUETTES.—Three tablespoons melted butter, five tablespoons flour, two thirds cup of milk, yolk two eggs, one cup American cheese, cut in small pieces, one half cup Swiss cheese, grated. Cook butter, flour, milk and eggs until thick; add American and Swiss cheese, salt and cayenne; cook till cheese is melted; chill; shape in balls, dip in crumbs, in beaten egg and in crumbs again and fry in deep fat, hot enough to brown a piece of bread in forty seconds.

CHEESE FRITTERS.—Cut some narrow fingers of cheese and place them in a dish with a little oil, vinegar and pepper. When sufficiently seasoned, dip them in a light batter and fry a golden brown. Serve with chopped parsley sprinkled over them.

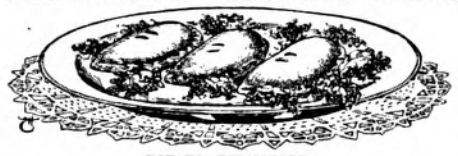
SCALLOPED PEAS WITH CHEESE.—Heat one can of peas or equal quantity of dried peas, cooked until soft. In a baking dish, put a layer of cracker crumbs, with butter, salt and pepper, a layer of peas, then cracker crumbs, etc., until dish is nearly full; then a layer of grated cheese on top, with enough milk to cover. Bake until browned.—Ed.

CHEESE STRAWS.—Mix one cup of grated cheese, with one cup flour, one half teaspoon salt, pinch cayenne pepper, butter size of an egg, one egg and enough cold water to enable you to roll the crust thin; cut in strips and brown in oven.

DOROTHY A. RACE, Milford, N. J.

SCALLOPED CHEESE.—To one cup of boiling milk add one tablespoon of butter, one half teaspoon of salt, one cup of bread crumbs, one quarter pound of cheese, cut in small pieces. Stir thoroughly. Beat three eggs, the yolks and whites separately. Add the yolks first and whites last. Bake in moderate oven for thirty minutes. Serve hot.

MISS MABEL BEANE, Oakland, Cal.



BAKED MACARONI AND OYSTERS.—Cook macaroni in salted water. When done, drain thoroughly. Put alternate layers of macaroni and oysters in a deep dish, seasoning the macaroni with grated cheese. Bake until brown having the top layer of macaroni and cheese.

CREAMED ONIONS.—Six onions, cut into small pieces. When boiled, pour off the water and make the cream of one half cup flour and cold water, well mixed; let boil, salt and pepper to taste.

CREAMED SWEET POTATOES.—Wash, pare and cook sweet potatoes in boiling salted water. Drain and let them stand until cold and then cut them up in cubes. Place in a sauce pan and to two cups add two tablespoons of butter and cook three minutes. Season with salt and pepper. To two tablespoons of flour add one cupful of rich milk. Pour over the potatoes and cook slowly for twenty minutes.

POTATOES BAKED IN CREAM.—Peel six raw, medium-sized potatoes, cut them in thin slices, place in a buttered baking dish, season with one half teaspoon of salt and a dash of cayenne, pour in one cup of cream, cover with crumbs, dot with butter cut into bits and sprinkle with cheese. Bake about forty-five minutes.

POTATO TURNOVERS.—Mash left-over potatoes and season, add one beaten egg and flour enough to enable the mixture to be rolled. Roll out to size of a saucer.

POTATO TURNOVERS.

Place on one half of it, seasoned and chopped meat, fold the other half and place in oven long enough to brown. Serve on celery leaves.—Ed.

VEAL LOAF.—Chop very fine three pounds of veal, taken from the leg, a quarter of a pound of pork, one cupful of bread crumbs, three teaspoons of salt, one of black pepper, a scant half teaspoon of cayenne and a pinch of cloves. Work in thoroughly two raw eggs. Put in a mold, shut tightly and steam two hours. Remove and set in the oven to dry, leaving the oven door open. When cold, turn out of mold, cut in slices very thin and serve with meat jelly.

BEEF CURRY.—Coarsely chop one large or two small onions and fry them slowly in two tablespoons of butter until nicely colored; add one teaspoonful of curry powder and cook for three minutes, then one pound of raw beef from any lean part. Brown one tablespoon of flour and mix it in a cupful of stock or gravy. Bring to the boiling point, add the juice of a sour orange and two tablespoons of apple sauce or one tart apple chopped fine. Simmer until the meat is very tender and serve with a dish of plain boiled rice.

CORNED BEEF HASH.—Two cups of meat, finely chopped, the quantity of potatoes being larger than that of meat. If one cares for onion cut up a small one very fine. Then into your spider put a generous piece of butter and your meat, potato and onion mixed thoroughly together. Over this pour milk to moisten. The longer you cook the hash the better it is. Season with salt and pepper to taste.

J. E. D., Malden, Mass.

CHICKEN SALAD.—Boil a chicken until tender. Cut meat off the bones and put through a meat chopper. Put this back into two cupfuls of the liquid in which it has been boiled and thicken with either corn-starch or flour, and cook five minutes. Pour into small molds or cups and press half a hard boiled egg into the center (cut side up), and set aside to cool. When serving place the molds on salad leaves and serve with mayonnaise dressing. Veal can be used in the same way.

SCALLOPED CODFISH.—Place in a shallow dish alternate layers of thinly sliced fried pork, potatoes, onions and codfish that has been freshened. Lastly a layer of bread crumbs. Each layer should be seasoned with salt and pepper. Over the last layer pour milk to moisten thoroughly. Bake in a covered dish one hour. Milk may be added occasionally. Remove cover to brown.

CREAMED EGGS.—Boil and cut into slices six eggs make a sauce by creaming one level tablespoon of butter with two and one half tablespoons of flour and adding one pint of cream or milk; let it boil for three minutes. Season with teaspoon of salt and a dash of pepper mixing it thoroughly. In a baking dish put in a layer of cream, one of eggs, alternating until all are used. Sprinkle cracker crumbs over the top, dot with pieces of butter and brown in the oven.

DELICIOUS BEAKFAST DISH.—Beat whites of four eggs stiff. Toast four slices of bread a light brown, dip them quickly in hot water and spread lightly with butter. Pile the whites on toast and place a yolk in the center of each and bake three minutes. Season the whites with a little salt before beating.

FRIED CARROTS.—Pare and boil two good-sized carrots; cut into thin slices, dip in egg and bread crumbs and fry in smoking-hot fat. Cold carrots may be recooked in this way.

RELISH FOR COLD MEAT.—Boil young beets till tender, remove the skin and shred with a silver fork. To one cupful of beet, add one third cupful of grated horseradish with salt and vinegar to taste.—Ed.

THE LITTLE MARPLOT

Serial rights by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

By Mrs. Georgie Sheldon

This grand story is one of the very best that this popular author has written. The heroine is such a gentle, lovable character, yet so brave and resourceful mid the cruel snares cast about her by her cunning, plotting, relentless rival, that she challenges the reader's admiration and stirs the heart's strongest emotions. The story is full of action, opening with a perilous situation and moving rapidly through a succession of startling events to the final solution of a baffling mystery. The desperate extremities to which love, hate and insatiate ambition carry a jealous woman appear in the working out of a wonderful plot. Read the opening chapters here and you will be keen for the rest of this interesting story which will follow in large monthly installments.

CHAPTER I.

A LOST PURSE.

"I ASSURE you, sir, that I purchased my ticket before I came aboard the boat; but, during the night, my purse, containing my ticket and all my money, was stolen from me."

"Bah! miss; that is an old, worn-out dodge, and I've had it tried on me too many times not to know what it means. I must have your ticket or you cannot leave the boat."

The above conversation had occurred on the lower deck of one of the elegant Sound steamers that ply between Fall River and New York.

The girl was a little above the medium height, with a trim, graceful figure, and a certain air that at once impressed the beholder that she had been well reared, in spite of the plainness of her attire and certain unmistakable evidences of poverty.

Her face could not be distinctly seen, for she wore a thick, blue veil; but the contour and pose of her small head were remarkably pretty, while the wealth of golden hair that crowned it—fine and glossy as satin—betrayed the fact that she was a blonde of the purest type.

"My money and ticket were stolen——"

"Humph!" he interrupted; "did you tell the stewardess of your loss?" he demanded.

"I did, and she assisted me in my search."

"Was there much money in your purse?"

"About five dollars," faltered the girl, tremulously, "and—and it was all the money I had," she unwisely added.

"Really, miss, it's a very pathetic story," sneered the official, "but it won't go down with me."

With an impulsive upward sweep of one small, shabbily-gloved hand, the maiden threw back her heavy veil, thus disclosing a ravishingly-beautiful face and a pair of wonderful blue eyes which, with the indignation that blazed forth from their mystic depths, seemed at that moment to be almost black.

"You doubt my word," she said, haughtily. "I would not tell a lie for the price of a hundred tickets, and, had not my loss rendered me absolutely penniless, I would gladly pay my fare over rather than bandy words with you. Where is your captain? I will appeal to him."

She was exquisitely lovely in her spirited indignation, and the officer's coarse face involuntarily relaxed into an expression of bold admiration, while there sprang into his evil eyes a look that made her instinctively shrink away from him a step or two.

"Tut, tut! pretty one," he said, insinuatingly. "I didn't dream that you were such a little firebrand; but," glancing searchingly around to assure himself that they were still the only persons in that portion of the boat, "never mind about the captain; just give me a kiss from those sweet lips of yours, then we'll say no more about the ticket; and perhaps I'll give you a lift on your way besides."

"Sir!" indignantly began the fair girl.

"Hush up! you haughty little empress," warningly interposed her companion, "such airs will not help your cause; you are in my power, and now I'm going to have that kiss, whether you will or not——"

As he spoke, he rudely laid hold of her shoulder with one hand, and was about to encircle her slight form with his other arm when, before the frightened girl—who was almost paralyzed with fear—could even cry out for help, a manly figure sprang into view, seized the wretch by the collar from behind, and the next moment he lay sprawling upon the deck, while his half fainting victim staggered weakly up against a partition for support.

Presently she was conscious that a tall form was bending over her and a kind, pitiful face looking into hers, while a rich, mellow voice murmured reassuringly in her ear:

"Young lady, pray calm yourself—you have nothing more to fear from that coward, who shall answer to his superior officer for the insult he has dared to offer you."

As the blur, which had obscured her vision, began to clear away, the girl found herself looking into the handsome, almost ideal, face of a young man whose splendid physique, grandly-shaped head, and classic features made her think of the pictures that she had seen of the Apollo Belvedere.

A great sigh of relief and thankfulness escaped her white lips, for she knew, instinctively, that she had found a protector, who, in spite of her poverty and misfortune, would befriend and respect her because of his reverence for womanhood in whatever sphere of life.

"I congratulate myself," the gentleman continued, "that I was obliged to return to the steamer just at this time, having carelessly left a package in my stateroom. How does it happen, if I may be allowed to know, that you have been detained so long aboard the boat? If I am not mistaken, I saw you among the other passengers last evening."

In a few brief sentences the unfortunate maiden told her story, while her companion listened attentively, studying her fair, ingenuous face with shrewd, earnest eyes.

"That girl has no ticket, and she can't leave the boat until her fare is paid!" exclaimed the petty officer, struggling to his feet.

"Don't pesume to utter another word in this lady's presence, unless you wish to repeat the experience of a few moments ago," the stranger sternly commanded. "Ah! here is the captain," he added, as he saw that official descending the steps of the companionway.

"What's the meaning of this?" the captain gravely questioned, as he approached the trio.

"That girl is a stowaway, sir; she was trying to sneak off the boat when, as I stopped her, this young cad interfered and knocked me down," excitedly interposed the under officer.

"Yes, I knocked him down," calmly returned the gentleman, in response to the look of inquiry which the captain bent upon him; "but it was because he insulted the lady, not because I had any wish to interfere with the performance of his duty."

Then he proceeded to give a brief account of what he had seen and heard, while his listener's face grew black with wrath at the disgraceful disclosure.

He turned at the close of the recital to the cringing, sullen villain, who was slyly edging his way toward the companionway, and said, in a voice of thunder:

"Knave, you are discharged! Get you gone, and never dare show yourself on this vessel again!" and, casting looks of hatred upon the two who witnessed his dismissal, the poor wretch shrank out of sight.

"And so you think your purse was stolen?" the captain continued, turning to the young girl and speaking with great kindness.

"I do not know how else to account for its loss," she replied, "for I put it carefully under my pillow just before I retired."

"Have you any baggage?"

"Only this, and a small trunk containing what clothing I have," she answered, as she held out a worn handsatchel, which she opened, revealing some clean handkerchiefs and a few modest toilet articles.

Just at that moment a colored woman came running up from the cabin.

"Oh, captain!" she breathlessly exclaimed, upon seeing him, although she could not see the young girl who was standing behind his portly form, "a poor little miss lost her purse last night, and had to go off the boat this morning without a cent of money——Why, here she is now!" she interposed, as the object of her sympathy started forward, with a low, glad cry. "I've found it, honey," the good-natured stewardess went on, as she triumphantly held out a cheap little pocketbook. "It must have slipped down among the folds of the curtains and got kicked under the lower berth, where I came across it while I was sweeping."

"Oh, thank you! thank you! I am so glad!"

With trembling, but eager, fingers the maiden opened it, and found the much-needed ticket inside.

"Now, I can prove that my fare was paid, and my story true," she said, with a charming little air of triumph, as she passed the required bit of pasteboard to the captain, a smile, like a gleam of sunshine, lighting up her beautiful eyes and chasing the clouds from her lovely face.

"And is your money also safe?" he kindly inquired.

"Yes, sir," she responded, but flushing slightly, as, with a single glance, she estimated the meager amount.

"I am very glad," said the officer, with a friendly accent, "but I regret exceedingly that you should have met with such an annoying experience on a vessel under my command. Is there anything I can do to assist you further? If so, I am at your service."

"Thank you, no; I believe I can do very well, now that I have my money;" she began, when her champion interposed, with a courteous bow:

"I understood you to say that you have a trunk; pray allow me to find it for you, and see you safely in a carriage to take you to your destination."

"You are very kind, but—I—I think I shall not need a carriage," she faltered, blushing; "but I will be obliged to you if you will tell me the easiest way to reach this address," she concluded, taking a scrap of paper from her purse to give him.

The captain intercepted it.

"I will attend to the young lady, sir," he quietly observed; "but I thank you heartily, on her behalf and my own also, for your timely assistance and protection."

"I am very glad to leave her in such good hands," the stranger courteously replied; then, lifting his hat in a respectful salutation to his fair charge, he went his way.

The captain conducted his companion to the wharf, where he soon found her trunk, then secured a carriage, and put her into it.

"Young lady," he remarked, with a friendly smile, as he closed the door of the vehicle, "I know this man, and he will take you safely to your destination, so do not give yourself any uneasiness if the ride seems long to you. Your fare is paid, too—that much is due you for the delay and annoyance to which you have been subjected. Good morning."

He touched his cap, smiled cheerily into her face, signaled the driver to move on, and the next moment the grateful girl was on her way uptown.

Just as she rolled off the pier, she glanced out of the window on her right, and caught a glimpse of the handsome stranger who had so opportunely come to her rescue.

His eyes were upon her, and, as she met his glance, he raised his hat again. She flushed with pleasure, her red lips parted in a charming smile as she nodded in response to his salute.

The next moment she had passed him.

"How kind—how grand he was!" she murmured, the flush still on her cheeks. "I wonder if I shall ever see him again. I wish I could learn his name."

The young man himself was indulging in a similar soliloquy.

"She is the daintiest little bit of humanity I have ever seen," he mused. "I wonder who she is!"

CHAPTER II.

A STRANGE LEGACY.

Ruth Reynolds was the name of the heroine described in our previous chapter.

She was a Green Mountain lassie, having been born in a quiet town in Vermont, where her father had for many years acted as spiritual guide to a staid and respectable flock.

Ruth's mother had died about a year before the opening of our story, and now she had just lost her father also.

Mr. Reynolds had been failing for months, and, as he drew near his end, he was appalled by the thought that he would have to leave his sensitive, beautiful daughter alone and penniless in the world.

They had no relatives, scarcely a friend in all the world outside his humble parish; to whom he could apply in his daughter's behalf; the only feasible plan he could think of was to write to a lady in New York, who had once professed herself a devoted friend to Mrs. Reynolds, and ask her to put Ruth in the way of doing something for her own support.

Acting upon this thought, he wrote an appealing letter to her, but up to within two weeks of his death no reply had come, and he was at that time in a distressing state of suspense regarding the future of his child.

"My poor darling!" he exclaimed, one day, while giving her some instructions and advice, "I have absolutely nothing to leave you as an heirloom, save that old cane, which once belonged to your mother's grandfather."

As he spoke, Mr. Reynolds glanced, with a half-pathetic, half-amused smile, at the clumsy, ancient-looking relic that rested upon two brass hooks above the mantel.

"My mother's grandfather!" Ruth repeated, in surprise as her glance followed his. "I thought it belonged to her father."

"Yes," gravely returned Mr. Reynolds, "I know that is what you have always been told; but it is supposed to have been handed down from several generations back of him, although there was a great obstacle in the way of your grandfather Allenwood claiming kinship with them."

"How so?" questioned Ruth.

"The story has anything but a pleasant flavor—indeed, it is hardly suitable for your ears; still something impels me to tell it."

Mr. Reynolds opened a drawer in his desk as he spoke, and, taking out a small book, opened it, thus revealing its pages closely written over and read the following account:

"Amos Rothwick was the eldest son of Sir Roger Rothwick—in whose veins flowed some of England's best blood—of Rothwick Castle, Derbyshire. He was said to be a wild, dissolute fellow in his youth and a world-wide rover. Upon the death of his father he was summoned home to assume charge of the estate and assume his proper position in the world. A few months later he married, with great pomp and ceremony, a young woman above him in point of rank, but poor in this world's goods, although she possessed an excessively proud and arrogant nature. One child was born to them, a sturdy boy, who gave great promise of being the counterpart of his mother both in features and disposition. But, soon after his birth, Sir Amos and his haughty wife had a terrible quarrel, which ended in their becoming utterly estranged, although they continued to dwell under the same roof. This quarrel was caused by Lady Rothwick discovering, in some mysterious way, that her husband had formed a romantic attachment before she became his wife; that, during his 'wild days,' he had lured a beautiful girl—the daughter of one of his father's tenants—into a pretended secret marriage; that a son had been the result of this 'liaison,' as her ladyship termed it, and the 'precious pair' were still being supported out of the Rothwick coffers. Robert Allenwood was the name of this unfortunate boy——"

"Oh, papa! not my mother's father!" exclaimed beautiful Ruth Reynolds, her face suddenly crimsoning with mingled shame and dismay.

"Yes, dear; I told you the story had an unpleasant flavor. But, in spite of the disagreeable fact, Robert Allenwood grew up a noble boy, inheriting his mother's virtues, without his father's vices. And now we come to the story of the cane," said Mr. Reynolds, referring again to the book.

"Sir Amos continued to care for the child and his mother, notwithstanding his haughty wife's displeasure, although he removed them to a distant shire beyond her reach. He even visited them once or twice a year, and upon one occasion took the Rothwick cane with him. It was surmounted with a finely carved horse's head and was given to Robert 'to play with,' while the gentleman talked with his mother. But when Sir Amos was ready to go and demanded his cane the child cried bitterly for his steed. The baronet laughed and pacified him by telling him he should have it again some time—that he would 'will it to him when he died.' The boy never forgot the promise and frequently referred to it, while his mother never attached the slightest importance to it, until one evening, just as she was retiring, there came an imperative knock upon her cottage door. Upon answering it she found Sir Amos Rothwick's valet outside, and he put into her hands the Rothwick cane and a small package——"

"Ah!" suddenly interposed Mr. Reynolds, looking up, "that reminds me that I have another heirloom for you, Ruth—I had forgotten it entirely."

Then he resumed his reading:

"The man said that his master was dying, that he he had sent the cane to the boy, as he had promised, but he must never let it go out of his family; the package was for Mrs. Allenwood. There was a letter also, the servant continued, putting his hand into his pocket for it. It was not there, however, and though he searched faithfully every receptacle on his person, it could not be found. He promised to look for it on his return to the castle, and bring it to her later; but he never returned—the letter never came to light and the poor woman never knew what message the baronet had sent her from his dying bed. Upon examining the package she found only a key——"

"A key! to what?" Ruth hastily interposed.

"My child, that was a tantalizing mystery then, and it has remained such to this day," replied her father, laying down the book. "Open that drawer again, and you will find the strange legacyq in a small box at the back."

The girl obeyed, and a moment later was curiously examining a very peculiarly-shaped key.

It was about three inches long, made of bronze, its thumb-piece ornamented with a thistle above two olive leaves, while the opposite end was shaped like a cross.

"What a strange—what a useless thing for a dying man to bequeath to that poor woman!" the young girl indignantly exclaimed.

"It certainly seems so," Mr. Reynolds replied, "but"—taking up his book again—"it says here that doubtless it was a very significant legacy, which the missing letter would have explained; but poor Mrs. Allenwood was destined never to be enlightened, and so lived out her sad life, a wronged and heartbroken woman. Robert married early in life a sensible, energetic girl, and came to America to carve out his own fortune. They settled in Montpelier, where they were wonderfully prospered for many years, only to lose everything during one of the financial crises that swept over the country.

"Robert Allenwood was a noble, whole-souled man—a man of high mental attainments and unswerving principle. Alice Edgemont was his worthy helpmate; and I, Elizabeth Allenwood Reynolds—the only living child out of five—have made a record of this strange history. My father gave me both the Rothwick cane and key just before he died, exacting a promise that I would never part with them to strangers, but hand them down as heirlooms to my children. 'They are nothing but a clumsy stick of wood and a bit of rudely-fashioned iron,' he said, 'but they are at least a link proving that the Rothwick blood flows in my veins—even though that fact brings a blush of shame to my cheek. Had my mother reared me less conscientiously, I might have been tempted to use them to work out the sentiment embodied in the Rothwick coat-of-arms—a thistle above two olive leaves—which is supposed to indicate that "a Rothwick never forgives a wrong until he is avenged."'"

"Why, papa! what a strange, strange story!" Ruth exclaimed, with a long-drawn sigh, as her father concluded and wearily laid down his book. "It is a romance indeed! a mystery so profound that there seems not the slightest hope of ever solving it, and yet," she went on, musingly, "if that letter is still in existence and could be found, what wonders it might reveal!"

"My dear child, why will you puzzle your brain over anything so useless? It is not worth your while; do not make me regret that I have told you the story," her father pleaded. "And now," he added, feebly rising, "as I am very weary, I will lie down and rest a while."

He passed into the next room, closing the door, leaving Ruth absorbed in thought over her peculiar heirlooms.

She laid down the cane and took up the key.

She started suddenly, then shivered as if some cold chill had struck her.

"How queer!" she murmured, glancing around the room half fearfully, "but something seemed to tell me that some time I shall find that lock that this key fits—that some time I shall learn that secret!"

* * * * * * * * *

Three weeks later, her father having been laid in the village churchyard beside his wife, poor, homeless, almost friendless, but dangerously beautiful Ruth Reynolds, having received the long-looked-for letter from her mother's former "friend," bade farewell to her quiet home among the Green Mountains and went out into the world to earn her own living and to meet her fate.

CHAPTER III.

AN ARDENT LOVER WINS HIS POINT.

We already know what befell our fair heroine upon her arrival in New York City, and how she escaped falling a victim to a human vulture, just as she was leaving the steamer.

After the interposition of the captain, all went well with her, and, in less than an hour, she was set down at the door of a beautiful residence on West Thirty-sixth street, the silver plate upon which bore the name of William Winslow.

Several years previous Mr. and Mrs. Winslow had both been members of Mr. Reynolds' church, and, at that time, had professed a strong friendship for their cultivated pastor and his gentle wife; but a turn in fortune's wheel had made them suddenly rich, and they had removed to New York, where they were not long in becoming launched upon the restless sea of fashionable life.

For a while the two ladies had kept up their intimacy by correspondence; but this was finally interrupted when the Winslows went to Europe. Before their return, Mrs. Reynolds sickened and died; and when her friend learned the fact, she wrote a letter of condolence to the bereaved husband, telling him that if there was anything she could do for him or his, not to fail to call upon her at any time.

Taking her at her word, the clergyman, when he found he must soon leave his child alone in the world, begged her to have a care for his one darling, and exert herself in putting the orphan

Comfort Sisters' Corner

With best wishes to Mrs. Wilkinson and all the COMFORT sisters. ETHEL WILLIAMS.

SPENCER, VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

Please let me come in for a few moments, as I hardly ever hear from a little sister. I am fifteen years old. Papa is a renter. We live on a large farm now. I have three brothers older and three sisters younger than I am.

Mamma has taken COMFORT even since I can remember. I like to read it all, but Mrs. Wilkinson I believe I like your corner the best. I like the COMFORT'S League too. I am very sorry for the poor shut-ins; I can't help them any now but if God gives me success I certainly mean to divide with the poor.

I would like to have an education but we are poor and live near no good schools so where is there a chance for me?

Eulalie Wells, I enjoyed your letter in March COMFORT. And I would like to hear from you.

Mary J. Lewis, I wish I could talk with you a while. If there were more mothers like you I think the world would be better.

Miss Maude Black, I certainly enjoyed your letter about "A Beautiful Life," and I think it did me good, I want you to write again.

Claoma Taylor, you wrote a beautiful letter on the subject of "Idleness," and there are so many nice letters! I don't know how long it would take me to write the names of all the sisters that have written beautiful letters.

Mrs. Wilkinson, you are doing a good work. I would like to shake hands with you, and talk with you a while. Please let me say a few words to mothers.

Mothers, I think you should teach your children to work while they are young. My mother always had good health and she said she just couldn't sit down and let me cook when I didn' know how, and I didn't want to learn, because I didn't know the benefit of it. When I was thirteen years old my little sister was taken sick and had to go to the hospital and mamma had to go with her. Well, I was the only cook at home and I didn't know how to make coffee. All three of my brothers were at home, hard at work. Mamma was gone seven weeks. Now, I had a hard time. I should have known how to cook simple food. How many of the sisters agree with me on that subject?

I will not describe myself as I am not very pretty. Mrs. Wilkinson, do you think any of us would be very pretty if we described our lives as well as we do our looks? I think we ought to study more about our lives any way, and not so much about our looks.

I would like to receive cards and letters, as I don't go much, and get lonesome sometimes. I will try to answer all that enclose stamps.

Wishing you all success, I am, your loving sister,
NETTIE D. SHELTON.

Nettie Shelton. The younger sisters are always welcome, particularly when they write such a sensible letter as yours. I don't want to scold, but don't you think you are giving up too easily in the matter of an education? Even if there are no good schools near, couldn't you consult with someone capable of advising you and arrange for a course of study at home. It will be more difficult I'll admit and you'll miss the companionship and school spirit, which is long remembered, but it will be worth it. Try and see.—Ed.

JOHNSTOWN, 547 Maple Ave., PA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Having just finished reading Mrs. Haggerty's letter I thought I would give my experience as I come from a large family (eight) and I think that the smaller the family, the better. In that last line of poetry where it says, "Do your best and trust to Heaven," I say it's all right to "trust to Heaven," but, Heaven won't get this child a new dress, nor that one a pair of shoes, or a hat, or whatever else is needed, especially if the wages are small, and the expenses are large, for there are nine out of every ten who earn low wages. A mother who has to divide those non-elastic dollars among many cannot give as many of them to a large family as she could to a small one.

Did you know that the largest number of men earn from eight to twelve dollars a week? And how can you clothe a large family on that, especially when food and rent is high?

I am twenty-five years of age and have been married six years; am the mother of two girls and one boy.

I would be glad to hear from anyone else on the subject of quality before quantity.

MRS. HULL.

Mrs. Hull. If you will read Mrs. Haggerty's letter again you will notice that she asks advice in governing her children, and herself, and the poem refers to that, rather than to material things. People in general are too apt to take the common, everyday things of life for granted and never seem to realize they have more than their own efforts to thank for them. As to the desirability of large or small families—that subject is open for discussion and we'll wait for the sisters to express their opinion.—Ed.

HAVANA R. R. 2, OHIO.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I take COMFORT and could not do without it. I am thirteen years old, have brown hair, blue eyes and light complexion. I cannot walk as I have spinal trouble, but I am in hopes I will outgrow it and walk some day. I can ride out just as much as I want to and, I even went sleigh-riding last winter, and I feel good all the time. I have not walked for three years. We have tried everything within reach.

I read a good many books and magazine stories. COMFORT has many good stories in it. I sew a lot. I can creep around a little and get around the yard by myself. I have a playhouse that I enjoy very much and I have a lot of nice pets, so you see I get a lot of enjoyment out of life even if I can't walk like other girls.

I went to school for four years, and was as healthy as most any of the children. I have a lot of girl friends that come and see me real often. I have no brothers or sisters but a very dear mother, father and grandma who cares for me. I live in Ohio.

I should like to hear from the sisters and cousins and I will answer all who enclose a stamped envelope. I hope some of them will write to me.

I will bring my long letter to an end by wishing you all the very best. WILHELMINE BROOKS.

Wilhelmine. You are a brave little girl and I hope your faith will be rewarded by a speedy recovery. Anyway, you have ten active years in the past, with all their pleasures, to think of, and we hope a great many more in the future. Let us hear from you again.—Ed.

KOOTENAI, IDAHO.

DEAR FRIENDS AND SISTERS:

Having read the letter of Anna Kirk, in the July COMFORT, I felt it right to say a few words on the subject she writes about. Now dear Anna hasn't described herself or given a Miss or Mrs. to her name, consequently we must not judge her harshly even though the majority of us do not agree with her. Personally, I have never written to the Sisters' Corner but have often thought I would. I take great interest in what others have written and when I read a letter, I like to know what the writer looks like, how old she is and whether married or single; but I can love a "fat woman" just as much as the most perfectly built one.

Christ has been described to us and I love to picture Him, not of His great beauty, but because of his great love. Not all that tell how they look are vain or beautiful. I for one, am five feet five inches tall, weigh one hundred and ten pounds and have a big nose, also big feet and hands—now that isn't very handsome. My husband tells me I am all nose, feet and hands, but he is such a dear. I know he doesn't care a mite; and who knows but what some dear sister who described herself, sent ten letters or dollars to the shut-ins and never mentioned it, or thought that God would reward her for her charity.

I am not meaning this to hurt Anna, for she surely meant to be on the right side and to help others, but just a wee bit conceited of what she herself was doing. We must see our own shortcomings in all things. I can see many of mine while thinking of the best way to do things and to teach my three little children.

I trust God will help us all and if we do wrong forgive us, and help us not to hurt another's feelings.

We live in the far West. Have a stump ranch. This is a newly settled country and the land is not cleared.

Your poem to Mrs. Marie Haggerty was very appropriate. And we mothers of larger families know of the many trials, not only with the children, but being in poor health while rearing our little ones. I think it a brave woman who will rear a family of four or five children—which is a large family nowadays.

Wit love to all, I am, Your sister.
MRS. GEORGE HAMILTON.

SO. OMAHA, 1218 N. 34th St., NEBR.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

Sometime ago my name was printed in COMFORT in regards to growing "golden seal" as a means of making pin money. I received many inquiries concerning same and about other pin money ideas. I answered all who enclosed stamped, self-addressed envelope and to others I take this means of replying.

Golden seal is an herb used for medicinal purposes throughout the world. Its demand is great and constantly increasing. This war has raised the price of this herb. It is easily grown, needs no cultivation, only to keep free of weeds. It can withstand a long drought. It needs good garden soil and some shade. Once planted it stays planted and it is hard to kill out. It should be planted in the spring, about the first of April and it is ready to gather the middle of August. Roots should be got in the fall and kept in a dry, warm place throughout the winter and then set out. Roots cost about one dollar and fifty cents per fifty roots.

Now another easy way of making pin money at home so as not to take up much time is raising "Job's Tears," or "corn beads" to be made into necklaces, draperies, etc. Twenty cents will start you in business and it is so easy and fascinating that I believe no woman can resist the temptation of raising them. They require very little space and are cultivated in much the same manner as corn. They should be planted in May when danger of frost is over. There is really no failure in these. The beads are the shape of a small sea shell and beautiful in color. Once seen they never fail to be admired. The seeds also should be had ready in fall as these are scarce and hard to get. Necklaces sell according to style and length.

Raising ferns from birdseed is another way of earning pin money. The ferns are started from birdseed and in a few weeks your reward will be beautiful ferns that sell from fifty cents to one dollar. These are always in demand in my home town.

Baby shoes, made out of cream and white outing flannel, find a ready sale.

Now, I will describe myself. I am twenty-nine years of age, mother of three boys and two girls, ranging in ages from two to nine years; the three boys are the oldest, the girls the youngest. People don't believe I am the age I am and have so many babies. They take me for a young girl and ask me how I keep young. I laugh and always reply "Babies and work." I do all my own work and still have time to devote to my pin money plans.

I would like a letter shower October 30th and I will be pleased to answer questions on any of my hints if stamped, self-addressed envelope is enclosed. I love this corner, and I hope that COMFORT will always have the prosperity and good wishes it rightly deserves.

With kindest regards to all, I remain,
Your COMFORT sister, MRS. J. A. DOSTAL.

SIOUX CITY, 1707 West Fifth St., IOWA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT READERS:

As long as I can remember we have taken COMFORT and we surely could not do without it.

I have a favor to ask. Will some of the sisters that live in Oregon write to me? I would like to hear from some that live in Klamath county. We are thinking of buying a homestead there. Every year I suffer with hay fever, and I would like to find out by someone that lives there if people have any fever there.

Mrs. A. P. Stanley, the little story about Pollyanna and the glad game has helped me. I wish all the sisters would try it.

Love and good luck to COMFORT.
MRS. N. SWEARINGEN.

GOLD CREEK, MONT.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I have been a reader of COMFORT for several years, but so far I have let others do the writing.

In regard to Annie Kirk's letter, I would like to say that I see no harm or nonsense in the sisters' descriptions of themselves. Just because one writes that she is small and dark, she does not mean that she is pretty, and if a woman knows she is handsome, why should she be ashamed to tell it. For my part, I would never think of telling of the good I do, but some like that and there is no harm in it either.

Mrs. Marie Haggerty. Don't get downhearted because you can't care for five babies as another can for one. Do your best and teach your children to be true to themselves and to others. It is easier for a mother of one or two to do her work, but we are not here for an easy time and it is seldom that an only child grows up to be a better and stronger man or woman, than the family of five or more.

I have six children to care for and my housework and some outdoor work to do too. I have not the strength I had when I had only two, but I have more patience; time has taught me that, and I know more about children and their care. Our children are lively and some of them strong headed, so I correct them after "Grandma's" method sometimes and I think that a child who has been corrected the first six or eight years of his life does not require so much punishment as he grows older. Parents let babies have their own way and then try to mend their own mistakes by whipping the child when it is older. In my opinion a child's health and morals come first; its manner can easily be improved later on.

With best wishes for Mrs. Wilkinson and the sisters, MRS. R. CHRISTENSEN.

ELKINS, ARK.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I wonder if you will print another letter from me? I have received over ninety letters since my letter was printed in the July COMFORT, a great many wanting to know all about this place, the price of land and so on. Now for the benefit of those who didn't send stamps I will say that this is a prosperous country; the soil varies of course, the bottom farms are rich, and some of the mountain farms also.

The water is usually very good, and this place is supposed to be healthy. Most of the people farm their own land, but some of them have renters. Land sells all the way from ten to one hundred dollars, an acre, according to location and improvements.

We raise most everything. I shall surely try and answer each and every letter, except those from the bachelors, and let me say right here I am not a lonely widow, but a happy wife.

Thanking you all for remembering me and Mrs. Wilkinson for printing this, Your COMFORT friend,
MRS. BERTA WILSON.

BOISSWAIN, VA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

I for one do not agree with Anna Kirk, because "describing," and "praising," have entirely different definitions. Take myself for instance, I am five feet six inches tall, weigh about one hundred and forty pounds, have brown hair and eyes and am twenty-four years old. I leave it with the sisters if there is one word of praise in that matter-of-fact description.

I like her sentiments all right, but I think she has applied them in the wrong place. I would not enjoy the sisters' letters half so much if they didn't describe themselves. When they do, one can almost imagine they see them in their own homes and are talking with them instead of reading; it helps to make their letters real and they don't sound like fakes.

I like COMFORT and enjoy all the sisters' letters but love Uncle Charlie best of all, and who is there that does not? Love to all.

MRS. H. P. LEWIS.

BLANCHARD, LA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON:

With your permission I will give a brief description of this country as it may be of interest to some. I always like to read of different countries and people.

Last winter we moved from the overflow swamp land, to this delightful ridge country and we are well pleased with the change. I consider this country a wonderful opportunity for energetic, hustling people. If a person does not succeed here it is because he doesn't try or know how to grasp the opportunities as they appear.

First, it is an easy matter to get a home here. There being lots of land for sale, both woods and improved farms. Then in this parish there are several thousand acres of what is known as Reserve Land, held by the state and Federal Government for its oil resources. On this vast tract there are hundreds and hundreds of acres of fine farming land. It is free to any and all home seekers, who care to improve and work the land. While it still belongs to the government, all its products and improvements belong to the man who improves and works it. There are some old settlers who have spent many years on this reserve land and have never paid out one penny for rent or taxes. This parish has about two thousand acres of public land subject to entry, and some of it is fine timbered land. We have fine water, both well and spring, extra good summer range, fruit of all kinds, some good roads, ready market for all country produce, mail route, ex-

Edna's Secret Marriage

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Weston, old and wealthy, knowing he has but a few days to live, sends for Richard Burdon, his lawyer. Remembering a debt he owes Charles More, he revokes a will in favor of a younger brother's child and makes a new one, disposing of the lives and hearts of two, and leaves it for Mr. Burdon to carry out his bequests. The banker is found dead the next morning. Sixteen years later Sir Cyril More with wealth squandered and no aim in life, finds himself at Lucerne, Switzerland, where he meets Edna Weston, who has only Aunt Martha. Edna inquires of Sir Cyril if he knows Richard Burdon. Her father, on his death-bed charges her to go to him the first of the following September. Edna and her aunt board at the Pension, a Swiss boarding house and Sir Cyril leaves the Grand for the Pension Petre, where he gives his name to Edna and her aunt as Harold Payne. Seated in an arbor Cyril hears voices and recognizes Mr. Howley Jones, who admits being a chum of Cyril More, who has completely gone to the dogs, squandering all his money on Glitters. Edna listens and questions if he knows Sir Cyril and is it all true? He admits he has heard of him. Later Cyril meets Miss Glitters and requests her not to tell he is there. Passing on he sees Edna who has witnessed his greeting with Glitters.

A few days later, Aunt Martha, Edna, Sir Cyril and others go by train to the top of the Rigi. Returning, Cyril and Edna decide to walk down. A mist, preventing them from following the path, envelops them, and rather than have him leave her to find the path, she would rather die, Cyril clasps her in his arms, and she admits her love and promises to marry him. Without telling their secret, they go to a little Protestant church four hours' ride from Lucerne and are made one. Returning Edna realizes that Aunt Martha must be told. Coming to the Cathedral Edna recalls she has left her crepe shawl. Leaving her upon the Cathedral steps Cyril returns for it. Miss Glitters comes along and she remembers having seen Edna at the entrance of the Grand Hotel and knows she is waiting for the gentleman with whom she has seen her before. She tells Edna of his broken promises, shows her the face in the locket she wears, begs of her never to see him again and leaves her crushed with grief. Cyril returns and seeing the agony in Edna's face implores her to tell him the cause. She upbraids him for the wrong he has done. Filled with remorse he parts from her. She tries to call him back; it is too late.

Mr. Richard Burdon and Edward More, brother of Sir Cyril More, in legal consultation, learn the contents of John Weston's will and the fortune awaiting Sir Cyril More which Edward More regrets. Aunt Martha and Edna are announced. Previous to Mr. Burdon reading the will to Edna, he explains its purport,—John Weston, grateful to Sir Charles More, who saves him from financial ruin, and desirous to enrich his descendants devises the scheme of disposing of his vast wealth by the marriage of his niece Edna Weston to Sir Cyril More,—the fortune going to either Edna Weston or Sir Cyril More or to both in equal shares on one condition, that they become man and wife, leaving each free to decline or accept, without depriving the other of his or her chance of it. The choice resting with Sir Cyril, Mr. Burdon sends for him. He comes reluctantly not knowing a fortune awaits him or the conditions to which he must comply. Learning them he declines to marry Miss Weston and writes her a letter withdrawing any claim he may have had or may still have to the money accounted for in the deed. Edna insists that Sir Cyril shall share the fortune with her. Mr. Burdon, knowing Sir Cyril as he does, Edna must keep it. Mr. and Mrs. Edward More call and Edna and her aunt accept an invitation to visit at Acacia Lodge, preparatory to their going to Rosedene which adjoins More Park. Edna captures the love of Bertie More whose voice reminds her of another's.

Edna and her aunt take possession of Rosedene. Wandering alone over the estate and lost in thought Edna suddenly meets a man she thinks may be one of her servants. He apologizes for trespassing. Edna assures him she feels more like a trespasser, as she is a greater stranger and inquires the way to More Park, where she stands before the old house wondering what draws her there. Going home she meets the duchess, who invites her to a dinner. Lord Mersey is announced and Edna recognizes him as the man she had taken as a servant. The duchess, leading the way, they adjourn to a smaller salon. Lord Mersey talking to Edna leaves her suddenly as Grace Bromley plays the prelude of a song she sings. Riding home by the light of the moon Edna sees a man standing in the avenue of More Park and is unconscious it is Cyril More.

CHAPTER XVII.

"IF I COULD FIND OUT!"

EDNA had started well, and continued winning golden opinions from all, save one or two young ladies who were inclined to regard Ler in the light of an intruder, poaching on their happy hunting grounds, especially those young ladies who lived in the vicinity of the manor, and were in the habit of casting designing thoughts toward that eccentric nobleman, Lord Mersey, for his lordship, in his unconscious way, which was more effective and courageous than an actually daring one, cultivated Edna's society assiduously. He had been used to confine his rambles to the Rosedene preserves, but since the young heiress had come down and lit up the old place with her sweet, innocent kind of beauty, he enlarged his walks, and soon penetrated into the flower garden, then on to the terrace, and so, by degrees, got into the habit of dropping into Aunt Martha's drawing-room, just about five.

Aunt Martha and he got on remarkably; she was always glad to see him, and he seemed particularly fond of talking to her, though Aunt Martha did not understand one half he was saying; but she liked to listen, and declared that "it did her good."

"Ah, my dear Lord Mersey, if my poor brother—Edna's father, you know—were alive and here, what great friends you would be! There was nothing he had not studied. He used to talk to Edna and me, in the summer evenings, as we were at our work, just as you do."

And Lord Mersey would stroke his beard dreamily, and say:

"Miss Weston's father—yes, I should like to have known him."

But he seemed very well contented to know Edna herself, and Edna appeared, and was really glad, to see him.

There was a particularly comfortable chair beside the window, which gradually got to be regarded as Lord Mersey's chair, and in it he would seat himself, stretching his long legs out, with an air of repose and serenity and placidly watch Aunt Martha make her tea, which she did after the duchess' own manner and receipt.

Edna's place was on a small couch drawn up beside a little table, which was generally littered with some fancy—very fancy—work, or book opened face downward. She, too, would watch Aunt Martha, or sit with her face half-shielded by her hand and gaze at the fire, and Lord Mersey's eyes would wander from Mrs. Weston's kindly, commonplace countenance to the sweet, delicate face a little further on, and he would wonder what had given to that face the strange, wistful, sad expression which would settle upon it so often, so very often.

He knew, as one does know, that while he was talking sometimes she was not listening, that she could not have told a word if she had been asked, but that her thoughts were far away, recalling something—or somebody. At this latter suggestion Lord Mersey would look graver even than was his wont, and stroke his beard until it glistened and shone again, and he would murmur and mutter to himself, and rouse the dreaming beauty with some question that would be answered.

Sometimes other visitors would drop in—Lord Mersey's mother, Lady Portfield, or the vicar and his wife, very often the great duchess herself, but Lord Mersey would keep his chair—if he could do so without too violently infringing the rules of society, which says one visitor shall beat a retreat when another enters—and naturally people began to talk. Then again, Edna was too great an acquisition, too great an heiress also, to be left in seclusion, and there were dinner parties and dances, all of which she was expected to attend. She would go, charming everybody with her simple, girlish beauty the gentle grace, and the men would go mad about her, not only because she was so beautiful and bewitching, but because she was so invulnerable.

Young Bromley stated the case—he was a barrister and heir to the baronetcy, and a lady-killer to boot—very plainly in the smoking room of Bromley Hall after a dinner party at which Edna had been the beauty and the belle.

"I tell you what it is," said he, puffing impressively at a huge regalia, and looking pensively round at the listeners as they sat or lounged about the smoking room; "this is the gem of the county, and when she comes out in town there will be a sensation. She is irresistible. It is not because she is beautiful——"

"Which she undoubtedly is," remarked Viscount Alfred, a young cornet in the Blues, who had fallen head over heels in love with Edna at first sight.

"Which she undoubtedly is," echoed Bromley, "but because she is utterly unimpressionable——"

"By your royal highness!" laughed some one.

"By all of us," retorted Bromley, with calm nonchalance. "Is there one of you who has produced any effect?" Truth as well as modesty caused the inevitable silence. "No, she is gentleness and amiability herself; there is not an ounce of vanity in her composition, and she will listen to any of us with the sweetest consideration—even to you, Alfred, my lamb, for I saw you talking to her for three quarters of an hour at the duchess' the other evening."

The young viscount blushed as hotly and prettily as any of his sisters could have done.

"But just as you think you have interested her and are making a step forward; just as you begin to feel how bewitching she is, there comes over her a gentle abstraction, a dreamy absence and unconsciousness of your humble existence—not to say proximity—that makes you cold with despair."

"That's it, beautifully described, my dear sir!" assented a fox-hunting squire, who had resisted innumerable circes and fallen at Edna's feet without a struggle. "And when you stop and wait piteously for her return to mundane affairs, she comes down from heaven or wherever she has been, and smiling sweetly says: 'I beg your pardon! I was thinking of something else!'"

"Something else? Somebody else!" groaned another admirer.

"No," said Bromley; "not somebody else, I don't think that. She hasn't that look, and she would guard against that dreamy way of hers if it were so."

"Hem!" mused the young squire. "You may be wrong there. Here comes someone who ought to know, if all accounts are true," he added, as Lord Mersey came wandering into the room.

"What are you fellows talking about?" he asked.

"About the one topic—the heiress," replied the squire.

Mersey turned to choose a pipe from the rack before he spoke.

"Do you mean Miss Weston?" he asked. "Scarcely a suitable topic for discussion in a smoking room."

And there was something in his straightforward gaze over his pipe, as he lit it, that silenced any retort, though the young squire whispered behind his hand to Bromley:

"Mersey is hit harder than any of us, by Jove!"

There was little chance for any of them, they thought, if that really was the case; for who could resist the heir to the manor and thirty thousand a year?

At least, there was one woman in this world who could not, and that was Grace Bromley; and it is only fair to say that she would have given her hand to Lord Mersey if he had been a commoner with thirty shillings instead of thirty thousand.

We have only seen her for a few hours in the salon at the castle, and it is time, as she plays no unimportant part in our drama, that we should see a little more of her.

Grace was seen to best advantage at the music stool, or beside the harp; but she was possessed of a variety of accomplishments, could ride well to hounds, danced almost as well as Edna—not quite, for Edna had caught some of the supple grace of the mountain Swiss—could skate, and lastly, had that rare gift of looking interesting and commanding, rather than attracting attention.

"Grace would have made a first-class empress of Rome in the old imperial days," her brother had declared, and he had hit it, as usual. She was a superb figure, slim and straight as an arrow, with such dark hair brushed clean from her brow, and dark eyes that lit up beneath the long, dark brows, and sweeping lashes, when she was excited or angry. A truly imperial kind of beauty, that had borne down all before it, until Edna—sweet, dreamy Edna—had come upon the scene and wrested the scepter from her hand; scarcely wrested it, but rendered it powerless to command any longer where it most desired to do so. For, at one time, Lord Mersey had shown some signs of yielding himself to the imperial beauty—had begun to feel the charm of her swift black eyes and impassioned voice—had felt a subtle kind of pleasure, half pain, half delight, in sitting beside the piano as she played, as only she could play, making the instrument obey her will and move with her feelings. Then it was pleasant to him to find her, who was so imperious and indifferent to the men about her, so attentive and amiable to him, so ready to listen to his long, rambling dissertations and audible musings on all kinds of subjects, so anxious to learn anything he chose to teach her. All promised well; the friendship which was gradually growing would have developed into a warmer feeling; Lord Mersey, the creature of habit, would have discovered one day that he could not do without the society of the imperial beauty, who was all humility and soft obedience to him, and he would have made her the future Countess of Portfield. Until Edna came!

"Came from whence?" asked Grace, as she sat beside her harp, her brows knitted over her brooding eyes, her long, shapely hands striking a sullen chord in harmony with her own thoughts. "Came from whence? No one knows! Came without a friend, save the old woman who is tied to her body and soul—came without an introduction, without any credentials of respectability!—came, and won him from me! What does he see in her—is she more beautiful than I am?"

A large mirror, reaching from ceiling to floor, was opposite her, and she glanced in it as she replied:

"No, I think not; honestly, I think not. What is it, then, that he—a man of the world, a scholar, hypercritical in refinement and culture—can see in her to charm him? Is it that dreamy abstraction, that little trick of wistful sadness? Take care, Lord Mersey! Did any girl with a blank, innocent past, look and behave as she does? If it is that which you find so charming, so irresistible, take care that it does not spring from some secret which you, with all your fine feelings, would scarcely think fitting for the future Countess of Portfield to hold."

Then her sister—much younger than herself, and a great romp, who looked upon her sister Grace with something like contempt, because she took no interest in prize bulls and the improvement of stock, subjects Kate would discuss with her father, Sir George, for hours. Kate was short, thickset and boyish, the image of her father, as they all said—came in, whistling like a boy, stopping to exclaim, in a voice, clear and ringing as a boy's also: "What, Grace! wasting all this beautiful afternoon over that monstrosity in catgut! Why don't you come out? I've been——"

"My dear Kate, spare me the details, I beg!" interrupted "my Lady Grace," as Kate called her; "I can guess where you have been—the stables, the pig sty, the kennels. Look at your boots!"

"Rather dirty, aren't they? You should see father's!—but then they're topboots, and don't matter. I wish mamma would let me wear topboots!"

"A stable boy's waistcoat and a huntsman's cap. Certainly!" said Grace, sweeping the strings of her harp.

"How shocked you would all be!—all except Mersey."

"Would you oblige me, my dear Kate, by giving gentlemen their title when you speak of them?"

"The Right Honorable Viscount Mersey!" resumed Kate, with due pomposity; "he's the best of the lot, for all his bookwormish propensities. He never scolds and worries and teases me as you do, and I believe he likes me."

"He is interested in any phenomenon, monstrous or otherwise," calmly retorted Grace.

"Thank you, my Lady Grace!" retorted Kate, coloring—she had her father's temper, short and fiery—don't you wish you were a monstrosity? He doesn't seem to take much interest in you now."

Grace paled, and her eyes shot fire as she bent down to tighten a string; but her voice was quite calm as she said:

"Did he ever do so? Kate, I think I will take your advice, so emphatically if not delicately given, and go out. Would you mind ordering the mare? I am sure you are going to the stables!" and with this parting thrust my Lady Grace rose and sailed from the room.

Kate looked after her ere she in her turn went to do as she was bid, for it was noticeable that sharp as Kate was with her tongue and rough in her manner, she was never reluctant to run on Grace's errands or do her bidding. Kate looked after her and whistled.

"Poor Grace! I wonder if she does care for him? What fools girls are to fall in love! I declare I never will!"

Grace's mare came round—a beautiful creature, almost black, and as shapely as a painted horse of Wouverman's—and Grace got on his back and started for a gallop, and for a time the green-eyed monster that even music would not exorcise, was cast off in the clear, bracing air of the spring afternoon. Grace would have been all the better for that ride, but as fate would have it, after reaching Fox Gorse cover she turned to go home by the More Park road, and coming into it by a bridle path through the wood, came full upon an elegant little phaeton, drawn by a pair of cream ponies, and driven by Edna. A tiny groom sat behind, with his arms sternly folded and his baby face fixed in stolid impassiveness after the manner of his kind; but it was not by the phaeton, or the penies, or the groom that Grace's earnest gaze was drawn, but to the beautiful girl who held the reins and whip, and drove as if she were driving in her dream, and her face set with a wistful sadness. Grace was just going to ride up to the phaeton, which was walking up the hill, when a man's figure came through the wood opposite her, and held up his hand to stop the phaeton, and taking off his hat walked across to it.

It was Lord Mersey, and Grace saw that as he approached Edna's face lost its dreaminess, and lit up with the sweet smile which was worth more than all Grace's imperial beauty.

She saw Lord Mersey look at his hands, as if they were too dirty to touch the daintily gloved one of the young charioteer, and then wipe them on his trousers, just as a waterman might do, before he took the little, primrose-colored pair. He had got something to show her, evidently, for he produced something from one of the front pockets of his loose coat, and Edna's head and his went very close together over the something; and then Grace heard Lord Mersey's deep voice explaining or recounting how he had found it, Edna listening all the while with interested attention. Then suddenly there came the old look of abstraction and absence, and Lord Mersey, perhaps, noticing it himself, stepped aside, said good by, raised his hat, and the phaeton passed on.

Grace watched them part, as she had watched them meet, pale and anxious, then she turned her horse's head toward the road again, and, climbing her whip, murmured:

"She does not care for him—I know it, I feel it!—and yet she will win him, if I know a man's nature at all. That indifference of hers would pique him into a declaration. She has bewitched him! He will grow still more infatuated, propose to her, marry her, and be miserable—yes, for I know him. It will happen, as sure as fate, unless something prevents it! Surely," she mused, her color coming and going—"surely it were no sin to prevent him making himself miserable for life—to save his happiness? Any means to such an end would be pardonable. What can I do? If I could find out the cause for that manner of hers—if I could but find out something about her!"

Patience, Grace Bromley, and chance—or shall we say fate?—may throw that knowledge in your way.

CHAPTER XVIII.

CAPTAIN MORTON.

The spring advanced; the London season had commenced; the duchess and the Portfields had gone up; the one to the ducal mansion in Grosvenor Square, the other to the corner house in Park Lane, from whence Lord Mersey could see the flowers and the grass; but Edna still remained at Rosedene. She was growing fond of the place—the chestnuts were in full bloom; the birds made the air musical; the atmosphere was fragrant with the scents of the spring flowers—and could not tear herself away; besides, she shrank from the excitement of her debut, and did not feel strong enough to exchange the quiet lanes and silent woods, where she could commune with the past, for the noisy turmoil of fashionable life in the great city. The Bromleys also remained; Sir George was far too busy about the land, and Lady Bromley would not move without him. Then came Mr. and Mrs. More, and Edna's little sweetheart, Bertie. Mrs. More was quite charmed—quite charmed with Rosedene; everything about it was too delicious—really too delicious, she declared, and Edward More experienced a miserable kind of satisfaction in being near the great inheritance between which and him only stood his reprobate of a brother, wicked Sir Cyril.

He spent most of his time, when he was not writing in the library, wandering about the outskirts of the park, grumbling at the dilapidation and planning the alterations he would make when he reigned in his brother's stead. Mrs. More paid visits, drove about in Edna's pony phaeton, dawdled about on the sofa reading French novels, and spent the rest of her time in consultations with her maid on sundry questions of costume; then Edna was left pretty much to herself, and did not complain of feeling lonely.

It was a restful, peaceful time which promised to stretch far into the future, but the change was nearer at hand than dreamed.

One evening, in the middle of May, had been fixed for a small dinner party at Rosedene. Unlike most dinner parties it was really to be small, the Bromleys, the vicar and his wife, and Lord Mersey, who had come down expressly for it—

COMFORT for one year and admittance to the League of Cousins for only 30 cents. Join at once. Everybody welcome.

NEVER send a subscription to Uncle Charlie, nor to the Secretary of the League.
NEVER write a subscription order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write the order on a separate sheet from the letter, and then both may be mailed together in the same envelope.
ADDRESS all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. See Instructions at the close of this Department.

IF you will arrange yourselves comfortably on my lap and give me your very serious attention I will tell you of an incident in the life of this country that is absolutely appalling in the depths of brazen infamy and criminal disregard of even the primal instincts of decency and honor. If I were not an optimist (that is a man who is hopeful and a believer in the inherent goodness of humanity) I would throw up the sponge after reviewing the facts which I am about to reveal to you, and utterly despair of any good thing ever evolving from the public servants of our cities. The scene of these deeds of criminal and moral frightfulness, is laid in a typical city of considerable size, in a middle western state. The revolting drama of graft and corruption that was recently enacted in this particular city has, though possibly in a lesser degree, been enacted in scores of other cities, in fact it is just one of the symptoms of a great national disease, corrupt politics and corrupt business, working hand in hand, ever nibbling like hungry rats at the roots of our institutions, ever threatening to demolish those democratic forms of government we have so painfully attempted to establish. An all-powerful, unscrupulous and thoroughly depraved gang of rascals obtained control of this before-mentioned city in the middle West. As usually happens in such cases, the prime mover in the plot was a corrupt and conscienceless mayor. Next came the city officers who were indebted to the mayor for their appointment. Then there was a police force, venal and corrupt—the same old grafting machine that you can find in most of our cities. Next in order we vision a circuit judge brazen and unscrupulous and a city judge of the same kidney. Bringing up the rear and filling in the somber background is outlined the usual bunch of rum-soaked politicians, ward Leelers, rum hole and beer parlor proprietors, all working hand in hand with slimy old party politicians of the typical Republican and Democratic stripe, and back of that the vampires of the tenderloin, red light white slave district, where the daughters of our land are degraded and done to death by the two-legged animals who frequent these dens of vice, disease and infamy. Last November there was an election in this particular city. The chief of the human bubbles seething in this wild devil's broth had the gubernatorial bee buzzing in his political bonnet, and many nice, pin-headed Democratic or Republican voters as the case may be were preparing to put the "gentleman" into a great and high office. It would be well for you by the way to note from just what kind of an environment we produce the typical politician that you, without thought, mechanically and with the regularity of clock work, vote into office. It was necessary for these political corruptionists, in order to retain control of the flesh pots of office, to win the election, and this is how they proceeded to do it: The assistant Chief of Police bled the gamblers, saloon keepers and white slaves of six thousand dollars for a slush fund for campaign purposes. On election day one man voted no less than twenty-two times, while another enterprising gentleman blistered his thumb to such an extent working the voting machine overtime for more than five hundred voters, that he found it necessary to relegate his thumb to the background and use a stick. In one precinct where there were but eighteen resident colored voters, no less than from three to four hundred dusky gentlemen managed to vote. One woman who succeeded in keeping an eye on one of the crookedest of the voting booths, noticed that men who voted would go away, change their clothes, come back "disguised" and vote all over again, and many men who did not know even the names under which they had to vote, got in their licks at the ballot box just the same. Thank God there was one man, as there usually is, for providence looks out for that, who became the Nemesis of this bunch of criminal grafters. He was the editor of a local newspaper, fearless and determined. From his editorial office he fired broadsides into the corrupt gang who controlled the city. The gang retorted by clapping the editor in jail, but they didn't hold him long. With corrupt judges working with the gang it was an easy job to put the editor behind the bars, but they couldn't keep him quiet. He was threatened with dynamite and even death, but nothing could stop him, he volleyed and thundered. Then thank heaven, Uncle Sam took a hand in the game, and Federal officials who could not be corrupted or intimidated, flashed the searchlight of retributive justice on the squirming, seething, political evil doers—and then something happened. The graft combination was so rotten that it fell to pieces of its own evil weight. The deviltry had been so thorough, so wholesale and complete, that explanation and defense were out of the question. One hundred and sixteen rascals were placed under arrest; eighty-nine confessed their guilt, knowing it was impossible to conceal it; twenty-seven more in spite of all that influence and position could do, were convicted. The mayor, the leader of the gang, was hiked off to a Federal prison for six years. The judge who jailed the plucky editor has been put behind the bars for five years, the sheriff is also doing five years' time in Leavenworth, and the city judge is also wearing stripes. One hundred others have been put under lock and key for six months and upward.

Now you will probably think that the men who went to jail were the riff raff of the city. On the contrary (and this is the thing that cuts deepest of all) many of them represented the best families in the city and the majority of those arrested were "representative" citizens.

It seems almost incredible that a whole city could thus abandon itself to an orgy of disgraceful corruption, and this in a community full of churches, culture, schools and beautiful homes. And yet it isn't so strange after all. The one great thing that is lacking in the American people collectively and individually, is a social conscience. The things that happen in our cities would not be tolerated in any other section of the globe. In the cities of Europe where the civic pride and social conscience inspire men with a high sense of duty, graft and corruption are unknown. Public office is a public trust. Public servants feel it an honor to serve their fellow men and they serve them faithfully and well. For us to fall down so disgracefully, so revoltingly, where every dictate of honor and decency should impel men to work nobly in the public positions in which their fellow citizens have placed them, is an open confession of the inferiority of our moral and ethical standards as applied to governmental affairs to those of the old world. These scandalous exhibitions of graft and corruption show how necessary it is for some purifying influence to cleanse the Augean stables of our municipal, state and national governments. In the state in which the villainies above happened the women of course have no vote. It is quite possible if they had had a vote, this hideous affair might never have happened. If the women had been voting in this particular state, they could have used the recall as they did in Seattle, and turned the rascals and corruptionists out of office. But why, oh why do we let rascals get into office? They don't in other countries. You will say we don't know what they will do until they get into office. Rubbish. They know in Europe, why cannot we know here too? Thieves, corruptionists and political adventurers are not selected to rule cities across the pond. There are plenty of honest men, men filled with civic pride in all our cities, but the honest man lacks the initiative and resourcefulness of the grafter and corruptionist, who has the well-bribed forces of evil at his back thoroughly organized, ready to win by fair means or foul, and the extraordinary part of it is these evil elements using the machinery of the old political parties always manage to get thousands of the "best citizens" to vote for them. You see it's the old, old story. The people are responsible for these conditions and no one else. What are we going to do in the face of such gross stupidity? We must develop a social conscience and a sense of civic pride. The decent elements of society should insist that politics be entirely eliminated in the management of our cities. There should be only two parties in this world, the party of truth, decency, righteousness and honor, and the party of evil corruption, crime and wrong. Let these be the two opposing forces and right will triumph, and our city administrations will be clean and honest, and if you get the cities cleaned up, the state governments will be honest and decent, and later on the national government will be purged and cleansed by the same irresistible force. Let the women vote. Let those who elect officers have the right to recall them immediately they betray their trust. That is the way to purge the nation of its political filth. That is the way to rid us of the evil reputation we have in the eyes of the world, the reputation of being the most lawless and politically corrupt of nations.

After this paper goes to press, but before it reaches our readers, I shall have passed my fifty-second birthday on the 25th day of September. To celebrate that event, as announced in last month's issue, I got out a new book which I call "Uncle Charlie's Picture Book," as it consists chiefly of pictures of people, scenes and objects of interest connected with my life and the events in which I have figured. It is prettily bound in stiff covers and makes an attractive as well as interesting volume. It can be had free as a premium for two subscriptions. For further description see announcement on another page.

If you haven't a set of Uncle Charlie's four wonderful books your home is not complete and you are not equipped for the full enjoyment of life. Start in at once to obtain them,—they cost you no money, only a very little time and effort.—and keep at it until you have the entire set. The book of Poems is beautifully bound in ribbed silk stiff covers; the Story Book is bound in two styles, the one in ribbed silk stiff covers like the Poems, the other in paper covers; the Song Book is bound only in heavy paper covers and the Picture Book in handsome stiff covers. Poems or the Story Book in ribbed silk stiff covers, either one for a club of four subscriptions; the Song Book or the Story Book in handsome paper covers or the Picture Book in pretty stiff covers for a club of only two subscriptions. These four books are a library of endless joy and merriment, the best medicine to drive away the blues.

Now for the letters.

HUMANSVILLE, MO.

DEAR UNCLE AND COUSINS:

I am a school girl, seventeen years old. Have dark blue eyes and chestnut hair, a fair complexion and am five feet four inches tall. I go to school all the time, except when sicknes prevents me. I expect to be a teacher some day, I would like to teach next winter. I have had that aim in view for some time—in fact since I was ten years old, and I think I have a talent for it.

I think I shall talk upon the subject of meddling. How many of the cousins are guilty? "Oh not I," "Nor I," I hear some say. But I say you do meddle. All of us do and that is why we should try to overcome the habit. When a friend tells you he is going away, you say, "Oh, what for?" Now that is meddling. Perhaps that person is going away on a business matter that he doesn't want everyone to know about, and he thinks he is going to get away without having to tell anyone, when just at the last moment, you suddenly inquire, and he has to tell you or make up a big lie in its place, and most of us would do the latter. By this, you see, you are doing wrong and thus causing someone else to do wrong. So let us guard against meddling. Do not ask personal questions only to a very personal friend, and not too often then. How many of the cousins have a fast chum? And how many realize what the word friend really means? I will give you a few definitions and I wonder how many have a friend that fulfills the requirements. The first person that comes in when the whole world has gone out. One, who, having gained the top of the ladder, won't forget you if you remain at the bottom. I think these words are so true. I have a friend that fulfills these and more too. I think I have written enough for this time, I hope someone will be benefited by my letter. I wish some of the cousins would write to me as I get lonesome somtimes.

Your niece and cousin, NETTIE E. HUDSON.

Nettie, you say you would like to teach next winter. Excellent idea. Winter usually needs a good deal of teaching, for as a rule it is entirely too cold and boisterous, and it's time somebody taught it to warm up and behave itself, and I hope you'll do the job and do it in good style. Meddling is an excellent subject for public discussion. I know meddlers as a rule are an awful nuisance, but as I'm a professional meddler myself I've a sort of fellow feeling for meddlers as a class. The most meddlesome man however, in the world is the German Kaiser. I saw the other day he has given away 354,000 medals to his soldiers. Now there is a *medal*some man, if you like. You say when a friend tells us he is going away we exclaim: "Oh, what for?" Now Nettie, when your best fellow was sitting with you in the parlor in the evening, and pulled his watch out at half after thirteen o'clock and said he would have to be making tracks for home, now honest didn't you say: "What for?" Every girl I ever knew said that to me and I didn't think she was meddling either; however I had sense enough to know if I didn't go Pop would come down-stairs and start meddling me through the window. In your letter you give us as an example of meddling: the young man who is going off to town and doesn't want people to know what he is going for, or whom he is going to see and has to answer questions with a lie or what you would call a lie. Now a fellow who can't go to town without telling a lie deserves to be questioned and meddled with. If a fellow tells me he is going to town I never ask him where he is going. I don't need to. The best way when a fellow is going to town is to address him somewhat in this fashion: "Well old boy, I hope you'll have a good time. When you have your arm round her waist, give her a squeeze for me and remember a girl with a twenty-eight inch waist can hold more than one plate of ice cream. Remember too when you get your cheek against hers that a lady's face is a lady's face and not a lunch counter; and remember before you come home, to dust the flour off your shoulder and pick the red hairs off your coat or your wife may get her hooks in your wool and turn you over to the alimony club." Now that isn't meddling with a fellow's business. That's only giving him a little friendly advice, and goodness knows most fellows need it. The asking of personal questions is not necessarily a breach of good manners. Everyone I come across I pelt with questions. It isn't because I'm meddlesome, it isn't even that I'm inquisitive or curious, it's just because I'm interested. I always ask people what section of the country they were born in. That gives me a chance to talk familiarly with them about their home town. I next inquire after their health. That gives me a chance, if they are sick, to prescribe for them. Then I ask them if they are strong for prohibition ond, if they say they are, I have the Goat pull down the shades so they can't see the saloon across the street. Then I ask them what their political views are. When they say Republican or Democrat as the case may be, as of course they will, that's where I 'phone for the lunacy commission. Last of all I ask them if they are for women suffrage. If they say yes, we open a bottle of—mineral water. If they say no, Maria and the Goat throw them out of the window. Now Nettie you might call that meddling. I don't. I call that educating. The majority of people don't care where you come from or where you're going, who you are, or what you think. Now I'm interested in everybody, and the first thing I try to find out is if the party I'm talking to has the right line of thought, and there is not one in ten that has any thought at all. That being the case, it's up to me to get busy and give them a few helpful things to ponder over. If I see that they're combative and don't want to learn (and most people would rather die then get a new idea or any idea), I present them with a book that will make them think or get Maria to show them to the door, or the Goat to butt them down-stairs. You see there is just a little difference between ordinary meddling and my meddling. The ordinary individual meddles to make trouble or to satisfy curiosity. I meddle to educate and help. Your little lecture on friendship, Nettie, is all to the good, but I think you are a little mixed in some of your definitions. You say that a real friend is the first person that comes in when the whole world has gone out. Pardon me, that's not a friend, that's a burglar. So sure as you walk out of your home in the city that's the cue for the burglar to walk in. You also define a friend as one who having gained the top of the ladder won't forget you if you remain at the bottom. Now I don't call that much of a friend. The real friend is the one who when he climbs the ladder carries you up on his back. I knew one of those false friends who climbed to the top of the ladder alone, while I stood at the bottom of the ladder. Now you would call that man a real friend for when he was at the top of the ladder he certainly didn't forget me. I can solemnly vouch for that, for after he had been at the top of the ladder for three seconds he let go his hold and fell down plump on top of me. If he hadn't remembered me he would have kept hanging on, but when he stood by my bed in the hospital he told me I looked such a nice soft thing to fall on, and as I'd often told him to take a tumble to himself, he just had to let go and do it. My idea of a real friend is the man who loans you fifty dollars and who hides in the cellar and instructs his wife to tell you he is out every time you come round to pay it back. Nettie you say: "I have a friend who fulfills these and more too." Delighted to hear it. Now won't you please tell us, Is he blond or a brunnette? Rats, there I am meddling again!

Comfort's League of Cousins

5 Jay Avenue, MASPETH, L. I.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am nineteen years of age, five feet six inches tall, and live in one of the nicest places on Long Island.

If you don't mind I would like to see this letter in print. And talking about sleigh rides, I went a mile a minute. In the summer time I go to the beach swimming and rowing cherry picking camping and apple picking. Uncle Charlie I wish you would come to Maspeth in the summer time to help me pass the time away. I am an optical lense grinder by trade and if you need any eyes I will make you a pair. I make eyes for people, not blew eyes.

Kindly send me your age and I can tell the size of the nose by the age. And ask Billy the Goat if he needs any. Send his age too, or the size of his horns and nose.

Uncle Charlie what's good for sore feet?

I got a small bull pup. He could take Billy the Goat in one mouthful. He only weighs sixteen pounds. Do you think he could take Billy the Goat in one mouthful?

I think I've said enough for now. I remain,
Your nephew, GEORGE TEALE.

Glad to hear from you, George. You have made one astounding statement in your letter. You startle us by stating that "In the summer time you go to the beach swimming and rowing cherry picking, camping and apple picking." Now the next time you go to the beach swimming and performing all those other remarkable stunts please let me know in advance and I'll have all New York down to see the performance. I should like to see you swimming to the beach along the mile or two of hot dusty roads that lie between Maspeth and the ocean. In fancy I see you lying prone on the dusty roads striking out madly in the direction of the Long Island shore, picking apples and cherries en route. George, I've heard of a man going to the beach by the train or the street car and then diving into the water and swimming and I've heard of people who walked to the beach and took a swim, but I never heard of a man who started swimming before he got to the water. A man once asked me what I thought would be the easiest way for him to reach the top of Pike's Peak, and I told him if he wanted an easy and novel way to reach the top the best way would be for him to get a boat and row up. My advice to you is to quit this dry swimming or some cop will come along and find you struggling in the middle of the dusty roads and put you in the Willy House. So you make eyes do you? Making eyes is a mighty dangerous business and you'd better be careful how you go about the job, or your exhibitions of dry land swimming will be a thing of the past. I used to make eyes once. I made eyes at a lady. I didn't know that the guy sitting next to her was her husband but he was, and after he got through with me I decided never to make any more eyes. You might make me a couple of gross of assorted eyes. Some of my lady friends prefer blue eyes to brown and as I aim to accommodate everybody, I'd like to change my lamps occasionally, so as to give satisfaction to everyone, and with your assistance I think I will be able to do it. If any man needs a few dozen extra pairs of eyes I do, for my eyes are concentrated on printed or written matter nearly seventeen hours daily. Usually the newspapers are in my hand by seven A. M., and it's generally after midnight before I switch off the light over my head, and try to snatch a few hours of troubled sleep. My eyes have been ruined not so much by reading printed matter as by trying to decipher some of the thousands of penciled letters that are sent me. Some penciled letters are as easily read as some written in ink. In other cases people use a highly glazed paper and a cheap pencil with bad lead that makes scarcely any impression at all; others use coarse paper and a soft leaded pencil and the lead soon rubs off. Trying to decipher such letters by artificial light has almost blinded me at times, so don't forget the eyes, George. What I can't use I'll give to Billy the Goat to eat, then he'll have an inside view of things. Don't forget to send me a nice, strong, workable pair the next time you go to the beach swimming. I'm afraid an ordinary pair of eyes would not be good enough to thoroughly appreciate a sight of that kind. George you want to know what is good for sore feet. Walk on your head for six months. That ought to cure them. Any man who swims on land is bound to have sore feet, so you had better cut that stunt out too. Billy the Goat isn't afraid of your bull pup. Billy says he'd not only eat your bull pup, but he'll swallow the kennel as well, and you'd better grab those glass eyes and run or he may get you too.

GRENINSVILLE, GA.

TO THE LEG COSINS LADDIES:

I wish to get lellers of carriesponetance from single laddies age from 25 to 35. i want ne a good woman for a wife. I am a widderer my age is 37. i have four childion. GEORGE ——

George, I am not quite certain if you live at Greenville, as the way you have it spelled is Greninsville, but as you don't seem to have a very profound knowledge of Webster, and spelling isn't your strong point, and as there is no other place given in the postal directory that remotely approximates to anything except Greensville, we'll have to let it go at last. I have published your brief but important communication George, so that our readers may see what a lot of tough propositions I have to handle. You address yourself to: "the leg cosins laddies." That being interpreted into English I am inclined to think would be, the ladies of the League of Cousins. There is a great difference George, between ladies and laddies, and between League and leg. From the gist of your letter I, with the assistance of the Goat, Maria, and a few of our neighbors, have come to the conclusion that you want a wife. This being the case I am somewhat astonished at your trying to get in communication with the laddies' leg. Maybe you are a war veteran and are a leg shy. If that is the case we'll take up a subscription and get you an artificial one. We are not particularly interested in the leg question. We are trying to reach people's brains and not their lower extremities, for we know if we can get people to take care of their brains, their minds and thoughts, the remoter sections of the body will take care of themselves. You see how important it is to spell correctly. By putting an extra d into the word ladies, you change their sex and make them laddies—men instead of women. So you see spelling does amount to a good deal after all. Just think now if I were to send you a strong healthy laddie, and you went to the depot with your eyes bulging with expectation and with your heart doing a tango against your ribs, and then a big, six foot hobo with his face upholstered with Alfalfa, was to jump into your arms, you'd be some astonished, George, and you'd realize, as few of you do, that an extra letter in a word may mean all the difference between bliss and agony, matrimony and murder. You incidentally inform us that you wish to get "lellers of carriesponetance." Why don't you ask for letters instead of lellers. I suppose "lellers" is some new brand of mushy dope that passes between spoony people in Georgia. Maybe you were too fatigued or too lazy to put a cross across those two l's and make it letters instead of lellers. And why do you want "carriesponetance." Got a penchant for Carries, is that it? Most Carries I've known have been pretty nice girls, but I don't know that they are any better than any other type of girl. Anyhow if you prefer that type we'll try and oblige you—maybe I guess perhaps. I'm glad you ask for "carriesponetance" only from single laddies, because it's a terrible thing to think what might have happened if you had asked for carriesponetance" from married laddies. A single laddie is bad enough but a married laddie is an awful proposition to be up against. I'm sorry George that you are a "widderer." It's hard enough to be a widower, but to be a "widderer" must be fifty times worse. If I were only a swe t young widow George, and belonged to the "leg of cosins" I'd come right down to Georgia by the next train and——present you with the sweetest, loveliest, darlingest——Webster's dictionary you ever saw in your life. I was thinking of presenting you with myself, but you are strong for the Carries, and I'm a Charlie and no. a Carrie; ain't that too bad? George I'm sorry I can't upholster you with a good woman. There are thousands of good women looking for good men. If you are the right kind of man, strong healthy and able to give a woman a good home, you would not have to write to me to find you a partner. Time and experience have taught me one thing, and it is that the man who lives in the old, well populated, long settled sections of these United States does not need any assistance in obtaining a wife. When he does need assistance as a rule he isn't worth having, or else there is some physical, financial or moral reason why he is not acceptable to the ladies of the community in which he resides. Heaven forbid George that I should even vaguely hint that this is so in your case. Mind I am only generalizing. There are plenty of good reasons why the man out West is at times driven by desperation to advertise for a wife, for women in some sections of the West are simply not to be had, because they are not to be found. Back East no such conditions exist, so girls don't bother your heads about men who advertise for wives back here in the East, for if you do you'll find as a rule you are only hunting trouble. I feel quite confident George that there are plenty of good women within ten miles of you who would help you run your home if you asked them. Try the home product and then you'll know what you are getting and they will know what they are getting. Marriage is too serious a proposition to be left to the hit-or-miss methods of correspondence, and these methods would be more risky than ever in your case, as you do not shine as a correspondent and then too there are those four children to be considered. What you need most is a good mother for them rather than a good wife for yourself. Think of the kiddies first George, and keep your eye on the "laddies" at home.

CROWDER, OKLA.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a little girl fourteen years old. I have dark brown hair, gray eyes and fair complexion. I go to school every day and am in the eighth grade. Say, Uncle my teacher is going to have a debate in school next week. The subject is: Which is most destructive to man, water or fire? Which one do you think, Uncle? I am afraid you will not like me because I am rather homely. I am an orphan girl, living with my grandparents, but they are awfully good to me. Well, Uncle, do you believe in reading novels? I like to read very much.

Would like to hear from any of the cousins that care to write. Hoping to see this in print. I will close. God bless and help you in your work. EDNA BAKER.

Edna, give my compliments to your teacher and tell him I think that debate on which is the most destructive, water or fire, is a very preposterous subject for children to discuss. Possibly it will make some children think a little, but it is a criminal waste of time and opportunity to discuss foolish questions that lead to nowhere and result in nothing. Now if he had asked the scholars which was the most destructive to man, water, fire or the Democratic and Republican parties he might have evoked some useful discussion and had a whole lot of fun as well. Suppose after spending a lot of time over a fruitless discussion, it was decided that water was the most destructive, what good would come of it? Water is as capable of doing as much destruction as fire and fire is capable of doing as much destruction as water. Both are good servants but bad masters; both serve a useful purpose when under control, but if you're burned you're burned, and if you're drowned you're drowned. What your teacher should do is to set you some live subjects to discuss. Why didn't he ask you to make suggestions as to what was the best way to abolish poverty, crime, ignorance, superstition, disease, war, billionaires and all the other terrible evils that menace our existence on this planet, there would be some real sense in doing that. The world doesn't need foolish debates, it needs real discussion. I'll wager not a single school in the United States except those run by a few personal friends of mine, have ever discussed the cause of poverty. When you see a plant is in bad health you don't put mustard poultices on the leaves and branches. You examine the soil that the plant grows in; you find if the pot that holds it is big enough, and if the soil has enough or too much water; or if there isn't some destructive worm gnawing at its vitals; in other words you look for causes, not effects. If I keep scratching my nose it will get sore. Now the way to heal that nose is not to put vaseline on it, that's only dealing with the effect, but to stop scratching, then nature will do its own work. Now ask your teacher to have you discuss things that affect your life and your interests and the interests of your family, community, city, county, state, nation and then the wide world and all the mighty worlds about us. Teachers have such a wonderful opportunity when the brain of youth is plastic and receptive, to sow in the fertile soil of the youthful mind, seeds of love, truth, justice and mercy, but instead of doing that they waste their time discussing things that do not help one atom to broaden the vision of their scholars. That is why children grow up with the same ossified ideas that Pop had and go on thinking and doing what Pop did, never contributing one atom more to world thought and world progress than Pop did. That's why we groan and suffer and never get anywhere and that is why life is such a fierce, exhausting struggle. All due to lack of education along right lines. If teachers would use the same sense in bringing up their scholars that is used in raising flowers and chickens we'd have a world worth living in believe me. Teacher might have asked you, Edna, what was best to do with the saloon, burn it or drown it, then you could have replied: "We don't care whether it is burned or drowned as long as we get rid of it," and you could have won the prize by saying: "Burn it and drown it." There the teacher would have accomplished something, he would have brought home to your youthful minds the fact that a saloon is a poison shop, a deadly menace and should be removed. Of course I believe in reading novels. I have said so a thousand times, but don't make your brain a fiction sponge. The trouble with most human beings is they don't read anything but fiction, nothing but stories. In our New York libraries there is an excellent rule: you can't get two story books at once; if you want a story book you must also take a work of non-fiction, a work about travel, history, biography, science, poetry, or best of all, economics and sociology. If your teachers only knew something about economics and sociology we could revolutionize the world in a generation. Along the lines where education is most needed, there is no education at all. Anything worth while that I know I have learned by study and observation since I left school. Some of the most hopelessly ignorant men I have ever met have been graduates of our greatest universities. All education should be directed to the attaining of one great and glorious end—service in the cause of God and humanity. Strive to live life right and live life well, to think good, be good and do good. Wake up teachers to the needs of the hour. The future of the race is in your hands. Everything depends on your sowing the right kind of seeds in the brain areas you are now cultivating. Ask the all-wise Father to aid you in your work.

RICHMOND, VA.

UNCLE CHARLIE:

I have been reading your department with much interest and have received much benefit from your lectures. If you will please give me all the advice you can on introductions, it will be a great help to me as well as the majority of the other readers. I am exceedingly backward on introductions for the simple reason that I do not understand them. I have written to some manners and looks departments, but have not received a clear explanation. They say introduce the gent. to the lady by calling the lady's name first. This style is used very much, but as to its correctness I don't know. "Mr. A. meet Miss C." which one in the above case should speak first, or make the salutation? The lady I think. Is there any fixed rule which one shall speak first? In introducing your brother should you call him my brother Mr. A.?

Under certain circumstances it seems more convenient to introduce the lady to the gent. as "Miss B. meet Mr. A." Is that correct? When you want to introduce a gent. to a lady is it necessary to say: "Miss B. allow me to introduce Mr. A." or can you say "Mr. A. meet Miss B." In introducing more than one man to a lady, how do you proceed?

When a young man meets or shakes hands with a gentleman of high social standing such as ministers, should he raise his hat?

If you will give this letter a few minutes of your valuable time, it might mean more to me than you can at present realize. There are lots of people like I am, just ignorant, who need some capable person to advise them.

Uncle, you will notice I can't write or punctuate, but I can spell, for I keep old man Webster handy.

Yours very truly, HENRY AUSTIN.

Henry, why didn't you give your street number? There may be more than one Henry Austin in Richmond, and you might know that many of the cousins will write to you, as some of them are experts on etiquette. I have personally seen many of them eating soup with a fork and using the corner of the table-cloth for a napkin, so you can see they know all about etiquette and table manners. As I said before, a lot of our readers will doubtless write to you and as the postal authorities insist that street numbers be given when writing to large cities, the heap of mail that would ordinarily reach you will be returned to writers who will at once get suspicious and accuse me of concocting, devising and excogitating your letter. There are a lot of ginks of the "Doubting Thomas" variety who believe that I invent all the letters anyway. Some of them even think I've invented myself and don't really exist. Well, I should worry. They forget that no man is foolish enough to put himself to needless trouble. A man who gets more mail than Rockefeller does not need to invent letters, believe me, and no humorist in the world could invent the unconsciously humorous and extremely funny things that people occasionally write and say, quite innocently of course. Anyway it is very easy for the pee-wee brained critics to find if the letters are genuine or not, as names and addresses of the writers are nearly always given, and it is very easy to write them and find out whether they actually exist. Most people are too lazy to do this, so they nurse a grouch and think they are awfully smart, whereas they are nothing but stupidly dull, boorish and boobish. Now Henry, it happily happens that on my library shelves I have a little popular etiquette book, and the very first chapter is on introductions. The book says in introducing two persons the mutual friends should be very careful, and in fact should know that such introduction would be agreeable to both parties. Now it was the essence of wisdom for the etiquette expert to have dwelt on that all important point. Just look for instance what might happen if you were to introduce me to the Kaiser or the Czar. There would be a couple of second hand crowns on the market right away. Just think, too, what would happen if I were to introduce Lieutenant Hobson to the Mikado or Roosevelt to Boss Barnes or Billy Taft. Think, too, what a flare up there would be if I introduced Billy Sunday to our esteemed friend old Nick, or Eugene Debs to John D. Rockefeller, or old Doc Cook to Lieutenant Peary, or President Wilson to Huerta, or the editor of the Menace to Cardinal Gibbons, or a Kentucky Colonel to the president of the Anti-Saloon League. My, but there would be a monkey-and-parrot time. Some tall scrapping believe me. The war in Europe

A Hallowe'en Party

Innocent and Mirthful Entertainment with the Spooky Element Omitted

By Dora Morrell

Copyright, 1913, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

IN long bygone centuries it was believed the spirits of the visible and invisible worlds walked among men on All-Hallow Eve and because of their interest in human events were ready to tell the future to seekers after hidden knowledge and as the weal or woe of men and women had most to do with the condition of the purse and heart, of these did they testify in various tricks and charms. Faith in the reliability of these things has passed, but not the pleasure from consulting the oracles, hence the Hallowe'en party.

The beginning of the party was the appearance by mail of a card representing a witch, pointed hat, full black skirt, apron and ruff (copied from a Mother Goose book). On the apron was written, "Come join my revels, Oct. 31." On the reverse of the card, "Bring a four-leaf clover, a wishbone, or a horseshoe." The cards went out a week early.

When the guests arrived they were greeted by the Witch in person who gave each one of them a small basket holding nuts and a folder of birch bark on which was lettered "Nut-brack Night," an old name for Hallowe'en. On the inner leaves of the folder was the program of coming events. A tiny pencil was attached by ribbon. As each guest entered the room she tacked her clover or wishbone above the door to find from the Christian name of the first man passing under it what was to be His she was going to take.

The house was decorated everywhere with autumn foliage, evergreen, the red haws of roses and honeysuckles, beside such harvest fruits as could be pressed into service, ears of red and white corn braided by the stalks, and strings of corn kernels and acorns sewed on linen thread and draped effectively. The garden still held marigolds and chrysanthemums, and these filled vases for table and mantels. Little witches and attendant goblins were in all unexpected places, and when the evening was done one went home with each guest "for luck."

An open fire is ideal for a Hallowe'en party but in this instance the house afforded none so the guests were ushered into the kitchen when all had arrived, and there upon the table was a dish filled with "witches fire," surrounded by goblins. This is a very weird light, and there was no other in the room. It is made by burning salt and alcohol, and these can be renewed as they burn away. The witch led the dance and all danced after her until the light was going dim when she replenished it and sang:

"Plunge thy hand into the fire;
Fear not, though it burns yet higher,
Fate for thee holds good within,
Grasp, and fortune bravely win."

There may be nothing within but raisins, to signify prosperity, or the usual trinkets may be added with their significance.

When the light had faded, the candles and lamps hidden in Jack o'Lanterns were lighted. They were so many that the kitchen was bright enough for everything. First, according to the folder, came the nut test. This is rather uncommon. For it there must be an uneven number of girls and men, or either by themselves. Each took an acorn from the basket and strung it with others, when they wrapped this around a log and laid it upon the fire, after which they retired to the farthest corner from the fire and remainded perfectly quiet until the log and nuts were consumed. Then, unassisted, they raked out the ashes and together repeated:

"May my marriage be the theme
To visit me in this night's dream.
The image of my lover send,
Let me know his name and face,
And his occupation trace."

This was supposed to assure them fate—full dreams. Another dream producer was a small cake made of a walnut, a hazel nut, a nutmeg, ground fine and mixed with much salt and a little water. This is to be eaten when the subject is getting into bed, and at the same time she cries, "My love, appear with drink for me," but she does well to make sure of the drink by taking a pitcher of water and having it near the bed. In the morning the pitcher will be empty, and she will have dreams to tell. Nuts were named and set upon the hot stove top, indicating by their manner of burning whether two would live and die together or one would go another love to find. Sometimes they turn like one and sometimes they fly apart in pieces. If the nuts burn brightly or black, or burst, they prophesy prosperity, ill fortune or separation.

While some were busy with nuts, others bobbing for apples in a tub, each having a tiny slit holding a bit of paper with a name on it, the Witch was wandering around among them all, singing "Will anybody have her fortune told?" This Witch had learned to tell fortunes by card and hand, but for one who has no such knowledge she can have a "Fortune Tree", its green leaves holding a white inner leaf on which has been written a verse or couplet, and she can distribute these as she wanders.

"Pulling the Kale" took all the party to the cabbage patch when they were blindfolded and walked about until they stumbled; the cabbage the foot had struck must then be pulled up and was full of information as to the important He, or She when the men had pulled. Dirt on the roots meant wealth; long, full roots mean an old family; as the symmetry of the stalk and cabbage, so the physique of the individual of which it is the token; the taste of the pith tells the disposition, sweet, bitter, or spicy. They who find no cabbage are doomed to a lonely life.

"Making the Dough Cake" engaged most of the party as more than one cake could be made. This demands perfect silence from the beginning until the cake is baked. It is flour, salt and water stirred to a stiff paste, and then with a new pin each girl writes on it her initials and another's. The cake will bake in ten minutes, and those pairs whose initials stand clearly out will shortly be married.

"Throwing the Yarn" is an old charm from Scotland. The girl who wanted to know, held one end of the ball of yarn and dropped the ball, saying as it fell:

"As you unwind
My true love find;
Me to him bind,
One heart, one mind."

Then she felt a pull from the other end of the yarn and asked: "Who's there?" "Your future meal-ticket," came the reply, showing the nationality of the respondent.

It is now near midnight, and the card charm ends just at that moment. Two girls without speaking sorted face cards and aces from a pack and placed them under a pillow where they were to remain in silence fifteen minutes. At exactly quarter of twelve the cards are distributed to the company; if the number of the guests is larger than one pack of cards can serve with the selected cards, another pack may be used also. A king means speedy marriage; a Jack, broken engagement; a queen, "old maid;" diamond, riches; spades, poverty; clubs, thrift; hearts, love.

The girl who determined to try the lemon test had prepared for it by carrying in her pocket all day two lemon peels. She said she should rub the chair beside her with them at the "silent supper" so He would find her, and that was at twelve exactly. "The silent supper" is silent for but a little while. Around the table are left empty chairs. The girls are seated, the lights turned out, and the men come in, groping their way to a chair behind which they must stand. If no girl held that chair a bachelor must the man be. They could not tell if the chair belonged to a girl because the girls knelt on the floor in front of the chairs. Imagine how he felt who found himself behind his sister's chair. The lemon charm worked to perfection, so the girl said.

The table was covered with a paper table-cloth over a length of white paper. Paper napkins and dishes were used. Beside each plate was a tiny candlestick and taper. Autumn leaves made a centerpiece on which stood a medium-sized pumkin, filled with apples and nuts. Smaller pumpkin baskets held grapes and pears. Autumn leaves made mats for plates and for serving dishes. On wooden plates with paper mats were piled sandwiches in liberal supply and variety. Oat cakes belong to Hallowe'en and were provided, so too the delicious doughnut, and the simple foods that have a place at such a festivity. Apple and nut salad in apple shells was appropriate and inviting. The supper began by drinking "lamb's wool," an old Irish drink. It is the pulp of baked apple, beaten to a froth with milk, cider or other things. Another custom connected with the supper in Ireland and Scotland is to serve for this occasion a dish called "call-cannon," the meaning of the word not being known. It is a combination of mashed potatoes, parsnips and chopped onions, with a deep hole in the center filled with melted butter. A bowl of it with a ring hidden in it, is placed on the table. The finder, if single, will soon marry; if he is married he will come to the greatest prosperity. Cider and coffee were provided for drinks.

After hunger was satisfied came the apple naming, and finding by the seeds placed on the eyelids "Who loves me best." The little candles by the place were lighted; some burned clearly to the end and promised happy married life; others smoked for a while and then went out and a few would not burn without coaxing. Little boats of nut shells with bits of lighted candle were set afloat in bowls big enough for two. These bowls would be very pretty made from pumpkins if one had them to spare. As these candles lasted and floated so was the year to come typified, and if two boats drifted together, as they sometimes will, so must those whose names they carry.

Of course at the supper there is a spice cake just big enough for a piece for each guest, and in it are hidden a ring, for marriage within a year, a thimble for her who will sew her life away, a key with which to unlock all knowledge, a wheel for one fated to roam, a heart for one who will find love everywhere, a silver sixpence (a dime will do) for wealth. This cake was baked early in the evening and each person who was to eat of it had to stir it when it had been mixed. It was all ready but moistening before anyone came.

The horseshoes gave their message,—many nails told of wealth, empty holes of empty pockets; striking the metal one read by the ringing whether the one to come was clear and true, or dull and false. The evening ended with autograph writing of all present on the empty leaves of the folders for which the pencils had been attached.

There are many more charms that might be tried but the Witch decided to use her power and omit all that called on the subject to go somewhere alone in the dark, or any that were in the least "spooky," because for nervous or supersensitive persons their influence is harmful. Neither did she have much to say about ill-luck or disappointments to come. Such things have no place with jollity, and suggestions bear weight even when given at a merry-making.

in the way of doing something for her own support.

She received the fair girl kindly, but with a thus-far-and-no-farther air which at once nipped in the bud whatever hope she may have cherished that she was going to find a friend to love her for her mother's sake, if not for her own.

Almost immediately upon her arrival, Mrs. Winslow informed her that, having learned from her father that she could sew very nicely, she had secured a place for her as seamstress in the family of a friend who lived in the country.

Accordingly, a few days later found the lonely girl pleasantly located in a beautiful residence on the Hudson, a few miles from Albany, where she was to serve, in the capacity of waiting-maid and seamstress, another fashionable woman—Mrs. Anthony Plympton by name.

* * * * * * * * * *

"My blue-eyed darling—my modest little forget-me-not, tell me that you love me—promise me that you will be my wife."

"Next to my father and mother I believe I never cared so much for any one——"

"Ah! Ruth, darling! sweetheart! then I shall claim you as my own! You are mine—mine! and I will soon remove all doubt from your mind regarding your love for me."

The above conversation occurred, one lovely summer evening, in a small arbor that had been erected in the grounds of Hazelwood Heights—the elegant residence of Anthony Plympton, Esq.—and commanded a fine view of the beautiful Hudson river, a few miles below Albany.

Two years had passed since the opening of our story and the installment of our heroine, pretty Ruth Reynolds, in the service of Mrs. Anthony Plympton.

Meantime Ruth had developed greatly; she had even grown taller, and was expanding into almost dazzling beauty.

In temperament she was naturally cheerful; and when, as was often the case, her clear, girlish, happy laugh rang through the house, or she caroled sweet songs over her work, Mrs. Plympton would experience a jealous pang in her maternal bosom that a girl so fair should have been born to a woman in an humble sphere in life.

"Oh!" she sighed, many and many a time, "why could not I have had a daughter like her?"

And yet there soon came a day when she scornfully repudiated her as such!

And why?

Not because she was not worthy, beautiful, or intelligent—for Ruth had been a thorough student under her cultured father—but because she was—"poor" and a girl of "no position!"

At the end of two years the idolized son and heir of the house—Ralph Eastlake Hartmann Plympton—returned from a long sojourn abroad, where he had been studying some, traveling a good deal, and having a good time generally.

From the hour that he recrossed the threshold of his home and met her, he became hopelessly infatuated with his mother's beautiful seamstress.

He was shrewd and worldly—wise enough, however, not to betray the state of his feelings in the presence of either of his parents; but, as Mrs. Plympton's many engagements kept her from home a great deal, and his father was absorbingly immersed in business, it was an easy matter to conceal his penchant for Ruth, and to manage to spend much of his time in her charming society.

Anthony Plympton, Esq., was "the great man" of the region where he resided.

He had made his money in various ways—such as buying promising patents from struggling inventors, for a mere trifle, shaving notes, manipulating stocks, and advancing money at the usurious rates of from one to three per cent per month.

He had gone up like the proverbial rocket, but with no likelihood of coming down like the stick also mentioned in the familiar adage.

Therefore it will surprise no one to learn that he was a purseproud, would-be aristocrat, having a great deal to say about "the Plympton family," "the Plympton estates," and "the Plympton prosperity" generally, while it also goes without saying that, ever since the birth of his son, he had been building famous castles in the air for the scion of "the Plympton house" and the pride of "the Plympton heart."

But how true it is that

"The best-laid schemes, o' mice and men,
Gang aft a-gley!"

And the said scion and pride of Hazelwood Heights proceeded at once, after returning to the paternal mansion, to prove that much quoted proposition of the shrewd old Scotch poet.

But to return to that arbor overlooking the broad Hudson.

Mr. and Mrs. Plympton had gone to Saratoga for a few days, to meet some friends from the West, thus giving the young lover a most propitious opportunity to pursue his wooing, and which he proceeded to improve most industriously, as we have already seen.

It was a warm, lovely afternoon early in September, and Ruth, weary of remaining indoors, had taken her work and stolen out to the pretty Gothic summer-house that had been built on an elevated point of land.

And so Ralph Plympton found her; he always found her as soon as the coast was clear; and before a half-hour had passed he had made the declaration we have recorded.

The attraction between the young couple had been mutual, to a certain extent. Ruth would not have been human not to have been gratified by the attention and respectful admiration which she received from the handsome, aristocratic young man, whose familiarity with social life had served to invest him with a polish and bearing that were extremely pleasing to her, as to every one.

He was twenty-three years of age, possessing a fine figure, an attractive face—though, to a careful student of physiognomy, there were certain lines indicative of an easy-loving, self-indulgent nature, without much depth or strength of principle to balance it—a pair of bright, mirth-gleaming brown eyes, to match his waving hair, a ready smile, and a fluency of speech that was one of his chief charms.

She sat with downcast eyes and flushed cheeks, after his last triumphant assertion that she belonged to him, and he would soon remove from her mind all doubt regarding her affection for him.

Surely she had never liked anyone so well; she was always happy when she was with him; she missed him when he was absent, and eagerly looked forward to his return; indeed, her last thought at night was of the enjoyment his companionship had afforded her during the day—her first thought in the morning one of anticipation of what the day would hold for her in connection with him.

But was this "love" such as he expressed? did she "worship" him? would she feel that her "life" would only be complete with him for her constant companion?"

These were questions which, for some reason, she could not satisfactorily answer at that moment.

"Ruth, love, why do you not tell me that I may claim you," the young man at length questioned, as he leaned forward to look into her averted face. "You have twined yourself so effectually about my heart that I cannot live without you."

"Surely you do not mean that!" she murmured, in a startled tone.

"Indeed I do," he cried, excitedly. "Could you bear to have me go away and never come back to you?"

"I had not thought of such a thing," she said. "It would be very lonely; I—I believe I should miss you more than I can express."

"Then I am sure you love me, darling," cried the young lover, his face lighting eagerly while he drew to his heart the small hand he held. "You must love me—you must tell me that you love me—you must promise that you will marry me, or—I must go away. I cannot go on living with you here from day to day, and know that you can never be mine."

"But, Mr.——"

"Ralph," he interposed, with fond authority.

"Well, then—Ralph," she repeated, a shy smile flitting over her lips, a lovely flush mounting to her white temples, "I am afraid you ought not to have said this to me—I am afraid Mr. and Mrs. Plympton would not approve."

The red blood suffused the young man's face at this; too well he knew that they would not approve.

"I do not see why they should not approve, my darling," he fondly replied; "but even if they could find the slightest objection to you, I do not think such an argument should be allowed to weigh against the happiness of two lives," he continued, gravely. "I am of age—I know my own mind, I have an independent fortune, and in choosing my wife I intend to please myself, though if my choice meets the approval of my parents, I shall only be so much the happier."

She believed he would make a true and loving husband, but she did not answer.

"Dearest, do you think the opinions of others should be allowed to interfere and part two people who truly love each other?" Ralph continued.

"No," said Ruth.

"And if you were sure you loved me, and that I was in any degree worthy of you, would you allow any one to part us?" questioned the young lover, eagerly.

"No," she answered again, "and yet—I should shrink from causing any trouble—it would make me very unhappy if through me there should be a rupture between you and your parents."

"Which would be the worse?" he questioned, "to blight my whole life—as it will be blighted if I lose you—and send me out into the world again, a lonely wanderer, my existence a burden because shorn of every hope for the future, or to temporarily offend the pride of an over-fond father and mother? I do not say that the latter would be the fact; I am only supposing the case, to argue my point, Ruth, I love you with all my heart; I believe you love me in return; we are congenial in our tastes; I have abundant means to enable me to make life pleasant for you; and there is no earthly reason why we should not follow the dictates of our own hearts.

Practical Chicken House

AS everyone who keeps chickens usually realizes that they want a new house at this season of the year, I have had a photograph taken of one of our houses, which I consider most practical for a flock of birds numbering from twenty-five to forty. The open front insures circulation of fresh air and ventilation, so the house is especially valuable for sections of the country where they have cold winters, as the constant circulation of air night and day prevents the birds getting overheated during the night or chilled in the early morning, which they are very apt to do when closed houses are used. You will see from the picture what the outside of the house looks like, and I will try to explain the construction and inside fixtures so clearly that any handy man can build it without the help of a real carpenter.

The house should be located on dry, well-drained land, and should face south or a little east of south. Twelve posts are needed, five for each side and one in center of each end. Post holes should be made three feet and posts should be well tamped to make them firm. Sills of four by four inch stock are laid level on top of posts and spiked to them. Ends are halved to match sill joints.

Nest is placed with entrance at drop board level (two feet above top of sill). Food hopper and water pail are at convenient height for fowls. We prefer to place them high and to make a slatted platform in front of each for fowls to fly up to. This keeps food and water up out of litter and dirt. It also leaves more free floor space as floor beneath platform is open and available. If rear section is made two feet deeper, making whole house 16 feet deep, it will give room for one more roost and give a capacity of forty layers for winter or thirty for summer; fowls confined to house or with only a small yard. Nests are simple boxes twelve by twenty-four inches inside measure, open at north end only and have shed-roof hinged cover. With more than twenty-five fowls a second nest should be supplied.

Building Instructions

Door placed between two highest studs in east wall with bottom just below top of sill to break joint and stop draft. Door opens outward and hinges on north side. A screen door of one inch mesh netting should be made to open in, just inside of solid door. This is useful in summertime or at any time when it is desired to have door open. A litter board from floor level to four to six inches above sill is used to keep all litter in rear section of house. It should be made removable, resting in cleats. Front section should have sand or earth floor only. In rear section use clean oat straw litter or dry leaves. This house may be made with sand or gravel floor only, filled in to top of sill, but we use light wooden floors and raise the house on blocks. Sand and litter should be renewed as often as needed.

After sills are laid studs should be placed in position and nailed to sills. Plates are spiked to top of studs after making sure to have them plumb. Rafters are lightly notched to engage plate. Side boards should be put on in horizontal position and should be covered with good roofing fabric. Roof boards lay east and west. Joints of sides with roof should be flush and smooth. Roofing fabric for sides should go on up and down and should lap on roof about one foot. This gives a wind-proof joint. Eaves at north end of house should be made by a double course of shingles to project three inches. Roof covering should be laid to roll east and west with generous laps, and should allow only four inches of shingle course to make eaves in same manner as north end.

Windows for semi-monitor top should be three three-light common small cellar windows, and should be screwed tightly in position to make a wind-and-storm proof joint. These windows may be removed in hot summer weather, but in cold climates should be firmly fixed in place from September 1st until first settled warm weather in June. West window may also be removed in hot summer weather and replaced by wire screen. With windows out in warm weather the house is cool and comfortable even in "dog days."

Front Elevation

The front is boarded up from bottom eighteen inches to break floor drafts and is also boarded down six inches from top. Balance is one quarter inch wire netting. Door for fowls is only break in wire front, and is closed by a board shutter run in cleats on the inside.

Nest boxes, which contain two nests each, are placed at each end of the house. The dropping board is eighteen inches above the floor, three feet wide, and runs the full length of the back wall. The roosting frame, consisting of one or three perches, according to the number of birds which are to occupy the house, is elevated above the dropping board on nine-inch legs. Three self-feeding hoppers stand on a shelf fixed on the wall of the east end of the house, and eighteen inches above the floor. A perch is fixed in front of them, so the birds can hop upon it while helping themselves to dry mash, grit or oyster shell. A water fountain stands on a smaller shelf on the west end wall, and, of course, a perch in front of it. Lifting the feed and water on shelves leaves all the floor space free, and prevents feed or litter being scratched into them. Whatever else you may omit in the way of inside fixtures, don't forget to put in a board to keep back all litter, otherwise it will be scratched up under the windows and get wet every time there is a driving rain or snowstorm. And then, ten to one it will become mouldy, and within a month or so birds will commence to show signs of sickness, for mouldy bedding causes trouble with breathing and digestive organs, and is often the unsuspected cause of serious epidemics. We have had such a hot, stormy summer that I am afraid the cold days of fall will bring colds and other ailments into the poultry yard, so I advise you all to keep a sharp watch on your birds, and if any one is sneezing, or looks the least bit dumpish, catch it and shut it up in some dry, clean coop, which should be kept for a hospital.

Bronchitis, canker, pneumonia and influenza are all more or less alike in symptoms and are constantly mistaken for roup. They are kindred diseases anyway. All spring from cold. My advice is, don't wait to diagnose the case. At once start to destroy the embryo germs, without waiting to determine the particular family they belong to.

Having quarantined the suspected bird, start treatment. If there is any discharge anywhere, thoroughly scrub with some antiseptic solution night and morning. Dr. Woods recommends hydrogen dioxide with fifteen drops of tincture of phytolacca root in each pint of drinking water. Food to be light and nourishing. For all forms of colds he gives: Tincture of aconite, ten drops; byronia, ten drops; tincture of spongia, ten drops; alcohol enough to make one fluid ounce. One spoonful of this to be added to every quart of drinking water.

My own personal supply of drugs for self, family, poultry, pets and livestock consists of permanganate of potassium. It comes in little flaky, deep-lake colored crystals, and costs next to nothing. Dissolve a thimbleful of these in a quart of water, and you have an A 1 disinfectant. A dessertspoonful of that mixture, diluted with half a pint of water, becomes an antiseptic solution that meets every requirement for internal or external use. Fifty cents' worth will last a year, even if generously used, as a purifier in or out of the house. It has also the added advantage of being easily sent through the mail without fear of breakage. If kept in a tin with a close-fitting lid or a wide-mouthed bottle severely corked, it will last indefinitely.

When we have a bird with a cold, it goes into a coop with plenty of straw on the bottom, and it is kept all the time in the sun. At night a curtain of bags insures warmth. Mouth, eyes and nostrils are swabbed with water, to which the permanganate mixture has been added; half a teasponful goes down the sick bird's throat.

Food consists of stale bread moistened with milk, in which onions have been boiled. If the diarrhea is bad, a thimbleful of poppy seed is added, or water in which mullein has been boiled is given as a drink. A change of food is arrived at by boiling rice, mixing it with chopped parsley and green sprouts of onions, chopped fine, and charcoal mixed in, once a d y. If we have milky pudding for dinner, some of it goes to the patient—in short, any of the nourishing food you would give to a child will serve.

This "homey" doctoring has always answered with my poultry. It's much easier than doctoring with medicine, often not on hand, and, on a farm, not easy to get.

Correspondence

E. P.—My chickens are six weeks old. When they were one month old they became sick and half of them died. They were hatched in an incubator. I sent away for the eggs.

A.—The chicks had white diarrhea. Three grains of powdered catechu in every quart of drinking water might have helped them, though I have not much faith in a cure for the disease. The only way of fighting it is along the lines of prevention, which means getting eggs from healthy hens and clean nests. White diarrhea is a germ disease which may be transmitted from the hen, or a dirty nest is often the breeding place for the spores which adhere to the shell and develop the germs of the disease in the incubator or on the hens. For this reason, all eggs for hatching should be wiped with a clean cloth moistened with alcohol. The droppings from one afflicted chick may spread the disease through an entire hatch within a few hours. Disinfect your incubator, brooder, and everything which has come in contact with the sick chickens.

D. H. B.—I have received much help through your poultry department in COMFORT and I come to you for information. I have lost Learly all my young turkeys. I cut one open and it had sores on the liver. I also lost one old turkey hen; her liver was more than three times its natural size. It was covered with sores, pimples and hard knots that were filled with a substance, resembling bone. I would like to know the disease and cause. They have full range on the farm, and live mostly on what they pick up of waste grain and table scraps.

A.—Without doubt the turkey had the disease and liver which is commonly called blackhead, because in some cases the bird's head turns dark before death. It is contagious and most difficult to eradicate if it once breaks out on a farm. Doctoring young birds is just time wasted. The only hope is along the lines of prevention. The greatest difficulty lies in the fact that common hens may spread the disease without anyone suspecting that they are ailing, as they rarely, if ever, show show signs of sickness. But the microbes are in their droppings, and so contaminate food and water, and are by this means carried into the digestive organs of turkeys, where they rapidly develop and usually prove fatal, especially in young birds. Old turkeys have more power of resistance, and are frequently infected for months before showing signs of sickness. The best way to fight disease is either to keep sick poultry in yards, or the turkeys in large enclosures, changing the location of the turkeys' enclosures at least twice a year before they are again allowed to run on it. Give old birds two tablespoonfuls of Castor oil once or twice during the months of November and December, to clear out the intestines, and once a week from then on, mix two tablespoonfuls of moist bread or mash, which must be made into pills the size of large peas, two or three to be given to each bird. Next spring, wipe the eggs for hatching with alcohol, and set them under strong, healthy fowls. When the hatch is over, put the hen and brood in clean coops on ground far removed from all other poultry. Feed on curds from sour milk, and give hardly anything else. When the young turkeys are three days old, let the hen which is mothering them have free range, and they will pick up plenty to eat.

M. C. S.—Last spring I had much trouble with my geese eggs hatching. The eggs were fertile, but the shells so hard the geese died before they could come through. I dipped the eggs in lukewarm water the day before hatching.

A.—The best way of moistening shell is to sprinkle the nest and surrounding ground with water every second day during the last two weeks. Perhaps the fault lay in the breeding stock. Eggs from geese under two years of age rarely hatch, though they are usually fertile, as the goslings are wanting in constitutional vigor, and lack the strength necessary to break through the shell.

E. G.—We had fourteen young Indian Runner ducks. They got along fine, until now. They are in the water, begin to get lame and die in a day or two.

A.—Young ducks should be kept away from swimming water until they have exchanged their down for feathers. And always give them plenty of dry bedding to sleep on.

H. S.—Please tell me what I can do for my hen. She is two years old and the latter part of May was broody. After setting two weeks she could not walk. She seems to be well in other ways.

A.—Probably the ground under the nest was damp, and the hen is suffering with rheumatism. Rub her feet and shanks with a mixture of turpentine and sweet oil.

C. C.—I am a subscriber and I get much good from your Poultry Talks. I have never seen anything described like what my ducks have. They appear hearty, but when they are nearly grown, all at once they act as if they were hurt. Their wings drop, their eyes swell shut and act as if back was hurt before they die. They are sick about two days. I lost thirty last year.

A.—I really can't account for the condition of your ducks. It is most puzzling, especially as you say that you lost thirty in the same way last year. If any of our readers have experienced the same trouble, and can suggest a remedy, I shall be glad to hear from them.

H. C.—My chickens are droopy and their droppings are like matter (yellowish green), and after two or three days of sickness their combs turn black. They have it about a week and then most of them die. The first symptom is they do not eat.

A.—In cases of real cholera, it is very little use trying to doctor the birds, for usually the disease has advanced to a fatal stage before any symptoms are noticed. Diarrhea, which may result from poison which the birds may have got around the farm—such as paint skins, strong fertilizer, putrid meat or lime—can be cured if treated in the early stages. Give two spoonfuls of Castor oil, and three hours later a feed of bread which has been toasted, soaked in scalded milk, allowed to cool, and squeezed almost dry. Give no grain for three or four days, and nothing but rice water to drink. True cholera is very contagious, so if you are at all doubtful as to the true character of the disease your birds are suffering from, clean up and disinfect the chicken house and all fixtures, and plow or spade up the yards.

E. G. R.—My little chickens stand with their heads in the air and seem to be tasting something. Their wings drop down and the crop fills up with gas. They have a nice, dry clean coop and plenty of water and green food along with the regular chick feed. (2) What causes chickens to hatch without any eyes? I had two that way. One of them had blue lumps all over the top of his head; they were soft.

A.—You don't say if the chickens were hatched in an incubator or under a hen. If the former, I am inclined to blame their present condition and the want of eyes to uncertain temperature during the term of incubation. If they were hatched under hens, the breeding stock must be badly inbred or very much out of condition. There is nothing to do in such cases except get rid of all male birds and sickly or mopy looking hens; then buy strong, healthy cockerels to mate with what hens you may think worth keeping.

S. B.—My chickens seem to be all right, until two or three days before they die, when they cannot breathe and gasp for breath. I cut three of them open and the wind pipe was full of little red worms about three quarters to one inch long. It's only the chickens that have had this.

A.—The birds are suffering from gapes, which is caused by a parasite worm. Affected birds should be confined to small quarters, away from other poultry; otherwise the whole flock may become contaminated; and be especialy careful, next spring, to keep brood coops off from the ground where the afflicted birds' droppings have fallen. After the sick birds are quarantined, mix twenty drops of turpentine with one teaspoonful of sweet oil, dip the end of a narrow wing feather into the mixture, have someone hold the bird, then take its head in your left hand, stretch out the neck to its full extent, hold the beak open, and push the feather down its throat, give it a quick turn and pull out. Usually several of the small worms will come with it. Let the bird have a few minutes to recover its breath, and repeat two or three times, and again the following day. Feed on soft, flourishing food; put a teaspoonful of asafetida in every quart of drinking water, both for the sick birds and for the flock from which they were taken.

F. W. C.—I am starting into the Rhode Island Reds. Do you have to inbreed them to hold their color? My neighbors say they are a hard chicken to raise.

A.—To keep the color in all birds like Rhode Island Reds, it is necessary to practise line breeding, which needs an amount of experience, careful study, and a rigid system of keeping records, without which it is impossible not to fall into the error of inbreeding. Rhode Island Reds are naturally strong, vigorous birds, and if you only want them for eggs and market, it is not necessary to worry about plumage. The eggs are usually fertile, and hatch strong, easily raised chicks.

J. A. C.—My geese get so they can't walk. Some die, and others sit around and then die. They have spells, as though they were dizzy and then refuse to eat. They have a whitish discharge.

A.—If goslings are fed much grain, they are almost sure to lose the use of their legs and get out of condition. Give very little mash, made of equal parts of ground oats, corn and wheat bran. Let them have free range on short grass. Cover floor of sleeping place with plenty of clean dry litter.

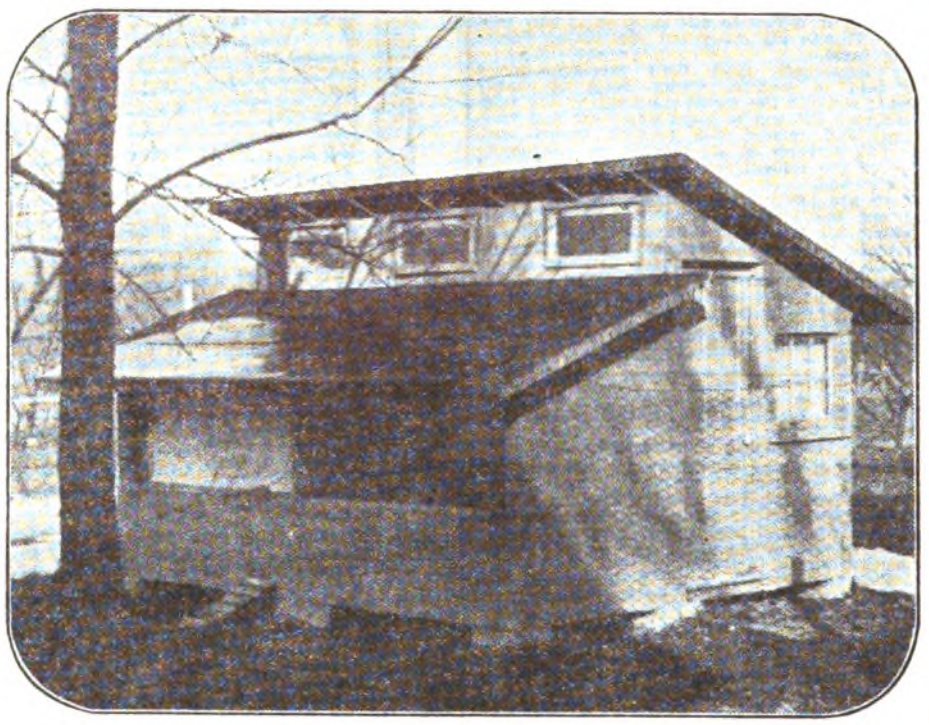
J. L. B.—Can you tell me what is meant by showing the red in young turkeys and at what age, and what to feed them at that time?

A.—The term "showing red," refers to the turkey's head and neck turning red, which it usually does when they are about three months old. If they are out on free range, feed nothing but sour milk and curds night and morning.

J. W. W.—I have three dozen hens. They all seem healthy, but do not lay. They did not set this summer. I used the lice powder recommended in July COMFORT. Last spring I got twenty-four eggs from them every day. Last spring I used an incubator but the chicks died the day after they were hatched.

A.—As the hens all laid well during the spring, should say that the want of eggs in July was due to the hens' moulting. Give a mash every morning made of equal parts of wheat middlings, corn meal and ground oats, and wheat bran. To every quart of this mixture add two tablespoonfuls of beef scraps and animal meal. At noon feed oats or wheat, scattered in deep litter; at night all the whole corn they will eat up in ten minutes. There must have been something faulty about the way you regulated the incubator, otherwise you would have hatched out more chickens, and they would not have died off so quickly. If the temperature in an incubator is very irregular, it has such a disastrous effect on the embryo chickens that there is nothing one can do after they are hatched that will make them strong and healthy.

H. M. B.—I have the Rhode Island Reds and the American Dominiques and in every case the sickness is with the Dominiques. I have one hundred and have lost ten. They get dopy and stand around all hunched up for a day or two, then their eyes close and a thick white cheesy substance forms in them but there is no discharge from mouth or nostril.



A.—Examine the bird's throat. If there is any disagreeable odor after the beak is opened, you are safe in doctoring for roup. If there is no odor, it is only a cold, or a roupy condition of the eyes, and may be cured by bathing with a solution of boric acid. Just add a little tincture of iron to the drinking water for a week or two.

A. S.—Will you please tell me what size house I should have for forty-eight hens, and would a house dug in a south hillside with the front walled up with rock and of course plenty of light and air be all right? Is there any other grain I can feed instead of wheat? It is very high here. Would there be any money in early frys, say to set my incubator in November and from then until March? I receive many helpful things from this department.

A.—A house twenty feet long and ten feet wide would be about right for forty or fifty birds. If the hillside is very dry, it might be safe to make a dug-out. Personally, I would rather have a wooden house covered with roofing material. Use oats instead of wheat at noon, and mash in the morning. See answer to J. W. W. It would depend entirely upon your market as to whether broilers would be profitable or not, so early in the season. But you must remember that from November to February fresh eggs bring very good prices, and unless you have a good brooder house, it is difficult to raise young chickens at that season of the year.

A. R. S.— As this is my first year raising chickens I wish you would tell me if scraps, bread and meat,

The Highest Honor

By Owen Hugh O'Neil

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE president sat in his office, scanning his personal correspondence. One letter after another he drew from the tray on his desk, and two typewriters clicked busily as he dictated his answers.

There were envelopes white and blue and gray, with addresses neatly typewritten and stamps carefully affixed; but at length he selected one that seemed out of place on the president's neatly appointed desk. The envelope was rough and coarse, and of a grayish-yellow color. It was soiled with greasy thumb-marks, and in one corner were the printed letters, "R. R. S." The address, a big, boyish scrawl, had been written with an indelible pencil, and was somewhat blurred. Altogether, it was a disreputable-looking letter, but the president's eyes brightened when he saw it. For an instant he held it between his thumb and forefinger, wavering between desire and duty; then he laid it aside, and resumed the duties which, for a time, claimed his attention.

An hour later he again took up the letter and tore open the envelope, disdaining the paper-cutter which lay on the desk. He extracted several large sheets of paper, ruled in red ink; at the top of each sheet was the name of the railroad of which he, John Reeves, was president. And between the folded sheets was a photo postal—the picture of a young fireman. He held his soiled buckskin gloves in one hand; the other grasped the handle of his shovel. His overalls were soiled, and his face, too, was greasy. And this was William Reeves, the president's son!

The president held the picture in his hand and studied it critically. It seemed strange to think that this greasy fellow in overalls was the same brown-eyed Billy who had played in the mansion up on the Avenue,—the same little black-haired Billy who had stood foremost at school,—the same big Billy who had graduated with high honors at college—the little Billy, the big Billy, the Billy who had never known a mother's love.

But the president was proud, for had not he himself worked his way up? He had started on the lowest round of the railroad ladder, as water-boy on "Section Six," and now he was president of the big system—such a president, it was said, as had never been known before and might never be known again. For when he had attained power and influence, he had not forgotten the men who had aided him in his youthful days; although he was president, he was still "one of the boys."

And now his boy was one of the boys—a fireman on the Mountain Division—the worst run on the road. He could imagine just how Billy looked, his back bent, his left foot forward, shoveling ton upon ton of coal into the hungry furnace, with a long string of cars stretching behind. Some day Billy Reeves would be president, and then he would realize, as never before, the value of early training.

At first, the idea had been distasteful to Billy; he had shrunk from the thought of associating with the "men of the cab and rail," eating his meals from a tin dinner-pail, wearing coarse clothing, and facing the dangers of the Mountain Run; but he determined to show the world and his father that he was a man in every sense of the word, and when he donned his overclothes and prepared for his first trip over the Mountain Division, it was with his own full consent. He had been given his choice; a monotonous commercial life, or that of railroad man, knowing that some day he would be railroad president; and he had chosen.

It was a long letter that John Reeves held in his hand; part of it ran as follows:

"I am not on the extra board now, I was promoted to regular fireman last week. My engineer is Ross Garrahan; our engine, the two-forty-two.

"You have often spoken of Joe Garrahan, the veteran railroad man; you placed him on the retired list three years ago, you know. Ross is his son. He says that he is slightly acquainted with you. Ross is the only living son of Joe Garrahan; two others Dennis and Theodore, were killed on this division. You may have known all this before; it is new to me however. Ross is a fine fellow, and treats me just as he does all the other railroad boys. I am just plain Billy Reeves now, not 'the president's son.'

"* * * You know, Dad, that the motto of one of the great railroad organizations, is 'Fidelity, Justice, Charity.' Well, fidelity, justice, and charity are only a few of the great things that a man learns on the railroad. I honestly believe that my seven months of railroading have been of as much value to me as all my years of college life.

"* * * * * * I never realized what a wonderful thing one of these big engines is, until, as fireman, I knew that my life was in her keeping. She is completely in our power, yet, just as completely, we are in hers. Ross Garrahan's left hand can send her flying over the rails, or bring her to a dead stop in an inconceivably short space of time, and yet, if a wheel should break while we were spinning around one of those sharp curves, or if any one of a thousand other things should occur, our souls would be thrust into eternity more quickly than you can snap the case of your watch. Oh, it is wonderful, wonderful!

"I spoke of it to Garrahan yesterday, and he said, 'These engines aren't built to go in the ditch; they're built to stay on the track.' I made no answer, and then he said, 'I understand, Billy. At first you are almost overcome with awe, but you grow accustomed to it after a while. It sort of wears away.'"

The president read the letter through to the end, then folded it carefully and replaced it in the envelope. And once more he studied the photograph that lay on the desk before him; the high forehead, with the black hair waving away from the temples; the honest brown eyes; the firm lips and chin—every inch a man! The president wished that Billy's mother could read this letter, and see Billy's picture, but she had been dead many long years.

For a little while the president mused, and then placed the letter and the picture in an inner pocket of his coat. It was noontime now, and he rose from his chair and prepared to leave the office. An attendant rushed in at this moment, with a yellow envelope in his hand.

"Telegram, sir!"

The envelope was marked "Rush," and somehow, he knew not why, Mr. Reeves feared to open it. There was nothing startling or extraordinary about a telegram marked "Rush," and yet he felt that this little envelope contained tidings of disaster.

He tore the envelope open and let it drop to the floor. An instant later he gave a loud cry of despair, and the telegram dropped from his fingers. The attendant picked it up, and could not help but see the words typewritten on the yellow slip.

"Your son, William Reeves, was killed in wreck at Shell Ridge at 11:30 A. M. today. Body still in wreckage. R. Clark, Supt. Mountain Division."

Billy was dead! Handsome, brave Billy Reeves, the president's only son! For a moment he stood like one in a dream; then he rushed down the stairs and to the railroad tracks.

There at the station stood the Limited, almost ready to start.

"An engine!" cried the president. "An engine and right of way over everything between here and Shell Ridge!"

The only available engine was that attached to the Limited, but the demands of the frenzied, grief-stricken president could not be ignored, so the four-forty, with one car to give her weight, was uncoupled, and the president climbed into the cab.

"Another fireman!" he cried, and the fireman of a yard-crew was quickly summoned.

The four-forty swung out over the steel. Two hundred and fifty miles away the president's son lay dead under a mass of wreckage, while at the east end of the line the president cursed himself for having demanded the boy to "work his way up."

Frank Bertram was running the four-forty that day, and Frank was known as the most reckless runner on the road, yet even he could not satisfy the president's demands for speed, speed and still more speed. Fast freights and passengers alike were sidetracked, and the four-forty ate up the miles as she ate up the coals. The two firemen toiled unceasingly, till the perspiration poured from their faces. It was a warm summer day and never before had they toiled so hard and steadily.

The four-forty was known as one of the best and most reliable engines on the line, just as Frank Bertram was known as one of the best engineers, and for that reason the president wished to retain the services of both engine and engineman until he had reached his destination. So they stopped at Riverside for water and coal, instead of changing engines, and here they secured two new firemen, but Frank Bertram still held the throttle when they pulled out.

The thought at the bottom of the president's heart was this: Perhaps Billy had not been killed, after all; perhaps he had been injured seriously, even fatally. But even in that case, perhaps he—the president—could reach the scene of the wreck in time to speak to his son once more—just once more—and ask forgiveness for having demanded him to face the dangers of the rail in order to gain experience in the railroad game.

Constantly he begged for more speed, but Bertram protested that even now they were making a record run, that would be talked of for years to come. Many a man, when he saw the four-forty and her one car approaching, cried "Runaway!" and when they recognized the president's face, and saw the firemen toiling as if their very lives depended upon the amount of coal they could shovel into the furnace—when they saw that the special did not even slow up at the crossings, but rushed by at a fearful rate of speed—they were more than astounded.

It was twelve o'clock, noon, when the Four-forty left the east end, and it was three-fifty P. M. when they reached Shell Ridge. Two hundred and fifty miles in two hundred and thirty minutes—"a mile a minute and twenty miles to the good," as Frank Bertram said afterward. How they made it none could tell, but make it they did.

They had extricated Billy Reeves' body just a short time before the president arrived, and now they were removing the wreckage underneath which Roscoe Garrahan's body was pinned.

"What was it?" demanded the president of a group of officials standing near.

"The side-rods snapped," replied Superintendent Clark. "They hadn't a bit of a show, poor fellows!"

At length they brought Ross Garrahan's body and laid it beside that of Billy Reeves—alongside the track, on the soft sod.

Old Joe Garrahan was there, too, but no tear came from his eyes and no sob from his throat. He sat there, by his dead son's body, his lips set tight, and his hands clenched. But John Reeves did nothing but implore Billy to speak to him, to forgive him.

At length Joe Garrahan could stand it no longer.

"Reeves," he said, "don't take on so. It's hurtin' you, and it don't do Billy any good. Don't you think my dead boy there is as much to me as Billy is to you?"

"Oh, Joe, if I had only kept him at home!" cried the president.

"Kept him at home? What for? You wanted to make a man of him, and you did it. He took a man's chances, and lost—and so did Ross. They were men, just as you and I were men, in our younger days. We won, but they lost. That's all the difference, John, don't you see?"

"But he was my only child, my only boy!" moaned the president. "Oh, Billy, why did I make you do it? Why did I let you do it, my boy?"

"Your only boy, John?" said Garrahan softly. "So was Ross my only boy—the only one left of three fine fellows.

"There was big, strappin' Dennie—you remember him, John. He was the oldest, and as steady as clockwork, and they brought him home to me dead. I thought my heart would break, but his engineer—he was fireman, you know—the engineer says to me, 'Garrahan, it's the highest honor that can fall to the lot of a railroad man, to die in the discharge of his duty. The highest honor, Garrahan, man.' And he was right.

"Then there was Teddy—you're after rememberin' Teddy, Mr. Reeves, and how his yellow hair used to blow into his eyes, and he'd toss his head, and shake it out—Teddy, with his blue eyes shinin' with mischief—oh, he was the handsome boy, John!

"'Twas on the evening of his twenty-second birthday that the message came to me that Teddy was dead. A misstep in the dark, and 'twas all over with him. Dennie and Teddy—and now it's Ross. Three good boys they were, but I'm not complainin'. 'Tis the highest honor, Mr. Reeves. If your Billy had lived, he'd have been president of the road some day, and he'd have been honored by everyone, maybe. And again, maybe he'd have bitter enemies, who'd have maligned him and defamed him, as the best of men are maligned and defamed. And when he died, they'd forget him, the world would, and cease to honor him, but the railroad men who have died in discharge of their duty will be honored through time and eternity, John.

"'Tis the highest honor that man can receive. 'Tis not as if he had died in disgrace, you know. If he had been to blame, or if Ross had been to blame, 'tis the sorry man I'd be today; but they did their duty, both of them. Workin' his way up? Yes, but not as you worked your way up. You're president now, but Billy is more. You're loved and honored, but not as Billy and Ross are loved and honored. He has worked his way up, 'tis true, but not to an official position on the railroad. He has worked his way up to higher things. It's hard—I know it's hard. My last boy—and your only one. But it's not ourselves we must think of—it's them. We must think of them, and rejoice—for they have worked their way up to higher things—and they have received—the greatest honor."

Garrahan's voice broke, and they sat silent, with bowed heads, for a long time. Then they rose and prepared for the journey home.

"Good by, Joe," murmured Reeves, as they clasped hands. "I thank God that my boy has received the highest honor."

cellent poultry country, and but very few mosquitoes; that is, around the homes, but some in the creek bottoms. Plenty of running water and fine fishing lakes. The majority of the farms are fenced with barbed wire. Land rents at one and two dollars per acre and but very few white renters here.

The school system is good but there is a scarcity of children, owing to a thinly populated country now. Why this condition? Can't tell you, only I know many of the first settlers have moved away to the city. We are three miles from the nearest railroad. There are a good many negroes here, but they are mostly hard-working, honest people. Some have fertile farms and beautiful homes. People are social and kind.

The soil is adapted to corn, cotton, oats, peas, pinders, both kinds of potatoes, sugar-cane, most all kinds of hay; in fact, most everything known to the Southern clime.

And above all things we think this a healthful location, our health is so much improved.

If I am welcome will come again with some helps and recipes.

MRS. MOLLIE E. ADAMS.

OLIVE BRANCH, ILL.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

Through the medium of COMFORT we are granted the privilege of communicating with every reader of its interesting pages by a few strokes of the pen. One sister asked in the May issue how the hired man should be treated. Are we not all one great family? The same sun, moon and stars light our way. The same God guides our destiny. God did not create lofty mountains, grand canyons, beautiful streams, trees, birds and flowers for the rich alone. The poor share in Nature's beauties. Then why discriminate against the poor? Why should one who is fortunate enough to own houses and lands feel superior to his brother man who, through misfortune or an undeveloped business mind, has to toil for his bread? Greed and selfishness are the bane of civilization. It is crushing the true social spirit for which our ancestors were famous. Greed of the trusts and the money lords are, today crushing the toiling, helpless thousands, housing them in hovels and denying them the right to live on equal terms with their fellow men. Free and equal is a misnomer applied to the poor. It is true they are allowed to vote but often at the dictation of their employer.

It is good for revenue that causes our government to grant the sale of intoxicants. It permits the saloon, that giant octopus that reaches its tentacles out and drags the youths of our land down to ruin, the youth who are to be the future citizens of our great and glorious country. The saloons are the leper spots that blot city and country alike. Now if every sister who reads this will rise with one voice and say, "The saloon must go, I have no son to sacrifice," it would soon go. Sister, if you have no husband, father or son who is a slave to drink, have pity on those who have, and rise up as one great army and protest to our government against the sale of that which ruins our homes, sends men to prison, to the gallows, the work house and asylum. It causes innocent children to go naked and hungry, grow up without an equal chance in the world, to be future criminals. It is feeding the hearts of women and children into the greedy maw of the saloon keeper. Our county officers allow the blind tigers to flourish in districts where the vote of the people has driven the saloons out. The people seem helpless to combat this evil without the aid of the government. When, oh, when, will the love of our fellow man overcome greed for revenue and stamp out that which receives its revenue from women's tears, wrecked homes, blighted childhood and lost souls.

I will not describe myself as I am not young, nor pretty and have no John.

MRS. JULIA DUNCAN.

BRIDGEPORT, IND.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have been reading the sisters' letters and came to Mrs. Marie Haggerty's letter, and must say I agree with her in regard to children. They certainly have to be corrected and sometimes punished or at least I find it so.

I have five children, the oldest a boy eleven years old, the youngest three, one girl eight years and it takes patience and strong nerves to keep those children as they should be kept and do all my housework, including sewing, raising chickens, making a garden and milking.

We live on a farm of one hundred and fifty-three acres, three miles from Indianapolis, the capital of the state, and raise corn, wheat, oats, rye, clover and have lots of fruit and a nice vegetable garden.

I love the farm and would not think of taking my boys to town.

I see very few letters from sisters around here. I have taken COMFORT for ten years and could hardly do without it.

I see Annie Kirk does not like to read the description of the sisters. Well, I rather like to know what aged lady I am "talking" to. They can describe themselves without telling how "Pretty" they are, which I do not believe in myself, for "pretty is as pretty does" you know.

I think Uncle Charlie is a wonderful man and many more of us should pattern after him. He certainly has patience enough to rear a large family. I was greatly amused at the eighth verse in the little poem, "Training the Other Woman's Child." 'Tis true one can seldom fix rules and keep them where boys are wide awake and alive, which my boys are and the girl, too, for that matter. I teach them to do things that are not too hard and think it right for them to work as well as play. I am sending blessings for all.

MRS. FLORENCE MOHA.

LETITIA, KY.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Is there room for a Kentucky girl in your happy band? I enjoy your letters very much and get many helpful suggestions from them.

My deepest interest is in the educational uplift of our country. So many of us make a mistake in regard to education. We think it must all be obtained in the schoolroom. One may master every course of study in America and still not be educated in the true sense. The school is an important and indispensable factor in obtaining an education, but so much of it must be obtained elsewhere. If you were to ask me, "Who is really educated?" this would be my answer:

"The one who loves the scenes of Nature and can see

Home Dressmaking Hints

Forecasts for Fall Fashions

By Geneva Gladding

JAUNTY redingotes will be popular this fall. There is also a strong tendency in favor of Russian blouses. In skirts one will find the circular effects with conservative flare, also plaited styles, and tiered, and gathered forms.

Collars on suits and coats are to be worn high, but so arranged that they can be turned low at the throat. Flat collars are also seen.

Waists show fitted lines and there are lovely Princess styles, with unbroken lines at center front and back, the fitting being under the arm.

Dressy afternoon and evening gowns have sleeves wide from elbow to wrist, while for coats and suits the sleeves are set in at the regular armscye, and are closefitting to the wrist.

Long separate coats will be worn, but on suits, coats will be generally 28 to 32 inches in length. Belted styles will be popular, also those cut in two sections: the skirt portions with much flare.

Russian blouses are particularly attractive in youthful dresses for practical wear.

Semi-fitted lines are seen on many gowns, but the curve under the bust is more clearly defined, while the hip is shaped slightly only.

Sleeveless evening gowns are made with tulle yokes to which transparent sleeves are joined.

Pattern Descriptions

ALL PATTERNS 10c. EACH
Unless Other Price Is Stated.

1272—Girls' Cape. For general wear, for stormy or cold weather this model has many good features. It will afford protection from rain if made of water-proof cloth. The hood may be omitted.

1401—A Simple Stylish Model. The waist is made with convertible collar. The skirt, a nine-gored model has plaited fullness at the seams. It is good for taffeta, poplin, voile, serge and cloth and all wash materials.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. Size 36 will require seven yards of 44-inch material.

1448—Costume for Misses and Small Women with sleeve in either of two lengths, and with gored skirt. Plaid suiting in gray and blue tones was used for this style. It is nice for serge, taffeta, gabardine, cashmere, linen, gingham, chambrey, voile and poplin.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires six and three eighths yards of 36-inch material for a 16-year size.

9770—A very Attractive Chamber or Lounging Robe. This model is good for cashmere, silk, flannel, or flannelette. The waist is in Empire style, and is finished with a pretty collar.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires five yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1173—Girls' Underwaist, Bloomers and Petticoat. The designs here portrayed are easy to develop and convenient and comfortable.

Cut in six sizes; two, four, six, eight, 10 and 12 years. For an eight-year size it will require one and three quarters yard for the petticoat, one and one half yard for the bloomers, and one yard for the waist of 36-inch material.

1425—Ladies' House Dress with long or short sleeve. For utility, comfort and convenience, this design has much to commend it. It closes in coat style, with the entire fronts overlapping. This assures easy and practical adjustment. An ample pocket is arranged over the side front. The pattern is good for gingham, percale, lawn, seersucker, soisette, madras, dimity, drill or linen.

Cut in seven sizes; 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires six and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1452—Girls' Dress in Surplice style, with four-gored skirt and sleeve in either of two lengths. This style is good for serge. Shepherd checks, mixed suiting, chambrey, Devonshire cloth, khaki, percale and flannel. The skirt is made with four gores and may be trimmed with a jaunty pocket.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires three yards of 40-inch material for a six-year size.

1145—A Practical, comfortable Apron. This attractive model is cut with raglan sleeve portions to which the back and front portions are joined. The pattern is good for percale, lawn, seersucker, gingham, drill, alpaca or sateen.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large, and requires four and one half yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

1298—Boys' Blouse Suit with Knee Trousers. The blouse may be made of khaki cloth, drill, linene, galatea, linen, madras or flannel, cambric or muslin. The trousers are good for most any suiting, and will be found very comfortable, and easy to make.

Cut in four sizes; six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires three and one half yards of 36-inch material for a 12-year size.

9603—Ladies' Night Gown with long or shorter sleeve and with or without added yoke. This design is cut on simple, comfortable lines, and may be made in sack length, or in regulation gown length. The model is suitable for muslin, cambric, lawn, nainsook, crepe, batiste, flannel, flannelette or silk.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires five and three quarters yards of 36-inch material for the gown in full length, and four yards for sack length, for a 36-inch size.

1080—A simple Comfortable Frock for Mother's Girl. This style is easy to develop, is graceful and attractive, although simple, and is good for any of the season's dress materials. The waist fronts and the three-piece skirt is finished with a box plait, under which the dress is closed.

Cut in five sizes; four, six, eight, 10 and 12 years. It requires three yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size.

1424—Ladies' Costume with sleeve in either of two lengths. This stylish model was developed in white cotton crepe. It is also good for serge, taffeta, madras, linen, gingham, lawn or organdie.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires seven yards of 44-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1123—A Natty Dress for Mother's Girl. How comfortable and attractive this simple little dress will be to the wearer. The deep armscye and front closing are good features of this model. It is a one-piece dress, with closing under the plait in front. Corduroy, velveteen, galatea, percale, linen and gingham are all good for this style.

Cut in four sizes; four, six, eight and 10 years. It requires three yards of 36-inch material for a four-year size.

1414—Ladies' Dress, with six-gored skirt, and sleeve in either of two lengths. The design is good for voile, grenadine, poplin, serge, faille, taffeta, linen, linene, gingham, or chambrey.

Cut in six sizes; 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure. It requires seven and seven eighths yards of 36-inch material for a 36-inch size.

1258—Girls' Over Blouse Dress with skirt attached to a separate waist, and with sleeve in either of two lengths. This dress is easy to develop and easy to launder, so wash goods are very appropriate for it. The closing is effected on the shoulders, and the neck finish may be high or in round Dutch style.

Cut in four sizes; eight, 10, 12 and 14 years. It requires three yards of 36-inch material for the dress, with one and three quarters yard of 27-inch material for the underwaist for an eight-year size.

9646—A Splendid Shirt-waist, with or without yoke portions and turn-back cuff. White voile was used for this design. It is equally effective in lawn, dimity, crossbar muslin, crepe, linen or silk.

Cut in six sizes; 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42 inches bust measure. It requires three yards of 36-inch material for the 36-inch size.

1022—A New and Stylish Model. This garment is comfortable and has good lines. The pattern is good for velvet, corduroy, tweed, cheviot, serge, chinchilla, and all the new novelty fabrics now in vogue.

Cut in five sizes; six, eight, 10, 12, and 14 years. It requires three yards of 44-inch material for an eight-year size.

1468—A Dainty Dress for the "Tiny Tot." Lawn, nainsook, dimity, crossbar muslin, crepe, voile, mull, silk, percale, cashmere or flannelette may be used for this design. It has simple lines, is easy to make and pretty.

Cut in four sizes; one, two, three and four years. It requires two and one half yards of 36-inch material for a three-year size, with two and one half yards of four-inch edging for ruffle.

1406—Suspender Dress for Misses and Small Women. Of all new styles there is none more in vogue or more attractive than the suspender frock. The model here shown has full bodice portions with suspender straps over the shoulders, a smart five-gored skirt with jaunty pockets, and a neat shirt-waist with convertible collar, and comfortable sleeve.

Cut in three sizes; 16, 18 and 20 years. It requires five and five eighths yards of 36-inch material for a 16-year size with two and one half yards for the waist.

1404—Junior Suspender Dress, with guimpe, in high or low neck outline and having two styles of sleeve. All the girls are wearing suspender dresses, and there certainly is no style so simple and so effective. In taffeta, gingham, ratine, crepe, linen or linene this style is very pleasing. If preferred the suspenders may be omitted.

Cut in three sizes; 12, 14 and 16 years. It requires two and seven eighths yards of 44-inch material for a 14-year size.

1396—Ladies' Four-gored Skirt in normal waistline. The plaits may be stitched in tuck effect and pressed to position, or left to flare in soft folds.

Cut in six sizes; 22, 24, 26, 28, 30 and 32 inches waist measure. It requires four and five eighths yards of 36-inch material for a 24-inch size.

1447—Dress with Smock Blouse and three-gored skirt, with sleeve in either of two lengths. This very popular and attractive style, is most desirable for voile, chambrey, lawn, batiste, taffeta, gabardine, linen and drill. The skirt may be joined to an ordinary waistband, or to an underwaist.

Cut in three sizes; 12, 14 and 16 years. It requires five and one quarter yards of 36-inch material for a 14-year size.

1395—A Unique and Comfortable House Apron. The body and sleeve in one idea has been carried out in garments of every sort, hence the busy sewer and home dressmaker, will welcome this mode in an apron that is simple and is easy to make because of few seams.

Cut in three sizes; small, medium and large. It requires three and one half yards of 36-inch material for a medium size.

Work Necessary in Fall

WHAT a lot of different things the farmer has to do at all seasons of the year; but in fall, when winter is looming ahead, it seems that a host of things accumulate which have been postponed until cool weather. Pardon us if we suggest a few of the things that should not likewise be postponed until one can "get around to it," or until spring comes when one is sure to be so busy that he will put the work off until fall. Among the "do it now" things that come to mind are the cleaning and whitewashing of the house cellar. On damp fall days one notices that dank smell of raw potatoes coming from the cellar and that means an unhealthy condition requiring ventilation, sunlight, cleaning up and free use of whitewash. The wash is a great deodorizer and purifier and its timely use makes for better health in the family. This suggests also the putting of all stables in right condition for the wintering of stock. Lice, ringworm, itch, worms, all are most common where stables are not cleansed, ventilated, sunlighted and whitewashed for winter occupation. It will pay to put such places in order. At the same time what about the implements? Are they stored for winter? Have they been overhauled, oiled and painted? If not these things should be done. Far more machinery rusts out than wears out with work. Write that statement in your memory and see that it does not become true on your farm. Harness needs cleaning, repairing and oiling before winter and should be hung in a dry, moderately warm place. The stable medicine chest needs replenishing now. See that it contains simple drugs, like raw linseed oil, Castor oil, epsom salts, saltpeter, turpentine, coal tar disinfectant or dip, and that suturing needles and silk, absorbent cotton and bandages, a syringe and drenching bottle are there to be used at once when need arises. The orchard needs the fall cleaning work. Dead branches harbor vermin and should be burned. Dead and loose bark harbors insects and should come off. Whitewash does good to the tree trunks. They also need protection against rabbits. The fall plowing should be finished early and then manure should go onto the fields before snow lies.

Curing Meat

Many farmers are content to use salt pork and beef throughout the warmer months of the year who could as easily have excellent home cured meats if they took the trouble to prepare them. The majority of these, however, much prefer the cured meats but do not know how to cure them so that they will keep properly and be palatable at the same time. All the recipes here given have been thoroughly tested for years and if directions are followed a palatable, delicious product of good keeping quality is assured.

Sugar Cured Hams and Bacon

This recipe calls for seven pounds of salt, two pounds of light brown sugar and four ounces of saltpeter for each hundred pounds of hams or bacon. Bacon meat should be cut into long strips and hams and shoulders trimmed and tightly packed in a large earthen jar after thorough cooling. This cooling is important as no animal heat should be left in. Before packing the jar should be washed and scalded with boiling water and thoroughly cooled. The salt, sugar and saltpeter should be dissolved in hot water and thoroughly cooled before pouring it over the meat. Enough boiled and cooled water should be added to cover the meat which must be kept under the surface by weights that have been boiled and cooled. In from two to four weeks the bacon will be salt enough for smoking. This may be determined by cooking a sample. If it is to be kept for some time it better be too salt than too fresh. The hams will be ready in from five to seven weeks, depending upon their size. They, too, should be sampled. When ready, drain thoroughly and smoke for two days, using clean corn cobs for fuel.

Dried Beef

Dried beef may be prepared by using exactly the same kind of pickle, smoking in the same way and then thoroughly drying, or drying to suit taste.

Corned Beef

The same pickle is excellent for corned beef. For corned beef, however, the beef should be drained every five or six weeks and the pickle boiled, skimmed and thoroughly cooled before pouring over the beef again. In fact, as soon as any evidence of spoiling is shown either in pork or beef, the brine should always be boiled and cooled if the meat is to keep. It is also a good plan to rinse the meat at the same time in clean cold water.

Canned Beef

Fresh beef may be canned and perfectly preserved in ordinary mason fruit jars. First remove all bone and boil beef in the least amount of water possible long enough to insure its being heated through. Prepare the mason jars exactly as in canning fruit and fill with the boiled fresh beef in exactly the same way, covering the meat with the liquor of its own juice. Beef canned in this way keeps perfectly and is of delicious flavor. It is better to cook the beef in the cans after tightly packing, with just enough water to cover, when one understands how to can fruit by this method.

Hams, bacon and dried beef, to keep well, must be hung, when prepared, in a cool, dry place away from flies. A coating made by using a paste made from cayenne pepper helps their keeping qualities if one does not object to the pepper, most of which can be brushed off before using.

Good Flavored Mutton

While appreciation for mutton is gradually increasing in this country there are many people, and most of them upon farms, it is said, who do not care to eat this meat. We fancy most of the mutton haters live in the city, but wherever they are found their dislike of mutton might be done away with by improvement in the way mutton is produced and then prepared for the consumer. It was the greasy Merino sheep and the scrub sheep kept for weed and brush eradication that brought mutton into disfavor, or failed to gain popularity among our people. While such mutton was being marketed here, totally unprepared by proper feeding and injured by improper methods of slaughter, the people of foreign countries were making choice mutton one of the leading foods of practically every meat eating family and there nobody ever expressed a dislike for mutton. The reason was that mutton breeds of sheep were employed to produce this meat, the sheep used were properly fed on mixed rations, by trained shepherds and then the sheep were slaughtered by men who understood the business. Readers of COMFORT will get over their dislike for mutton if they produce it from mutton breed sheep, such as Shropshires, Southdowns, Hampshires and Oxfords, or their grades or crosses, and several other breeds of sheep will produce fine mutton if quickly and properly fed for slaughter. On general principles it may be said that the sheep that is kept primarily for weed and brush eradication will make poor meat unless specially fattened on mixed rations and even then the meat will not be first-class in quality if the sheep is old when fed off. Have the lambs fed generously from birth, on choice feed and finish them on succulent or green feed, choice mixed clover and Alfalfa hay, roots and oats, bran, oilcake of flaxseed meal and little corn and their meat will be sure to prove juicy, palatable and of fine flavor. The secret, apart from this, of producing fine mutton depends upon killing in cool weather, or instantly cooling out the carcase, so that no animal flavor (sheepiness) will remain and being scrupulously careful not to allow the warm flesh to touch the wool or to remain in the same place with the wool. The sheep also should be emptied by starving for twenty-four hours before slaughter.

Maintaining Permanent Fertility

It is a mistake to suppose that the mere rotation of crops will maintain fertility. Each crop removes soil nutrients (plant food) and in time each crop grown will lack necessary food. Neither will return of all of the plant food present in the manure of animals eating all of the crops grown upon the farm fully restore the removed fertility. Some of this will have been wasted by evaporation, or leaching. Ordinary soils contain great stores of potash. Dr. Hopkins of the Illinois station says that in his state the normal soils contain from 25,000 to 45,000 pounds of potassium per acre. It therefore is not absolutely necessary to purchase potash for ordinary soils, but it may have to be bought for use on some sand soils or peaty marsh lands. The amount needed by plants will be liberated from the soil if clover and other green stuffs are plowed under. Growing clover does not suffice. The roots will not supply the needed fertility. The entire plant, or plants of like kind, must be plowed in to insure permanent fertility. In so doing one gains the nitrogen which has been taken free from the air by the clover plants and other legumes. Carbon and oxygen are derived from the air in like manner and hydrogen is obtained from the water absorbed by plant roots. Iron and sulphur are also abundantly supplied by nature. In addition to potassium and nitrogen, the other necessary elements for plant growth are magnesium, calcium and phosphorus. These five elements are the ones which the farmer must be sure are sufficiently abundant in the soils of his farm. If one or another is known to be lacking it must be supplied. The farmer should only buy what is absolutely necessary and as a rule he will find that it is phosphorus that must be bought. To obtain necessary calcium where it is lacking ground limestone should be bought and applied. This limestone will also supply magnesium in right form for plant food. The Illinois system of maintaining permanent fertility is to apply about two tons of ground limestone per acre every four years, in a four year crop, rotation, consisting of corn, oats and then clover. Alfalfa also is to be grown on such farms. Phosphorus is the most lacking quantity. Ordinary soils only contain some 2,000 pounds of it per acre, compared with the 50,000 pounds of potassium such soils may contain. According to Dr. Hopkins phosphorus can be purchased in Illinois for about three cents a pound in the form of fine-ground natural rock phosphate. Many of our readers in Southern states can obtain it very much cheaper than this. The cost is about 10 to 12 cents a pound in steamed bone meal and 12 to 15 cents a pound in acid phosphate. It is cheapest to buy and use ground rock phosphate and one should apply at least 1000 pounds per acre every four years and much more should be applied the first year. To keep up the nitrogen supply in the soil one must then keep live stock, plow under clover and make Alfalfa the crop of one field to be plowed up every five years while another field is to be seeded to Alfalfa. The application of mixed fertilizers and stimulating chemicals merely coaxes the land to grow a crop at the time; but it does not store up fertility and it does not insure permanent fertility. Ex-Governor Hoard of Wisconsin, who is a most successful Alfalfa grower has been applying ground phosphate rock and ground limestone for ten years and says that his farm is steadily growing more and more productive each year. He maintains a large herd of dairy cows and sells their products. They soon would impoverish the farm, despite the return of their manure, from the Alfalfa and other feeds they eat, but the ground phosphate rock and ground limestone is more than maintaining the fertility of the soil.

In commenting in the Prairie Farmer upon some Ohio experiments in the use of phosphate rock Director Thorne of that station said: "When manure is reinforced by materials carrying phosphorus to make up for its inevitable deficiency in this element, and is then applied directly to the field or protected from the losses due to exposure to the weather in open barnyards, or to heating in piles, either in the stable, yard or field, there is nothing better for keeping up the fertility of the soil. The assertion is made that on most farms not enough manure is produced to keep up the fertility, which is true. In this case manure must be reinforced with whatever elements are not supplied in sufficient quantity. Phosphorous in the form of raw rock phosphate or acid phosphate is generally the essential element. In our experiments 40 pounds of rock phosphate costing 17 cents, added over a dollar to the crop-producing value of a ton of manure, because it supplied the element lacking in the manure."

The moral is not to depend upon manure and clover alone, but to add phosphrous to the manure and add limestone powder to the land at the rate of about two tons per acre every four years. It will be found absolutely impossible to keep up the fertility of the soil by merely stimulating the crop each year with chemical fertilizers.

Feeds that Helped Out the Grass

We should like to hear the experience of some of the readers of COMFORT who took the advice of this department of the paper and put in "catch crops" or "adjunct crops" of green stuff to eke out the pastures in the dry weather of July, August and September. Let them tell us what they used for this purpose and how the cows liked the feed and thrived upon it. In our own experience such feed has proved the salvation of the situation, so to speak, during the past season. First there was some winter rye for the cows to pasture while grass was getting ready, and they liked that pretty well. It slightly "tasted" this milk for a time, but that occurs too when green grass is fed in early spring. It is of little injury, if the milk is quickly stirred and aired to get rid of abnormal flavors and did not show up in the cream. When the grass became short there was a good big patch of peas and oats to cut green. The cows just loved that feed and when we started with it the milk increased in quantity and the flow kept up very well, despite flies and mosquitoes and the hot weather. At the same time the pigs were luxuriating in a lot where we had sowed a mixture of Essex rape, peas and oats. My, how that mixture grew, for there was lots of rain last season and the land was rich! The pigs went out of sight in it and the crop grew so strong and tall that we had to cut it for the cows and that allowed a second crop of rape to spring up at once. Next season, on Riverholm Farm, we shall not mix oats with the rape and peas for the hogs. Rape alone does well, or peas and rape, but for the cows it is best to omit rape and increase peas. We did not use enough peas and the oats alone, or with very little pea vine, do not appeal to the cows as much as we should like. While the cows were eating peas and oats we had a big patch of broadcasted silage corn coming along to cut green and cutting started before the tassels appeared. The cows like such feed well and do well on it. We noticed that where the seed had been too thickly sown that the plants were stunted and pale green or yellowish in color. It is a mistake to seed too lavishly. The plants want room to grow big, dark green leaves. For next season's use there will be a mixture of one bushel of rye and ten pounds of winter vetch to the acre, seeded in the cornfields "the last time through." This should give three weeks of fine pasture for the cows in spring and then will be turned under as green manure for the next crop. It is a good cover crop to prevent washing and it enriches the soil: but we do not care for it is a preparation for corn or tobacco. It tends to harbor the moth that produces cut worms, for they look for just such a green growth in which to lay their eggs. The vetch makes a fine growth and is good feeding for cows and sheep, but the seed is too dear at present to make it popular with farmers. We paid at the rate of $18.50 a hundred pounds or about half what Grimms' Alfalfa seed costs in the Western states. Talking about Alfalfa we have also arranged to have some of that to cut green next year and the following years, if all goes well. The old orchard was plowed last spring and seeded to oats and peas for green feed and as soon as that catch crop was cut off we plowed deeply again and disked and harrowed the ground over and over again until it was as fine as meal. The low places were filled in with a plank drag, so as to level the ground, and when all was as fine and smooth as possible twenty pounds of Grimms' Alfalfa was seeded to the acre and then harrowed in lightly. That was on August 11 and an hour afterward we had a nice shower of rain and another one fell next day, so it is about certain that a fine catch will be secured. It should be added that five hundred pounds, or so, of soil from a sweet clover patch on the roadside was sowed broadcast on the surface of this new Alfalfa

The Pretty Girls' Club

Conducted by Katherine Booth

Scalp Massage and Healthy Hair

IF I could make a list of all the hair ills I hear about daily, you would all raise your hands in horror, for when one of you writes me that your hair is brittle and dry—or oily—or falling out—or faded—or thin—or too short—or broken—or any one of the things which hair that isn't just as we would like it is sure to be, you, of course, don't guess that almost every girl in our Pretty Girls' Club is writing me a letter which is just as plaintive as yours.

But she is!

I have come to the conclusion that really healthy hair is a rarity. Let me whisper a secret to you—that is because perfectly healthy people aren't as numerous as they might be.

Most of us think of the hair as something apart from the rest of the body, and all of us expect and want pretty hair, even if we have indigestion, or insomnia, or liver trouble, or constipation, or a chronic cough. But the hair is just as closely related to the rest of the body as the skin and the nerves. If our stomach is out of order, our hair will be, too, before very long; if we are constipated, the hair suffers as quickly as the complexion—and pimples and blackheads and muddy skins show us how quickly that is.

So, the very first thing you must do, if you want to stop your hair from falling out or turning gray, or becoming unbeautiful in other ways, is to get stomach and bowels in apple-pie order!

The next thing is to stimulate the circulation in the scalp. If the scalp is not kept loose upon the skull, the flow of blood to the roots of the hair, which brings it nourishment, will be interfered with, and lifeless, falling hair will result; and the little oil glands which keep the hair smooth and glossy and full of life will dry up and not be able to do their duty.

Test your scalp with the fingers—does it move very easily back and forth, and from side to side, and round and round on the skull? If not, there is where the main trouble is—with your hair. It is not enough that you can force it to move slightly—it should respond to the slightest touch.

I would be almost willing to wager that ninety-nine—or at least ninety-eight and a half!—out of every hundred of my Pretty Girls will discover that her scalp is difficult to move—in certain spots, at least.

So let us get to work and overcome that condition at once. Scalp massage will work a wonderful change for the better, if we are diligent about applying it, so suppose we resolve to begin tonight. Ten to fifteen minutes every night for a month will do a great deal to put the hair in good condition.

Most hair does not get enough air. It is pinned up closely to the head during the day, heating the scalp, and sometimes, when we are a little more tired than usual as bedtime approaches, we are guilty of going to bed with the hair still pinned up. This is all wrong—and a beautiful way to cover the scalp with dandruff. Whenever we comb the hair during the day, we should gather the extreme ends in one hand and then shake the hair over and over. This causes it to fly apart at the scalp and let the air in. This, too, is the first thing we should do when taking down the hair at night. Shake for half a minute, then comb out the snarls, and part the hair from forehead to crown.

Now, place the tips of the fingers of each hand, held close together, on the part, and, pressing firmly, move the scalp toward the forehead, then back, forward, back, for many times. Part the hair again a few inches to one side of the first part, and repeat the movement. Go over the whole front of the head in this way; then part the back hair from crown to neck, place fingers on part, and repeat the treatment. Part again, and so continue until the back of the head has been gone over vigorously.

Shake the hair again for a minute, then slip the hands under the hair close to the scalp on each side of the front part, and move the scalp in a circle, or, rather, move the fingers and the scalp will move with them, since they are pressed tight to the skull. Go over the entire head in this way—then brush the hair for fifty strokes, and go to bed with it in two loose braids and with the consciousness that the blood is busily feeding the little hair follicles and supplying the oil glands which are to make your hair healthy and beautiful.

Of course you mustn't forget that the blood must have nourishment in it, or it can't feed hair or anything else, so be careful to eat healthful foods in healthful ways, to drink plenty of water and keep the bowels regular and active.

If the hair is beginning to turn gray before its time, you can darken it by dampening with a Sage Lotion, at night, before massaging and after shaking it to air the scalp.

Don't go to bed nor braid the hair until it is entirely dry. There is nothing worse for the hair than to do it up while the slightest bit of dampness remains. The sage lotion can be easily made at home as follows:

To Darken Hair

Into an iron kettle put two ounces of green tea, two of dried garden sage, and three quarts of boiling rain-water. Put on the back of the stove, where it will simmer gently, until the liquid has been reduced to a quart. Take off the stove, and without removing from the kettle let stand for twenty-four hours, after which you may strain through cheese-cloth and pour into bottles.

This should be used every night.

An unguent which is said gradually to darken the hair can be made by adding one dram of tannic or gallic acid to an ounce of olive oil; this should be massaged into the scalp every night.

Personally, I do not like "hair-darkeners"—I think it is much better to put the scalp in healthy condition, purify the blood, and get the digestive system working properly; for then you have really accomplished a cure, while any lotion which darkens the hair isn't changing conditions at all, but merely disguising them and sometimes making them worse. The real cure is the thing to work for.

If there is dandruff, of course there is no objection to applying a lotion to help loosen it from the scalp. With very oily hair, the scalp can be dampened with a Castor Oil Lotion, made of one pint of alcohol and six teaspoonfuls of Castor oil shaken together, and then massaged.

To apply this lotion, a medicine dropper is convenient. You can get it at your druggist's. Part the hair, run the dropper along the part, then massage as previously directed. Each time you make a new part for your massage, use the lotion again.

If the hair is dry, then this should not be used, because alcohol is drying. Instead, you may add sixty grains of sulphur to an ounce of vaseline, and dip the fingers in this before massaging and at intervals during the massage. Use this only about every third night; but on the other nights give just the plain massage.

Of course, you mustn't forget that a scalp can't be healthy unless it is kept clean; so be careful to shampoo the hair once in two weeks. Use white soap or green soap—never the yellow household soaps—and do not rub on the hair, but either scrape it and melt in boiling water beforehand, or make a suds in the bowl just as you are ready to wash the hair. In either case, rinse and rinse the hair many times after shampooing, in warm water, and finally in cold.

Here's to healthy hair—to pretty hair—to luxuriant, satin-smooth hair—for all my Pretty Girls!

Answers to Questions

Horseback Girl.—If your eyelashes are coming out, anoint the edges of the lids each night with vaseline. Probably the eyes are not in very good condition, so be careful how you use them. Do not rub the eyes with the fingers on waking in the morning. Wash them very gently with warm water, until all the vaseline has been removed; then with cold water. Wash the eye out twice daily with an eyecup and a four per cent solution of boric acid. For the hands, use this whitening lotion:

Lotion for the Hands

Orange-flower water, four ounces; rosewater, four ounces; borate of soda (borax), one half dram; spirits of benzoin, one dram; bruised almonds, one ounce.

Your druggist can put this up for you. If you want to do it yourself, mix the first two ingredients and the almonds, and after twenty-four hours filter, add the soda, stir constantly until dissolved, then put the benzoin in, drop by drop, stirring and shaking constantly. Before applying this lotion, scrub the hands thoroughly, then rub gently into the hands. Let dry, then make another application. You can do this two or three times before going to bed, unless the skin begins to feel irritated.

S. R. H.—You weigh a little too much for your height, and your bust should be a trifle larger. I judge from your description of your itching skin and the fact that it cracks and chaps, that you are using a strong soap on it, and not rinsing it properly. Use soap only once a day, on going to bed, and then do not rub it on the skin, but merely make the water soapy. Scrub the face nightly with a camel's-hair complexion brush, and the hot soapy water, then rinse and rinse and rinse, in hot water, in warm water and in cool water. Rub a little cold cream into the skin finally, and go to bed knowing that your skin will be much better on waking in the morning. At that time, wash the face with tepid water—no soap, and dry thoroughly. If you use powder at any time in the day, rub a little cold cream into the skin first, and wipe off with a soft towel; then dust on the powder and wipe again. Do not under any circumstances scratch the face, as you say you do. You will hopelessly mar your skin, and may even scar it. If your face gets soiled during the day, rub a little cold cream into it, and then go over it with a soft towel or cloth; the dirt will all come away. Yes, theatrical cream will do for your skin, or any reliable cold cream. For the prominent collar bone and the hollows in your neck, practise the following exercises. Also, be sure to stand straight, with the chest raised a little, the shoulders dropped.

To Fill Out a Hollow Neck

With hands pressed closely to sides of legs, drop the head forward on the chest; then throw it back as far as it will go; repeat several times. Then let the head fall toward the left shoulder as far as possible toward the right shoulder; then revolve the head, letting it fall forward, toward the left shoulder, backward, toward the right shoulder. Practise until you feel fatigued or dizzy.

Mrs. J. F. S.—You can order a camel's-hair complexion brush through your druggist, because he can, in turn, order it from the firm of chemists which supplies him with his goods. It should cost about twenty-five or fifty cents. If he will not get it for you, write to a department store in your nearest large city, or to any of the big mail-order houses which advertise in the magazines. It is against the rules of this department to print addresses.

N. M.—I regret that letters to this department cannot be answered by mail, and that you have thus had to wait for your reply. In taking the milk diet, I have suggested an evening meal the first week; after that, there should be no solid food. This means fruit or anything else. You can, of course, have six prunes each morning, that have been soaked over night in a tumbler of water, but that is all. The thing is to confine yourself to the milk, since that contains all the elements the body needs in almost perfect proportions.

Mrs. C. M.—I am very glad to print the formula for the Orange-flower Skin Food.

Orange-flower Skin Food

Oil of sweet almonds, four ounces; white wax, six drams; spermaceti, six drams; borax, two drams; glycerine, one and one half ounces; orange-flower water, two ounces; oil of neroli, fifteen drops; oil of bigarade, (orange skin), fifteen drops; oil of petit grain, fifteen drops.

Put the wax, spermaceti, and oil of sweet almonds in a double boiler and mix over a low flame. Add the glycerine to the orange-flower water, dissolve in this liquid the borax, and pour it slowly on the mixture in the double boiler, stirring constantly. Just at the last, the vessel having been removed from the fire and the mixture beginning to cool and grow firm, add the three perfume oils. For your thin nails which crack, massage the skin at the roots of the nails to stimulate the circulation and increase the blood supply. You should care for the nails daily, being careful to gently manipulate the skin. Coating the nails with flexible collodion will protect them while they are getting stronger. Do not trim the nails except when they have been softened in warm soapy water, as otherwise they will be liable to chip.

B. J.—No, do not use olive oil to massage the face; it certainly will cause a growth of hair. You may use just a little of any good cold cream on the finger tips, and gently massage the skin nightly. Remember that gentle massage builds up the tissues but vigorous massage breaks them down. You probably need building up all over, because it would be unlikely that your face would be very thin and the rest of your body in perfect proportion. Why do you not take the milk diet for a month or six weeks, it will fill out your face, clear and whiten your complexion, and help overcome any defects in your figure.

Miss F. J. S.—Ask your druggist for the lapactic pills—that is their name and they are so labelled. I presume the price varies in different parts of the country, running from thirty to fifty cents, but I can't be sure about this. Under the drug laws, labels show the ingredients.

Mrs. J. L. D.—If you have liver spots, you must at once correct your diet, in such a way as to give your liver more or less of a rest. Fats and sweets give it extra work to do, and you should omit them from your diet. The probability is that you have been overfond of them in the past, this means to cut out preserves, and cake, and candy, and much sugar on things; also you should eat very little if any butter, no gravies, little cream, and no fat meats. Every morning drink the juice of half a lemon or a whole lemon in a glass of cool water, without sugar, half an hour before breakfast. Eat plenty of green fresh vegetables and fresh fruits when you can get them. Where you live, you ought to be able to get oranges and grapefruit, ought you not? If you could eat grapefruit every morning for breakfast, it would be a good thing for you. Do not eat vegetables which have been cooked with fat pork, and avoid hot biscuits and hot breads. Corn bread is the least objectionable of hot breads. When you can't get green vegetables, eat onions and canned vegetables. Pineapple is the very best fruit you can possibly eat, and I wish you might have it—fresh or canned—at least twice a week. In addition, you must practise exercises night and morning, while in your night dress. An excellent one is to lie on your back on the bed and, without bending the knees, raise the legs as far as possible, then let them sink slowly back to the bed, as if being held up by a weight. Do this fifteen or twenty times. It will be easier for you to try it first with the left leg, then with the right, then with both together. Another exercise is taken lying flat on the bed on the back. In this position try to touch the headboard with the toes. Practise this fifteen or twenty times. Precipitated chalk is good for the teeth. Dampen the brush, put in the chalk, and then scrub the teeth with it. Any good powder which you see advertised by reputable concerns is safe to use.

Essie.—I am so glad you like our department, and more glad that you are practising the exercises. Here's success to you! I know that if you will be faithful the results will be just what you want. In taking the milk diet, use sweet milk, as fresh and rich as you can get it, not buttermilk. To make the eyelashes and eyebrows grow, anoint them nightly with a little melted vaseline, and brush them night and morning (being careful to follow just the right arch in doing so), with a tiny eyebrow brush which you can get at your druggist's. It looks like a doll's toothbrush.

Missouri Girl.—At fourteen or fifteen, your skirts should be just above your shoetops, so that a tiny bit of stocking shows between shoe and skirt. For the freckles, try mopping the freckled spots at night with a lotion made from one dram of ammonium chloride and four ounces of distilled water. Your druggist can put this up for you. Just lemon juice put on the spots and allowed to dry will sometimes bleach them, and taking good care of the skin through the winter usually disposes of them. Then one can be careful when spring comes again, to protect the skin before exposing it to the sun.

Rosebud.—You weigh just about the right amount; your bust is a little large for your age, but that will get smaller a little later, so do not let it disturb you. Get all the outdoor exercise you can and it will help; and do not eat many sweets or fats—by that I mean cake, candy, preserves. You will lose some of your flesh before you are sixteen, but you can help the matter along by exercising. How do you do your hair? Why not part it a little to one side of the middle, then brush it smooth, and braid it in one or two braids. That is the fashionable way for girls of your age among the rich Fifth Avenue families of New York. Or you could cross your braids and bring them around your head, fastening a bow where they cross in the neck. This would keep the hair neat.

M. C. L.—For the freckle lotion, formula for which you send me, just mix the ingredients, let stand twenty-four hours, and strain. Blonde hair frequently turns darker. You could add a little soda to the water in which you shampoo your hair, but remember that this is drying and do not "get the habit." Frequent shampoos, even without the soda, should help the color—shampoo once in two weeks unless the hair is dry.

D. W.—For the freckles, use the paste for which I gave formula in the last issue of COMFORT. By the way, why don't you start a scrap-book and keep the formulas and exercises I give from time to time? They would prove a help "in time of need."

Teddy.—Don't use cocoa-butter on the arms, but it will help the bust, though exercise would be better. In applying it to the bust, hold it over a flame and slightly melt, then rub it on the breast with a circular motion, following the contour of the bust and going round and round. Since your arms are thin, too, I should think the very best thing for you would be to take the milk diet for a month or six weeks. This would build up the bust, the arms, and your figure generally, besides increasing your weight. You speak of the large veins. I judge your circulation is not good. The milk diet will help that, too. See that your bowels move freely every day.

B. V. S.—Read answer to Mrs. J. L. D., on liver spots; use the freckle paste given in last month's COMFORT, and the treatment for superfluous hair given there also. As to the red pimple on the nose, sometimes it is dangerous to meddle with spots like this. Try keeping your bowels open daily, drinking lots of water, and eating healthful foods; also obeying the directions for liver spots. If this is an ordinary pimple, such treatment will drive it away forever.

Poultry Farming for Women

from a hotel is good for chickens. Please tell me what is best to feed.

A.—Table scraps are very good food for laying hens if they are chopped and well mixed, so that no bird can get too much of any one thing, especially fat. If there is plenty of meat and potatoes in the table scraps, corn chops and oats will make a well-balanced ration, but if there is very little meat and potatoes in the scraps, you had better feed whole corn at night during the cold months.

W. Z.—Will you tell me what is the matter with my chicken. She looks and lays good but has a cough. After coughing two or three times she will squak and act as if she were trying to get something out of her throat.

A.—Probably the bird has bronchitis or some slight affection of the throat and air tubes. Give one-grain pills of quinine sulphate night and morning for a few days, then at night only for another two or three days.

J. R. N.—What is the trouble with chickens when they have some kind of choking in their throat? Sometimes they can scarcely get their breath and have kind of rattling noises.

A.—See answer to W. Z.

A. W. H.—I have trouble in raising turkeys. A swelling will come under their wings, something like a blister and seems to be full of water. They will droop around and finally die.

A.—Pierce the blisters with a needle, and gently press out the water. Add half a teaspoonful of nux vomica to every quart of drinking water to tone up the bird constitutionally, for the blisters are a sign of debility.

D. H.—I am an old subscriber and get much good from the Poultry Department. I want advice about my chickens and ducks that have had some kind of disease. The ducks get weak in their legs, and then they drop their wings, stretch their necks out and sit in one place till they die. The chickens stretch their necks out and close their eyes and sit in one place a day or two before they die.

A.—The ducks and fowls have eaten putrid meat, or some such irritating substance, or there may be some stagnant water on the farm, from which they have been drinking. If you can't find and remove the cause, the best plan will be to confine the birds for a week or ten days until the conditions have changed. Feed lightly on mash, and add a tablespoonful of Castor oil to each cupful of feed.

Help Some Crippled Child

You may help that child of your acquaintance who has Club Feet or some other deformity if you will acquaint yourself with the good results obtained by the McLain Orthopedic Sanitarium of St. Louis—a thoroughly equipped Institution devoted exclusively to the treatment of crippled and deformed conditions such as Club Feet, Infantile Paralysis, Hip Disease, Spinal Diseases and Deformities, Wry Neck, Bow Legs, Knock Knees, etc., especially as these conditions are found in children and young adults.

Egbert Kidd, 7year old son of Mrs. John Kidd, was brought to us when 22 months old. His feet were made permanently straight as shown in the picture without the use of chloroform, ether, any general anaesthetic or plaster casts.

Read the mother's letter:

"With pleasure I recommend the McLain Sanitarium. My boy was born with Club Feet. When 22 months old I took him to this Sanitarium for treatment. In two months I returned home with him and he now walks as straight as any child".

Comfort's League of Cousins

would have to take a back seat. So evidently the best thing to do, if you have a bunch of people in the parlor and another bunch coming up the stoop, is to waltz the stoop bunch out into the woodshed in the backyard and quietly inform them who the parties are they are going to meet. For instance you would say, "George Smith, there's a lady in the parlor with red hair, a bunch of freckles on her teeth and a couple of warts on her nose, and, by the way, her name is Mrs. George Smith and there is an angry look in her eye and I think I saw a razor looming out of her pocket. Will you have any objection to meeting her?" Then George would begin to tremble and through his chattering teeth he would whisper that the lady waiting in the parlor was the wife he had deserted a few months ago, and that the lady on his arm waiting to be introduced to the company was quite unaware of the existence of the other Mrs. Smith. Then Mr. Smith bigamist would be seen beating it across lots, while Mrs. Smith 14a would be throwing a fit on the woodpile. You can bet your life the very essence of prudence and wisdom dictates that you know a little about the history of people and their peculiarities before you introduce them under the shadow of your roof. The etiquette book bears me out by stating: "The better way would be to inquire of each out of hearing of the other, if there is anything in the way to prevent an introduction." In making the introduction, it is always better to introduce the younger to the older, the gentleman to the lady, and the inferior in station to the more intelligent. You will proceed thus: "Mrs. Jones, allow me to introduce to you Miss Samantha Freckles. Mrs. Spookendyke, allow me the pleasure of introducing you to my friend Mr. Doodlesocks." Of course it is not necessary for you to use the exact language I have, but that is just about what is used in what is called high sassiety, and of course, Henry, you wouldn't be found dead moving in any other kind of sassiety. It is always well to remember that aviators move in high society and the coal miners move in low society. There is only one man who moves in all classes of society and that is the man who owns the moving furniture van. When there are about sixteen dozen people awaiting to be introduced to one individual, name the one individual first, then in swift succession name the others, each of the parties as they are introduced will duck his or her nut to each of the twelve as their names are called out. If the party whose duty it is to duck his or her nut twelve times in succession gets a crick in the neck, send to the drug-store for a quart of vaseline and rub gently with both feet on the afflicted spot. The etiquette book says if a person has just returned from foreign travel it is customary to announce that fact by saying: "Mrs. Doughface, allow me to introduce to you my friend Mr. Greenwhiskers who has recently returned from expioring the barbarous foreign city of Chicago." This not only makes both parties acquainted but it gives them a good subject for conversation. Always be careful in introducing a member of your own family to state his or her full name thus. (Of course if they are too full don't introduce them to anybody but turn the hose on them and put them to bed.) If they haven't been booze hoisting you can get busy thusly: "Mrs. Falseface I should like to have the pleasure of presenting to you my grub spoiling sister Miss Mary Dooley. Never say my brother Jim, or my sister Sue as that would leave people in doubt as to whether your sister or brother were married and might spoil their chances of getting their matrimonial hooks on some poor unfortunate. If you are unlucky enough to have persons of fame or distinction under your roof, you will introduce them in this manner: If it's a Congressman you'll have to put the prefix Honorable before his name. Of course it would be far nearer the mark to say Dishonorable, but then sassiety is artificial and any man who told the truth in sassiety would be either put in the electric chair or sent to the rummy house for the balance of his natural. If you introduce a man of letters or art you will proceed thus: "Ladies and what came with you, if the door is locked and you have no objection, I would like to have the privilege, honor and pleasure of introducing that notorious villain Uncle Charlie, the author of that literary masterpiece entitled "Who pushed the cockroach in the soup, or the bloodstains on the cellar door." In meeting a lady on the street it is correct for the lady to recognize the gentleman first. The male animal should never salute the lady first, unless she is a very intimate acquaintance. When you are introduced don't grab a person's lunch hooks and deposit all your microbes in her well-washed hands, but duck your head and let it go at that. Never say "Mr. A. meet Miss B." It sounds as if you are trying to arrange some clandestine meeting. To hear anyone calling out "meet, meet, meet" seems to me the essence of vulgarity. One would think you were in the butchering business trying to work up trade. I would raise my hat to any man I greatly respected, but whether or not I raised it to a minister would depend on what kind of dope he was preaching. People who wear wigs should be very careful about raising their hats unless the wigs are nailed on. Wigs can be safely nailed on the majority of heads as most heads are wooden. Now Henry you can go into sassiety and take all the medals for introducing people.

REST, ARK.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Will you let a little girl come in to your happy circle? I am thirteen years old, five feet high, weigh eighty-nine pounds, have light hair, blue eyes and fair skin.

My grandmother takes COMFORT, and I certainly enjoy reading it, especially the Cousins' League.

I can do most any kind of housework. I can cook, wash dishes, sweep, make hair switches milk cows sew and make up the beds. I also work in the field. My school was out the 26th day of February. I certainly was sorry, for I do love to go to school, and I had such a good teacher too. Cousins, don't you think Uncle Charlie does a great work? I do. I dearly love to read. I have read a number of books, and I read lots of papers, am also a dear lover of music. My parents are both living. I have a brother and sister living and two brothers in heaven. As my letter is getting pretty long, I will close. If this escapes the waste basket I will write again. Your friend,

NONA TILGHMON.

Delighted to have you join us, Nona. Your address is Rest, Ark., I notice. I wonder they didn't name that burg of yours Ararat, as that's where the ark rested. You are certainly a wonderful housekeeper. Your accomplishments in that line have got me completely woozy. Once a little girl told us she could make beds milk cows sweep the floor and play the organ. But that isn't a circumstance to what you can do. Think of a little girl who can make hair switches milk cows and make beds. It would be worth half a million bucks to see a hair switch milking a cow, handling a needle and making beds. It seems to me if you could only distribute those hair switches around the day of the hired man would be over. I hope, however, you won't let the hair switch fall in the milk. That reminds me of grandpa when he was at the table. He was old and very short sighted and he astonished the family by saying: "That's excellent noodle soup." Just then one of the kids chirped up: "Hi there, grandpa's got his beard in his mouth again." So your school is out on the 26th of February. Your school term shouldn't finish until the middle of June. Just think of the folly and expense of keeping all that educational plant idle for nearly two thirds of the year. Education should be taken entirely out of the hands of county and state authorities and handed over to Uncle Sam. Then we would have competent teachers and educated children. Most of our schools are fine establishments for the perpetuation of ignorance. The country that can't get along without pushing its children into mills and factories ought to invite some kindly planet to smash it into pulp, and even then it is too merciful a finish for it. You'll find more on this subject in another column.

CROGHAN, R. R. 2, Box 93, N. Y.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

I am a farm girl eleven years old. I go to school, am in the fifth grade. My hair is a dark brown and I have blue eyes and quite tall. My sister and I made up poetry which I am sending. I can sweep and cook and wash dishes, but I like outdoor work best.

I am hoping to see this letter in print. My teacher is Ivah L. Brown. Your niece, ALICE V. ADNER.

The Liesure Hour

BY ALICE V. ADNER.

It is the hour of liesure, and the children are at play,
While mother is a sewing and father cuts the hay,
Sister in the garden weeding out the rows,
Brother in the oat-field, with his big pail he sows.

And father coming home at night, he sits down on the steps,
He looks up in the meadow and says, "Here comes the children with all their pets."
Jimmie with a pony, Malvin with a frog,
Nellie with a kittie, Jessie with a dog.

They will take their shoes of and go in at the door,
They take their hats and caps of and lie down on the door.
Then father peeps his head inside just around the door.
And says, "Just see them all a-lying on the floor."

Alice I am very glad to have an opportunity to print your pottery. It is all good, healthy, wholesome stuff, no broken hearts or busted lives. You have quite a healthy vision of life and you ought to have considering the fact that you inform us "You have blue eyes and quite tall." The title of your poem is "The Liesure Hour." Maria and Billy the Goat say they never heard of a "Liesure Hour" but I have. I had a clock once that was either a day and a half fast or three weeks slow. When it ought to have been striking eight o'clock in the morning, you'd find it striking half past seventeen in the middle of the night. Every hour that clock struck it was a *lie*sure hour. We have all come to the conclusion Alice, that you mean Leisure Hour. We would not care for you children to have a *lie*sure hour. A lie still hour would be all right, and a truthful hour would be all right, but we don't want any of you to be fibbing the hours away. You inform us that:

Brother is in the oat field,
With his big pail he sows.

How can anyone, even your brother sow with a pail? I once succeeded in sewing a button on with a hammer and a couple of tacks, but I never tried a pail. Oh, I see, he was scattering seed from his pail. Now why didn't you put it thus:

Sister's in the garden
Chewing up the weeds,
Brother's in the oat field
Distributing the seeds.
Mother she's got COMFORT,
And is sewing while she reads.
And the dog is busy chasing fleas
Of variegated breeds.

Your description of the children coming home with their pets and spending a "liesure" hour on the floor is very appealing. Now I'm absolutely sincere when I say that. It's fine to come home with that healthy tired feeling and take a nap. What I don't understand is your statement that the children and their pets take their shoes "of" and go in at the door, then they take their hats and caps "of". I've seen people take their shoes off, but I never saw them take their shoes of. Make that off Alice, instead of of, and I think it will read properly. I think you have very indulgent parents to allow you to bring all your pets into the house. Say Cousins, wouldn't it be some fun to see Jimmie's pony taking his shoes off as he goes in the door, and it would be funnier still to see the frog, the cat and the dog removing their shoes, and not only their shoes but their hats and caps. Hang on there to the brass rail while the frog puffs up the stoop, pulls off his patent leather shoes and doffs his high silk hat. That must be some sight when his father puts his head round the door and sees the hatless, capless, shoeless animals and children peacefully dreaming in one another's arms. Alice, if you'll only get papa to take a snap shot of that thrilling scene it shall certainly be published in the very earliest possible edition of COMFORT. The Goat says when that frog takes his shoes off he's going to hang his head out of the window.

BLOOMINGTON, ILL.

DEAR UNCLE:

I am a new subscriber to COMFORT and have only been reading your wonderful work for a short while, but in that short while I feel that your intelligent, honest, plain spoken words have done me more good than all the newspaper articles and all the sermons I have heard from the pulpit in all the rest of my life. I would be very glad to read an article of yours advising young men and women of the poorer classes who have to rely on labor for their daily bread not to go through life without striving to make the future better than the past and not to go blindly on thinking of nothing only of fleeting pleasures, thinking these are the only things that make one happy. I think a few of your intelligent words will cause many to stop and think and some to change to a broader and more rational, worth while way of living. God bless your noble work a thousand times, and I hope He will permit you His servant to minister to his people for many years, and let you continue your noble work which will undoubtedly be of more value to all people than the work of any or many other writers.

Yours respectfully, P. W. PEAK.

Thank you, Brother Peak, for all the lovely things you say about the dope I hand out in these columns. It tickles me to death to know that nearly all of our readers think as you do, and that they are with me heart and soul in my efforts to get humanity out of the nut class, and chase hell from off this planet. I have been trying for years to do what you say you are anxious I should do, and that is to get folks, the young people especially, interested in something more than the pleasures and frivolities of the day—the boys to think of something more than cigarettes, beer, flirting and the movies, and the girls to have an interest in something a little higher, nobler and more inspiring than short skirts, swell duds, cold cream, lip rouge, face powders, curling irons, evil smelling perfumes, love stories (though they are all right in moderation) joy rides and empty-headed boob boys. Most people go through life without ever tasting its real sweets or having one worthy aspiration. Instead of trying to do something to make this world a better place to live in—and if a person won't do that they have no right to be here—they stay like unhatched chickens in the egg shells of their stupidity and ignorance, dying and getting out of the world being the only worthy act of their lives. In fact about the only graceful and useful act that a vast number of people perform in this world is to die and leave it. If you give the matter a little thought you'll find I'm not far wrong. There is so much to be done in this world, so much good that can be done with very little effort, that the attitude most people adopt towards life is simply inexcusable. Life is hard because some other boneheads before them did just what they are doing—nothing. Some people think they cannot do any good in this life unless they have millions of dollars to give away, forgetting that it is thought and not dollars that moves the world forward. If these people had the money they crave they wouldn't give any of it away anyhow. It isn't the man who goes around building hospitals, endowing libraries, orphan homes, kennels for the aged, etc., who is a public benefactor. These things are all good in their way, but they don't get people anywhere. We don't want charitable people, except those who are charitable in their thoughts, and we don't want people who need charity. What we need is justice, not charity. Instead of building hospitals we want the knowledge that will root out the diseases that fill hospitals; instead of having Mr. Carnegie build us a library, we want somebody to teach us how to build libraries with our own money. The only real benefactor in this world is the man who instead of giving to the poor, will show them that poverty is born of injustice, vice, profligacy, laziness or stupidity, and is wholly unnecessary, and that we ought to be thoroughly spanked and whipped for tolerating it. We need the man who will make us wise up. But the world is too stupid to deal with causes. It only wants to treat effects and that's why progress is so painfully slow, and why millions of men are forced to lay down their lives in Europe and millions more possibly may have to lay down their lives here, just simply because they won't think. There are men in Europe who think they are fighting for their country, millions of them, whereas as a matter of fact they are fighting for their rulers, for their kings, for a governing class, and fighting against themselves. Brother Peak it all hinges on the one thing, first getting the people to think, then getting them to think right. Now you are alive, you are thinking, you appreciate my work, and understand what I am working for, but there are some people who get infuriated if you try and blast a few more new ideas into their slumbering craniums. Here is a letter from one of the special standpatters, etc. from Deer Lodge, Montana. I get a few of these yearly and enjoy them immensely: "Dear Uncle Charlie: It's seldom that I read any of your uplifting (?) talks, but sometimes while glancing through the paper I catch a line or two that sounds like the blitherings of an idiot that's trying to 'blow off' and show how much he thinks he knows, when he just shows how much he don't know. I don't know whether I have done right to criticize you as I have or not. At times I don't think you are responsible, and it's a pity to upbraid one in that condition, but I do think they ought to remove you somewhere for safe keeping. There is no two ways about it, you are either insane or downright ignorant. Now my beloved Uncle Charlie, I wonder if you will print this letter among some of those who seem to think that you are the whole cheese, when you are not even the mould on the rind. I'll look for it. Very sincerely, Aunt Emmy." Some roast eh? Unfortunately Aunt Emmy didn't have the courage to print her name. People with her ideas never do. If she had, Brother Peak, you and a few thousand more of our progressive friends doubtless would have had some interesting things to say to her. Anyway you can see from that little effusion, acrid and vitriolic, that the way of the reformer is a highway of thorns. Christ found it so, all others who have tried to help humanity have found it so, and will continue to find it so, until people realize that God Almighty gave them brains, not to put in the ice box, or lock up in cold storage, but to think, and think rightly with. Now there is another class of people and a very large class that I want to tell you about. These are the people who think they want to know, but when you put them to the test you find that the thought was only a momentary flicker that died as soon as it was born. Here is a letter I recently received from one of this very numerous class.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

"Uncle Charlie, Dear Sir: Will you please ans, these questions for me, and whatever charges you make I will pay for and whatever conditions you lay down I will comply with. When was the Panama Canal begun and finished? What did it cost and how large is it? What is the cause of the present European War? Who is the Czar of Russia, Emperor of Germany, King of England? Which countries are fighting each other and what are they fighting for? We are cut off from daily news here and I want to know these things. Let me hear from you at once, and oblige, yours truly, J. S."

I receive thousands of letters similar to the above. You would think all these parties were eager and hungry for knowledge, thirsting for information. Once upon a time I thought so, but oh, heavens, how I was deceived! Once upon a time too when I was green and foolish, I replied to some of these letters, often spending hours in research, but never in a single instance did anyone carry out his or her promise or keep faith with me. Not even a card of thanks was received, and the cost of writing personal replies to letters of this description (one dictating and one typewriting) is seldom less than a dollar. I found that the greatest need in every home is an up-to-date encyclopedia, a good magazine such as COMFORT is for instance, and a good, independent, progressive metropolitan newspaper. With these things in the house it is unnecessary to ask for information of anyone, and as all these things can be obtained at a very trifling outlay it is simply criminal for people who spend more yearly on tobacco, booze, chewing gum and other fool things than would purchase a decent library to deny themselves the knowledge that would set them free from the bondages of ignorance in which their mumified bodies are swathed. The very cheapest things in the world today are book and magazines. Food for the stomach is dear, terribly dear, precious food for the brain is cheaper than dirt. No nation, no people, no race ever moved forward on its belly. It is what we put in our brains that counts. Thousands write me and say: "The people round here have no money for books, no time to read, they are too poor." Now it is because they do not read and do not think that they are poor. The man who stints his stomach to buy books, magazines and newspapers, does not have to stint it long, for the power and profit he derives from his brain food, soon gives him all the money he needs to fill his stomach and soon frees him from the grind of eternal drudgery. My brain food costs me from fifteen to twenty dollars every month of my life, and at the foot of my bed is a thirty volume encyclopedia which cost no less than $165. You will throw up your hands when you hear of a set of books that cost as much as a piano, but you should not. Thousands of you have pianos in your home that you cannot play. For a fiftieth part of what you have paid for a piano you could have all the knowledge and wisdom of the world in condensed form at hand that you could study, use and profit from daily. But not in more than one in a thousand homes will you find a decent encyclopedia. People in the mass are willing to learn if they can learn and get information and knowledge without effort, without thought and without expense. This of course is absolutely impossible. You cannot file the chains of ignorance from your hands and feet, the chains that keep you twin brother to the ox, unless you pay something for the file, and you must use the file yourself and use it good and hard or you will never cut through the chains. I spent over an hour dictating a reply to the party who wrote me from South Dakota. Did I get any reply or thanks? Certainly not. I did not expect it. But I am not pessimistic. I'm the greatest optimist in the world. The masses of the people all through the ages have had a terribly hard time of it. Their noses have been at the grindstone for centuries. This generation is getting opportunities for both knowledge and pleasure that other generations never dreamed of, but quite naturally whatever spare cash people get hold of is being expended for pleasure. Only here and there will you find people who prefer to spend their money for knowledge and the truth that will set them free. There is however, a new generation springing up with a more serious bent of mind, a reading and thinking generation, a generation that is hungry for truth, hungry for knowledge, a generation that thinks more of the brain than of the stomach. Brother Peak is one of this generation, and there are thousands of brother Peaks growing up all around us, young men and young women who have a real object in life and who want not to exist, but to live both spiritually and physically, a generation with aspirations and ideals that wants to know the whys and wherefores of everything, a generation that wants to see and that will live to see peace and brotherhood replace war, hate and destruction. So read all you can, get hold of all the good books you can. Feed your brain, feed your soul and the stomach will take care of itself.

The roll when completed is straight, with a thread the length of roll along its side. The length or size of a roll is regulated by the number of times the thread is thrown over; o., over, thread over hook the number of times indicated; k. st., knot stitch, draw out loop about one quarter inch, catch thread and pull through, then put the hook between the drawn loop and the thread just pulled through, catch the thread, draw through these two stitches to form the knot; blk., block, a st. in each of a given number of sts., preceded and followed by a space; sp., space, a space is formed by making a chain of 3 or 4 sts. and omitting the same number of sts. in preceding row; sk., skip, to miss or omit number of stitches indicated in preceding row; p. c., padding cord; * stars mean that the directions given between them should be repeated as indicated before proceeding.

New Ideas in Crocheting

AS our plan last year of giving in this issue and the next a collection of novelties suitable for Christmas gifts met with the general and enthusiastic approval of COMFORT'S fancy work lovers we are repeating it.

We feel sure our readers, who fashion their own remembrances, will be delighted with this new way of using a simple crocheted braid, glued in place, and afterwards shellacked resulting in durable, but inexpensive articles of various sorts.

Although this work is easy the larger pieces require considerable time, so workers will appreciate this extra month which really gives not a bit too much time before the arrival of another holiday season.

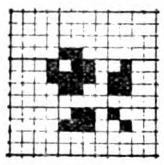

FIG. 1.

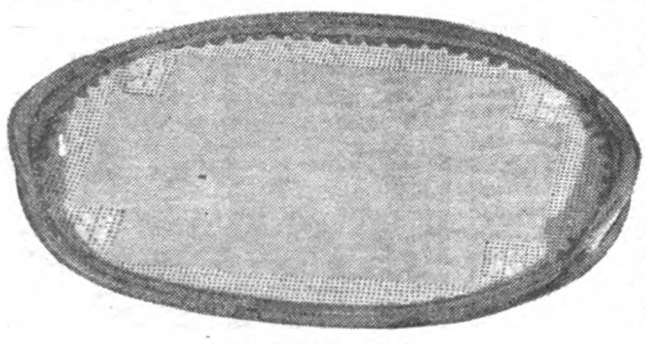
Materials Required

For articles made in this way one can use ordinary coarse, white ball darning cotton for small things such as photo frames, napkin rings, small baskets, boxes, etc., afterwards tinting with either silver or gold paint.

For other articles such as trays, candlesticks and the jardiniere, one should select macrame cord or a tightly twisted twine. A fine bone hook will be needed as the chaining should be close and firm, also some glue, shellac or varnish and a small brush for applying.



Double Chain Braid

Tie loop in cord, ch. 1, insert hook under cord at back of chain, draw loop through cord over hook and draw through 2 loops, repeat. Several yards of this braid will be needed for any good-sized article and in working it up the wrong side of the chaining is always used for the outside, or the side opposite that which shows the chain stitching. This being more irregular, it gives a more attractive appearance to the finished articles.

Foundations for This Work

Pasteboard shaped into various forms for handkerchief, jewel or collar boxes, work baskets, candlesticks or shades, lamp shades, photo frames, etc., can be covered with this braid and then gilded, or stained a green or mahogany with most satisfactory results. The pasteboard foundations should be either securely sewed or fastened together with short strips of court or adhesive plaster so that they will be firm.

Broken glass or china vases can be covered, as well as earthern flower pots or wooden window boxes. For all smooth surfaces to which the glued braid cannot be directly applied, use a thin coat of putty. Press the braid into this, beginning at the bottom of an article always, and working round and round towards the top, applying a little glue to the upper edge of the braid and pressing the layers together closely.

CROCHETED TRAY.

Always allow the glue to become throughly dry before applying the finishing coats.

Crocheted Tray

Such a tray, as the one illustrated is as substantial and durable as if made of wood, and as is usual is fitted with a glass bottom. For the double chain for this article either macrame or heavy wrapping twine can be used and then stained as desired.

The shape can be either round, square or oval. A doily of white linen with monogram in the center or a handsome piece of silk or cretonne can be used under the glass.

After deciding on the size and shape, have the glass cut. Stretch whatever is to be used for the center over a piece of corrugated pasteboard (or two thicknesses of ordinary pasteboard) cut one quarter inch larger all around than the glass.

Turn the edges over and glue in place on the wrong side and leave under weights to dry.

The outside of the back of the tray can be covered by crocheting a piece the proper size and just the top and handles made of the crocheted double chain braid or this can be used for the entire tray.

In this case begin in the center of the back and apply a little strong glue, place the end of the braid in place and then make round after round until the back is entirely covered. Let it dry perfectly in flat position. Next work on right side, filling space around the glass with braid glued in place. Place one round of braid glued to and overlapping the glass. Continue

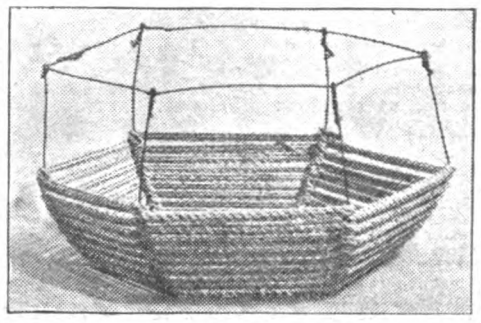


ILLUSTRATION OF MANNER OF MAKING CROCHETED WORK BASKET. FIG. 2.

In making this basket, the braid is all wound on the wires, then with a brush glue between braids and pressing together finish shaping; thoroughly dry before shellacking.

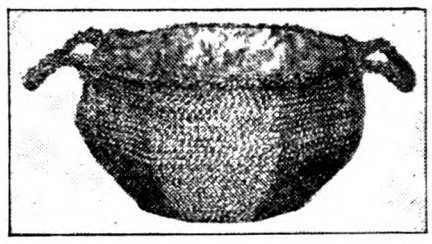
making rim as heavy and high an edge as desired.

The handles are glued braid set in between the rows. These should be sewed or tied into place and also well glued.

Put each row on carefully and press and shape the edge until most dry.

Finish by staining and then with shellac or varnish and the result will be most pleasing and lasting.

Directions for Crocheting Tray Center



The center of the tray shown is of linen with a filet crocheted edge. The pattern of the inserts in the corners (see pattern in detail, Fig. 1) is made as follows.

Ch. 32 stitches, turn.

1st row.—1 d. c. in 9th st., ch. 2, 1 d. c. in next 2nd ch., repeat making 12 sps., ch. 6, turn.

2nd row.—12 sps., ch. 6, turn.

3rd row.—2 sps., 4 d. c. over next sp., 2 sps., 10 d. c., 4 sps., ch. 6, turn.

COMPLETED WORK BASKET.

4th row.—5 sps., 7 d. c., 1 sp., 4 d. c., 3 sps.

5th row.—12 sps., ch. 6, turn.

6th row.—4 sps., 7 d. c., 2 sps., 2 d. c., 2 sps., ch. 6, turn.

7th row.—2 sps., 7 d. c., 1 sp., 13 d. c., 3 sps., ch. 6, turn.

8th row.—3 sps., 4 d. c., 1 sp., 7 d. c., 2 sps., 4 d. c., 2 sps., ch. 6, turn.

9th row.—6 sps., 7 d. c., 4 sps., ch. 6, turn. Next 2 rows all spaces. The sides and ends are also filled in with spaces to fit the shape directed.

In inserting these motifs in the corner the linen should be cut out on a thread.

Crocheted Work Basket

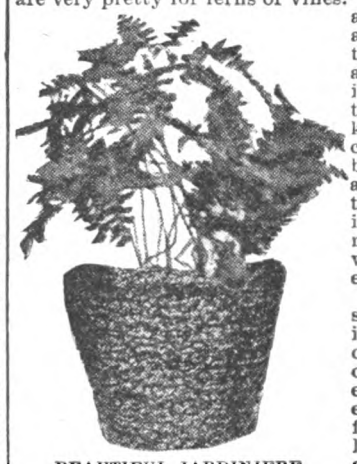
This attractive basket has for its foundation, wire cut from an old hat frame. It is six sided in shape. Three wires of equal length should be fastened together in the center, measure out three and one half inches from the center on each wire, turn up and then over a wire which forms the bottom of the basket.

The six wires should be turned over this bottom wire equal distances apart, then the shape of the basket will be correct whether it be octagon, square, round or oval.

Twist the ends of the wires over a top wire, also measuring carefully to keep the distances between wires equal. With the wire frame made, tie the braid into the center of the bottom and working on the outside from left to right, wind the braid over each wire, making a smooth outside and braid covered wires inside although the manner of working can be reserved if one prefers.

Press the rows together closely when winding so there will not be gaps.

Finish the top and form the handles of a braid made of three strands. Line with any bit of silk or ribbon after giving the basket two coats of shellac or clear varnish.



Beautiful Jardiniere

This work is very effective for covering pots or flower boxes and is so cheap anyone can make their winter window gardens attractive by covering the unsightly pots in this way.

Such a pot containing a fern or some bulbs for early blooming would certainly make an appropriate Christmas gift for any flower lover.

Hanging Baskets

These can also be fashioned of this braid and are very pretty for ferns or vines. Use wire as a foundation and cover in the same way as is shown in making the work basket, or the chaining can be woven in and out over the wires, but in this case more wires will be needed.

BEAUTIFUL JARDINIERE.

A good-sized hanging basket can be made of seven pieces of wire, each twenty-four inches long. Fasten all together securely in the center. Tie in chain and commence weaving in and out, over and under the wires, shaping the basket as you proceed. Twist the ends of the wires down over the edge of the top and finish with a plait made of three strands of chaining.

Form the handle of wire making it about fourteen inches long, cover by winding with crocheted chain. This should be made fast to the basket by running half way down the sides and twisting around the wires. Shellac if desired.

Fruit baskets of various shapes can be made in a similar way, but for these macrame cord will be best as they should be strong.

Water Pitcher Set

A circular tray about twelve inches in diameter with six small trays or coasters, as they are commonly called, for the glasses, is but another of the possibilities of this new work.

Under the glass bottoms one can use bright colored silk or cretonne to good advantage instead of crocheted centers.

Pin, hair-pin and comb-and-brush trays are also pretty, and will be new and novel gifts which will not be likely to be duplicated.

Candle Shade

A circular or square shade can be made of silk and outlined top and bottom with the chaining or one can be easily made all of crochet as follows.

Crocheted Candle-Shade

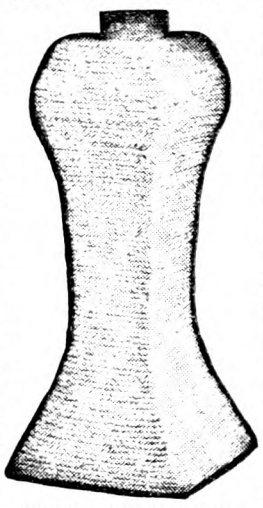
Begin with chain 76 stitches.

1st row.—1 d. c., ch. 2, skip 2, 2 d. c., repeat making 18 spaces in all.

2nd row.—2 d. c., in first ch. 2, ch. 2, 3 d. c. in next ch. 2, repeat.

3rd row.—2 d. c., in next ch. 2, 1 sp., 3 d. c., 1 sp., 3 d. c.

4th row.—Sl. st., to first sp., 3 d. c., 1 sp., 3 d. c.



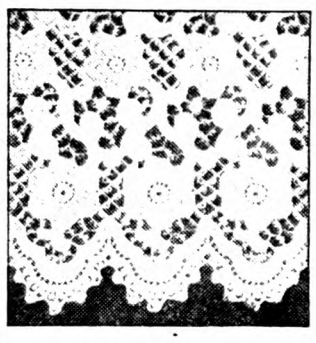
5th row.—Sl. st., to sp., 3 d. c., complete each point, making 6 in all. Then finish with 6 small tassels.

Numberless discarded articles can be refinished with this braid and made into ornaments which will be most useful and surprisingly gratifying.

Candlesticks

These can be made by using pasteboard for a foundation or a clever whittler can combine a piece of a broomstick with wooden squares for base and top.

The one here shown has heavy pasteboard used as a foundation. Height ten inches. Bottom six inches square, graduating into two and three quarters inches, and then broadening to four and one half. From this curve into three and one half. After cutting a good paper pattern, cut four pieces of pasteboard exactly alike, allow the edges to meet and join by using small pieces of court or adhesive plaster. Then cover with chaining glued in place as usual.



CROCHETED CANDLESTICK.

Jewel Box

From one of our home workers who certainly is capable of utilizing materials at hand to advantage comes this beautifully effective crocheted box.

Fig. 3 shows the bit of Hamburg from which the motifs were cut and arranged to form the circle in the cover of the box, one being used in the center. This idea is a valuable suggestion as by using bits of lace and embroidery combined with crochet or tatting one can get elaborate, unusual and decorative effects with greatly lessened handwork.

HAMBURG. FIG. 3.

Medallions in old waists, children's dresses or worn-out underclothes can probably be found in many a rag bag, some perhaps large enough to nearly cover the top of some boxes, as powder, handkerchief, glove and jewel boxes can all be made in this way.

All-over Lace Pattern

For Sides of Boxes

This is made in the length.

Begin with chain required length, plus 12 stitches, turn.

1st row.—1 d. c. in 12 st. from hook ch. 2, 1 d. c. in next second ch., ch. 7, 1 d. c. in next seventh ch., (always count from last double made) ch. 2, 1 d. c. in second ch., ch. 7, 1 d. c. in seventh ch. Repeat entire length, 1 d. c. in last st., turn ch. of the necessary length to keep end of lace even.

2nd row.—3 d. c. under ch. 2, between 2 d. c., ch. 3, 1 s. c. under ch. 7, ch. 3, 3 d. c. under next ch. 2, repeat.

3rd row.—1 d. c. on first of group of 3 d. c., ch. 2, 1 d. c. on last of group of 3 d. c., ch. 7, repeat.

4th row.—Same as 2nd row.

5th row.—Same as the 3rd row.

Simple filet lace patterns are also very effective for covering the sides of these boxes and a handsome design in filet crochet for a square box cover can be made as follows.

Roman Woman's Head

Begin with ch. 70 sts., turn.

1st row.—1 d. c. in 9th st., ch. 2, 1 d. c. in next 2nd ch., repeat making 31 spaces in all in this row, ch. 6, turn.

2nd row.—1 sp., 4 d. c., 1 sp., 4 d. c., repeat, ch. 6, turn.

3rd row.—31 sps., ch. 6, turn.

4th row.—1 sp., 4 d. c., 6 sps., 13 d. c., 1 sp., 19 d. c., 2 sps., 13 d. c., 4 sps., 4 d. c., 1 sp., ch. 6, turn.

5th row.—5 sps., 22 d. c., 2 sps., 25 d. c., 1 sp., 4 d. c., 7 sps., ch. 6, turn.

6th row.—1 sp., 4 d. c., 4 sps., 10 d. c., 1 sp., 16 d. c., 2 sps., 25 d. c., 1 sp., 4 d. c., 2 sps., 4 d. c., 1 sp., ch. 6, turn.

7th row.—4 sps., 7 d. c., 1 sp., 13 d. c., 1 sp. 13 d. c., 2 sps., 7 d. c., 1 sp., 10 d. c., 7 sps., ch. 6, turn.

8th row.—1 sp., 4 d. c., 5 sps., 10 d. c., 1 sp., 4

JEWEL BOX.

d. c., 1 sp. 22 d. c., 2 sps., 7 d. c., 1 sp., 10 d. c., 1 sp., 4 d. c., 1 sp., ch. 6, turn.

9th row.—3 sps., 10 d. c., 1. sp., 16 d. c., 5 sps., 10 d. c., 1 sp., 10 d. c., 1 sp., 4 d. c., 5 sps., ch. 6, turn.

10th. row.—1 sp., 4 d. c., 6 sps., 4 d. c., 1 sp., 10 d. c., 1 sp., 16 d. c., 2 sps., 10 d. c., 1 sp., 10 d. c., 1 sp., 4 d. c., 1 sp., ch. 6, turn.

The Other Car

By Juliette Augusta Parnson

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"BUT you will marry me," Marsden was persuading Norma Hastings, in a darkened corner of the Club veranda., "Just say that you will marry me, and I'll take the risk of all the rest."

"But I do not love you, Mr. Marsden. I cannot even pretend that I do."

"Love? My dear little girl, how could you know anything about love? How many girls ever marry the men they think they love? How many boys ever grow up to be the policemen and ice-wagon drivers that they intended? Love, real love, comes only through marriage and intimacy. Trust me, my dear; I know."

Yes, the girl reflected, he probably did know. He was a man nearly twice her own age. There was a mildly cynical wisdom about his mouth and eyes that made him a little mysterious and very attractive to all girls, and to some who were no longer girls. Women said that he would never marry, that he had never made a definite proposal to any woman. She knew that some women in their Club set had smiled wisely, even a little pityingly—that was what made her angry, at his attentions to her. If she accepted him now, she could laugh at them. If she refused him they would never believe it. They would say that he had played the summer with her, and had tired of the play. It was a little cold-blooded, she admitted to herself. It was very different from the throbbing, compelling love that she had dreamed. But, at least, it would punish Jimmy Lake, and just now she was perhaps more interested in punishing that gentleman than in anything else. He had flirted outrageously with the Burgess girl and then had tried brazenly to defend himself by saying that she, Norma, had driven him to it by having Marsden continually hanging around her. Decidedly, Jimmy must be punished.

"Yes," she said, coming quickly to her decision, "I will marry you."

Marsden came quickly to her and grasped her arm, but she looked up coolly at him.

"Remember," she warned, "I have not promised even to pretend."

He stopped, rebuffed by her coldness, but apparently not disturbed. "As you wish," he said. "I can wait."

It was a beautiful, pearly white moonlight night as they sped swiftly towards her home in his car. Marsden found in the scene and the time the setting for love making. Norma felt herself suddenly snatched up and before she knew what was happening she found herself struggling in his arms. He was kissing her madly, wildly and she was frightened and disgusted. He was like some old satyr with a human maiden in his power. She had never dreamed that it could be so horrible as this. She tried to scream and fought him away viciously, but he only held her the more tightly, seeming to gloat over her frantic struggles.

Then something happened. The high steady whine of the big car under speed broke down into an angry roar of back-firing. Marsden released her and rose to look over the chauffeur's head. The car slowed down to a standstill at the side of the road. Marsden and the chauffeur both got out.

Norma slipped out into the road on the other side. The lights of the car were turned to the side of the road, so that the road ahead was in comparative darkness.

"What's wrong?" She heard Marsden's irritated voice.

"Carbureter, I guess," was the answer. "I think I know what's wrong, but it'll take some time, sir."

"Well, get at it. I'll help."

Norma fled swiftly down the road. Her home was only a mile or so away. She might be able to reach there before they had the machine fixed and could come on. She did not think of the consternation she would cause by coming home alone and on foot at this hour. She thought only of one thing, to get away from that man, never to see him again. His cynical, sardonic assurance of possession in her, because she had said certain words, revolted all the strength of her girlhood.

The moon suddenly became overclouded, so that the darkness dropped down about the girl, and a turn of the road took her out of possible range of the lights of the machine. She felt safer now, for even when he should miss her he would not start in pursuit until the machine was repaired. Just as she was beginning to be assured that she would reach home before being overtaken, a car came howling around a turn of the road behind and threw its lights full upon her.

Fear leaped upon her and caught her by the throat. It was as though that huge car were Marsden himself, with all of his smooth strength and confidence and careless power. Her knees trembled under her with fright, so that she thought she must fall in a huddle right there in the road before the oncoming machine.

But she somehow found strength to stumble to the side of the road and crawl over the low stone wall that formed the boundary. Once having the wall between her and the road, her powers came back and she started to run freely away from it.

She had not thought that he would stop or leave the car. But as she ran she heard the machine stop at the place where she had left the road, and, looking back, she saw the black figure of a man silhouetted against the gray of the night sky as he climbed the wall.

Then she forgot everything: Forgot that she was a normal young woman with society training, forgot that she really might go back and face Marsden, or any other man, and that he would hardly dare touch her.

She was no longer a young woman with a position in the world. She was just a little hunted thing that ran desperately, wildly away, anywhere, away from some vague, taunting horror. It was not fear of the man's anger. She never thought of that. It was the blinding, sickening shame and horror of his touch, of his kisses, that drove her on and on, without direction, without purpose.

She heard the thud of a man's pursuing steps and turned, with the instinct of the wild, to a growth of underbrush, for hiding. She heard a man's voice calling her name. It did not seem like Marsden's voice, but that only frightened her the more, for she was sure it was a trick of her disordered mind. Was she going insane?

She ran on and on, pursued by the thought and the voice, her gown tearing and her little sharp-heeled dinner slippers tripping her at every step. She stubbled through a little brook—the step and the voice close behind her now—and staggered up the other side, where she ran headfirst into a tree and fell fainting at its foot.

She opened her eyes at the insistent, repeated pleading of a man's voice that said over and over:

"Norma darling, speak to me. For God's sake, tell me what it was!" It was Jimmy Lake, and as soon as she opened her eyes he gently kissed them shut again. She was pillowed up safely and warmly in his arms.

"It was Marsden," she said. "I was running from him."

"So the brute showed himself for once without the gloves, did he? I know now why I wanted to stop and kill him where he stood in the road, when I saw that you were not in the car."

"Oh, Jimmy, keep me, keep me! Never let him see me!" she pleaded into his shoulder.

He gathered her up to carry her back across the brook, murmuring into her hair:

"With my life, dear little heart, I'll keep you forever."

Toughey's Travels and Adventures Abroad

By Adele Steiner Burleson

INTRODUCTION

The intimate acquaintance with the Burleson family which our readers have enjoyed through the "Toughey" stories of last season will intensify the interest and pleasure with which they will follow this family's tour in foreign lands as charmingly told by Mrs. Burleson in the "Toughey's Travels and Adventures Abroad" series, to appear exclusively in COMFORT this fall and through the coming winter and spring.

It is a true story of the experiences and adventures in great variety—curious, annoying, amusing, thrilling—that befell the author and her family while touring Europe about twelve years ago, though in the narrative she modestly hides her identity by calling her husband and herself Mr. and Mrs. Deering.

For the information of our new subscribers we will briefly introduce the characters.

Mr. Burleson, now Postmaster General, was then a member of Congress from Texas.

Though, as a devoted wife and mother, care of home and family has been her paramount duty, Mrs. Burleson has found time, nevertheless, to figure prominently as a social leader and take an active part in many benevolent and charitable movements, while her talent as an author of essays, plays, dialogues, stories and magazine articles has won distinction for her in literary circles.

"Toughey" who plays the title role, is the eldest daughter, a prim little miss of fourteen, and feels a great responsibility for the conduct of her little sisters. She was christened Laura, but in the family went by the pet name "Toughey," conferred on her in babyhood by a college girl aunt in admiration of the child's coolness, grit and self-reliance manifest even at that tender age.

Nan and Bess, the two younger girls with only a year's difference in their ages and usually referred to collectively as "the children," are playmates and fast friends. Their vivacity and childish pranks are a source of worriment to serious-minded Toughey who is several years their senior.

Grandmother is Mrs. Burleson's mother, to whom the two little girls flee for consolation in time of trouble

CHAPTER I.

THE TRIP ACROSS.

WHEN the greatest doctor in the world prescribed a year abroad for Mrs. Deering, the household was stirred to its lowest stratum, which Toughey explained to the children meant them. Each one had a vision all her own of the trip and what it meant to her. With the children it was too nebulous for expression and Toughey's carefully cultivated indifference was intended to conceal the thrills of her ambitious little heart. Meanwhile the intermediate happenings until the sailing date were not always of the children's choosing nor to their liking. Vaccination laid them low, each with a swollen purpled leg. But germs had to be met and overcome so their rebellion was useless and in time was even merged into comfort and pride as they viewed their mottled fevered limbs.

The disposing of their pets was the hardest of the trials they had to meet. The excitement of packing them up made parting with dolls and tin soldiers and the wooden inhabitants of arks easy; and they turned forgetful eyes from the paper ladies on the walls of their playroom, but giving Dandy, the collie over to a strange man to be taken down into Virginia was a heart-breaking affair. And thrusting Moon, the cat, into the reluctant arms of a friend, after other suggestion for her except the lethal chamber at the city pound, had failed was no less agonizing. Then there was the small turtle, which, since their last summer's trip to the seashore had had the freedom of the house and was the survivor of so many perils that the children felt a special and tender interest in his existence.

"He can't live much longer anyway," said Toughey consolingly. "He hasn't eaten a morsel for over four months."

"You said you would feed him!" The children were at once suspicious and indignant.

"I did too, and everything in this house would starve to death if it wasn't for me." Toughey fixed the children with a severe eye. They looked guilty but vigorously denied the charge.

"Ikey used to be so fond of raw meat, but since he fell out of the third story window," she paused for a minute to look reproachfully at her little sisters, "where you left him, he's never had any appetite. I am afraid he was crushed a little," she finished reflectively.

A few days after this conversation Ikey settled all doubts concerning his future by taking a final and fatal plunge down the cellarway.

"You'd better stop mourning over Ikey and begin to think what you're going to do about the white rats," advised Toughey. The rats were indeed a problem which threatened to prove unsolvable; notwithstanding the children's industrious advertisement of their charms and the advantages of having them as members of a household.

"Don't they bite?" was the usual question of a prospective rat owner.

"Never!"

This was a strictly truthful answer.

"What do they eat?"

"Anything. Everything."

This also was true. Any statements beyond these had to be diplomatic or even evasive.

The children united by a common interest, generally met the situation successfully unless Toughey happened to be present, when they were seeking a safe and comfortable home for their pets. Under her hypnotic influence all of the facts in the case were brought out sooner or later.

"Yes, they do get out of their cage sometimes and roam all over round the house and eat up your best handkerchiefs and get under your pillow in the middle of the night and get lost."

Once started along this line, the children did not seem able to stop themselves.

"We call the father rat, Cannibal, because he eats up all the baby rats as soon as they are born."

When one little girl after another declined the responsibility of the Cannibal and his family the children turned on Toughey.

"I don't see why you have to knock 'em so nobody wants 'em," was their argument.

"I've never said a word about them."

"Well, but you look at us so," they grieved.

"Well."

"But you make us feel as if we were going to tell stories about the rats!"

"Well, were you?"

This settled the matter. The children's resentment at having been keyed up to perfect truth by Toughey, yielded to their satisfaction at being able to prove they had been.

The Navy Hospital's offer of ten cents apiece from whom the original pair had been purchased for rats for laboratory experiment was shudderingly rejected.

To sell the entire lot of nine, for the scandalous price of fifteen cents to the animal dealer at twenty cents a head was the final degrading alternative to setting them loose in the street. The transaction finally went through, but it left the children humbled and reticent.

There still remained the two goldfish and Feathers, the canary, to be disposed of, for Mrs. Deering was firm in her refusal to take any live things to Europe save only Toughey and the children and their grandmother. Just when a happy future seemed to have been secured for these remaining pets, an unfriendly providence took actual charge of their destiny. The very day they were to have been transferred to other careful hands a caller arrived with a small boy. Mrs. Deering led him kindly to the goldfish and he did the rest—he went fishing. At the end of his mother's visit the only animate sign among the little school of fish was a single tiny gasp and a feeble flip of one tail.

At the very same hour in another part of the house occurred the tragedy of Feathers. He had sported gaily in a sudden burst of spring sunshine until the unusual heat dried the water in his cup. The children were too busy with other things to notice his extremity.

"Brain fever and neglect!" was Toughey's verdict and all the tears the children shed could not make her change it.

When the day of their departure from Washington arrived the children showed no trace of either tears or regrets. Their father's cheery good by and promise to join them in England in a few months was entirely satisfactory to them and they wondered a little that Mamma and Grandmother and even Toughey should look so serious over the farewells.

Once on the big ocean liner their interst centered in her. They wasted no time gazing pensively at the receding shores of their country or shedding sentiment at the feet of the Statue of Liberty. There was too much interesting housekeeping to be done below in their stateroom. The swollen suitcase into which, by some miracle performed only by mothers and grandmothers, all of their effects had been stored was now disgorging its contents. Each article was to be disposed of according to its nature, affinity and the resources of the stateroom. The little new kimonos must find hooks, the books and games a shelf, the extra clothing a safe drawer in the chiffonier. All went gaily for a time and order was beginning to emerge from confusion when a queer slump took place in their spirits. They lost their ambition suddenly. Everything in the stateroom seemed to be swimming about including themselves.

At this moment Toughey dashed past, darted into the adjoining stateroom, which she occupied with her grandmother, and slammed the door. Mrs. Deering also made a precipitate arrival in their stateroom which now resembled a junk-shop. The children were painfully surprised at the events that quickly followed and in which they themselves participated. Only grandmother survived the general ruin.

It was several days before the little family were reunited on a common ground of cheerfulness.

"You were awful seasick, weren't you, Toughey?"

"Almost as bad as you were," she replied smoothly.

The question did not impress her as being sympathetic as it appeared. At any rate it proved to be debatable and was discussed at intervals during the remainder of the voyage.

"Nurse," having remained in America for a year's rest, the supervision of the children devolved upon Toughey, Mrs. Deering and Grandmother. Mrs. Deering looked after their baths, clothes and meals. Grandmother amused them with checkers, backgammon, and reading aloud. Toughey did the rest. But peace did not always prevail.

"We weren't doing a thing!" was the invariable defense when Toughey complained of them to their mother.

"Oh, no, of course not; only climbing up the rail trying to fall over into the ocean," she explained.

If the weather was fine and everybody busy with shuffle-board, all went well, but when Toughey wanted to remain in her berth and read an interesting book and the children wanted to roam, there was trouble. Their range was considerable. Toughey once dug them—fiercely—out of the engine-room.

The Captain insisted that nothing could happen to children on his ship, that he often tried to lose them and failed. But even Toughey refused to accept this theory and continued to keep a watchful eye on the doings of her little sisters.

Sometimes they promenaded the decks with a young doctor who was trying to understand children and fast reaching the conclusion that American children were a trifle puzzling. Occasionally they talked furtively with a New York boy whose nurse and governess kept him for the most of the time a close prisoner in his stateroom; more often they played dolls with a little Irish girl whose greatest privilege was being permitted to "stub up for dinner." "She means Stop up for dinner," the children explained when Toughey looked mystified. "Most times she has to go to bed before dinner."

One day when the children were having a quiet game of jacks on deck, Toughey attempted to combine maid duty from her steamer chair, with the thrilling adventures of the "Count of Monte Cristo." The plan seemed to work perfectly, a glance at the children, then back to the fascinating story. But presently an ominous silence made itself felt. Toughey looked up from her book. The children had disappeared. They were close by, of course. She read on a few pages. "Walking with the young doctor," she told herself, and read on. "Down in the stateroom playing dolls," was the next answer, she made to her conscience. But it was no use. So she crawled out of the warm rug, closed her book, with a bang, it is true, but she closed it and raced down the deck in search of her runaways.

The young doctor was inspecting a sail through his glasses; the little Irish girl was tempting Providence, standing on the ship's rail watching a school of porpoises; the American boy was taking an unhappy walk with his forbidding nurse, but the children were nowhere to be seen. Toughey scrambled down-stairs, ran to their stateroom and as she entered, beheld Nan with her body half out of the porthole. Bounding forward she seized the child and dragged her back into the room.

"What are you doing!" she exclaimed pantingly.

"I was just looking for Bess." she answered. At Toughey's scream of terror, Nan gave a frightened giggle.

"In the ocean!" Toughey managed to stammer, her eyes starting from her head, her fresh color gone.

Bess jumped from behind the portiere and threw herself with shouts of laughter on Toughey.

"We fooled you this time! We did! Didn't we?"

Toughey dropped on the sofa and burst into a passion of tears and nothing the children could do or say would comfort her. It was upon this scene of confusion that Mrs. Deering and grandmother, who had been having tea in the big dining-room, now arrived. Mrs. Deering looked grave when the case was stated, but grandmother was openly indignant at the children's idea of fun.

"We're not wicked and miserable little sin-

Toughey as She Is Today

By Edna Mary Coleman

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

MRS. RICHARD VAN WYCK NEGLEY of San Antonio, Texas, formerly Laura Burleson, the eldest daughter of Postmaster General and Mrs. Burleson is one of the busiest young matrons of the Texas city where she now resides.

Like her mother, she is full of energy and though her husband and two small sons, Albert and William aged four and two respectively claim the largest share of her attention, she still finds time to participate in the social activities and keep up her interest in the various clubs to which she belongs. Mrs. Negley is a natural social leader as she possesses the rare gift of attracting friends and the still rarer one of keeping them. She has a charm of manner that never wears off and to meet her once is to remember her always. Throughout her school, university life, travels and brief belleship in Washington society preceding her marriage, she drew around herself a large circle of admiring friends whose regard she had the happy faculty of retaining through the changes made by time and residence.

But Mrs. Negley has another vast circle of friends of whose number and identity she knows but little, and they in turn regard her, not as a stately grown-up woman, with multifarious social and domestic cares, but as the courageous, warm-hearted, impulsive, but dependable little heroine of Mrs. Burleson's charming child stories of "Toughey" in Childhood Adventures on a Texas Ranch which has had such a wide circulation during the past year through the columns of COMFORT. Mrs. Negley may climb to dizzy heights of intellectual attainment or scan the peaks of literary culture or scientific lore, but she will never thrill her friends and acquaintances more genuinely than "Toughey" does through the various exploits and adventures of her childhood days, when with her little sisters, she revelled in the glorious freedom of vacation life on their father's Southern plantation. Through them all the sturdy childish honesty and uncompromising standards of right and wrong, devoid of priggishness or pretense is one of the greatest charms of the stories.

MRS. NEGLEY (TOUGHEY) AND HER TWO CHILDREN.

"Toughey" was never anything but natural and normal and Mrs. Negley is simply "Toughey" grown up. None the less natural, none the less normal, but with the dignity and poise that characterized her as a little girl intensified and rounded out into wholesome womanhood.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Burleson hold decided and advanced ideas concerning the education of their children, which have been faithfully followed with them all. College training had always been considered by them as the finest possible equipment for life's responsibilities and vicissitudes and their children never had any other idea about education but to finish their schooling with university degrees.

Mrs. Negley attended the public schools of Washington and also high school. By means of extra summer work she was able to qualify for the University of Texas in a special course and thereupon took up her studies in her home city, graduating with honors. Her father was a member of the first graduating class in law from this institution. Here she specialized in history and English and took up various other courses. Upon the completion her father gave her a substantial reward, usually fifty dollars, and upon one occasion gratified her longing for a certain diamond ring.

As her parents were living in Washington, Miss Laura, while attending college, spent most of her time with relatives where she was a cherished addition to the family circle, but after becoming a Phi Beta Pi she concluded that she would like to live at the fraternity house with some of her classmates. Mrs. Burleson agreed to this believing that the experience would be of value to her from an economical standpoint, as there she would have real responsibilities to assume and discharge. Accordingly the twelve girls and a chaperone put in some delightful months living in this fashion. To meet her obligations her father gave her a certain amount of bank stock which yielded her an income amply sufficient for her needs. Out of this she was expected to maintain her social position among her own and her family's friends, pay her share of the living expenses, provide her clothes, amusements, etc. Being obliged to live on a set income taught her many valuable lessons which her parents believed could only be learned in this manner. She learned the real value of money, from the things she purchased, and soon discovered that recklessness of expenditure in one direction was sure to be followed by necessary and painful self denial in others. She learned to carefully consider her wants and to shape them to fit her income, and these lessons of self control and careful management from the view-point of her parents were fully as important to fit her for life as the stereotyped curriculum of the college.

Mrs. Negley gave a great deal of study to Latin and Spanish, speaking the latter fluently and this past winter she has been taking a university extension course in French so as to more thoroughly understand and appreciate the best of French literature. Literature has always been one of her favorite studies and the winter just prior to her marriage she took a course in Russian literature for the simple reason that she had never known much about the literature of the land of Tolstoi, Turgenef and Gorky and therefore desired to learn.

In her college career she also took courses in botany, geology, physics and short courses in pedagogy and the drama, while domestic science was also included in manner sufficiently thorough and amplified to render her a finished housekeeper and manager, and charming hostess.

Both Mr. and Mrs. Negley are fond of horseback riding, golf and tennis and enjoy swimming, and are members of the Country Club. Mr. Negley is a Yale graduate where he made a record in the athletics as well as in the cultural courses. He is now treasurer of the Standard Trust Company and is interested in other large business enterprises in San Antonio.

Mrs. Negley also belongs to the Suffrage club, and one of the literary clubs of San Antonio.

They have recently purchased a home on the highest point in San Antonio and are busily engaged in planning landscape effects for the grounds.

While it is too soon to formulate any plans for the education of her little boys, Mrs. Negley has already settled that they shall have a college training, for that is a foregone family conclusion and she is already developing and demonstrating her own theories concerning them as the older boy has been taught to speak Spanish which he does almost exclusively.

They are both to be enrolled in the cause of Woman's Suffrage and to become Boy Scouts as soon as old enough.

Mrs. Negley's views regarding philanthropic and charitable work are much like those her mother holds and follows. She believes that each person should do all in his power to relieve the distress that comes within the reach of his immediate daily life and that the best way to perform real lasting philanthropy is to help people to help themselves.

though he declared that he had come to get a breath of air and to see grass that was not covered with half an inch of dirt.

The dinner was served in the small dining-room; the drawing-room and the conservatory adjoining it were lit up, the latter being thrown open to the room for the first time. Mrs. More was in her glory, attired in a costume just fresh from Worth's, and glittering like a huge firefly with diamonds. Edna also wore one of Worth's costumes, but it was neither gorgeous nor glittering, simply a soft, clinging material that was neither cashmere nor crape, and neither dove color nor stone-gray; its simplicity was rather increased than destroyed by the rich, quiet-looking lace that seemed to have lit upon it like a spider's web, and for jewelry she wore a small blossom of azalea—a daring thing to do—but perfectly successful. Even Mrs. More, who had inveighed against the dress as a plain, dowdy thing, not at all up to Worth's firm, was fain to admit that it had made Edna—or she had made it, which was it, Mrs. More?—look remarkably effective.

A year ago how the glad, untroubled heart of the girl would have delighted in that admission, but now—she just glanced in the glass in answer to the imploring look of her delighted maid, and felt a small sense of satisfaction.

Bertie happened to be in the drawing-room as she came down, and he stood and looked at her for a moment with speechless admiration in his blue eyes.

"How beautiful you look!" he said at last. "What is that dress you have got on? You seem to float in it. Why doesn't mamma wear a dress like that, instead of that one she has put on, which seems all on fire?"

Edna assured him that mamma's was a much prettier dress than hers; but Bertie remained obstinately incredulous, and at last silenced Edna.

"If you think so, why didn't you wear one like it?"

Edna might have explained that it would not have suited her, but she contented herself with stooping down and kissing the child, and that satisfied him very much more completely.

As a great favor he begged to be allowed to remain in the drawing-room until dinner was announced, and although Mrs. More at first ridiculed the idea, when Edna seconded the request she granted it rather reluctantly. Bertie was getting too big a child; he reminded people of mamma's age too forcibly.

So Bertie ensconced himself behind Edna's chair, and presently a carriage dashed up to the door and the Bromleys were announced. Almost at the same moment the vicar and his wife made their appearance, and, wonderful to relate, Lord Mersey, punctual to the moment, was heard in the hall telling the footman, in a deep voice, to be careful with his coat, as there were some fern leaves in the pockets which he had gathered as he came along.

Bertie watched them all in his little, critical way, and for the moment, as Grace sailed into the room, tall, dark and imperial, in a close, habit-like dress of dark blue with a touch of crimson at the bosom and a ruby jewel in her raven hair, he stared with all a young artist's delight, but presently he turned his blue eyes toward Edna, and let them remain there until Lord Mersey came in. There was much shaking of hands and the usual small talk, in which Mrs. More's voice could be heard predominant, and the butler was just announcing dinner when a footman called him outside, and after an animated conference with the great dignitary, in a hushed whisper, entered with a card on a silver salver for Mr. Edward More.

"Ed, what's this" said Edward More, who was talking politics with the vicar—your clergyman is always ready to talk politics or warfare, perhaps because he is debarred from taking an active part in either. "A gentleman in the library. I can't see the name by this light; strange fashion this for keeping a room half dark—quite mediæval, and the name is printed, too, small enough to require a microscope. What is the name, Edna?"

Edna took the card, and in her sweet, musical voice, read out, "Capt. Morton."

"Morton!" echoed Edward, with a nervous twitch of his eyebrows, as he glanced at his wife. "What on earth—will you excuse me a moment, Edna?" and muttering and grumbling he left the room. Talk dwindled away while he was gone, everyone felt curious to hear who Capt. Morton might be. The butler worried himself to death about the dinner in the hall, and the cook, a French chef, to whom Edna paid a salary larger than a colonial bishop's, raved and swore in the kitchen at the prospect of the dinner being spoiled.

Presently Edward More returned and came up to Edna; he looked just as he looked when he was arguing a rather terrible case at the Chancery bar, and fidgeted with his eyeglasses as he explained:

"A great friend of mine come down on business—was very sorry to intrude—and would call again——"

"Oh, but," said Edna, opening her eyes, "surely you asked him to stay."

Edward More dropped his thick lids over his keen, little eyes, and muttered something to which Edna responded warmly "By all means," and again Edward More left the room, returning in a few minutes to explain that his friend, Capt. Morton, had accepted Edna's kind invitation, and as soon as he had changed his dress would join them, and he begged that Miss Weston would not spoil the dinner, etc., etc., and as Edward More seconded the modest request, dinner was announced.

The soup, upon which the chef had expended many anxious hours, was dispatched with very little consideration, owing to the general curiosity, and the fish would doubtless have shared the same fate if a footman had not thrown open the door, just after the turbot had appeared, and announced "Capt. Morton."

As all looked up there entered a tall, distinguished-looking and singularly handsome gentleman.

Everybody looked surprised.

Edna for her part had imagined a fair, florid and rather stout man of the ordinary military type. But Capt. Morton had nothing martial about him, excepting his dark and carefully trained mustache and his upright figure, and the latter was toned down and softened by a singular grace, that pervaded face, figure and expression, and was almost feminine.

The captain glanced around with a pair of dark and perfectly composed eyes, picked out Edna at a glance, bowed over her hand as he murmured a few admirably chosen apologies and thanks, and with a general bow around, took a seat that had been left vacant for him next the vicar's wife. It was a capital place for the captain, who might naturally be expected, as a stranger, to be slightly curious as to his company, for it commanded the whole table.

Soup was brought to him, conversation flowed on and past him for a time, and then Edward, just as if he were grumbling, remarked that he, the captain, had not taken long to change his dress.

"A soldier should always be able to don his uniform, either for the field or the drawing-room, in ten minutes," said the captain. And again everyone was struck by the soft, musical tone of the unmartial voice. "Besides," he added, with a smile, "to tell you the truth, I have traveled far, and was very hungry; visions of dinner to say nothing of fairer and better things, rose before me; and I don't think the man in the play who changes his costume four times in fourteen minutes could have felt more anxious to don the proper habiliments."

This little pleasantry broke the ice, and let the captain into the general conversation, and certainly it was improved by his admission; few men could talk better, and not one in a score of them knew so well when to talk and when to be satisfied with listening. Capt. Morton was an artist at all points, and had studied his subjects deeply; so it happened that, whether Lord Mersey started in them the manifestations of the power of God and His love for humanity; who trusts Him fully and seeks His wisdom and guidance; who can control his temper, return evil words with kind ones and who has a smile and a kind word for everyone; who comforts the distressed and lends a helping hand to the poor and needy; who has learned the value of character above wealth; who seeks the welfare of those about him first, and strives to set a noble example for others; who does not think it a disgrace to labor with the hands in any honest profession; who secures food for his mind from the choice works of literature."

Cooking, home making, choosing literature for the home, entertaining and every art that tends to make home real, should be added to the girl's course.

Another thing we consider too lightly is our thoughts and our reading. One may say that it does not matter what we think, but I assure you it does. "Our character is tinged with the complexion of our thoughts" and reading is the food for thought. How can we think pure thoughts and read impure ones? And it is impossible to read them without recalling them.

Young people, especially, should use every caution in selecting their reading and when they find the impure, discard it at once. The title or first few chapters should be enough to determine the story.

One should also be careful in selecting places of amusement. I read once, I do not recall the writer, but she said, "Never go anywhere that you would not wish to be found if the Lord in His mercy should call for you." It made a lasting impression on me and I am sending it to you.

I am twenty-one years old, five feet, eight inches tall, weigh one hundred and seventy-nine pounds and have light brown hair, blue eyes and a fair complexion.

I should be pleased to hear from some of my coworkers in the teaching profession, or any of the good sisters who are interested in education.

May God extend to you all His richest blessings and may we all be permitted through His Grace to meet in one unbroken band in Heaven.

Your loving sister, MAGGIE ALLEY.

LINDEN HEIGHTS, P. O. BOX 353, OHIO.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

This is my first letter to COMFORT and I hope I may be rewarded by seeing it published. I want to make a few remarks on the article Mrs. Wilkinson wrote regarding the keeping of Sunday. I agree with her to a certain extent; that is, as far as she went. I do not approve of laboring on Sunday unless it is absolutely necessary. In these days of so many different opinions I really think in the end it rests entirely with one's own conscience whether they are doing right or wrong in the way they keep Sunday.

The point I wish to bring out clearly and distinctly is that in my opinion there is too much religion on just Sunday. Some go to every service on Sunday and while I am not censuring all church goers, I know a great many of them leave their Christianity in the church from one Sunday to the next. During the week they say and do things that are not becoming to Christians; their children are permitted to run on the streets while on Sunday they force them to go to Sunday school and strictly forbid them doing certain things as it is Sunday. These parents know not what their children see and hear on the streets. In order to gain a child's confidence you have to be its friend and display an interest in its welfare. I speak from experience as we have a boy of six who is just as apt to get into mischief as any other normal child. We teach him to tell us everything and so far as we know he has always confessed all wrong doing on his part. Perhaps it will take him a few days to think over his troubles but in the end we know all from him. How many Sunday school teachers teach their scholars to do as we have taught our boy? I'll venture to say not one half do. You can't do exactly right yourself and expect your children to do right if you are religious only on one day—Sunday.

As the world stands today, the working class is ruled by a hand of iron, wielded by the rich employers. They demand certain work done in a certain number of days and no time is given the employees for amusements or recreation. Only on Sunday can they enjoy themselves and as the churches are not very warm in greeting the poorer classes of people they seek other places and amuse themselves as best they can. The churches can find plenty of work to do for Christ but they close their doors six days out of the week and the would-be Christians wonder why men and boys spend their evenings in saloons and poolrooms. Does the church offer inducements for them to spend their time elsewhere? If a room of a church were given over to the public for reading and the other good causes that church would be well patronized and better thought of. As long as the churches remain closed and the money kings grind out the lives of the working class this great problem of how best to observe Sunday will never be solved.

How many sisters agree with me? I shall be very glad to receive their different views on this subject and will answer all I can. MRS. W. C. LAWRENCE.

CARDINGTON, OHIO.

DEAR EDITOR AND COMFORT SISTERS:

I have taken COMFORT a short time and must say I am well pleased with it. I never read the Sisters' Corner without feeling I should like to join the army, and then I feel just a little timid and afraid that I cannot say very much to interest others.

I take several papers but think COMFORT one of the best and often wonder how the editor can get so much good reading in one paper.

I live alone and must have something to read to help pass the time as I get very lonesome.

I think the most interesting subject to write about in our corner would be home. I often ask myself the question, why is it there are so many unhappy homes? Home ought to be the happiest place on earth and would be always if every one in the home would do his or her part to make it what God intended a home should be. If I could take each wife who reads the Sisters' Corner, by the hand and ask "Are you happy in your home?" I wonder if the half could say "yes." How many women that are trying to do right and be true wives feel they are appreciated? There are thousands of women today dragging out miserable lives because they think they are obliged to. It takes a man and woman both to make a home. The husband may furnish a house with furniture; his part in this work is soon done. The wife's is a long and weary work and every whit as important as his. Give men their choice as to which they prefer to do, and every man would select the man's part rather than the woman's and yet they take their parts naturally and in this work they help each other to a home and to a perpetual companionship in the home. All this is right and beautiful, but after he has for years enjoyed the home with her, which with their mutual labor they have produced and kept together it is the height of unfairness and assumption for him to claim that he was the only producer in making the home and that she all the time has been spending his earnings. There are scores of wives, especially farmers' wives that spend but very little of anybody's earnings, not as much as the hired girl. And sometimes men never think about it, until their wives are gone and taking their long rest, and they have to pay a housekeeper or do their own cooking.

I have been married more than once, but I do not know what happiness is. I have been a man's slave and I know what it is. Some of the sisters talk about their good Johns. If you have one show him you appreciate him. I believe a good man likes to know he is appreciated as well as a woman does. I often hear women with good husbands and good homes say if they ever got rid of the husband they have they never would have another, and I know if their husbands could hear them say such a thing they surely would feel hurt; and I think if some women like that should lose a good husband they might wish sometimes they had him back again, especially if they had to earn their own living.

I would like to hear from some of the sisters who live alone and have to earn their own living. We might be able to help each other in telling how to earn money.

With best wishes and long life to old COMFORT,

MRS. BELLE MLLLS.

CAMP, FULTON CO., ARK.

DEAR COMFORT SISTERS:

I wish to write a word to encourage those who I know must have been discouraged a short time ago by the lengthy list of books suggested by a COMFORT sister. There are many, many farmers' wives situated in isolated places where circumstances compel them to toil both outdoors and in the house, with little ones clinging to their skirts and from twelve to sixteen hours a day. Sounds hard, doesn't it? It's still harder in the performance. Yet sisters you can gradually gain an education of the higher sort and true culture. If you can only read a page or a paragraph each day and thoroughly digest it and in your selection of authors there are two points to consider. You want those you can enjoy and those that will contribute to your improvement. For years I plodded through Charles Dickens' works. I would occasionally rest and then return to him again. The "Tale of Two Cities" still is fascinating. I can close my eyes and still hear the tramp, tramp of many feet. But on the whole (hear all ye Dickensites) I prefer Walter Scott. Treason, is it? Well I am glad I am not an imitation student. The first reading of Scott's works was dull. But I didn't have any choice at the time. It was his books or nothing. Now he is my favorite. Is there anyone who doesn't enjoy "Lorna Doone?" I never expect to read all the books mentioned by the sister. For there are articles in current magazines that are well worth the time spent. Besides a woman on a farm must know the details of her home work and now that there is information in regard to all kinds of farm work, from the growing to canning, pickling, preserving and jelly making, dispensed free by the U. S. Department of Agriculture, there is no use in anyone being ignorant. Then the fifteen-cent classics, and plenty of monthly papers and one large weekly for twenty-five cents a year. Verily we live in times that are easy to get an education. The penny Perry pictures supply the artistic side.

Now sisters be clean, but don't overdo it. The mind is just as important as the body. Learn which are the essentials and do them. Don't burden yourselves with non-essentials. Life is fleeting, seize every minute of happiness. Be satisfied with simple pleasures, and teach your children to be the same. The old-fashioned virtues of economy, truthfulness, industry, perseverance and reverence for old age are fast becoming obsolete.

Yours for a better outlook on life,

ISABELLE WATKINS.

MAYFIELD, GA.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

I have been a subscriber to COMFORT for several years but have never written to our corner before.

I enjoy all the letters very much, especially, those that teach us to be satisfied with our lot in life.

It isn't so much what we have as how we feel in our hearts that makes us happy. Let all of us learn to count our blessings and I think there will be many more of us satisfied with our surroundings than there now are.

Will the sister who told how to prepare and use goose oil for cataract on the eye come again with particulars as to its use or write direct to me as I have an uncle who has a cataract on his eye and I wish the information for him. I will appreciate the favor.

Will close with good wishes to all, MRS. J. W. HALL.

CUMBERLAND, R. R. 1, WIS.

DEAR MRS. WILKINSON AND SISTERS:

Here I come to give some help to pay for all the good I have received from dear old COMFORT.

First, I am going to tell how a dear old neighbor told me how she and her husband lived an ideal life. She said, "Let not the sun go down upon thy wrath." They have lived fifty years of unruffled companionship and each has the sympathy and respect of the other. She said, "we have been sorely tried with life and also with each other, but we made up our minds to settle each day's trouble before the day ended. We have our little hour at the end of each day when we balance up the day's books. Then we made it a business to clear up the little ripplings of the day and to retire with the page clear for the day to come. The rule has worked well. It has become a habit with us, until I believe we each look forward with genuine expectation to the end of each day, with its sweetening moments." There, if you will believe it, is a master rule from two of life's masters. The beginning of strife is proverbially small. Little things that in the hour of them are but very little, gather bulk in the stream of existence and with a new day's sun they have grown into something ominous indeed. But these same little things, if they are taken when they are little, before brooding and self-concentration have their effect can be easily smoothed out, and then, when the next day dawns, there is not a single trace of them left. There are many people who begin the day with a period of devotion, which in itself is a most admirable practise, but I was greatly struck with the peaceful moment at the day's end and with its immense possibilities as a regulator and a sweetener of life.

In planning a new kitchen or remodeling an old one, we are learning to consider four important factors, namely, cost, convenience, cleanliness and beauty. Starting with the empty room, we begin to study these factors in connection with the floor, walls and ceiling. In most old houses these are respectively of soft wood and lime plaster, the first two often painted, and the last calcimined. If the floor and walls are in good condition, a fresh coat of paint from time to time will keep them so indefinitely. Calcimine cannot be washed, is not to be recommended for the kitchen, and would better be cleaned off and the ceiling painted with a light tint of the same color used for the walls. What this is to be of course, depends partly on personal preference and partly on exposure. Pale blue or green walls make a cool-looking kitchen of a sunny west or south room, but one that faces east or north will appear warmer and cheerier if deep ivory, buff, light tan or terra-cotta pink be chosen. Choose a varnish paint for the floor, and either a flat or enamel finish for the ceiling and walls. It pays to buy the best, for it wears longer and will not peel or discolor under the vigorous scrubbings for thorough cleanliness of a kitchen.

Never put a teapot away with the lid closed, as dampness gathers and the pot soon has a musty odor.

Air the beds every day. Few people realize the amount of effete matter thrown off through the skin by perspiration.

Cellars should be considered one of the most important features of the home. They should be kept scrupulously clean and well ventilated. Remove a brick from the bottom of the chimney flue so the damp air may escape. Whitewash cellar twice each year.

Now something for our home. The living-room is the center of the home. This means that it should be in every sense the "living-room!" It need not be expensively furnished, but it should be a comfortable place, with roomy chairs, a floor which will not too easily show the marks of dirty feet, plenty of light and air, both by day and by night, and if you are building a new house or remodeling the old one, don't forget the fireplace, for it adds wonderfully to the comfort and cheer of cool evenings and rainy days. There should be books and papers and room a plenty for the housing of the hobbies of individual members of the family. The living-room should be the playroom, workroom and the rest room of the whole family. And the children who grow in this room will remember that room and the father and mother who made it and will not wander far.

I will close with a toast of laughter to all.

"Here's to laughter, the sunshine of the soul, the happiness of the heart, the heaven of youth, the privilege of purity, the echo of innocence, the treasure of the humble, the wealth of the poor, the bread of the cup of pleasure; it dispels dejection, banishes blues and mangles melancholy; for it's the foe of woe, the destroyer of depression, the enemy of grief, it is what kings envy in peasants, plutocrats envy in the poor, the guilty envy in the innocent; it's the sheen on the silver of smiles, the ripple of the water's delight; the glint of the gold of gladness; without it humor would be dumb, wit would wither, dimples would shrivel, for it's a glow of a clean conscience, the voice of a pure soul, the birth cry of mirth, the swan-song of sadness."

With love to dear Mrs. Wilkinson and sisters,

MRS. R. R. GOLDEN.

Best Ways of Doing Things Around the Home

If soup is too salt, add grated raw potato to it and cook a few minutes.

Keep honey in a dark place and it will not granulate so quickly.

When ironing, stand on a soft, thick rug and the feet will not become so tired.

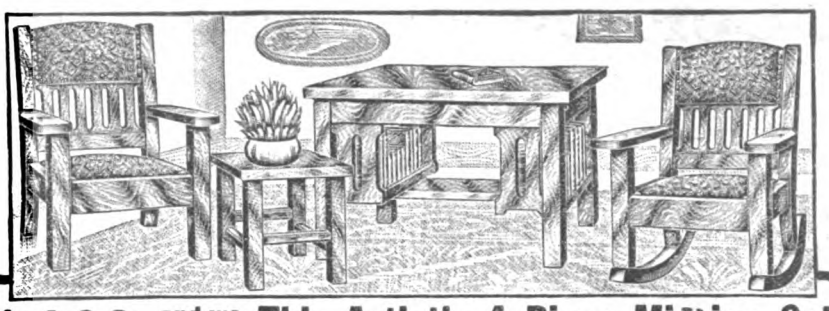
To remove fruit stains from the fingers, dip them in strong tea and wash in warm water, using no soap.

To prevent cheese getting dry or mouldy, wrap it in a cloth dampened with vinegar and keep in a covered dish.

Keep your doors and windows closed while filling preserving jars, thus avoiding drafts and breakages will be rare.

Mix corn-starch with salt, to prevent lumping; allowing one sixth part of corn-starch.

To remove white spots from furniture. Dip a cloth in hot water, almost to boiling point. Place over spot, remove quickly and rub with dry cloth. It may be necessary to repeat.



Try dusting rattan furniture with a small brush.

Remedies

HICCOUGHS.—No matter how persistent they can usually be stopped by taking a few drops of vinegar on sugar.

CANKER.—Canker may be cured by rinsing the mouth with a mixture of salt and vinegar.

BURNS.—Apply equal parts of white of egg and olive oil, mixed together, and cover with soft cloth.

Weight and Health

"Every man and woman almost seems to think that if they lose weight their health is falling off and if they gain it that they are improving," said a doctor looking gentleman, "when the fact is that weight hasn't much to do with the health as long as it is not too little or too much—the very thin person and the very fat one, not being in proper condition, as a rule. Among young people those who are slightly over the average in weight are in the best health, and among the older people those a little underweight are apt to be the healthiest. From 20 to 30 an excess of from 40 to 60 pounds will mean no harm, but after 30 the weight should decrease and between 35 and 45, 35 or 40 pounds excess doubles the chance of not living. The tall persons have a better chance with overweight than the short, thick ones, and at the age of 40 only the strictly temperate and in light occupations and having a chest measurement greater than around the abdomen are safe in carrying any extra weight. Fat women have a better chance than fat men, because as a rule their work is not so heavy and they are less inclined to go at things in such a hurry. The fat ones should keep their weight down and the thin ones should increase theirs, and I want to say to you that it is harder to diet yourselves and keep your weight down, than it is to eat nourishing food and increase it."

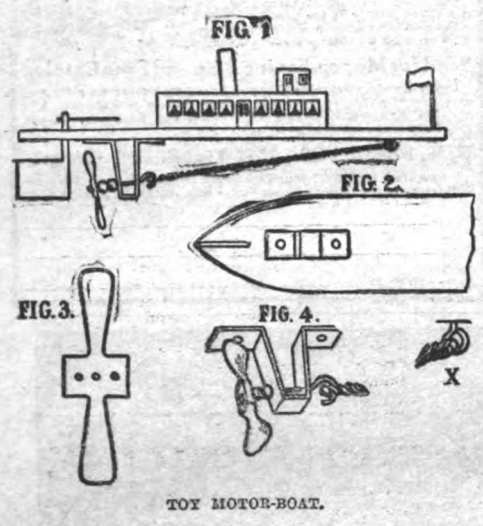
A Corner for Boys



By Uncle John

THE cool breezes of October seem to ask the question, "How are you prepared for the winter?" If we look around and study the habits of insects, birds and animals, we will learn that each creature has prepared for the barren days to come. The squirrel and beaver have their stores of food laid away, most of the birds have migrated to warmer climes, the frogs have burrowed deep in the mud and the woodchuck, bear and some other animals have denned up to sleep till spring. All things that fly or crawl or walk obey the instinct of self preservation. While the dumb creatures are governed by instinct, we are endowed with brains and will power. These are the weapons with which man has conquered the world. Without them he would have fallen an easy victim to the wild monsters of the jungle centuries ago. Today man has reached a high point of development, but there is infinite room for improvement. You must do your share. You must do it with the power of your brains, knowledge, and the power of your soul, determination and courage. Do not scorn working with your hands. Remember that the mind directs the muscles and that while you are training one the other benefits. I believe it is as natural for a boy to want to make things as it is for a girl to play with dolls. With this idea dominating, I offer this month some plans that you can utilize. Only a few common tools are needed but these must be in good condition. If you cannot do it yourself, get some man to put a good edge on all your cutting tools. I will be pleased to receive letters offering suggestions for the improvement of this department.

A Boat That Travels

The picture shows a toy boat fitted with a propeller and rubber band motor that will drive it from fifteen to fifty feet. By following directions given here, you can make a model like it in a short time. The main part of the boat is a flat board whittled to a point as in Fig. 2. A piece of soft pine one half inch thick, nine inches wide and eighteen inches long will be just right. The cabin in the center of Fig. 1 may be a real enclosure or simply a one inch piece fastened with nails driven up through the flat piece into its edge. The smoke stack could be made of a flat piece of wood and the doors and windows painted on.

The propeller is made of a piece of tin three inches by one inch. Its shape is shown by Fig. 3. The holes along the center are punched with a nail. Each blade of the propeller is given a twist in opposite directions so that in revolving it will have a screw motion or thrust. A piece of heavier sheet metal or doubled tin is bent to form the hanger that supports the propeller shaft, as in Fig. 4. The hanger is tacked to the bottom of the boat, exactly on the center line with its center four inches from the rear. A piece of bent wire forms the shaft. One end of the wire is fastened immovably to the tin propeller, the other is a hook over which the rubber band goes. Between the hanger and screw wheel, two glass beads are used for bearings. They make it run a lot easier. The fore end of the rubber band is held by a screw eye in the bottom of the boat. To run the boat, twist the propeller until the rubber is tight, then place boat in water in running position and suddenly release wheel. It will skim along for a good distance.

TOY MOTOR-BOAT.

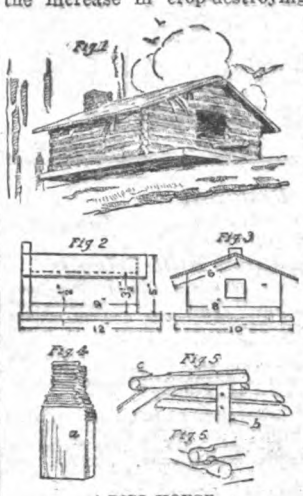
About Alligators

Although the traffic in alligator skins has practically died out in this country, by virtue of the fact that alligators no longer exist in sufficient numbers to induce any one to make a business of hunting them, in Colombia, it is a large industry and capable of almost incalculable expansion. At present the skins come from three hundred miles of lagoons along the Magdalena river, while this one country alone contains over four thousand miles of "alligator bearing" streams. Early extinction of the species is not very probable either, as each female lays one hundred eggs annually. Of the many varieties abounding in the shallow waters, only two have skins of commercial value. If they measure from seven to ten feet in length the hunter receives one dollar and fifty cents each. The hides must be green salted for drying stiff in the sun spoils them. The hunters ride on the end of long, narrow canoes, using spears to catch their prey. One man paddles the boat, the other stands with uplifted harpoon, and woe to the alligator who shows a snout within thirty feet of him. Sometimes the agile hunter will shoot his spear at a streak of bubbles made by a submerged reptile and generally his aim is true. After being speared the alligator is towed to the bank and stunned by a blow with a large hammer.

During the high water season millions of alligators come up to prey on ascending fish, and when the water recedes and rivers shrink to their natural boundaries they are left stuck in the mud. It is then the hunters make big catches, but large numbers of the best skins go to waste because they become stiff before they can be properly treated. Alligator eggs are relished by the natives but the flesh, which is white and seemingly palatable, has no food value. The grease of the alligator produces a light, yellow oil which the natives use as a cure of lung diseases. In the main rivers the 'gators are not hunted because they can easily get away in deep water.



An Unusual Lake

Situated between Bolivia and Peru is Lake Titticaca, the highest navigable body of water in the world. Imagine an expanse of water one hundred and fifty-five miles long and forty-four miles wide at an elevation 12,500 feet above the sea level. Only one large passenger boat plys on it and that was brought from Europe in sections and put together on the sandy shores. The sections must have been quite small too, because each one had to be carried up a mountain trail. Since that time a primitive railroad has been built. The general shape of the lake is oval but the bank is irregular with bays and coves. Near the center are eight large and fifteen small islands. The water is icy cold and no metal, even iron or steel will rust in it. On the shores are prehistoric ruins of large buildings. They ere made of large irregular shaped blocks of the hardest granite put together in marvelously accurate fashion without mortar or cement. Archeologists have excavated and turned up thousands of bones which the traveler may see lying about. One of the most famous ruins is the entrance to the Sun temple where the ancient races worshiped. One stone which forms a kind of landing is thirty-two feet long and half as wide. It is reasonable to suppose that a race of people that could accurately handle such large blocks knew something of engineering science although they existed thousands of years before the age of steam and electricity.

The outlet of Lake Titicaca is the Desaguardero river which flows into Lake Poopo which lies entirely in Bolivia. This latter lake is 12,000 feet above the sea level, has no visible outlet and is the same in area as the state of Rhode Island.

A Bird Log House

It is needless to say that every wise boy is interested in conserving the birds of our land. It has been proven by study and investigation that the increase in crop-destroying pests is proportionate to the slaughter of our feathered friends. The appetite of a bird is enormous. Their ability to digest big meals rapidly is marvelous, when compared with human digestion. I have seen young sparrows and robins eating army worms for an hour at a time. There is no telling how many each would eat in that time but I fancy it was close to one hundred. Think what would happen to you if you ate a hundred links of sausage. I did not know until a few years ago that wild birds were frozen to death and starved in the woods but I found many dead and dying quail in a winter hike one bad season.

A BIRD HOUSE.

If you want to do a little toward protecting the birds, you might make this winter home and set it up in a place likely to attract them. Figs. 2 and 3 are intended to give all dimensions. The baseboard is ten by twelve inches and one inch thick. You may build your house out of twigs, joined at the corners as shown in Fig. 6, and trussed for a roof as in Fig. 5 or you could build an enclosure out of shingles or thin boards and then lay branches on the outside for appearance's sake. They could be tacked on with one-inch brads. Fig. 4 is a solid block which represents the chimney. It fits into a hole in the roof and all that shows above same is covered with the twigs. In Fig. 5, "C" is the ridge-pole at the highest part of the roof and "B" is the piece which supports it. The last course of the roof construction may be shingles, tar paper or tin. Put a chunk of tallow inside and occasionaly other food and you will soon have a tenant for your log house.

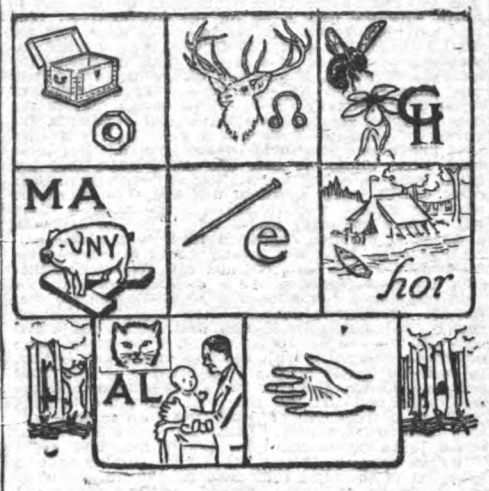
Word Freaks

I know of only two words that contain the vowels in their natural or alphabetical order. They are "abstemious" and "facetious." Did you ever notice that "charcoal" is in reality "charred wood" and that the heavy end of a match is the "light" end? It might be proper to say that army was defeated with great "slaughter," but think how foolish it would sound if you left out the first letter. A sentence has its pause at the end of its clause but a lion has its claws at the end of its paws. Although the word "stone" has five letters, if you take away the first and second only "one" remains. The same might be said of "alone," "atone" and "shone." In a big dictionary that I have before me, the definition of the simple word "fire," occupies more than a page. It has forty different meanings. Speaking about long words, "beleaguer," has a "league" or three miles between the first and last syllables. A boy being asked how he would punctuate the sentence, "A big lemon pie was on the table," replied, "I would make a dash after the pie." You would compliment a man if you told him he had a "level" head, but if you said he had a "flat" head trouble might result. A contractor who was told to raise a building two stories "razed" it instead. As a closing I will say that it always puzzled me to hear a school closing entertainment referred to as "commencement exercises."

For Hallowe'en

Here is a new idea in jack o' lantern making. A barrel is used instead of a pumpkin and a half dozen candles or more in place of only one.

A light barrel like those used for sugar, salt or flour is the kind to get. Draw upon it the diagram of the face and keep improving it until you feel that you cannot make it any better. You then saw out the eyes, nose, and mouth, keeping your saw cut on the center of the line. Use a narrow-bladed saw and start it by boring holes so the point can enter. Trim the edges of the cut with a knife. If an old discarded barrel without head or bottom is used, the stretcher shown in Fig. 2 will serve both as a bottom and a carrying device. Fig. 5 shows how three nails are driven from the underside of the bottom to hold each candle. The candle "c." drops down between them. The cover is represented by Fig. 3. It should have holes bored to let the heat out. In Fig. 4 one way to arrange the candles is shown. A lamp or lantern would do instead of candles. Red tissue paper or thin cloth is pasted over the openings on the inside. It would be well to have the outside of the barrel painted black.



BARREL JACK O' LANTERN.

Game

When you are seated around the table in the evening after lunch you might try this game. Give each player a pad and pencil and choose for a subject a general class of articles like "Things to eat." An initial letter is then agreed upon, the signal is given, and the players begin to write each a list of "Things to eat," beginning with the chosen letter. The first one who has written ten shouts "Done," and the others must not make another stroke. The list is then read and if properly made, the player who made it gets one point for each word and ten extra for winning. The other players get a point for each proper name of something to eat and are penalized three points for each improper word. One hundred points win the game, the score being marked after each inning. Here is a specimen list, supposing "h" to be the letter chosen. "Halibut, hash, huckleberries, hominy, hogs, hens, ham, hardtack, hazelnuts and herring." You will find it far more difficult to prepare such a list than it at first seems. You can take for your subjects, trees, flowers, birds, animals, cities, girls' or boys' names or things wearable, usable, cookable, or dangerous. The initial letter is changed for each inning and the players take turns in choosing it.

Puzzle

Each of the eight squares represents the name of a tree. Can you make them out? The answers are printed below.

Answers

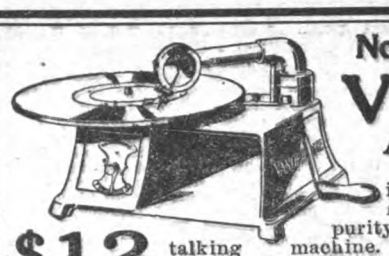
Chestnut, buckeye, beech, mahogany, pine, camphor, catalpa, palm.

Riddle

I know of three peculiar things. The first is made longer by cutting it at both ends, the second gets bigger as you contract it and the third, if put in a barrel will make it lighter. Can you guess what they are?

Answer

The first is a "ditch," the second, "debt," the third, "holes."



Problem

A boy of eleven is one third the age of his father. In how many years will he be one half as old?

Answer. In eleven years.

After you have read this page you should lay it aside for future use. I suggest that you get a scrap-book in which to paste the Boys' Corner each issue. It will be good to refer to when you are at a loss to know what to do or what to make. It will always have something seasonable and of genuine help to the boys. Look for next month's number. It will be bigger and brighter than ever. Until then, permit me to remain,

Your friend, UNCLE JOHN.

Premium No. 443

EVERY person who owns, handles or manages horses and all livestock keepers and breeders should have a copy of this great book because it tells about all the known methods of treating diseases of horses and other domestic animals—methods that are based upon the results of actual practice and not mere theory. It also contains Prof. Gleason's famous system of horse breaking, taming and training therefore, it is in reality two books in one and positively the most authoritative work of the kind ever published. There are in all 580 pages, many of them illustrated and dealing with the cause and cure of practically every disease known to horses, cattle, sheep, poultry, swine and dogs with the right remedies for each disease. Among the many subjects covered in Part 1 of this book are causes of diseases, how to observe diseases, treatment of diseases, Cerebro, Spinal Meningitis, distemper, dysentery, eye diseases, fistula, glands, internal diseases, kidney diseases, poisons, stomach and bowel diseases, worms and literally hundreds of other horse and live-stock ailments, which for lack of space we cannot enumerate here. In Part 2 of this book Prof. Gleason gives to the world for the first time his method of breaking and training horses and there are are also special chapters on how to buy, how to detect unsoundness, feeding, breeding, horse-shoeing, general care of horses, etc. Gleason's Horse Book is actually worth its weight in gold to every horse owner or breeder in the land, yet by special arrangement with the publishers we are enabled to give it away without cost to all who will accept the following

FREE OFFER. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one 2-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you Gleason's Complete Veterinary Hand Book and System of Horse Taming exactly as above described free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 443.

VETERINARY INFORMATION

Subscribers are invited to write to this department asking for any information desired relative to the treatment of animal troubles. Questions will be answered in these columns free by an eminent veterinarian. Describe the trouble fully, sign full name and give your address; direct all correspondence to the Veterinary Department, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine. Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any question privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing as above.

No atttention will be given any inquiry which lacks, the sender's full name and address, but we will print only initials if so requested.

TETANUS.—I had a four-year-old horse that became so stiff he could hardly get in and out of the stable. He would tremble all over when it was hot. He was this way about four days before he died, and two hours before he died he would try to run. W. M. A.

A.—The horse in all probability died of tetanus (lockjaw) due to infection of a wound. A characteristic symptom is that the haw (mambrana nictitans) of the inner corner of each eye protrudes over the eyeball when the head is raised. Treatment would not be likely to succeed in a severe case.

EPILEPSY.—My cow has a calf three months old. When the calf was three weeks old the cow lowed and dropped suddenly. She raised her head, turning it to her side. The nerves round her eyes jerk and a thin slobber runs from her mouth as she begins to recover from the attack and she looks around as though everything was strange to her. She is in good condition and gives three gallons of milk a day. H. Y.

A.—The cow apparently has epileptic fits and there is no cure. Better fatten her for slaughter, as the meat will be fit for use.

CATARRH.—I have a horse thirteen years old. He was sick and is still weak. He sweats freely. Bloody water comes from his nose. E. E. B.

A.—Bloody water may come from the nose in either glanders or purpura hemorrhagica. Glanders is incurable and requires destruction of the horse, in accordance with state law. The other disease is associated with great swellings of the abdomen, legs and head. It can only be treated successfully, in some cases, by a graduate veterinarian. You should employ one at once to make an examination. Home treatment will not suffice.

FISTULA.—I have a yearling colt, that has a sore, or a hole on the burr of his ear. Hair grows from the inside of the hole. A white fluid runs from the hole. It does not appear to be sore. Will it cause the ear to flop? H. L. H.

A.—A fistulous tract connects with a secreting cyst which should be dissected out by a skilled surgeon; but unfortunately this does not always succeed and the fistula is liable to recur. Ordinarily it does not cause the ear to lop.

WORMS.—In one number of COMFORT I read that kamala was good for worms in dogs. I went to our town druggist to secure it, but he did not know what it was. Could you give me another name for the medicine or tell me what to do for a dog that has worms? A. R.

A.—Kamala is the correct name of the drug and your druggist could easily obtain it by writing to his wholesale druggist. Freshly powdered areca nut does fairly well, in place of kamala, and is given in the same way; or your druggist may have a proprietary worm medicine for dogs that will do the work.

OBSTRUCTED TEAT.—I have a cow that has a pipe in her teats, and I can't milk her without stripping that teat. It does not seem to hurt her. A. F.

A.—The best course in such a condition is to dry off the milk secretion in that teat. Treatment will be likely to do more harm than good. Rub in a mixture of equal parts of fluid extract of belladonna leaves and camphorated oil twice daily while drying her off.

STIFFNESS.—I have a cow about eight years old that has had a stiff neck about ten months. It does not interfere with her feeding. It appears to be sore in the morning until she gets her head down. L. B. W.

A.—This may have been due to an injury, or to rheumatism; but in many instances tuberculosis of the bones of the neck is the cause and for that reason it would be well for you to have the cow tested with tuberculin as soon as the weather becomes cool. Tuberculosis is incurable. If tuberculosis is not present a dram of iodide of potash given night and morning in water might do some good, but it makes the cow thin, shrinks the milk flow and may induce abortion. It is given until slobbering, emaciation and scurfy skin is seen, constituting "iodism". At the first sign of these symptoms, or one of them, the medicine should be stopped.

WORMS.—Can you give me some good remedy for curing worms in dogs? A. A. E.

A.—Starve the dog for twenty-four hours and then give half to one dram of freshly powdered kamala according to size of dog, in a little cream or soup. Repeat the dose in two weeks. If you cannot obtain kamala at your drug-store use freshly powdered areca nut in the same doses, and add five to ten drops of turpentine at time of administration; then give a full dose of Castor oil an hour afterward.

GARGET.—One night my cow came home from the pasture, and when I milked her nothing but bloody milk came from one of her teats. When I milked her the next morning clotted blood came and her udder was swollen very hard and has been so for ten days. I could not see any bruise or scratch anywhere. The other teats appear to be all right. What do you think can be the cause and what do you advise me to do? W. K.

A.—The quarter is ruined for milk production, at this stage of the attack of garget (mammitis) which may have been due to a bruise or other injury, or to infective matter entering the teat. Milk that quarter three times a day and twice daily rub in a mixture of one part of mercurial ointment and two parts of soft soap or lard. It would be best to isolate the cow and milk her last, as such udder troubles sometimes are contagious.

DIFFICULT MILKING.—I have a cow five years old. She has her second calf. The cow holds up her milk and I am obliged to take the calf to her the second time before she will give down her milk. MRS. B. V.

A.—Place the calf in front of the cow at milking time and also let her eat some relished feed at that time. Gently massage the udder for a few minutes before starting to milk. If the teats are sore apply Castor oil after milking.

DEPRAVED APPETITE—CHEMICAL DEHORNER.—I would like to know what cows need when they chew old sticks and boards whenever they can get them. They seem to chew them worse when eating German clover. They have salt to lick. (2) I would like to know what to use to prevent a calf's horns from growing. P. H. B.

A.—The cows lack some needed ingredient of feed. Often it is lime that they want, or phosphates. Feed wheat bran freely and allow access to slaked lime and salt, or mix two teaspoonfuls of precipitated phosphate of lime or a tablespoonful of bone meal in the feed night and morning until the habit subsides. (2) When a calf is three days old, or under a week old dampen the skin over the horn button and then rub in caustic potash until a crust is formed, or the skin is well cauterized. This will prevent horns from growing. It is useless to give the treatment when the horns are through the skin.

CANCER—GARGET.—I have a fine horse that has a cancer wart on his eye. It was cut out once and came back. He can't see out of that eye. It runs and looks badly. (2) I have a fine cow that has something the matter with her left front teat. It is hard to milk. Last year it was hard, but this year it is worse and the last part is bloody. She hurt her udder one time. MRS. J. F. W.

A.—Have the eye removed by a surgeon and then dust on a mixture of equal quantities of iodoform, tannic acid, acetanilid and boric acid twice daily. (2) Dry off the milk secretion in the affected teats and fatten the cow for slaughter, if you think that will pay. She will never prove profitable for dairying. Rub in camphorated oil twice daily while drying her off.

WEAK STIFLE.—When I let my cow out in the morning she drags her leg. She bends her knee a few times and then her leg will be stiff and she will drag it along. At night, when she comes home, she is all right. E. H. L.

A.—The muscles and ligaments of the stifle joint at the flank are weak and let the patella (knee cap) slip out of place. When the cap is out the leg will be held backward. Rub the stifle once daily with a liniment composed of one ounce each of turpentine and aqua ammonia and eight ounces of cotton seed oil or raw linseed oil. Stop for a time when the skin becomes blistered.

LAMENESS.—I have a six-year-old mare. About six months ago she was kicked on the inside of her gamble joint. It is swollen and at first it was very hard. J. P. P.

A.—If the lameness persists it would be best to have the veterinarian fire and blister the hock joint and then give the mare six weeks' rest in a stall. Do not have this done in very hot weather or when flies are troublesome. Meanwhile rub in some iodine ointment every other day.

PUFF.—My six-year-old horse has had a soft lump on the first joint above the hoof on his front foot for two months. He is a heavy horse and good puller. When he walks it seems to move a little. (2) I would like a remedy for ringbone above the hoof on front feet. M. W. E.

A.—Clip off the hair and rub in a little oleate of mercury every other day. If that does not prove effective swab with tincture of iodine daily until the skin becomes blistered then stop for a few days but repeat again, if found necessary. (2) Lameness from ringbone of a fore pastern is practically incurable and unnerving is usually resorted to by the qualified veterinarian. When a ringbone is seen to be coming and before lameness is present keep cold wet swabs upon the part, rest the horse and if necessary also apply tincture of iodine every other day. This may stop the formation of the bony growth.

BRITTLE HOOFS.—I have a horse six years old and cannot keep shoes on his feet. The nails pull through the hoof. E. U. T.

A.—Mix together two parts of oil of tar and one part of oil of balsam of fir and apply at the juncture of the hoof and hair every other night and in six weeks, or so, the hoof should hold a shoe. Afterward apply twice a week.

BOTS.—Please tell me a remedy for bot worms in horses and mules. M. C. N.

A.—All pastured horses are infested with bots and they do little if any harm. No medicine strong enough to kill bots in the stomach can be given without killing the horse, but bisulphid of carbon, administered in a capsule, may drive the bots out. Ask the Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C. to send you a circular as to this treatment. Singe the bot eggs of the hairs on a pastured horse's legs and breast; or apply a five per cent solution of coal tar dip, or carbolic acid.

LAMENESS.—I bought a mare last March five years old. She was stiff in front, but has come out of that all right, but drags the left hind foot along the ground. She was kicked by a horse. I don't know whether the hip or ankle or hock. The inside of the hock swells up. I have been a subscriber fifteen years. A. M.

A.—There is little chance that improvement will take place while the mare is worked. It would be best to turn her out on good grass pasture. Once daily rub the muscles from stifle to hip with a liniment composed of half an ounce each of turpentine and aqua ammonia, four ounces of druggist's soap liniment and water to make one pint.

BLACK TONGUE.—In looking over your page in COMFORT, I notice the question of black tongue. Now as I have lost a number of good dogs in that way I know what it means to the owner of those four dogs. I have used boric acid and find it good, but what I use now and find it better is blue vitriol. I have cured one dog three times and another once. Put enough blue vitriol in water to make it light blue, wind a soft cloth on a stick and wash the dog's mouth carefully. If you find any yellow sores wash them and be sure to get all the yellow out; it may bleed but that is all right. I watch my dogs and if I see any symptoms I wash out their mouths once and they are all right. If their mouths are in a bad condition I wash three and four times daily. Pour fresh, warm milk with a beaten egg down their throat. Cut good raw meat in small pieces and put as far down their throat as possible so they can swallow. I gave a dost of salts one time, I don't know whether it helped or not but think it did no harm. I hope this may help others as it did me. MRS. C. V.

A.—We are very glad to get this helpful letter from our correspondent as we of the North do not have this dread "black tongue" disease of dogs to treat and so cannot experiment with drugs until a suitable one is found. Sulphate of copper (blue stone) is the best possible drug for killing molds, fungi and vegetable growths. It also is a splendid caustic. A solution of it is effective as a wash for the inside of water troughs and tanks that become green with algæ and it also will clear a pond or lake of such growths. We use it for a great many purposes and can quite believe that it is better than boric acid for the diseased mouths. Tincture of iodine also is effective for swabbing the sores and ulcers. We hope our readers in the South will give the blue stone solution a trial if they have a dog attacked with black tongue.

botany or travel, Mrs. Edward More dress and fashion, Edward law and politics, or the vicar war and rumors of war, Capt. Morton was equal to all. He had seen the new plant in the Jardin Botanique in Paris, and could describe it to Lord Mersey accurately; he had also seen, in the same city, the new costumes worn at the last Elysee ball, and had much to say about them for Mrs. Edward More's and the other ladies' delecation; he had brought the latest news about the probable change of ministry from town, and he was ready to enter into a discussion of the theater of war in Spain or the Cape Coast.

And yet he did not intrude into the conversation, but, with exquisite art, actually led it, while appearing to be led by it; all the while seeming to open his mind and lips with a frank confidence, while in reality he was gauging every mind about him.

When the ladies moved to the drawing-room, the captain got a tone more genial, and was all war, politics and sports. He had hunted game, small and great, all over the world, and had anecdotes to tell and experiences to relate, besides which the records of glorious runs after the immortal fox seemed tame and spiritless.

And yet it was no vain boasting; the vicar and Lord Mersey would have caught him if he had sinned against veracity. He had really shot tigers in Bengal, raced the kangaroo in Australia and snared the subtle beaver in North America.

"Capt. Morton appears to have been everywhere," said the vicar, as Edward More rose as a signal to join the ladies.

"I think I might almost plead guilty," said Capt. Morton, quietly. "I am cosmopolitan. A free lance, and I am almost one, stands a chance of going anywhere and everywhere, and picking up a little of something wherever he goes."

Tea was on the table, and Aunt Martha was deep in the mystery as the gentlemen entered. Capt. Morton made his way to her side, and took the greatest interest in her proceedings, mentioning casually that he had seen the Russians make tea—they are the greatest tea drinkers in the world—and explaining that they introduced a pinch of lemon.

Aunt Martha, delighted to get a new idea on her favorite topic, rang for a lemon instantly, and Capt. Morton cut it with his own hands—they were long and shapely and very white, though the right hand had a long scar across it—and squeezed the proper quantity of juice into the tea.

Then he moved away and joined a small group in the conservatory. They were gathered, not round a flower, but round little Bertie, who had been caught in the act of stealing in to get another glimpse of the beautiful ladies and grand gentlemen before going to bed.

The captain was very fond of children—so he declared—and stooped down to put his hand upon Bertie's silken head and ask him his name. He did it in his softest and most insinuating voice, but Bertie, after looking at him for a moment with childish steadfastness, moved slightly away and refused to answer, which greatly shocked Mrs. More, who explained that he was a most peculiar child, and terribly fanciful and willful—"And, I am ashamed to say, Miss Weston encourages him!"

Then the captain turned to Edna, and they two walked down the conservatory together.

If Capt. Morton was not a lady-killer it was not his fault. Few women could resist the intoxicating homage which was indicated by the soft voice and lowered, impassioned gaze of the dark eyes; of that manner which had been matured in foreign courts, where manners had been considered before anything; respect, admiration, devotion commingled, the captain could infuse with look and tone, and many a woman of the world had mistaken them for honest and passionate love.

Capt. Morton's manner to Edna, the heiress and hostess, was perfection; full of respect and profound attention. When she spoke he listened as if her words were those of an oracle, and when it came to him to speak he did so with the deference that might mark the tone of a subject addressing a sovereign.

Edna came back from that short walk more than ever charmed with Capt. Morton, and she would not have been a woman if she had felt otherwise.

The cards were on the table when they re-entered the drawing-room, and the captain was quite ready to take a hand, but stood aside for the vicar, with the greatest amiability, taking a seat next Aunt Martha, and charming the soul out of the gentle old lady, telling her all about the fans in Spain and Japan, and looking over the one he held at the people in the room with his dark eyes that noticed every little look, and sharp ears that let not a single word slip by them.

Lord Mersey and Edna were standing talking together near the conservatory; Lord Mersey was telling her how much the duchess wished that Edna would come up to town, and adding a few words on his own account, and Edna stood with a hesitating look. Anyone would have guessed that they had been talking of some matter more important and nearer their hearts than this, and the captain, turning his eyes toward Grace Bromley, as she sat at a table looking at some book, fancied that she for one thought so. His eyes rested on her handsome face and downcast eyes for a moment, then he said he would go and fetch a leaf he had admired in the conservatory to show Mrs. Weston, and he made his way across the room and glanced over Grace Bromley's shoulder. What made him smile, as he came back, leaf in hand, with a self-satisfied smile? Was it because he had seen that the book Grace seemed so deeply engrossed in was upside down? Presently Aunt Martha asked if Miss Bromley would sing for them, and as Grace moved to the piano, the captain opened it for her, and was ready with her music.

He stood by while she sang, his eyes on everybody, and more especially on Lord Mersey, who soon left Edna, with that reluctant way peculiar

We will go to Europe—we will travel the old world over, stopping here and there, as our fancy prompts, and when we are weary of roving, you shall choose the spot on which to make a permanent home. Darling, shall we go together and be happy, or—will you send me away alone, too wretched to care to live?"

She lifted her lovely face to him.

"Oh, Ralph! I cannot tell you to go away," she said.

"And you love me! you will be my wife?"

"Yes, I know I care more for you than for anyone else in the world."

CHAPTER IV.

TWO ENRAGED WOMEN.

Half-an-hour after Ruth had pledged herself to Ralph Plympton, and while the lovers were absorbed in the happiness resulting from their new relations, a messenger came from the house to tell her that she was wanted; that Mrs. Plympton had returned and required her services.

"My mother returned!" exclaimed Ralph, springing to his feet in surprise. "Why! she was not expected until tomorrow!"

Ruth, with rapidly-beating pulses, gathered up her work and went swiftly toward the mansion, but with a strange feeling of depression settling upon her heart.

She found Mrs. Plympton in her private sitting-room where the woman greeted her, in a matter-of-fact way, as if she had not been away at all, then set about some work which she professed to be in a great hurry to have completed.

In this way Ruth was kept busy all the evening, and had no opportunity to see Ralph before retiring, as he was detained by his mother in the drawing-room until a late hour.

She was a little disappointed that Ralph did not try to see her before retiring, if only to bid her a hasty good night; she was even more dismayed and astonished upon learning, the next morning, that he had left home—his father having dispatched him upon some important business which he had not time to attend to himself.

She was scarcely seated at her work, when Mrs. Plympton swept into the sewing-room with haughty mien, her stern face denoting some relentless purpose, her fine eyes blazing with wrath.

"Ruth Reynolds!" she began, in a tone that pierced the girl's heart like a knife, "so you have dared to promise to marry my son!"

As this unexpected thunderbolt fell out of her apparent cloudless sky, the girl's hands dropped nervelessly upon her lap. Before she could recover herself sufficiently to speak, the enraged woman went on, with increasing passion:

"You little, insignificant, country rustic! you—beggar! with nothing in the world to recommend you but your baby face, do you think I would tolerate you as my son's wife? Oh, I never would have believed that he could make such a fool of himself if I had not heard him with my own ears! I was warned of what was going on here, and so returned just in season to catch you at your shameless scheming. Here I have you under my roof—given you a home for two years, only to have you turn and sting me like this! Put down your work! go, pack your trunk, and—begone from my sight!"

"Yes, I will go," Ruth remarked, as calmly as if she had been asked to do the woman a favor; "but, Mrs. Plympton, don't you think it would have been more just if you had required your son to explain how I came to promise to marry him?"

"Silence, girl!" commanded the haughty woman, but flushing to her brow as she was made to realize how she had lowered herself by her unladylike demeanor. "Do not presume to argue this question with me, but leave my house with all possible dispatch. And—let me warn you," she continued, in a menacing tone, "if you dare force yourself upon my son again, I—I will crush you!"

The angry mother did not wait to observe the effect of her threat, but, turning abruptly, swept with a stately bearing from the room, while the gentle girl, who had so faithfully served her for two long years, went to her own to prepare to go out again into the world a homeless wanderer.

* * * * * * * * * *

Two days later, on a bright, perfect afternoon, a handsome carriage drew up before a quiet but eminently respectable hotel in New York City.

Two people alighted from it; the elder an aristocratic-appearing young man, clad in the height of fashion, every garment being of the richest material and latest cut.

His companion was a young girl of slight, graceful proportions, quietly but tastefully dressed in a traveling suit of brown broadcloth, a pretty hat of the same color surmounting her golden head, and gloves to match upon her slim, ladylike hands.

The eyes of the gentleman gleamed with deepest tenderness as he assisted her to the ground.

"My darling!" he whispered, in a low, intense tone whereupon his companion flashed a luminous smile up at him.

Just at that instant another carriage rolled by the hotel. A dark, brilliant woman, very richly, almost gaudily, dressed sat within it.

As she caught sight of the young couple a low, startled cry escaped her, and she leaned from the window for a second look at them, when an ugly frown swept over her face—a hiss of wrath escaped her intensely scarlet lips.

"Traitor!" she breathed; then the carriage rolled on and mingled with other vehicles in the avenue.

The young man conducted his fair companion to a reception-room, then left her to go to the office to register.

"Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Hartmann," we read as we glance over his shoulder, to watch, with pardonable curiosity, the hand that traces the name.

But the face and form are those of Ralph Plympton, and it is evident that, although he desires, for the present, to conceal his identity, he has managed, by some means, to balk the plot of his proud parents to separate him from the girl he loved and take the reins of fate into his own hands.

After registering he sought his bride, and then followed the obsequious attendant to their room, where, the door once closed and locked, he turns and catches that slight, brown-clad figure to his breast.

"Little wife!" he cried, in an eager, impassioned tone, "mine! all mine, so long as we both shall live!"

"Are you sure you will never regret what you have done today, Ralph?"

"'Regret,' love! There is no such word for me where you are concerned. I am the happiest man alive; and tomorrow we shall be on the briny deep, sailing toward another world, where we will live an ideal life, and no one can interfere with us. Are you not happy, sweetheart?" he concluded, smiling fondly down upon her.

A tiny hand crept up about his neck, a pair of red lips met his in a soft caress, and, though no words issued from the lips of the youthful bride, the ardent husband was evidently satisfied with her answer.

Later, after they had lunched and returned to their room, where they were chatting about their prospective voyage, Ralph abruptly inquired:

"Are you sure, Ruthie, that you have everything you wish or need for your trip? Remember, there are no shops on shipboard, so you had better set your brain at work to see if there are

Mrs. Nancy Salmons, Elamsville, Va., eighty-eight years of age. Oct. 18. Would appreciate a postal card shower on that day. Monroe Gibson, Imboden, Ark. Invalid, sixteen years of age. Needs a brace, but has not the means to buy one. Who will help?

We have had a ten billion dollar harvest. Won't some of you who have reaped that golden harvest from the Almighty's bounty, show your appreciation by sending a few greenbacks to these poor, sick and hungry brothers and sisters of yours.

Lovingly yours,

Uncle Charlie

Comfort's League of Cousins

The League of Cousins was founded as a means of bringing the scattered members of COMFORT'S immense circle of readers into one big, happy family. Its aim is to promote a feeling of kinship and relationship among all readers. It was primarily started as a society for the juvenile members of COMFORT'S family, only, but those of more mature years clamored for admittance so persistently that it was deemed advisable to impose no age limit; thus all are eligible to admittance into our League provided they conform to its rules and are animated by the child spirit.

Story of Uncle Charlie's Life Told in Pictures

THAT beautiful and interesting Picture Book which Uncle Charlie brought out last month as a souvenir of his 52nd birthday is going fast. Only 2000 were printed, but while they last you can obtain a copy as a free premium for a club of two subscriptions at 25 cents each, 50 cents in all; you may send your own subscription or renewal and one other to make up the club.

It is like visiting Uncle Charlie in his home if you have this book which shows his famous "chicken coop," outside and inside, with new pictures of himself, Maria and the present and a former Goat, all busy with their work.

There are numerous pictures of Uncle Charlie, which trace his life history, showing him as a youth, as an actor, an Indian, a soldier, a vested chorister, and last a helpless cripple on the narrow cot on which he has lain for the last nineteen years; also a picture of him with his only son, Herbert, now in his 23rd year, and a much treasured picture of Uncle Charlie's mother; pictures also of places and people connected with his eventful career. They are reproduced in the finest style of the art and are printed on thick, glossy, heavy coated paper.

The book is beautiful and artistic, as are all Uncle Charlie's productions, for he is a lover of the beautiful.

Send the subscriptions to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and you will receive the book direct from Uncle Charlie, by mail, postage prepaid. This is his venture; he has published the Souvenir Picture Book at his own expense and I pay him for all that are used as subscription club premiums. If the entire edition goes quickly there will be a small profit in it for him. Two subs at 25 cents each, 50 cents in all, gives you the book.

Send in your own subscription or renewal with one other subscription, now, and secure the valued souvenir of this wonderful man whose life is devoted to the cause of humanity.

Any Woman Can Have a 1900 Gravity Washer on 30 Days' Free Trial

Don't send money. If you are responsible, you can try it first. Let us pay the freight. See the wonders it performs. Thousands being used. Every user delighted. They write us bushels of letters telling how it saves work and worry. Sold on little payments. Write for fascinating Free Book today. All correspondence should be addressed to 1900 Washer Co., 1577 Court St., Binghamton, N. Y. If you live in Canada, address Canadian 1900 Washer Co., 357 Yonge St., Toronto, Canada.

Membership is restricted to COMFORT subscribers and costs thirty cents, only five cents more than the regular subscription to COMFORT which is included. The thirty cents makes you a member of the League and gives you an attractive League button with the letters "C. L. O. C.," a handsome certificate of membership with your name engrossed thereon, and the privilege of having your name in the letter list, also a paid-in-advance subscription to COMFORT. You continue a League member as long as you keep up your subscription to COMFORT. There are no annual dues, so after you have once joined all you have to do to keep in good standing is to keep your subscription to COMFORT paid up.

Please observe carefully the following directions which explain exactly

How to become a Member

Send thirty cents to COMFORT'S Subscription Department, Augusta, Maine, with your request to be admitted into COMFORT'S LEAGUE OF COUSINS, and you will at once receive the League button and your membership certificate and number; you will also receive COMFORT for one year if you are a new subscriber; but if you are already a subscriber your subscription will be renewed or extended one full year beyond date of expiration.

Or, if your subscription is already paid in advance, you can take a friend's one-year subscription at 25 cents and send it in with five cents of your own, thirty cents in all, with your request for membership, and we will send you the button and membership certificate, and send COMFORT to your friend for one year. League subscriptions do not count in premium clubs.

NEVER apply for membership without enclosing thirty cents to include a new subscription or a renewal.

The League numbering over forty thousand members, undoubtedly is the greatest society of young people on earth. It costs but thirty cents to join, and that gives you at least a 15-month subscription to COMFORT also, without extra cost.

Never in the world's history was so much given for so little. Never could thirty cents be invested to such advantage, and bring such splendid returns. Don't hesitate. Join us at once and induce your friends to do likewise.

All those League members who desire a list of the cousins residing in the several states, can secure the same by sending a stamped addressed envelope and five cents in stamps to Nellie Rutherford, 1299 Park Place, Brooklyn, New York grand secretary.

Special Notice

Never write a subscription or renewal order or application for membership in the body of a letter. Write your subscription or renewal and membership application on a separate sheet of paper, separate from your letter. We have to put all subscription orders on our subscription file at once; so if it is written on the same sheet as your letter, the whole letter has to go on to the subscription file at once and thus can receive no attention from Uncle Charlie.

Never send subscriptions to Uncle Charlie nor to the Secretary of the League; they bother him and cause confusion and delay.

Address all letters to COMFORT, Augusta, Maine, and they will promptly reach the head of the department for which they are intended.

"Virtue itself offends when coupled with forbidding manners."—Bishop Middleton.

In order to meet the demand for information made by COMFORT subscribers on the kindred subjects of Etiquette and Personal Appearance, this column will be devoted to them, and all questions will be answered, but no inquirer shall ask more than two questions each month. We would suggest to readers to cut this column out and paste it in a scrap book. Address letters to Etiquette Editor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Tip-top, Spalding, Nebr.—We fear that your middy blouse which was originally blue and is now washed nearly white can never be made whole white. You might have it dyed blue again, but to make it pure white is beyond human aid. That's the trouble about cheap dyes, they won't stay in their own color, nor get out and leave the original white.

Reader, Lowden, Iowa.—A bride should mark her household linen with the initial of her legal name, which is that of her husband. So also as to her silverware and anything else she has marked. Her maiden name is no longer hers and she has no right to use its initial, even.

Blue Eyes, Elkton, Mo.—You speak to the family doctor when introduced as to any other person, or in your case as you are still only a kid, it was enough to bow. It is proper to thank anyone for any courtesy extended, no matter how slight it may be. As for learning how to talk in company, you will be able to do that best by listening to other people until you have something to say. If you will read books, magazines and newspapers you will have a fund of things to talk about and be worth listening to. Girls of fifteen are at the awkward age and not much is expected of them and they had better be seen than heard, usually.

M. G., Phoenix, Ariz.—We don't know what your physician meant by his various attentions you mention, but on general principles a physician has no right to extend any attentions to a female patient except such as are purely professional and whenever he goes beyond that limit the female patient will do well to seek another physician. Fortunately this class of physicians is comparatively rare, but there are some and they are dangerous, and to be avoided by all decent girls and women.

Brown Eyes, Bennett, Wis.—Notwithstanding your husband treated you so badly you had to get a divorce from him you say you still love him and ask our advice about remarrying him. We haven't much to say. It is said that experience is a hard school, but fools will learn in no other way and you can't be a fool or you would have learned. Maybe you had better try another term under the same teaching. We are glad to hear that you married him when you were only sixteen, because if you had waited until you were twenty-one you mightn't have married him. You are eighteen now and maybe you had better wait until you are three years older. By that time, if you still want to try him again, you have our permission.

Two Girls, Loveland, Okla.—When a young man persists in coming to see you when you don't want him to come, why don't you decline to see him when he calls? After he has been turned down a dozen or so times, perhaps he will take the hint. (2) Certainly if you don't love the young man don't write to him. Some girls though can write to young men who are merely friends. (3) The young man owes you a letter even though you answerd him last with a post-card. Don't write till you hear from him. It is not very encouraging to answer a letter by a card, but it is frequently done by ladies. (4) Your first duty at the ice-cream party was to your escort and you should not have gone off with another fellow and had your first dish with him. He did quite right in taking you home before the party was over. Did he buy you a dish before he left? We hope he didn't.

Peggy Gray, Powersville, Mo.—Marrying at fifteen, not by any wish of your own except to please your elders, it is hardly to be expected that you would know anything of the love a woman should have for the man she marries. But you have children now and your husband is quite as good as the average and your whole duty is to him and your children. The friend you mention who talks very nicely to you and tells you he loves you, but you must be true to your better self is, we think, an individual for you to have nothing whatever to do with. Send him away and if he persists in his pious talk, tell your husband to throw him out. Many weak women who did not love their husbands have gone to the bad through the attentions of just such men. You are a good Christian woman, wife and mother and we believe you can very easily do the right thing.

Regretful, Morris, Mont.—When a widower with children marries a woman and not only tells those children he will punish her if she punishes them, as she should when they need it, but strikes her in his temper, we think the woman is justified in leaving him. A wife-beater is no kind of a man for any woman to try to live with, and if she is a woman of the proper self-respect she will not.

J. B. E., Dallas, Pa.—There is really no harm in a good girl keeping house for an elderly gentleman, but the gossips would make harm of it in very short order, unless the man was a thousand years old. There are, however, ladies who hold such positions in spite of the gossips and hold them creditably. Accept the position if you are superior to the gossips.

Anxious, Jennings, Va.—You can bring him to a point by not being so anxious about it. If he once knows you are on his trail, as you admit you are, he will jump it and flee to the waste places. You know it is contrary to all rules of etiquette for a lady to pursue a gentleman who is ignorant and unsuspecting of her designs.

W. M., Utica, S. Dak.—No gentleman who has serious intentions in his attentions to a lady wants to hug and kiss her right away. You may therefore consider this one as an arrant flirt and treat him accordingly. (2) In any differences, between a lady and gentleman, the one at fault should be the first to offer reconciliation. (3) The weight of a woman, five feet nine inches tall, is from one hundred and thirty-one to one hundred and seventy-nine pounds, average one hundred and fifty-five pounds.

A. L. P., Montello, Wis.—At a parsonage wedding the bride may dress as she pleases, as there are no rules of etiquette controlling and nobody much present to make invidious comments. It may be as informal and unconventional as an elopement wedding.

R. M. L., Buckhart, Mo.—When you are older than fourteen you won't care how postage stamps are put on, so long as they bring the mail all right. In the meantime, you think only of the help it will be to busy postal clerks for you to put the stamp in the upper right-hand corner of the envelope and tell all your friends to do the same.

F. C., Brownwood, Texas.—As the young lady's parents have no objection to your calling on her, and her uncle comes in when you are calling and in the absence of her parents whips her and orders you out, it seems to us that Texas etiquette would permit you to knock his block off with anything you could lay hands to. Of course, keep on going to see her and if you are afraid to tackle the uncle in person, have the law on him. What the parents of the young lady say is your rule of guidance.

Blue Eyes, Renick's Valley, W. Va.—One of the best indications of true courtesy from a gentleman to a lady is in his attentions to her when it is not convenient for him to be attentive. The man who is polite only when it suits his convenience is not truly a gentleman. In addition he is a selfish individual whose place should be worth more to you than his company. (2) You have committed the error of letting the young man know you are in love with him and he is so sure of you that he neglects you for other girls when you are out together. Can you blame him? Don't you always forgive him? Why don't you neglect him a while and show him two can play at that game? This isn't etiquette exactly but it is common sense.

Troubled, Salt Lick, W. Va.—The social problem of how a lady can free herself of the attentions of any gentleman she does not like, in a manner to retain his good will and that of his family has not yet been solved. In our judgment the lady is justified in administering a snub that will count for good, if he will not take an ordinary hint. Some men will not take a hint and some men's families are about as stupid. (2) Etiquette provides no rules by which a lady can win a gentleman's love. If she is rich maybe she can buy it, or an imitation of it that will last until he is her husband with a chance at her money.

Petey, Almond, N. Y.—Many harmless informalities are permitted in rural communities among young people which are hardly possible in city society, and we suppose it would not be very bad form if you did send this bashful young chap a post-card bearing the mystic inscription: "Guess who!" in your own handwriting. You are about as bashful as he is and maybe if you got acquainted it would improve both of you. Anyway, try it, but don't tell anybody. You will have to devise your own entertainment if he should call, but we will suggest that some little refreshments, something to drink or to nibble on, helps to pass away the evening and make you forget your other troubles.

Disheartened, E. Tawas, Mich.—The young man doesn't know the rules of ordinary etiquette as between ladies and gentlemen sufficiently to treat you with common politeness and why you are so anxious to stand in his good graces would surprise us if we did not know how rudely men may treat women and women still consider them gentlemen. As his mother and you are good friends and she wants you to visit her, you ought to go and while you are there you should snub the son until the mother asked you to explain. Of course, you will not do this, and it would not be really polite for you to do so, but it would be of a piece with the pattern of manners you get from him.

to him, and came and stood beside the piano, his hands folded behind him, his head bent and his whole attitude one of the dreamy enthusiast.

"Perhaps Capt. Morton will sing for us?" said Edna, and the captain, after protesting that he would sound like a raven mocking a nightingale, sat down to the piano.

At the first few notes there was a profound silence; the card players suspended playing, Lord Mersey got close to the piano and shut his eyes; the captain's triumph was complete.

They implored him to sing again, and he did so, modestly and unaffectedly, and sang better than before.

As he raised his head to give vent to the last high note, he looked up in the glass over the piano and saw Grace Bromley's face reflected. She was looking at the downcast one of Lord Mersey, and with such a look that if Capt. Morton had any doubts as to her feelings before that look solved them.

The revelation—or confirmation—nearly spoiled that note, but the captain did not mind that, for he felt that he held the key to Grace Bromley's heart, and he was satisfied.

"Splendid!" exclaimed Lord Mersey, in his deep bass. "Capt. Morton, I have never heard any tenor better than yours, excepting Mario's."

"Humph!" growled Edward More, over his cards. "I've told him often that he would have made a fortune on the stage."

The captain glanced across and smiled, and no one would have guessed that there was anything in that smile but the merest gratitude for a rough compliment.

Then the carriages came up and the party broke up; a servant waited to conduct the captain to his rooms, and he said good night, shaking hands with Edward More with the rest, but adding, in a whisper:

"Come up to my room; I will wait for you."

CHAPTER XIX.

CASTLES IN SPAIN.

The handsome and captivating Capt. Morton was something more than "an old friend" of Edward More's—he was, truth, a distant relative. One of the Mores, in years gone by—a cousin of Edward and Cyril More's father—had been what is commonly known as a "loose fish," and had put a climax to a number of offenses against his wealthy and high-born relatives, by marrying a second-rate French actress from the Porte St. Martin.

The direct line of the Mores had thereupon disowned him, and he, possessing no mean share of the family pride, had retorted by disowning them; in other words, he took his wife's name, and was known as Morton.

The affair had been so admirably hushed up that the world had either not known or had quite forgotten that such a person as George More or Morton had existed; and as neither George Morton, his wife, nor their son ever claimed relationship with their powerful kinsmen, the world was not likely to be reminded of it. That son was our friend, the elegant captain, and it is scarcely necessary to explain why Edward More's compliment respecting the captain's chances in a professional career was neither in good taste nor exactly pleasing to the recipient. It is not pleasant to be reminded that you are the son of a third-rate French actress and a disowned branch of the house.

Edward More, as he made his way to the captain's room, was rather sorry that he had made the little speech—for, if the truth was told, Edward More, the irritable, bad-tempered barrister, of whom many people were afraid, was, in his turn, rather afraid of Capt. Morton; for what reason, it would be rather difficult to say, but the fact was indisputable, and Edward More was aware that the captain as well as himself was perfectly cognizant of it.

Edward More knocked at the door, and having received permission, given in a soft, sweet voice, entered the first of a suite of three rooms—dressing, bath and bedroom—which had been allotted to the captain.

The captain was seated in a luxurious chair near the fireplace; a small fire had been lighted, for the nights were still chilly, as is usual with our English spring, and the captain was lounging back, with his slippered feet resting on a small Louis-Quatorze chair; he wore a dark crimson satin dressing gown, of which he had turned back the wide wristbands, leaving his hands free to hold before the fire; they were very shapely, as has been said, and they looked as white as a lady's against the dark background of satin.

The captain looked up with a smile as Edward More's frowning face came round the door, and removing his feet from the dainty chair, he waved one white hand toward it, saying:

"Welcome, my gentle Edward—be seated."

"Phew!" replied Edward, shaking his head at the fire angrily. "Not near the fire. What on earth do you want with it?"

"Ah!" said the captain, pleasantly. "You northerners are all in love with your native cold; but we—I am half a Frenchman, as you were kind enough to remind me tonight—like warmth—warmth, wine and women; was not that the old Sybarites' motto?"

"I don't know," said Edward More, snappishly.

Then, as a pleasant smile stole over the face of the not-to-be-irritated captain, he turned upon him sharply.

"What brings you here, Morton?"

"The ricketiest and dirtiest fly, I think, I ever traveled in; and I have traveled in many sorts in divers countries. If I could have let you know, you might have sent the carriage!"

Edward More looked as if he would rather have sent a hearse for him, but he controlled himself, and said:

"That's no answer, as you know. I asked what brought you here? What is the reason? You don't do things without a reason generally."

"There I think you make a mistake!" retorted the captain, holding up his white forefinger as if he were prepared to indulge in a pleasant argument. "An idle whim brought me here—or shall we say the desire to see your friendly face again, my dear Edward, and indeed I am so very glad to see it—I have seen so many ugly scoundrels lately!—that you ought to feel some little glow of delight at the sight of mine."

Edward More grunted, but deeming it best to attempt conciliation, said:

"Where have you been lately? What have you been doing?"

"Ask me where I have not been, what I have not been doing," answered the captain, with a little yawn. "My dear Edward, I have been half over the world—anywhere, everywhere. Do you object to my putting a few more coals on?—and I have been at the old trade——"

"Card sharp—card playing!" snarled Edward.

"Fie!" retorted the captain with a pleasant laugh. "What is a solider's trade but fighting? I have been fighting, my dear Edward."

"Where?"

"My dear Edward, you make a capital cross-examining barrister; no wonder you are rich and famous. In Spain, if you must know, with Don Carlos. Spain, the land of the grave and the garlic; Spain, the land of the——"

"Pshaw!" interrupted Edward More; "what did you leave for—you did no good, I suppose?"

"On the contrary, I did a great deal for his highness, I hope," replied the imperturbable captain. "I have never been accused of cowardice, my friend, and there were some sharp brushes now and then. Yes, if I had stayed I should have come back to you a colonel, or a general who knows? But I came back—that is what you ners," they bawled when they found sentiment going against them.

"Suppose the boat had given a big lurch when you were hanging out of that window, where would you be now?" and Toughey buried her face in the pillow to shut out the horrid vision.

"But we're not boobs, and she thinks we are! We can take care of ourselves," was their defense.

It was a day or two before Toughey's frigidity towards the children relaxed, but they were so frankly penitent and so docile that peace was finally established.

When the boat at last came to a stop at her dock in the Thames river, everyone stepped gaily down the gang plank. The trip had been pleasant enough but no one cared to prolong it. They remained in London only long enough to see Mrs. Deering's doctor and decide on the little village in southern England, where conditions were supposed to be especially suited to her and the need of others of the family.

They were not sorry to leave behind the icy discomforts of the old-fashioned hotel to which they had gone in London.

But were full of eager anticipation of the journey and the joys to follow at its end.

The Latest Vanity Case

Premium No. 711

Given for a Club of Three

EVERY lady and girl should have one of these handsome German Silver Vanity Cases because it is the latest style and design having a thin Model case like that of a thin model watch. As shown in illustration the outside of the case is beautifully Embossed and if you want to you can have your jeweller engrave your Monogram Initials in the little round panel which is perfectly plain and bright polished. This case is very light, weighing a little over over 3 ounces but it is of good size being 4½ inches long and 2⅝ inches wide with a 12-inch chain. On the inside of the case on one side is a place for visiting cards, bills, postage stamps, etc., etc., and on the other side is a powder puff in a little compartment which closes with a hinged cover, a good sized mirror, a compartment for nickels and another one for dimes. This new case is one of the prettiest designs we have yet seen so we have bought a quantity of them to give away among COMFORT readers. We will send you one of them if you will accept the following

Club Offer. For a club of only three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each we will send you this Vanity Case free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 711.

Comfort's Home Lawyer

In this department will be carefully considered any legal problem which may be submitted by a subscriber. All opinions given herein will be prepared at our expense by eminent counsel.

Inasmuch as it is one of the principal missions of COMFORT to aid in upbuilding and upholding the sanctity of the home, no advice will be given on matters pertaining to divorce. Any paid-up subscriber to COMFORT is welcome to submit inquiries, which, so far as possible, will be answered in this department. If any reader, other than a subscriber, wishes to take advantage of this privilege, it may be done by sending twenty-five (25) cents, in silver or stamps, for a one-year subscription to COMFORT thus obtaining all the benefits which our subscribers enjoy including a copy of the magazine for one full year.

Should any subscriber desire an immediate, special opinion on any legal question, privately mailed, it may be had by sending one dollar with a letter asking such advice, addressing the same to "THE EDITOR, COMFORT'S HOME LAWYER," Augusta, Maine, and in reply a carefully prepared opinion will be sent in an early mail.

Full names and addresses must be signed by all persons seeking advice in this column but not for publication. Unless otherwise requested, initials only will be published.

T. T., New Hampshire.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the surviving husband is entitled to receive from his deceased wife's estate curtesy of a life estate in her real estate, provided there be issue born alive to the marriage, and from her personal estate one third thereof if decedent leaves issue by such survivor; if decedent leaves no issue fifteen hundred dollars, where value of whole estate does not exceed three thousand dollars, and one half where such value is in excess of three thousand dollars; and that the survivor may reject the term of a will and take such intestacy share in case he so elects.

R. T. G., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that upon the death of a man leaving no will, and leaving no widow, child or descendant, his property would go to his father, mother, brothers and sisters and their descendants depending upon who is left surviving him; if he leaves no one related to him, his property would escheat to the Commonwealth.

Mrs. G. V. M., Michigan.—We are of the opinion that the laws of your state prohibit a marriage between a nephew and aunt.

Mrs. W. E. S., Iowa.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion, that upon the death of a man or woman, leaving no will, and leaving no child or descendant, the whole estate to the amount of seventy-five hundred dollars, after payment of debts and expenses of administration and one half of all the estate in excess of said amount shall go to the surviving spouse, and the other one half of said excess shall go to the parents, if no spouse the whole shall go to the parents.

Mrs. J. N. H., Texas.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that children may be disinherited by will, or that one child can be preferred by will if the testator so elects, but that in case the decedent only has a life estate in property he she cannot dispose of the remainder interest therein.

Mrs. I. C. G., Georgia.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that the statute of limitations runs against all actions upon open accounts and contracts not in writing within four years, but that said statute is suspended by the removal of the defendant from the state, until he returns to reside, and that the statute does not ordinarily run against infants, idiots, insane persons, or persons imprisoned, who are such when the cause of action accrues, until the disability is removed.

Mrs. A. M. C., New Mexico.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that all property acquired after marriage other than such as is separate property, is community property of the marriage, that the husband has the same absolute management, control and disposition except testamentary, of the community property that he has over his separate property, except that he cannot give it away or convey it without a valuable consideration, cannot sell or incumber the homestead property then used as a home by the husband and wife, without the consent of the wife; that on the death of the husband and after the payment of debts, the whole one half of the community property and one quarter of the other half goes to the surviving wife, and the balance, or one quarter of such community property to his children, or in the absence of surviving wife or children or both, in the same manner as separate property; we think the husband must support the wife unless she abandons him or is living separate from him by agreement not stipulating for such support, and if he does not support her others may, and recover the cost of support from the husband, provided he is not unable because of infirmity.

M. Z., Iowa.—We think that if the mortgage you mention is in all respects a good and valid one, payment of the same can be enforced through a foreclosure action brought for that purpose, and that the fact that same was made by the father of the holder of said mortgage does not affect the validity of said mortgage, but that failure of consideration or delivery of same or any other proper requirements in connection therewith might defeat said mortgage.

Miss C. W., North Dakota.—Under the laws of your state, we are of the opinion that upon the death of a married man, leaving a surviving widow and more than one child, and leaving no will, the widow would receive one third of the estate, the balance going in equal shares to the children, but that the homestead estate, which is the right to the possession, use, control, income and rents of real property, occupied or held as a homestead descends to the surviving widow and that when such estate is fully satisfied the property descends as other property.

Mrs. E. M. S., Virginia.—We are of the opinion that marriages between first cousins are prohibited in Arizona, Arkansas, Illinois, Indianna, Kansas, Louisiana, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Utah, Washington and Wyoming.

E. R. J., Pennsylvania.—Under the laws of your state we are of the opinion that if the woman you mention was of unsound mind at the time she made her will the same could be set aside in the proper contest brought for that purpose and the former will made by her, if the same is a valid one, would be probated as her last will and testament or if she left no valid will her estate would be disposed of under the intestacy laws; we think she had a legal right to make larger bequests to some of her children than to others, if she possessed testamentary capacity and no undue influence was exercised upon her; we do not think an executor or administrator can be compelled to account or pay legacies in less than one year from the time of his appointment; we think that upon the death of a testator the executor or other person having possession of the will should file same in the probate court, and that all persons interested can then examine same if they so desire; we think it is customary for the executor to distribute copies of the will to the persons interested in the estate as a matter of courtesy to them, but that there is no legal requirement upon him to do so.

THEY SAT ON BURGLAR.—A negro was taken prisoner in Chicago recently by all of the family sitting on him. Geo. A. Smith, Jr., entered his home after attending a dance. He saw the intruder dodge behind a portiere in the parlor. He grappled with him and when he raised a cry, his father, mother, and sister came to his rescue. Father and son succeeded in felling the burglar, and then all aided in holding him on the floor. The sister left for a while to call the police on phone. She opened wide the door and then took her seat beside the rest of the family, on top of the negro. A husky police sergeant a few minutes later, asked if there was any trouble. "Ah should say thar be trouble; please get me out this 'dicament!" answered the negro.

patch and harrowed in to inoculate the ground with bacteria which cause the growth of nodules upon the roots. These nodules collect nitrogen for the Alfalfa and without them there would not be a full crop. The seed germinates without this inoculation and the young plants may grow fairly well for a time, but when the available nitrogen decreases the crop droops. This is not the case when inoculation has caused nodule production on the roots.

Community Buying

If a farmer has to go to the elevator or feed store and buy extra feed by the bag or hundred pounds he will not be likely to make money from the feeding work. Such feed costs too much and never more than now. If it is to be fed profitably it must be bought in bulk and that the small farmer cannot afford to do. But there are a dozen or more neighbors in every district wanting a ton or two, or even a few hundred pounds of bran, or middlings, shorts, flaxseed or cotton seed meal, cornmeal or screenings, and if these men could get together and buy as a unit a great saving could be had. This is equally true of the purchase of ground limestone rock, ground phosphate rock, marl, commercial fertilizers and like commodities. We also know of one community where bulk buying was tried and so much appreciated that the idea spread to the buying of flour for household use and there is no reason why sugar should not be bought in the same way. Next time you think of going to the store for a hundred of bran or middlings sit down and figure out how much of these commodities you will need through the season; then see if you cannot get a few neighbors to do the same thing and join in the purchase of a carload to save freight and middlemen's profits. A supply of feeders or breeding cattle may be had in the same way. This is being put into practise in many states. The farmers are banding together to buy a carload or more of grade dairy breed heifers, or young pure-bred bulls, or grade feeders and they save money in that way and get better stock than would be possible by buying here and there from neighbors. It takes some capital to go into community buying; but capital is only possible to the men who have business sense to invest in the way we have suggested and when a man obtains a reputation for business ability and integrity the banks will supply the needed cash for a business "deal." This idea should also apply to the purchase of a pure bred stallion. Do not wait until some stallion peddler comes around with a fattened sire that is not the sort wanted or the one that will do the most good in the district. Get some neighbor owners of mares to band together, form a little company and go to a reputable breeder for the selection of the right sort of horse. He will cost less in that way and be much more likely to give good satisfaction.

Death to Woodchucks

A Wisconsin Alfalfa grower was much annoyed by woodchucks which established themselves in his fields and made great, unsightly holes with many burrows and exits. The vermin also did considerable damage by eating Alfalfa and so the farmer tried every possible plan to exterminate the pests. No plan succeeded perfectly until one day a happy thought struck him. He attached a rubber hose to the exhaust of his automobile, pushed the other end of the hose down into the woodchuck hole, speeded up the motor and then stood back to see the inhabitants bolt from the hole. He was disappointed in that. Soon smoke and engine gas belched from the holes, but no woodchucks ran out. They had been asphyxiated at once, so the farmer stopped every hole with earth, let the motor run a while longer and came away satisfied that the pests had been put to sleep forever. He has since destroyed every woodchuck on the farm in this way and we have no doubt the plan will be enthusiastically adopted and put in practise wherever a combination of woodchucks and automobiles can be arranged. It may also prove a good plan of getting rid of prairie dogs and other vermin. The writer is going to try the plan on his farm as there are several big woodchuck colonies there. We hope many of our readers will also give the plan a trial.

The Questions and Answers constitute one of the most valuable features of this department and we urge our farmer subscribers to read all of them carefully each month, as you will find that they contain much useful information and advice on practical problems that are troubling you as well as those who have asked the questions. Cut them out and pas'e them into a scrapbook for future reference. This will save you the trouble of writing us and will avoid delay in getting your answer when you need advice on these same matters. We are glad to receive inquiries from our subscribers and to advise them on all matters pertaining to farming, but it is hardly reasonable to expect us to waste valuable space in answering the same questions month after month for the benefit of those who need not have asked the questions if they had read and remembered the answers which we had previously printed.

Questions and Answers

ALFALFA IN W. VA.—Would Alfalfa be a paying crop in West Virginia, or not? Where can I get the material to inoculate the soil with?

MRS. L. A. B., Annamoriah, W. Va.

A.—Crimson clover and other legumes are more commonly grown than Alfalfa in your state, but the crop no doubt succeeds in some sections. Write to the agricultural experiment station of your state for a bulletin or other information on the subject and they will also tell you where to obtain Alfalfa soil or sweet clover soil for inoculation purposes. Do not attempt raising the crop before taking the experience of your neighbors on the subject and following the advice of the experts of the state experiment station experts. As we have frequently explained in this department, you inoculate for Alfalfa by sowing broadcast a thin application of soil from an old Alfalfa or clover field.

CUCUMBER VINES WILTING.—Can you tell me what causes my cucumber vines to turn a yellowish brown and then die? They turn first at the root end, generally when the runner is about four feet long and just commenced to bear well. What can I use as a cure or preventive? (2) What causes my vinegar to be full of tiny white worms that are barely visible to the eye? I was told that the "mother" was weak. I got more "mother," but it did not make any change. Store vinegar was affected the same way.

L. F. T., Framingham, Mass.

A.—The soil is not sufficiently rich in nitrogen. Manure it well and mulch heavily after the vines are growing well and do not need cultivation for weed killing. When enough cucumbers are set on each runner pinch off the end to prevent further running. If mulching does not retain sufficient moisture to prevent yellowing water two or three nights a week with weak manure tea. Woodashes worked into the soil about the plant will help. We take it for granted that striped cucumber beetles are not affecting the vines. (2) If worms ("wigglers") are present in the vinegar it has been exposed to the air and flies. Strain the vinegar through cheese-cloth and add new, clean "mother." Scald the keg or barrel in which the vinegar is kept.

PARALYSIS.—Would like information on following: We have a 60-acre wheat field that has a wonderful stand of clover—now knee deep—in it. We have been advised to cut same and not to cut the clover—which is right? (2) We have a ten-month sow—a mother of seven piggies now weaned—that has been down on her hind quarters for the past four days. What treatment would you advise? We think it is kidney worms. She looks well, feeds well, but seems helpless to rise her back limbs. (3) We are going to sow ten acres of Alfalfa this month. What preparation for same would you suggest? J. A. C., Richmond, Ind.

A.—It would be a great mistake to cut the young grass from last spring's seeding. Leave it alone to winter well and make a bumper hay crop next summer. (2) Kidney worms do not cause paralysis. Common erroneous belief to the contrary. The trouble is brought on by the strain and drain of nursing pigs and affects sows from pampered stock, especially corn-stuffed and under-exercised animals. If she is in good flesh she may be slaughtered for meat but treatment will not be likely to succeed. (3) Unless seeded by the fifteenth of August, Alfalfa should not be put in until spring when it may be seeded with a small amount of spring wheat, barley or oats. Land for Alfalfa must be rich, well-drained, free from weeds and prepared as for a flower bed or garden. If it has not grown Alfalfa (or white clover) it must be inoculated by applying 300 pounds soil from an Alfalfa or white clover patch. If the soil is not rich it should be dressed with well-rotted farmyard manure and also have an application of at least 1000 pounds of ground rock phosphate and 2000 pounds of ground lime stone to the acre. Sow 20 pounds of Alfalfa seed to the acre.

RECIPE FOR GRAY HAIR.

To half pint of water add 1 oz. Bay Rum, a small box of Barbo Compound, and ¼ oz. of glycerine. Apply to the hair twice a week until it becomes the desired shade. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it at home at very little cost. Full directions for making and use come in each box of Barbo Compound. It will gradually darken streaked, faded gray hair, and removes dandruff. It is excellent for falling hair and will make harsh hair soft and glossy. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy, and does not rub off. —Advertisement.

Conducted by Cousin Marion

In order that each cousin may be answered in this column, no cousin must ask more than three questions in one Month.

HERE we are, my dears, with October awaiting us. I don't know how many times I have said it to you, but I'll say it again, which is, that I think October is the finest month in the year. Neither too hot nor too cold and in such a glory of crimson and gold that one almost shouts for joy to see it. Of course, we know that it is not far from the dreary days of winter, but we don't think a rose is any less beautiful when we know it fades so soon, do we? We do not, and we should love October for its beauty if for no other reason. We should also—but I must stop talking and go to work. October is not a bad month to work in, if work is so awfully nice in any month.

The first letter is from Cousin Ojay of Belle Plaine, Iowa, who is only fifteen years old and she wants me to write her a personal letter and tell her how she can persuade a young man she loves to love her. Cousin Ojay hasn't been listening very closely, or she would have heard me say many times that love cannot be placed anywhere one wants it to be. However, she will grow older by and by and will learn. Love never hurts fifteen-year-old girls very much.

Peggy, Lime Springs, Iowa.—Nineteen is too young, I think, to marry, but in some instances waiting a year or two is not advisable and a girl may marry at that age with perfect propriety and with as much chance of happiness as though she had waited. Your fiance's age, thirty, will be a balance to your youth. I wish you both much joy.

Tennessee Girl, Gleason, Tenn.—It is a very foolish thing for two young people, the boy and girl kind, I mean, to become engaged with a whole lot of silly vows about being eternally true to each other and all that sort of gush. They will forget it in very short order and the girl will be the sufferer,' if anybody suffers. It is all right to be good friends, and they may even have an understanding that they will marry when they are old enough, but an engagement is foolish and harmful to both.

Rebecca, Port Henry, N. Y.—You have found a man who loves you truly and whom you respect and almost love and I think you will be making a serious mistake to let this old sweetheart, who slighted you once, come back again. Probably you do love him more than you do the man you are engaged to, but he does not care for you as he should, and as the other man does, and even if he did marry you, your married life, in my opinion, would be a disappointment. Be true to the man who is true to you.

Dolly, Hickory, Tenn.—When a young man, engaged to be married on a certain date, announces to the girl that it must be postponed until after he has made a trip of several months, I think it is time for the girl to announce that the postponement will be final and there won't be any wedding. But some girls are so anxious to marry that they will tolerate anything.

Blue Eyes, El Centro, Cal.—Don't talk about the girl who talks about you and have just as little to do with her as possible. Whatever she says to the young man he should tell you. That is the only way to protect yourselves. Did the earthquake get you?

Lonely Hearted, Jefferson Barracks, Mo.—By all means wait for the soldier. The three years intervening before he will be discharged will be long enough for you to learn a great deal about love and marriage and I think it will be really and truly true love if both of you think the same of each other three years hence as you think you do now. I wish to goodness more of you girls had to think it over for three years before marrying.

Papa's Baby, Pawhuska, Okla.—The more jealous he is, the more you go with other young men and maybe it will teach him what an ugly trait of character unreasoning jealously is. I wouldn't marry one of those mean jealous dispositions if I never got married.

Kitty, Samaria, Idaho.—As it is not an engagement ring, you needn't worry over keeping it just as you would any other present. You haven't really broken with him and it will be patched up by and by. Silly girls and boys in love can't be happy if they don't quarrel occasionally.

Two Chums, Friendship, Tenn.—Being the daughters of wealthy parents, I should think you would have all the beaus you wanted and more, too, if you merely let the report get around that you were rich girls. It works everywhere else, and it ought to where you are. Try it.

Dimples, Livermore, Colo.—Decline to meet the young man who has written asking if he may call. Tell him you have refused four young men in two months and positively will not be bothered with any more suitors until you are old enough to marry.

Opal, Joelton, Tenn.—Because your father and the young man's father disliked each other is no reason why you two should not marry, even if your mother is holding your dead father's dislike to the young man's father. A prejudice of that sort is a blind folly that would wreck two lives for no good purpose whatever. Marry him, of course, and let your mother outgrow her foolish prejudice.

F. A. B., Saginaw, Mich.—It is fine to be an American, but a really fine American does not object to a decent young man of another nationality who is an American citizen, simply because he is not all American blood. Our country owes too much to its foreign citizens to draw any line like that, and I think you ought to stand with the young man against your father.

Sad Heart, Jamestown, N. Y.—Of course you can't see why he doesn't like you better than he does your sister, and he can't see, either, but he does and there is no help for it. If he could love you, no doubt he would, as you love him so much, but he can't and no power on earth can make him. I'm sorry, my dear, but that is your cross and you must bear it.

Troubled, Larimore, N. Dak.—So you have "lots of fellows which would like to marry" you, but there are two which you love best but don't know which one to pick out? Well, I should say you didn't, if you don't know any more about selection than you do about grammar and spelling. Suppose you pick out a grammar and spelling-book and don't bother about the young men for a year or so.

Perplexed, Brookside, Cal.—No matter what the law of California may be about first cousins marrying, don't marry your first cousin. Go outside of the family to marry.

Two Girls, Norwich, Conn.—A New England girl of thirty-three is not considered old at all and to have two gentlemen callers is not too many, even if you are not the kissing kind, which I am glad to hear. Yes, a girl who does all the housework should have an allowance and she should go out in an auto, too, if the young man is a careful driver, but I never did like to see a girl on a mortor-cycle with a young man. It isn't safe and it isn't pretty. Neither do I think girls should be always watched by their parents. It is almost sure to drive them to do things they never would do if they were free to act on their honor. I think the parents of lots of girls who go wrong are more to blame than the girls are.

Down-hearted, Clarksburg, W. Va.—If there is no objection to the young man except that he is a foreigner, you will be quite justified, I think, in marrying him anyhow, when you are of age and don't have to have your parents' consent.

Brown Eyes and Blue Eyes, Hilton, S. Dak.—When girls are so anxious to "keep up" with other girls and boys that they are willing to disobey their parents to do so, those girls are very apt to keep it up until they come to a bad end. If you wish to do that, go ahead keeping up with your fast companions, and you'll get your wish, all right—or all wrong, rather.

Pruss, Duluth, Minn.—Go right along, my dear, letting him kiss you whenever he wants to, no matter if people do make fun of you, and you can smell whiskey on him. Marry him, too, and by and by that whiskey smell on him will mean something very different from what it does now. But you love each other so, and a drunken husband doesn't count against a whiskey smelling sweetheart.

There, my dears, your questions are answered and I think I have been real nice and sweet about it, even if I did have to scold some now and then. But it is all for the best, and now run along and get ready for Thanksgiving. It comes nex month and thinking about your beaus so much, you may overlook it. By, by, and may the good Lord have us in His keeping, always, want to know—in consequence of a little unfortunate affair with a brother officer. A foolish young Spaniard, with too much fire in his blood and too little discretion in the use of the rapier. Poor boy! He fancied that his little ladylove—a pretty little thing enough, your young friend, Miss Bromley, reminds me of her immensely—and I were too great friends; it was no fault of mine, I swear! The little girl would look at me with her black eyes, and it wasn't for me to tell her that though a cat may look at a king, a young girl, as handsome as herself, with a jealous young boy lover, must not look at another man. I liked the boy better than his little ladybird, but what was I to do? He forced a quarrel on me and—one mustn't smoke here, of course, not even a single cigarette! Ah, well, you know best! Where was I? Oh, yes. He fell at the first thrust, straight through the left lung. I don't think he lived three minutes afterward," and with a gentle sigh the sensitive captain warmed his hands and looked pensively at Edward's horror-stricken and disgusted face.

COUSIN MARION.

"It turned out afterward that the boy was a near relation to Don Carlos himself, and so, as I have a horror of imprisonment in those dirty Spanish jails, and a still greater dislike to facing six muskets early in the morning, I thought it best to make for the frontier and pay a little visit to dear old England."

"But what made you come here?" asked Edward, after a significant pause.

The captain raised his eyebrows and smiled.

"Have I not told you?—well, well," as Edward More uttered a snarl and fidgeted on his chair, "if you must know, I found London full of the prettiest little romance I had heard for a long time: you know all about it, and shall tell me the true version directly, and I was so filled with curiosity to see the beautiful heroine that, hearing you were here taking care of her, I came down. I knew I should get a hearty welcome from my dear Edward!"

"His dear Edward" bit his lips and looked as if he would have liked to pitch the gentle captain out of the window.

"They said she was beautiful," resumed that fascinating gentleman, "and allowing for the exaggerations usual in such a case, I expected to see a pretty little girl of the dairymaid type; but, by Heaven, they were right! She is simply lovely!"

"You are talking of Miss Weston, I suppose?" growled Edward.

"Of whom else is all London talking?" rejoined the captain. "Of whom else but of the girl who comes into a million of money, and of the man who refused her and it on the same day."

Edward More looked from under his frowning brows, and commenced to bite his nails.

"I doubted the million—I always make allowances for report and gossip," continued the captain, in a soft tone of self-communion, "but I distinctly refused to believe that any man could be so mad as to decline even half a million of money, though it was tied in a bundle with a charming young lady—and so I came down here to get a true version of this pretty little romance from your veracious lips. So proceed, my dear friend," he said, laying his hand on Edward More's knee, and looking up into his face with a smile full of confident power.

"I can't tell you any more than you know already," said Edward More, irritably.

"The million is correct then?" said the captain.

"I suppose so. I am not a trustee under John Weston's will, and I am not in Miss Weston's entire confidence. They say it is a million."

"A million!" echoed the captain, nodding gently at the fire. "And she has no one excepting that amiable but weak old lady to protect her?—barring you, my dear Edward, who are a host in yourself, of course."

"I don't know what you mean," growled Edward. "Miss Weston has plenty of people to protect her; she doesn't want for friends!"

"She would be the only millionairess who ever did!" said the captain, with a smile. "And there are no relatives—no grim uncle, or stern guardian—no one but yourself, my dear Edward?"

"Miss Weston lives alone with her aunt," replied Edward More. "What on earth do you want to know? What can it matter to you?"

The captain smiled.

"Tut! tut! All by herself. Poor little thing! And now, my dear Edward, to come to the most romantic chapter of the story; is it true that the head of our house—the rash and reckless—what is it you call the poor devil?—the 'wicked Sir Cyril,' actually, of his own free will, refused this sweet, beautiful girl and her money—actually, to put it plainly, refused to take his chance of her declining him, and so handing him the whole million instead of half?"

Edward nodded sullenly.

"Yes, Cyril refused."

"But why, why?"

CUBBY BEAR'S FRIENDS

By Lena B. Ellingwood

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

"OH, I don't feel happy a bit, Mamma Bruin!" whined little Cubby Bear dolefully. "I am so sore and lame, and I have to stay in my little bed all day. I want to run out and play!"

"Do not fret, little Cubby," Mamma Bruin told him. "You will soon be better. Be glad, as I am, that you were not killed by your fall!"

"I am ashamed when I think how I got hurt," said little Cubby Bear, speaking very low, "I ought to have known I could not fly, but it looked so easy for Billy Bluejay and Redtop Woodpecker!"

"Yes, and so you climbed a big tree and tried to fly, too," said Mamma Bruin, "but got a bad fall instead. Oh, well, never mind! You will not try it again, and you will soon be as well as ever!"

Cubby Bear turned away his face, so Mamma Bruin would not see it. He was crying! Yes, for his hurts were painful, and he felt sick and miserable.

"Please tell me a story," he begged. So Mamma Bruin told him a story of long ago, when Grandma Bear's mamma was a tiny baby bear, and was almost drowned by falling into a river. Then she said:

"Why, here comes Busy Beaver to call on you!"

"I seldom go so far from the Big Brook," said Busy Beaver, "but I heard you were sick, Cubby Bear. I am so sorry! Look, I have brought you some nice, tender roots to eat! Brother Binny Beaver dug them today."

"Oh, thank you," said little Cubby Bear. "But must you go so soon?" for Busy Beaver was putting on his hat.

"Yes, I must go, for I have much to do. I will come again if I can help you. I remember how you helped Brother Binny Beaver and me to save our homes last spring when the water was high."

Just as Busy Beaver went away, who should come in at the door but Bunny Rabbit, with all his Baby Bunnies, fresh and clean for a call!

"I went way down beyond the big pasture to the farmer's garden this morning to get you some cabbage leaves, because I heard you were sick," said Bunny Rabbit.

"How good you were," said little Cubby Bear, "to take so much trouble for me! I like cabbage leaves!"

"I was glad to go for them," said Bunny Rabbit. "I remember how good you were to take care of my Bunny Babies when I was away and they were sick!"

"Here is another friend come to see you," said Mamma Bruin, and in came Shinyblack Crow.

"Poor little Cubby Bear!" he cawed. "I have brought you some corn to eat. I hope you will soon be well. Hark! what's that I hear? Someone big and heavy is coming!"

Bunny Rabbit took his Baby Bunnies and jumped quickly out at the window, without stopping to say good by, just as a long face, with kind brown eyes, looked in at the door.

"Oh, Mr. Big-horn Moose!" cried Cubby Bear in delight, "I am so glad to see you!"

"I will not stop," said the big visitor, "for I shall frighten away your friends. I called to tell you how sorry I am you are sick, for I remember how kind you were to me, and trusted me, when all the other animals of the forest hid in fear, and would not let me show them that I did not want to hurt them!"

After he was gone, Tillie Turtle was found hidden away in her shell, near the door. After some coaxing, she put out her head and feet, but would not come in the house.

"I am glad that big creature did not step on me," she said to Mamma Bruin. "I came to ask for Cubby Bear. I like him. Some little bears would have eaten my eggs, when they had found them, but Cubby Bear left them in the sand when I asked him to."

Chirpy Chipmunk came in with some beechnuts.

"My! these are heavy!" he chattered. "There are more at the door. Racky Coon helped me bring them. Do not thank me for them, Cubby Bear. They are some of the nuts you gathered for me last fall, when I had a sore paw and could not get them myself. You got so many, they are not gone yet!"

"Oh, look, look!" cried Cubby Bear. "The pretty pretty flowers!"

They all turned to look, and sure enough, someone was holding a big bunch of flowers in at the window!

It was Foxy Reynard.

"No, thank you, I will not come in," he told Mamma Bruin. "The flowers are from Woozie Weasel and me. He was here just now, but ran away quickly so you would not see him! We remembered how Cubby Bear left his picnic to bring us cake and ice-cream after we were unkind to him."

A little tapping was heard at the door, and little Polly Partridge came sidling bashfully in, bringing a spray of delicate partridge berries.

"These are for the good little bear who brought me cough syrup when I was sick," she said, and went out hurriedly, just as Minnie Mink and Wollie Woodchuck came in.

"Poor Cubby Bear!" aid Wollie. "I am going to stay here and help Mamma Bruin take care of you if she will let me. You were so good to me when the big tree blew down and hurt me and spoiled my house!"

Two little animals, one with a shaggy, hairy coat, and one covered with fluffy white wool, came running in together—Kiddie Goat and Lillie Lambkin!

"We were so frightened," said Kiddie Goat, "coming so far from the big pasture alone! But Bunny Rabbit told us this morning that you were sick. Oh, Cubby Bear, I shall never forget how kind you were to me when my leg was broken, and how you brought me home and took care of me until I got well! Come, Lillie Lambkin, we must hurry back, or the farmer's boy will think we are lost, and perhaps send Rover Dog to find us."

Redtop Woodpecker and Billy Bluejay called together, and told funny stories to make Cubby Bear laugh.

Dr. Squilly Porcupine came to see how his patient was getting along, and put three large huckleberries on Cubby Bear's tongue for pills.

"I put the medicine inside them," he said, "so you would not taste it."

Then, when all the other callers were gone, Robbie Reddie sat on a bush just outside the window, and sang to Cubby Bear a sweet song of the bright, shining sun, and a safe little nest, and five blue eggs, 'neath a warm, downy breast!

"Oh, Mamma Bruin!" said little Cubby Bear, his eyes shining happily, "I am sorry I cried, and was so naughty and whiney. I am glad now I am sick, for I have found I have so many, many friends who love me! It is a good thing to have friends. I never, never knew I had so many before!"

The Little Marplot

not some few last things that you would like."

"Oh, Ralph! you have already given me more things than I know what to do with, but if you really want me to spend some more money I'll try to oblige you," laughed the pretty bride, and flashing a roguish look at him. "Let me see—yes, I think I must have a pound of 'Huyler's best,' —a flask of violet-water, and a bottle of that 'Crown Sal Volatile,' like what you bought your mother for headaches."

"All right, I will get them for you after I have had my smoke," the young man returned, rising to go below to enjoy his Havana and look over the papers.

"No; let me go out to get them while you are smoking," Ruth responded. "I noticed as we drove here that there are several shops just around the corner. I can easily find my way to and from them, and you'll have your cigar finished by the time I get back, while I shall not have to stay alone."

"As you like, sweetheart," Ralph fondly replied, and, pulling a roll of bills from his vest pocket, he slipped a couple of V's into her pretty hand.

As he did so a folded paper dropped out upon her lap.

"What is that?" she queried, picking it up and unfolding it. "Oh!" she added, with a slight start, "this belongs to me—it is our marriage certificate, which the justice gave you this morning, after the ceremony."

"That is so," Ralph remarked, as he gently attempted to take the paper from her.

"Wait a minute, Ralph, please; I want to read it through—I never saw one before," pleaded the young bride, with an absorbed air, but without relaxing her grasp upon the document.

The young husband frowned slightly, but made no further opposition to her request; then, lightly touching his lips to her forehead, he sauntered from the room, choosing his cigar from a handsome case as he went.

Ruth seated herself by a window and read the paper carefully through, heaving a little sigh of content as she finished it.

"I am glad I have seen this," she murmured, musingly, "and—I—I think I will keep it. Oh, dear! I haven't any pocket in this dress," she continued, as she involuntarily put down her hand to find it, "and Ralph has the key to my satchel. Never mind—I'll put it here until I come back from my shopping, then I will take care of it."

She opened a Bible that lay on the table beside her, and placed the marriage certificate carefully between the leaves.

Then, donning her hat, she went out to make her purchase.

Ah! upon what trivial acts one's future destiny sometimes hinges!

The Complete Story In Book Form

If you do not care to wait for the monthly installments of this new serial as they appear in COMFORT we will be glad to make you a present of the complete story in book form. You will enjoy reading this great story for it is one of the very best Mrs. Georgie Sheldon has written. The heroine is a live character that will challenge your wonder and admiration and stir the heart's strongest emotions. Love, the greatest thing in the world, is the keynote of this as of all other great stories. It is full of action which moves rapidly through a succession of startling events to the final solution of a baffling mystery. "The Little Marplot" will run as a serial in COMFORT through the fall, winter and spring months, but you need not wait in order to get the complete story. Send us only one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents, or your own subscription, renewal or extension of your present subscription for one year at 25 cents and 5 cents additional (30 cents in all) and we will send you a copy of the book free and postpaid.

Tobacco Habit BANISHED in 48 to 72 Hours

No craving for tobacco in any form after the first dose.

Don't try to quit the tobacco habit unaided. It's a losing fight against heavy odds and means a serious shock to the nervous system. Let the tobacco habit quit YOU. It will quit you, if you will just take Tobacco Redeemer, according to directions, for two or three days. It is the most marvelously quick and thoroughly reliable remedy for the tobacco habit the world has ever known.

Not a Substitute

Tobacco Redeemer is absolutely harmless and contains no habit-forming drugs of any kind. It is in no sense a substitute for tobacco. After finishing the treatment you have absolutely no desire to use tobacco again or to continue the use of the remedy. It quiets the nerves, and will make you feel better in every way. It makes not a particle of difference how long you have been using tobacco, how much you use or in what form you use it—whether you smoke cigars, cigarettes, pipe, chew plug or fine cut or use snuff. Tobacco Redeemer will positively banish every trace of desire in from 48 to 72 hours. This we absolutely guarantee in every case or money refunded.

Write today for our free booklet showing the deadly effect of tobacco upon the human system and positive proof that Tobacco Redeemer will quickly free you of the habit.

ECZEMA

Also called Tetter, Salt Rheum, Pruritus, Milk Crust, Water Poison, Weeping Skin, etc.

I believe eczema can be cured to stay. I mean just what I say C-U-R-E-D and NOT merely patched up to return again. Remember, I make this statement after handling nearly a half million cases of eczema and devoting 12 years of my life to its treatment. I don't care what all you have used nor how many doctors have told you that you could not be cured, all I ask is just a chance to prove my claims. If you write me TODAY, I will send you a FREE TRIAL of mild, soothing, guaranteed treatment that will surely convince you as it has me. If you are disgusted and discouraged, I dare you to give me a chance to prove my claims. By writing me today I believe you will enjoy more real comfort than you really thought this world held for you. Just try it, and I feel sure you will agree with me.

Drawnwork Scarf

EVERY woman reader of COMFORT who wants a handsome, serviceable dresser or sideboard scarf should answer this offer at once. We have imported from Germany a large quantity of these large sized, pure linen scarfs, 67 inches long and 16 inches wide, and secured them at a price so low that we can well afford to give them away for less money in subscriptions than you would have to pay outright for a much inferior scarf in any store. As shown in illustration, the pattern is a large attractive zigzag drawnwork design and both ends of the scarf are finished with a handsome wide combed and knotted fringe. Being made by skilled workmen of pure flax, the texture of this scarf is such that it should last a lifetime and in appearance it is one of the most beautiful dresser or sideboard covers you ever saw. We are giving away this scarf free on the terms of the following

CLUB OFFER. For two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you this large handsome, pure linen, imported scarf free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 332.

Comfort's Information Bureau

Under this heading all questions by COMFORT subscribers on subjects not related to the special departments elsewhere in the paper will be answered, as far as may be. COMFORT readers are advised to read carefully the advertisements in this paper, as they will often find in them what they seek through their questions addressed to this Bureau. They will thus save time, labor and postage.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this Bureau and of all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

G. G., Wallowa, Oregon.—The sample you send we think is yellow root, but it is almost too small to judge and is not commercial size. To you and to all COMFORT readers who wish to market roots and herbs we want to say that full knowledge of them, where they grow and how, is absolutely necessary and the only way to learn is by having some old hand at the business show them to you so you will make no mistakes and lose your labor and what you hope to gain. In other words unless you have a good knowledge of any business you can't do business.

A. C., Etna, Maine.—To blow the muck out with dynamite, you have simply to sink the ordinary dynamite stick deep into it and set it off. But be sure you have an expert dynamiter with you to show you how or you will go up with the muck. But why blow it out? Muck from a pond is a fine fertilizer and why not haul it out and put it on the land? Or give it to farmers if they will haul it away, if you can't use it? That sort of humus is very valuable for some land.

C. T., Melbourne, Ky.—To keep cider sweet add one and a half glassfuls of grated horseradish to the barrel and shake up well. After two or three weeks rack off and put in clean casks closely bunged.

Mrs. E. B. S., Augusta, Wis.—To you and to all COMFORT readers who are unskilled in story writing we want to say good and hard: "Don't." Thousands of skilled writers are writing and the supply of material exceeds the demand. If you must write, go ahead and give your stories to your local editors, because other editors will not buy them. You may think you can write stories, but you cannot—at least such stories as will sell. Most of our inquirers on this subject don't even know the first rules of composition and the pity of it is that they are so ignorant of the writing game that they don't know they don't know.

F. B. S., Richmond, Va.—As the literary lady wishes a secretary, which means a stenographer and typewriter, if she could afford one, we hardly think it would be proper to offer her your gratuitous services in any other capacity. Besides the lady wants a female secretary. (2) Newspaper syndicates have got very nearly into the magazine system and a novice would have no more chance to sell to them than to the magazines. Both magazines and syndicates order a great deal of their matter, though they are always ready for anything of importance, or of unusual interest. (3) Mrs. Georgie Sheldon Downs's (Georgie Sheldon) address is not given in "Who's Who," but a letter sent to Ashland, Mass., would probably reach her.

I. O. Y., Litchfield, Ohio.—COMFORT can give no advice on divorce matters.

Anxious, Vintonton, N. Y.—Bookkeepers receive from fifteen dollars a week, up, beginning at less than that and being advanced according to experience and ability. When a bookkeeper gets eighteen hundrd dollars a year he thinks he is doing as well as could be expected.

S. E. W., Heber Springs, Ark.—Lincoln pennies are worth a cent apiece and Buffalo nickels are worth five times as much, each.

E. P., Vichy, Mo.—First cousins are first cousins whether they bear the same name or not, and state laws against the marriage of first cousins apply to the relationship and not the name.

E. D., Great Barrington, Mass.—About the only purchasers for meteors are museums and public libraries or large schools and they want only something unusual in material or size. Ordinary small meteoric specimens have no particular value, as they are too numerous. Talk to your town librarian about it.

H. M. B., Casey, Ill.—The barber's trade in some localities is a fairly good one, but it is not one in which big fortunes are made. The work is not hard, but it is confining and not always pleasant. We should not recommend it for anyone who is in poor health.

Miss S. M., Collinsville, Ill.—Write to the Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., about silk-worms and books on the subject. Also inquire about butterflies and moths.

Mrs. P. J. L., Apin, Mich.—For list of civil war pensioners for any one state, write to Commissioner of Pensions, Washington, D. C. and you may get it, though you may not unless there is a very good reason why you should have it.

G. A. R., Independence, Mo.—If you have rocks with ancient pictures of animals on them, they may be of considerable value. Write to Sup't Smithsonian Institution, Washington, D. C. fully describing what you have and offering to send a specimen for inspection, if he wants to see it. He is reliable. It may be the Institution might buy what you have, as you need the money. Usually specimens are donated, but if they want anything of pecuniary value they will buy it. Advertise your other curios in Kansas City and St. Louis papers. Tell the Smithsonian about your petrified chicken and duck also the human face thing. Other COMFORT readers with any unusual natural specimens should write to Smithsonian. P. S. If the Smithsonian does not want them ask for address of reliable dealer, or collectors. You must remember that you can sell nothing of this sort except after inspection.

D. L. S., De Kalb, Ill.—See answer in this column to G. A. R., Independence, Mo. Any specimen you might find on ground open to the public would be yours. At least, if you said nothing about where you found it nobody would know. Send specimens by parcel post and have the parcel insured, when you pay th postage. The extra cost is small, and the government is able to pay any loss. (2) For copyright blanks and information write to Librarian of Congress, Copyright Division, Washington, D. C. Copyright will cost one dollar.

M. B., Utopia, Fla.—No Vice President of the U. S., that we recall now, was sworn in on foreign territory. Still Vice Presidents are such obscure persons that we do not keep a record. The territorial center of the United States you will find by taking a map of the same and figuring out for yourself about where it is. It will also improve your geographical knowledge. Also find out for yourself with a pair of scales, if a silver dollar is of the same weight as the same amount in fractional coin. Then you won't forget as you would if you didn't do anything more than ask us. A state is surveyed from any point that may be selected by the surveyors. Most state lines when not natural, as rivers, are marked at intervals by small monuments of stone or other material. The direction of the Panama Canal is northwest-southeast, the Pacific entrance being about twenty miles east of the Atlantic end. Look at the map. Some north and south tidal rivers may run each way six months, counting the tide as current, but no river with one-way current does so regularly, though several rivers in Northern South America vary their currents during floods. Stromboli, we believe, is called the Lighthouse of the Mediterranean—not "Mediteraean," as you have it. Vladivostok, Siberia, is the most northerly port of any importance open all the year. We don't know the difference betwen the African and the "Astatic" elephant. What is an Astatic elephant? Also while you are lookin' up geography and other things suppose you dig into your dictionary and see if "whitch" and "foriegn" "perticular", as you spell them, are as they should be.

Puzzled, Burlington, Vt.—The answer to the puzzled: "I went to India, but I did not stay there, and I did not stay there because I did not go there," is a watch, or clock. For, why should it stay there if it didn't go when it got there?

We Want to Prove at Our Own Expense That It Is No Longer Necessary to Be Thin, Scrawny, and Undeveloped

"Gee! Look at that pair of skinny scarecrows! Why don't they try Sargol?"

This is a generous offer to every thin man or woman. We positively guarantee to increase your weight to your own satisfaction or no pay. Think this over—think what it means. At our own risk, we offer to put 10, 15, yes, 30 pounds of good, solid "stay there" flesh on your bones, to fill out hollows in cheeks, neck or bust, to get rid of that "peaked" look, to do this without drastic diet, "tonics," severe physical culture "stunts," detention from business or any irksome requirements—if we fail it costs you nothing.

We particularly wish to hear from the excessively thin, those who know the humilitation and embarrassment which only skinny people have to suffer in silence. We want to send a free 50-cent package to the people who are called "slats" and "bean poles," to bony women, whose clothes never look "anyhow," no matter how expensively dressed, to the skinny men who fail to gain social or business recognition on account of their starved appearance. We care not whether you have been thin from birth, whether you have lost flesh through sickness, how many flesh builders you have experimented with. We take the risk and assume it cheerfully. If we cannot put pounds and pounds of healthy flesh on your frame we don't want your money.

The new treatment is used to increase the red corpuscles in the blood, strengthen the nerves and put the digestive tract into such shape that your food is assimilated and turned into good, solid healthy flesh instead of passing through the system undigested and unassimilated. It is a thoroughly scientific principle, this Sargol, for building up the thin, weak and debilitated without any nauseous dosing. In many conditions it is better than cod liver oil and certainly is much pleasanter to take.

Send for the 50-cent box today. Convince us by your prompt acceptance of this offer that you are writing in good faith and really desire to gain in weight. The 50-cent package which we will send you free should be an eyeopener to you. We send it that you may see its simple, harmless nature, how easy it is to take, how you may gain flesh privately without knowledge of friends or family.

We could not publish this offer if we were not prepared to live up to it. It is only the astounding results of our new method of treatment that make such an offer and such a guarantee possible on our part. So cut off the coupon today and mail it at once to The Sargol Company, 12-K Herald Bldg., Binghamton, N. Y., and please enclose 10c with your letter to help pay distribution expenses. Take our word, you'll never regret it.

Our Country

"It is a good thing," said a man of importance, "for us to stop occasionally in our wonderful progress as a nation and take account of stock. We are all so busy making money, or trying to, that we forget what the country as a whole is doing and every citizen, whether he is a patriot or not, should know something about the country he is part of and supports. For example, our total national wealth in 1914 was $187,739,971,000, or $1,965 for every man, woman and child of the population. Our total public debt, less cash in Treasury, was $1,027,257,000, or $10.41 per person, leaving a balance to each one's credit of $1,954.59, which is a very fair showing, even if every one of us hasn't the money in his pocket. The total money in circulation was $3,492,015,427, or $34.25 per person. Total bank deposits, $18,517,732,879, of which $4,936,591,849 was in savings banks in the actual possession of 11,109,499 depositors, some of whom you ought to be if you are not. The ordinary receipts of the government for the year were $743,673,167 and expenses $700,254,490, leaving a balance to the nation's credit of over 43 million dollars. We paid out in pensions to 785,239 pensioners $173,440,231, and our post-office expenses were $283,543,769 with receipts of $287,934,566. The value of money orders issued went to 769 million dollars. Our total imports were $1,893,925,657 and exports, $2,364,579,148, which have very considerably increased since the war in Europe. The value of our farms and farm property was over forty-one billions and of farm animals over six billions. We produced nearly 89 millions of gold and over 40 millions of silver and our total mineral production was $2,445,805,017. Our total manufactures were 22 billions and wages paid were four billions, and a billion was paid in salaries to officials. We had 251,984 miles of railway carrying over a billion passengers and over two billion tons of freight. We had 18,523,558 pupils in the public schools with teachers drawing over 300 million in salaries and a total school expenditure of $534,058,580 and I have told you only a part of what we have as a nation and the almost incomprehensible volume and wealth of the business of the nation and its people. The only item that is not a credit to us, of all I named, is that in 1914 we used over two and a half billion gallons of wines and liquors. When we have cut that down about ninety per cent, we will have a big increase in wage receipts and savings bank deposits and the nation will be stronger than ever."

WIN A PRIZE

Each one of these five lines of figures spells a word. The five words constitute five articles that we are giving away. This most interesting puzzle can be solved with a little study as follows: There are twenty-six letters in the alphabet and we have used figures in spelling the five words instead of letters. Letter A is number 1, B number 2, C number 3, etc., throughout the alphabet. IF YOU CAN SPELL OUT THESE FIVE WORDS WE WILL SEND YOU A SURPRISE-PACKET CONTAINING 5 BEAUTIFUL GOLD EMBOSSED POST CARDS, ALSO A CERTIFICATE OF ENTRY in our GRAND PRIZE CONTEST. USE YOUR BRAINS. Try and make out the five words. ACT QUICKLY. Write the five words on a slip of paper, mail it immediately with your name and address and you will promptly receive as your reward this SURPRISE-PACKET, which is a handsome assortment of five beautifully colored Gold Embossed Post Cards, together with a copy of a New York Magazine, also a CERTIFICATE OF ENTRY in our GRAND PRIZE CONTEST, which closes Dec. 23, 1915. Act promptly. This is your opportunity to enter this great contest in which we give away FIVE AUTOMOBILES—An OVERLAND, a MAXWELL, a CHEVROLET, a FORD, and a SAXON—All of them brand new of the latest 1916 model—also PIANO, PHONOGRAPH, GOLD WATCHES, CASH PRIZES, etc. In case of a tie between two or more persons for any Prize, a Prize identical in character and value will be given each person so tied. For Backache, Stiff Joints, Rheumatic Pains, and Unbearable Bladder Troubles.

SEND NO MONEY, just your name and address—A Full Complete Treatment—SENT ON TRIAL.

My treatment has helped thousands to regain their health. Those with tired, lame, aching backs, with unbearable bladder and urinary troubles, others stiff and bent with rheumatism—and it has made them well, the most chronic, severe, long-standing obstinate cases, after all the other remedies they tried had failed. They were suffering, and it eased their pains, soothed their aches, brightened their lives and made them happy, and now I want you to try it, to test it, and see for yourself just what it will do for you.

STOPS BACKACHE

If you have backache, kidney, bladder trouble or rheumatism, nervousness, tired and worn-out feeling, if you make water often, getting up during the night, if it smarts and burns in passing, if there is sediment or brick dust when it stands write for my treatment without a minute's delay.

I know you want to be well and strong again, so you can work, and walk, without pain; so you can sleep without disturbance, and wake up refreshed and rested, able to use every muscle, nerve, cord and joint of your body, without suffering misery all the time.

I want you to try my treatment. My soothing, healing, penetrating remedies—especially intended to drive away uric acid, cleanse, purify, strengthen, invigorate and encourage the kidneys to properly filter the blood.

Now here is my offer—I will send you a regular, full, complete, three-fold Lexoid Course of treatment, without a penny in advance—charges paid—ready to use—so you can try it without a penny's expense, just as I promise.

Take it when it comes. Use half of it, and see just what it does. Then when you know it is helping you, when you know you are getting better, just send me a small amount, an amount within your easy reach—an amount you can easily afford to spare—that is all I ask. I know you'll be willing to do your part when it helps you—and your word is good enough for me. Try it first, pay afterwards when you know, not before. When you have used half of it, if you are not satisfied, return what's left and pay nothing. Don't send a penny in your letter, not even a postage stamp; just your name and address and where to send the treatment. The Family Doctor

So many inquiries are received from COMFORT subscribers concerning the health of the family that this column will be devoted to answering them. The remedies and advice here given are intended only for simple cases; serious cases should be addressed to physicians, not to us.

Address The Family Doctor, COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

NOTICE.—As the privileges of this and all other departments of COMFORT are for subscribers only, no attention will be given any inquiry which does not bear the writer's correct name and address. Initials only, or a fictitious name, if requested, will appear in the published answer, but the inquiry must invariably be signed by the writer's true name.

S. J., Knoxville, Tenn.—Typhoid leaves many strange conditions in its wake, some of which are outgrown, or gradually disappear, and others remain, to a greater or less extent as may be. Sometimes the after effects are very serious, but in this one of loss of memory, we believe that in time and with some effort of memory teaching, the patient will be restored. Time only can tell certainly, and you must wait.

Star Route, Harrison, Mich.—There is no method of shrinking thick lips which will give satisfactory results, though we believe some "beauty doctors" make some attempt at it. You are foolish to imagine that you will be thought to have Negro blood because your lips are not as thin as you would like them to be. Many persons who unmistakably have Negro blood have as thin lips as white persons.

R. A., Marion, Ind.—Your heart palpitations due to gas are caused by indigestion, that is the food in the stomach ferments instead of being digested. It does not indicate organic trouble of the heart, but if continued may result seriously. Diet yourself, eating rice, milk, eggs, cooked fruit, stale bread or hard toast and chew every mouthful to a pulp before swallowing it. Drink no tea or coffee. Use little or no tobacco. To correct any acidity of the stomach take a pinch of soda in half glass of hot water when you feel it. Drink a glass of hot water morning, noon and night.

Inquirer, Mound Valley, Kans.—Bed-wetting in children is quite common and not usually serious if properly treated, but in mature persons it means derangement of the urinary organs which require the attention of a physician who can personally examine the patient. In some instances it results from nervous trouble, not organic, but in any case it calls for a physician's personal knowledge and treatment. The longer you delay, the more difficult it will be to remedy.

Miss J., Stratford, Cal.—"That tired feeling" affects pretty much the whole world of mankind and about the best remedy for it is to get out in the open air, or in cheerful company and fight it with will power, proper food and plenty of exercise, rather than with tonics and pills. Sulphur is not a bad thing to take if you can take it in the form of natural sulphur spring water. You will get rid of the pimples, if they are ordinary pimples, as soon as you get your blood to circulating right and your system livened up. Eat only such food as agrees with you and chew every mouthful to a pulp before swallowing it. Drink no tea or coffee, but plenty of water and take it hot.

E., Hayes, Kans.—The dark circles under your eyes are to some extent natural as they have been there from childhood and your general health is good. By gently massaging under the eyes, rubbing outward for a minute or so several times a day—rub very gently so as not to abrade the skin—you will dissipate much of the blood which gathers there. Don't take medicine, but regulate your diet and try to prevent instead of curing. Eat wholesome food and not too much and never swallow a mouthful without chewing it to a pulp. Drink no tea or coffee and get as much sunshine as possible. Practise deep breathing and get oxygen into the blood to make it active.

Mrs. P. D., Phoenix, Ariz.—Many people have skin diseases which are of long-standing, some from birth almost, and as a rule these are incurable. But they might have been greatly alleviated if proper treatment had been given them early and the patients instructed in the care of them so that a physician's services would be rarely if ever needed. You should have taken your boy to a doctor when the disease first appeared. Now after seven years, nothing can be done except by a physician who can make an examination and apply the proper treatment. Skin diseases cannot be properly treated by guesswork at long range, as from Maine to Arizona.

Mrs. S. G., Davenport, Ohio.—An operation for appendicitis in January should not be troubling you now, if the operation were properly done and there were no other complications. As there is still some pain you should see the physician who performed the operation and get his advice. We hardly think your throat trouble results from the operation. Have a physician make an examination. It is the only way to get at the cause and the remedy.

Worried, Goodland, Kans.—The pains in your neck and head are rheumatic or neuralgic and are quite common as all the nerves of the body get to the brain along that route. They are due to congestion and this may be relieved if you will stand straight, throw your shoulders and turn your head from side to side, as far as you can, for fifty times or more. Then bend the head forward and back as many times and from from side to side as many without turning. These motions get the blood to going around the nerves and the pressure and pain are relieved, as a rule. Do this when you get up in the morning and any time during the day if your neck feels a bit stiff. It may hurt at first, but that will pass. A minute or two for each of the three movements will be about right and you may do it a hundred times if you find that it relieves. Apply chloroform liniment on a cloth (don't rub) if the pain should become severe. Remove the cloth when you feel that it is biting to a blister, and apply again, in a few seconds. It is hot stuff, but very efficient. These neuralgic pains are to be found among all kinds of people and if COMFORT readers, specially the older ones who feel stiff in the joints, would go after them with this sort of exercise instead of medicine they would be surprised and delighted at the relief they would have. Most men and women who work think they get all the exercise they need, but they do not, for many of their muscles are never used at all and they only know they have them when they begin to hurt with neuralgia from lack of use, which means congestion, that is, too much stagnant blood pressing on the sensitive nerves.

Brown Eyes, Banks, Ala.—The louse family is well known all over the globe and you are fortunate never to have made the acquaintance of any of its members, as most childrn meet the head-louse somewhere or other. The body-louse is not so generally known and is more vicious than the other. The small insect which you mention as something like the louse you have heard of, we do not know, and if the scientists at Washington have told you they did not know, then there isn't anybody who does. Did you submit a specimen? If not, do so at once and they will tell you what it is, even if they never saw one before.

Mrs. D. G., Bessemer, Ala.—Ear troubles cannot be treated by guesswork as you ask us to do, because the ears must be examined to locate the trouble as the ears are subject to many derangements which if ignorantly guessed at and treated may result in total deafness. There is some catarrhal trouble and blood pressure which your doctor should be able to relieve as soon as he has located them. You may be too poor to pay a doctor, but you would be still poorer if you lost your hearing. Besides doctors are very liberal with really poor people.

Baby Doll, Springfield, Mo.—As you are only fourteen and have so much trouble already with catarrh, we advise you to prepare yourself for making your own living in Arizona or Colorado, or marrying some farmer out there and not be a chronic catarrhist all your life. In certain climatic conditions a cure is impossible. You must be painfully sensitive if a solution of borax and water is so dreadfully sickening to you. If you have a severe cough there is more reason than ever why you should go to the dry air of the West or Southwest.

T. J. M., Columbus, Ga.—Riggs's disease is not scurvy, nor is it in any way related to pellagra. It is contagious. It is a very painful and stubborn disease and if not properly treated the gums will recede until the teeth fall out. It cannot be treated by mail and you must see a dentist, or possibly a physician, as the entire system is more or less affected by it. It may be expensive, but would you rather have less money and more health, or less health and more money? COMFORT readers are advised that if they have painful recession of the gums they should consult a dentist or physician to determine if Riggs's disease is indicated. At one time treatment of Riggs's was usually unsuccessful, but in recent years great progress has been made and it is now successfully treated.

Mrs. J. R., Mon Louis, Ala.—It is rather remarkable that with all the years that the most skilled medical scientists have given to the study of cancer without finding a cure, they had not thought of this simple poultice of violet leaves which you say will cure it. We cannot give you a formula for preparing the poultice, but when you have seen cancer cured by it, will you please let us know at once. Aside from its help to humanity, there's millions of money in such a remedy.

W. H. G., Sioux Falls, S. Dak.—Some people are naturally thin and some are kept thin by tapeworm and your daughter may be of this class. But we cannot guess at it and prescribe for tapeworm when there may be no tapeworm. Your daughter must be examined by a physician to find out if there is a tapeworm. Other stomach worms sometimes have the same effect, but all of them are amenable to treatment, and if your daughter is thin as a result of worms, the doctor will soon have her so she will fatten up to normal size.

J. B., Tredine, Wis.—Your nasal passages are clogged up owing no doubt to catarrh and that condition probably brings on the nervousness. If it is catarrh and you have had it for any length of time, you should get out of your present surroundings and go to Colorado, Arizona or New Mexico. You may have polypus, or there may be a bony growth in the nose as often happens. Have you ever been examined by a physician?

W. P., Adams, Oregon.—Epilepsy is a very serious disease and in most of its forms, if properly treated may be cured, or very greatly relieved, but it can be successfully treated only by a competent physician who can see the patient at frequent intervals to note conditions. Inherited epilepsy has been cured, but the cases are so rare that it may be said to be incurable. Other causes are numerous, largely nervous, and cures are doubtful though many are cured. You only make matters worse by attempting to doctor yourself and if you expect to have any good results at all from treatment you must go to a physician who will be honest with you and treat you properly or tell you frankly that he can do you no good. There are hospitals for the special treatment of epilepsy, and we recommend that you go to one of them. Have some doctor you know send you to the one nearest your home. There may be one in Portland.

BIG LIVESTOCK YEAR.—The Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture reports that this is to be the greatest year for stockmen of the Southwest in half a century. The report says, "Stockmen have come to realize that they must feed; that winter range alone will not produce the income to which they are entitled." The prospect for a big crop of lambs is better than it has been for a long time, and as wool is likely to be worth twenty-two cents a pound, it would take a miracle to prevent the stockmen of the Southwest making money this year.

This Man Tells FREE How He Was Cured of Catarrh

It is a new way. It is something absolutely different. No lotions, sprays or sickly smelling salves or creams. No atomizer, or any apparatus of any kind. Nothing to smoke or inhale. No steaming or rubbing or injections. No electricity or vibration or massage. No powder; no plasters; no keeping in the house. Nothing of that kind at all. Something new and different, something delightful and healthful, something instantly successful. You do not have to wait, and linger and pay out a lot of money. You can stop it over night—and I will gladly tell you how—FREE. I am not a doctor and this is not a so-called doctor's prescription—but I am cured and my friends are cured, and you can be cured. Your suffering will stop at once like magic.

I Am Free—You Can Be Free

My catarrh was filthy and loathsome. It made me ill. It dulled my mind. It undermined my health and was weakening my will. The hawking, coughing, spitting made me obnoxious to all, and my foul breath and disgusting habits made even my loved ones avoid me secretly. My delight in life was dulled and my faculties impaired. I knew that in time it would bring me to an untimely grave, because every moment of the day and night it was slowly yet surely sapping my vitality.

But I found a cure, and I am ready to tell you about it FREE. Write me promptly.

RISK JUST ONE CENT

Send no money. Just your name and address on a postal card, Say: "Dear Sam Katz: Please tell me how you cured your catarrh and how I can cure mine." That's all you need to say, I will understand and I will write to you with complete information, FREE, at once. Do not delay. Send postal card or write me a letter today. Two Wheel Chairs in September

297 is COMFORT'S Total to Date

I don't know why it is, but September seems to be the most unfavorable month for getting subscriptions for the Wheel-Chair Club; so I am not discouraged by the drop to two chairs for September, for that is just what we did in September last year. I have sent out 39 wheel chairs since the first day of January, and that beats the record for the corresponding nine months of any previous year. Experience has taught me that as cool weather comes on the wheel-chair subscriptions mount up again.

The two September wheel chairs go to the following applicants. The figures after their names indicate the number of subscriptions sent in by them or by their respective friends in their behalf.

Silvan Felts, 8th and Edison Ave., La Junta, Colo., 200; Mrs. Rilda Scott, 616 Ouachita Ave., Hot Springs, Ark., 79.

The entire 200 subscriptions for Silvan Felts came in one club on the seventh day of September, and were all sent in by Mrs. James Felts, but she did not give me any description of Silvan for whom the chair is intended. Mrs. Felts has fully earned the chair and did it very quickly.

Mrs. Rilda Scott's case is indeed a hard one. She is a poor widow with one child and has no relatives to help her. She has creeping paralysis which has deprived her of any use of her lower limbs. For over two years she has been unable to walk, and yet this brave, crippled woman does fancy work, making a desperate effort to earn what little she can toward the support of herself and child, so to be as slight a burden as possible to those on whom she is dependent for the necessaries of life. She and her friends began working for a wheel chair for her last April. She writes that if she had a wheel chair which she could run herself she believes she could do much more to help herself. I trust the wheel chair will prove as helpful as she anticipates; certainly it will add much to her comfort.

You will notice by this month's Roll of Honor that Miss Ellen Young, to whom a wheel chair was awarded in August and announced in September COMFORT, has shown her appreciation by sending in 62 more subscriptions to help on the good work of our Wheel-Chair Club since she got her chair. She has my cordial thanks in behalf of the shut-ins on our waiting list.

Some touching letters of thanks follow, also the interesting Roll of Honor, which I hope will be larger next month, and I ask you all to do your best to make it larger.

Sincerely yours,
W. H. GANNETT, Publisher of COMFORT.

P. S. For the information of our many new subscribers let me explain that for each and every 200 new one-year subscriptions to COMFORT sent in either singly or in clubs by persons who direct that they are to be credited to COMFORT'S WHEEL-CHAIR CLUB instead of claiming the premiums to which they would be entitled, I give a FIRST-CLASS INVALID WHEEL CHAIR to some worthy, destitute, crippled Shut-in and pay the freight, too. It is a large and expensive premium for me to give for that number of subscribers, but I am always glad to do my part a little faster each month than you do yours.

Subscription price is 25 cents, but if sent in clubs of five or more for the Wheel-Chair Club, I accept them at 20 cents each.

COMFORT Wheel Chair Fully Meets Her Expectations

GREENVILLE, S. C.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

The wheel chair for my crippled son arrived in good condition and is all that I expected it to be. I will always speak a good word for COMFORT and send you any subs that I can get to help provide wheel chairs for the shut-ins. I have a large family to keep house for, but I shall give all the time I can to promoting your good work.

With best wishes for your success,
MRS. J. I. WILSON.

Thanks for Aid to One so Helpless

KERMIT, TEXAS.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Please accept for Mr. Gannett and yourself my sincere thanks for the wheel chair which arrived in perfect condition. I also wish to thank, through COMFORT, the many friends who so promptly and cheerfully responded to the appeal for aid of one so helpless.

Sincerely your friend,
THELMA LUCILE LEEMAN,
Per J. A. LEEMAN.

Little Boy Shut-In Delighted With His Wheel Chair

DALLAS CITY, ILL.

DEAR UNCLE CHARLIE:

Have received the rolling chair for our little son, Harvey. He is so delighted with it because he can use it just fine. We are very grateful for it and wish to express our thanks to you and Mr. Gannett and the many friends who helped in getting the chair. May the Lord bless you and Mr. Gannett is the sincere wish of Harvey's father and mother,
MRS. F. A. MARTIN.

Her Wheel Chair Enables Her to Get Out of the House for the First Time in Months

HARTFORD, KANS.

DEAR MR. GANNETT:

I received my wheel chair in good condition and am well pleased with it. I was taken out in it the evening it came, and that is the first time I have been outside the house since the fourth day of last November. I expect it will be a great benefit to me. I hope to be able to send you the full 200 subs as I wish to do all I can to help other shut-ins to get wheel chairs. I thank you and all who assisted in helping me get this chair. Wishing COMFORT success in the good work it is doing for the unfortunate shut-ins, I am, Yours truly, MRS. M. E. WILLYARD.

The Roll of Honor comprises the names of those who have sent five or more subscriptions to credit of the Wheel-Chair Club during the month previous. Following each name is the number of subscriptions sent.

COMFORT'S Roll of Honor

Children's Happy Hour

ONCE a rich lady invited all the little girls for miles around to a party which she gave in their honor. It was in the month of October and the weather was too chilly for light summer frocks but not quite cold enough for winter coats and furs. The reason the lady gave the party to so many was quite strange. Her own little girl had been sick a long while and was now well and out of danger. During her illness, of course, no one could play with her and she was very lonesome. Now that she was able to play again her mother asked her whom she would invite over for the afternoon. Annette pondered for a while and then said, "Oh, ask every little girl in the county. I've been so sad and lonely that I want to see them all." The mother did so and at last the day came for the big party. Each little guest had a bright shiny new dress on but one girl whose name was Lucy had to go through the woods and in taking a short cut she tore her party dress on a thorn bush. This made her cry bitterly but a fairy came along and said, "Do not cry Lucy, I will make you a dress very quickly if you bring me the goods." This surprised the child and made her feel a little hopeful, but she did not see where she could get dress goods and told the fairy so. "The ground is covered with beautiful patches," answered the fairy and Lucy knew that she meant the autumn leaves and quickly brought her a big armful. The good fairy tossed them up in the air and they came down all over the child and covered her like a new gown. She was delighted and picking up her basket of fruit started again for Annette's. A little further on a goat chased her and in getting through a barbed wire fence she tore her leaf gown. She did not wait to lament it, but raced into a corn-field and hid behind a shock. The goat got through the fence and came toward her and she snuggled in between the bundles. When the goat passed, she came out and lo, and behold, she was covered with a dress made of husks. Of course it was the fairy who did it, and it would have lasted good if a hungry old cow hadn't reached over and eaten it right off her. "Fear not," said the fairy, and in a second she had her clothed in another dress made of wheat straw. When she arrived at Annette's, everyone was delighted with her strange dress and after she had told her story, all the children went out and gathered leaves and husks and straw and made dresses for themselves. They were nice for Hallowe'en but I think they could not have succeeded without the fairy's help.

Directions for Harvest Doll Cut-out

This October girl has three dresses. The one in the left corner is made of a sheaf of wheat, the others are of corn husks and autumn leaves. She looks cute in each one but you will have to dress her yourself to find out which is really the nicest. To dress the doll you paste the whole picture on a piece of cardboard and then put it in the middle of a large book to dry. It should remain there at least one day and night. For paste you may use the white of egg or a boiled flour and water mixture. Mucilage is not good for this purpose. Cut each dress out separately and color them according to what they represent. The bundle of wheat will be light yellow, the corn husk gown light green and the autumn leaf brown. The little flaps at the shoulders and hips bend back and hold the dresses on. Each dress has a hat to match. Cut a slit on the dotted line seen on each so that it can go on dolly's head. The pumpkin head is a reminder of Hallowe'en and has nothing to do with the dresses.

How Some Burglars Have Been Captured

By C. L. Chapman

Copyright, 1915, by W. H. Gannett, Publisher, Inc.

THE simplest "burglar traps" imaginable have been among the most efficient in capturing desperate burglars.

A parrot, an ordinary bird of rather doubtful intelligence, captured a burglar in Washington after the police had searched for weeks for him. The parrot had a way of greeting everyone who entered the house a habit of which the burglar was not aware. At night when the burglar attempted to enter the house the parrot heard him, gave his usual salutation, "Hello there, old man," which was so unexpected that it caused the burglar to lose his nerve and he was easily captured by a member of the family and held until the arrival of the police.

A neat housewife was the cause of the capture of a burglar in Oregon. After scrubbing her kitchen she put a number of newspapers on the floor, spreading them out so as to protect the clean floor surface. A burglar attempting to gain entrance, climbed into the kitchen window, stepping on the newspapers. They rattled and tore. He attempted to pick them up and the noise awoke the whole family, who took charge of the burglar, who was more frightened than any of them.

Any unusual noise frightens a burglar. He is alert to the usual noises and knows how to avoid them, but the unusual sounds not only annoy him but make him lose his nerve. When he is once frightened his capture is easily effected.

The principal of a girls' school has a tiger, little more than a cub, which has proved a successful burglar scare. During the day he is chained, but at night he is allowed to run at large within the school grounds, a high fence keeping him from getting away.

Not only have there been no burglaries during his watchfulness, but there have been no elopments either, while a year before there were three.

Fly paper captured a burglar in the White Mountains. He tried to gain entrance into a summer camp, which was well stocked with provisions. Sheets of fly paper had been spread about to prevent the entrance of flies or mosquitoes. The campers were surprised on awakening in the morning to find a burglar covered with fly paper and almost unconscious with fright and pain. One piece of fly paper had become wrapped around his face, another in his hair and his hands were both covered.

SMALLEST PARK IN WORLD.—Pasadena, Cal. will soon boast of having the smallest park in the world, if plans of the Oak Knoll Improvement Association are carried out. The park will contain one fiftieth of an acre of ground, and when it has been improved and filled with bright flowers, it will be deeded to the city.

Someone Will Get This Auto Free!

$750 1916 Overland

35 Grand Prizes And Hundreds Of Dollars In Monthly Cash Prizes To Be Given Away In COMFORT'S Great Subscription Contest

The contest is now on and is open to any man, woman, boy or girl in the United States excepting those who live in Augusta, Maine, news agents or dealers, and professional subscription solicitors. No money is required to enter this contest and compete for the prizes. It is free to all! And like COMFORT'S previous prize contests it will be conducted with the utmost fairness toward all. Each and every contestant will be given an equal opportunity to win. No favors or special concessions will be granted to any one contestant, thus giving him or her an unfair advantage over the others.

This beautiful 1916 Five-Passenger Overland Touring Car with complete equipment will actually be given free and freight prepaid to the person who complies with the rules of this contest and sends in the largest number of subscriptions to COMFORT before midnight April 30, 1916. This is practically the same famous Overland that last season sold for $1075. It has speed enough to suit the most enthusiastic motorist. It is easily operated, commodious, beautifully finished and best of all the cost of running it is so low as to be within the means of the average family. It is the ideal family car—a car that mother and the girls can drive as well as father and the boys—and it is complete in every detail. Besides this fine Auto we shall also give 34 other Grand Prizes and 108 Monthly Cash Prizes. We will also reward every contestant for all subscriptions he or she secures with premiums or a liberal cash commission. So you see this is a contest in which you simply cannot lose. You are sure of being well paid for your efforts.

142 Valuable Prizes Besides The Auto.

The $750 Overland Car is not the only prize we are going to give away in this contest. There are also 34 other Grand Prizes ranging in value from $5.00 to $250 each and 108 Monthly Cash Prizes ranging as high as $180. The Monthly Cash Prizes will be awarded each and every month—from November 1915 to April 1916 inclusive. They will be paid to the contestants who send in the most subscriptions during each month (Subscriptions secured in October count on November Cash Prizes). The Grand Prizes will be awarded at the close of the contest April 30, 1916. The fine $750 Overland Car will be given to the contestant who sends in the most subscriptions up to midnight of April 30. The choice of either a $250 Motor-cycle or Upright Piano will be given as second prize to the contestant who sends in the second largest number of subscriptions, a $150 Shetland pony with Rig and Harness complete as third prize to the contestant who sends in the third largest number and so on. A complete list of the Grand Prizes is given below. They will be sent charges prepaid to the winners promptly at the close of the contest.

First Grand Prize, $750 Five-Passenger Overland Touring Car.
Second Grand Prize, Choice of $275 "Harley-Davidson" Motor-cycle or Upright Piano.
Third Grand Prize, $150 Shetland Pony with Rig and Harness.
Fourth Grand Prize, $100 Diamond Ring.
Next Two Grand Prizes, $30 Waltham or Elgin, Lady's or Gent's Gold Watch.
Next Two Grand Prizes, Lady's or Gent's, Boy's or Girl's $28 "Hanover" Bicycle.
Next Four Prizes, $25 "Victor" Talking Machine.
Next Four Prizes, $22.50 "Seneca" Camera.
Next Two Prizes, $20 Steven's Double Barrel Hammerless 12 or 16 Gauge Shot Gun.
Next Two Prizes, $18 Steven's Rifle (any calibre desired).
Next Five Prizes, $10 Cash each.
Next Ten Prizes, $5 Cash each.

Monthly Cash Prizes Double and Thribble

If you win a Monthly Cash Prize one month we pay you at once. If you win any Monthly Cash Prize the next month, we will pay you double the amount of your second month's prize and we will continue to pay you double each successive month that you continue to win any Monthly Cash Prize. Doubling begins with December.

If you win the same Monthly Cash Prize three months in succession we will pay you double the amount the second month and thribble the amount the third month and we will continue to pay you thribble the amount each successive month that you continue to win the same Monthly Cash Prize. If you should win the First Monthly Cash Prize each month for the whole six months then we will pay you four times the amount of that prize the fourth month, five times the amount the fifth month and six times the amount the sixth month. Thribbling begins with January.

Subscriptions mailed to us any time between the first day and midnight of the last day of any month will be counted to your credit on that month's Cash prizes as well as on the Auto and the 34 other Grand Prizes. This gives an equal opportunity to all contestants no matter how far off they live.

NOVEMBER MONTHLY PRIZES.

Remember You Will Get Your Premiums Sure

Bear in mind that this is not a contest in which a few contestants win all the prizes and the others receive nothing in return for their efforts. All of COMFORT'S regular premium offers are open just the same to those who enter this contest for the Auto and other Grand Prizes and Monthly Cash Prizes. Every club will entitle you to a fine premium which you may select from our regular Premium List or any issue of COMFORT. And we will place the very same club to your credit on the Monthly Cash Prizes and the Auto and other Grand Prizes. If you do not care for premiums, we will pay you a liberal cash commission. If you choose premiums they will be sent to you promptly upon receipt of every club you send in. If you prefer the cash commission you may deduct and retain 40 per cent of the subscription money and remit the balance when you send in your club. In this way you are absolutely sure of being rewarded for your work and in addition YOU may win one or more of the Monthly Cash Prizes and become the proud owner of the fine 1916 five-passenger Overland Touring Car April, 30, 1916.

Rules and Conditions—Please Read Carefully

The Grand Prizes including the $750 Overland Car will be given in their order to the thirty-five contestants sending in the largest number of subscriptions to COMFORT before midnight April 30, 1916.

The Monthly Cash Prizes will be paid each month (from November 1915 to April 1916 inclusive) to those who send in the most subscriptions during that month. The money will be mailed to the winners not later than the eighth day of the month following.

Subscriptions mailed on the last day of any month will be counted toward that month's Cash Prizes provided the postmark on the envelope shows that it was mailed before 12 o'clock midnight.

In case of a tie for any prize (a Monthly Cash Prize or a Grand Prize) a prize exactly like the one tied for will be given to each tying contestant.

All subscriptions must be secured from people living in the United States. No Canadian or foreign subscriptions will be counted in this contest.

The full subscription price must be paid by each subscriber.

No "gift" subscriptions will be accepted. In other words, you must not make a present of COMFORT to your friends by paying for their subscriptions yourself. Any contestant who violates this rule will forfeit all claim to any of the prizes.

Subscriptions for any period of time not exceeding six years will be accepted. You may send one-year subscriptions at 25 cents, two-year renewals (solicited from old subscribers only) at 40 cents, three-year subscriptions at 50 cents and six-year subscriptions at $1.00.

The Monthly Cash Prizes and the Grand Prizes will be awarded on the basis of one-year subscriptions. Therefore every 50-cent three-year subscription will count as two one-year subscriptions and every one dollar six year subscription will count as four one-year subscriptions. A 40-cent two-year renewal will count the same as one one-year subscription.

Any contestant may get his or her friends to help secure subscriptions but the subscriptions must be sent in by the contestant with his or her name and address signed on the bottom of the subscription blank.

All clubs that are to be counted towards the Monthly Cash Prizes must be mailed before midnight of the last day of each month. Any clubs mailed later than 12 o'clock midnight April 30, 1916 will not count in the contest at all. In order to determine what time the clubs are actually mailed we shall go by the postmarks on the envelopes.

Don't hold subscriptions back but send in your clubs as soon as completed. Always name the premium you desire in return for each club. We will not be responsible for any clubs sent in that are not plainly addressed "Prize Contest Department." Therefore be sure to address all of your clubs to COMFORT, Prize Contest Department, Augusta, Maine.

Send The Coupon With Your First Club!

Right now is the time for you to make a start towards winning the Auto and Monthly Cash Prizes. Don't wait and let others get ahead of you, but hustle right around for your first club of subscriptions and send it to us as soon as possible using the coupon printed at the left. If the coupon will not hold all the names and addresses then use writing paper or one of our regular subscription blanks pinning the coupon to it. Remember—in entering this contest you place yourself under no obligations whatever and you forfeit nothing if you stop at any time. In other words, the subscriptions already sent in will still remain to your credit on the Monthly Cash Prizes and Grand Prizes. But we know that you won't want to stop after you once get started and see how easy it is to win a fine Cash Prize each month besides your Premiums or Cash commission, with the knowledge that every club you send in is counted to your credit on the Auto and other Grand Prizes. You have everything to gain and nothing to lose in this contest. You cannot possibly lose because you are sure of your Premiums or cash commission anyway. Mail us the coupon with your first club right away and have your name entered in this grand contest for the 1916 Overland Car and other Prizes.

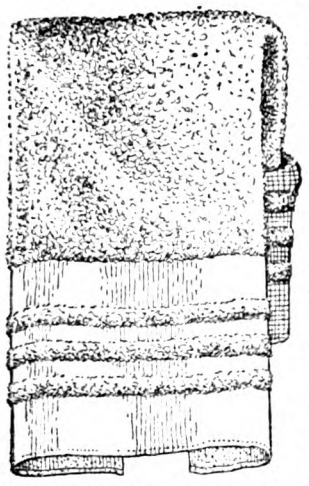
New Mesh Purse



Given For Two Subscriptions!

THIS is the new "Fish Scale" mesh purse with gate top and a ten-inch wrist chain, made throughout of German Silver, handsome, stylish, and perfectly safe for the carrying of money and other valuables. A slight pull with the forefinger of each hand instantly opens the purse, a gentle pressure with thumb and finger closes it. Our illustration shows the purse closed. When open the top is as large as the bottom, or in other words, two inches in diameter. When closed it leaves an opening only three-fourths of an inch wide over which the brightly polished German silver cover snaps down tightly so that the contents of the purse cannot possibly become lost. This dainty purse is now extremely fashionable so we have purchased a quantity for the benefit of those of our lady and girl readers who like to be up-to-date in these little accessories. You can have one of them free by taking advantage of the following

CLUB OFFER. For a club of two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you this handsome and stylish German silver mesh purse free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 7362.

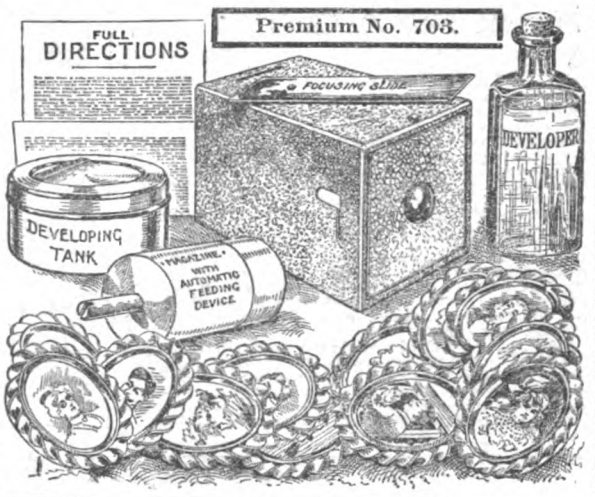
Pair Of Turkish Towels

Premium No. 7302



For Two Subscriptions

AFTER bathing there is nothing quite so fine as a good rub down with a Turkish towel, in fact it is the best towel for all purposes, whether for the bath- or guestroom or for everyday family use in the lavatory, kitchen or pantry. They absorb the water much more readily than other towels and the thick, heavy fleece-like surface imparts to the body a delightful feeling of warmth and well-being, exhilarating the whole system and literally making one feel like "jumping over a high board fence." These towels are also great for baby's toilet as they will not hurt the tender skin. The towels we offer here are genuine Turkish towels—not the imitation kind—and are 17 inches wide and 36 inches long which is a good convenient size for all-round family use. They are of good weight, well made and finished and are in every respect equal to towels that you would willingly pay $1.00 a pair for in any store. We will make you a present of one pair of these fine Turkish towels upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one three-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you one pair (2) of these towels free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 7302.

Will Produce A Finished Picture In Two Minutes

JUST think of it! A camera with which you can take, develop and finish a picture in just two minutes. To you this may seem impossible, but it is true nevertheless. Think of the amusement and pleasure to be had taking photographs of your friends and neighbors with this camera and deliver them the finished pictures while they wait. And the beauty of it all is, this wonderful camera does all the work itself. You don't have to know anything about photography in order to take pictures with this camera—you don't need to spend money fitting up a dark room and buying ruby lights and chemicals and the dozens of other conveniences which are absolutely necessary to have with the ordinary camera. This new Photo-Button camera does away with all that trouble and expense because you can take, develop and finish the pictures in broad daylight. You can commence to take pictures just as soon as you receive it, for we also give you a complete outfit consisting of One Dozen Plates, One Dozen Brooch Frames, a Bottle of developing fluid, developing tank and complete instructions how to go ahead and be successful from the very start. You can then take pictures of any of your folks or your friends, and you can mount the pictures in the pretty Brooch Button frames like those illustrated above. The pictures are perfectly round and of good size measuring 1 ¼ inches in diameter. And after you have used up what plates, brooch frames and developer we give you, you can send to us for another supply as we have the extra plates and everything else in stock and can let you have them free in return for one, two or three new 25-cent subscriptions to COMFORT, according to what you order and how much. Or, if you prefer, we will sell you the plates, developer, etc., at a low price. You may have this Camera and Complete Outfit without paying a cent, if you will accept the following

You Don't Have To Know Photography—You Don't Need A Dark Room Or Ruby Light—Or Other Accessories—The Camera does it all!

CLUB OFFER. For only four One-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each or two 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this Photo-Button Camera and Complete Outfit Free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 703.

Wizard Water Pistol

Given For One Subscription

TO all appearances this is a regular, full size, "six shooter" but instead of shooting the deadly bullet it squirts a solid stream of water 30 feet straight to the mark you aim it at. To load this pistol you stick the muzzle into water and pull the trigger three or four times. After it is loaded you discharge it by pulling the trigger just the same as you would an ordinary revolver. After it is loaded it is good for ten shots (of water) before it is necessary to load it again. Boys and girls can have loads of fun with this water pistol by giving their friends surprise "shower baths" and as it shoots nothing but water it is of course perfectly harmless to the smallest child. The "Wizard" is shaped exactly like a regular revolver; is 5 inches long, handsomely nickel plated and beautifully finished. You can obtain this water pistol free upon the terms of the following special offers:

Offer No. 716 A. For one one-year subscription (not your own) to COMFORT at 25 cents, we will send you the Wizard water pistol free by Parcel Post prepaid.

Offer No. 716 B. For your own subscription, or renewal or extension of your present subscription, to COMFORT for one year at 25 cents and 10 cents additional (35 cents in all), we will send you the Wizard Water Pistol free and prepaid. Premium No. 716. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

BIRTHSTONE PENDANT AND CHAIN

Your Own Birth-Stone Set In This Beautiful Rolled-Gold Pendant!

We Give You Both Pendant and Chain For A Club Of Two

ONE of the most stylish of all neck ornaments. Women and girls who like to be up-to-date are now wearing the Birthstone Pendant and Chain in preference to the birthstone ring while those who can afford it wear both. We know that all who receive the handsome Pendant and Chain illustrated herewith will be greatly delighted with it. It is one of the prettiest designs we found among a large assortment submitted for our approval by the largest jewelry manufacturer in the United States. It has a 15-inch plate cable chain, the genuine rolled-gold pendant is also made of rolled-gold plate and set with your own birthstone and attached to the pendant underneath the stone is a beautiful imt. Baroque pearl. Following is a list of the twelve different birthstones and the month which each represents. When ordering be sure to mention birthstone wanted.

Daisy Pump Action Repeating Air Rifle

THIS is the new Daisy pump air rifle—a real rifle with genuine pump action. It is a repeater—you fill the magazine full of shot—pull the slide toward the stock and it is all loaded and ready to fire the first shot. You can fire the Daisy almost as fast as you can pull the trigger without taking it from your shoulder. This is why it is so far ahead of any other air rifle you ever saw. It not only looks like a real gun but shoots like one. Its shooting power is tremendous. It will shoot farther and with greater force and precision than any other air rifle made. In appearance it is a beauty. From end of stock to end of barrel it is 38 inches long, weighs 3 1-4 pounds, all metal parts are of steel with non-rusting blue gun metal finish, the stock is of genuine black walnut, hand polished, and it has adjustable sights front and rear. It is a take-down model, of in other words, the barrel may be removed from the stock which makes it a very gun convenient to carry on long trips as it can be packed in a very small space. The "Daisy" costs $3.00 in the stores, but we are going to give our boy readers a chance to get one without spending a cent for it. We will make you a present of a "Pump Action Daisy" and send it to you by Parcel Post prepaid if you will accept the following

Club Offer. For a club of only twelve one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or six 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you a Daisy Pump Action Repeating Air Rifle exactly as described above by Parcel Post prepaid. (Premium No. 72112.)

Panne Satin Petticoat

Given For Three Subscriptions

THIS is one of the best bargains we have been able to offer this season. These handsome latest style colored skirts were actually made to retail for $1.50 but owing to financial difficulties the manufacturer was obliged to sell them at a greatly reduced price. We were very fortunate in getting hold of exactly one hundred and twenty-nine dozen of them and while they last will distribute as free premiums among our readers. They are made of finest quality mercerized panne satin which has all the sheen and brilliancy of the highest grade satin. The deep flounce is trimmed with four rows of cording and a 4½ inch knife plaiting. They are well made in every respect with finished seams. We have them in colors of mahogany, orange, green, king blue, American beauty, tango and navy blue and in sizes from 36 to 44. Remember the value—a regular $1.50 petticoat—when you read our offer below. And also remember that when our small stock is exhausted we shall withdraw this offer because it will be absolutely impossible to secure any more of the skirts at such a low price. When ordering be sure to specify size and color wanted.

CLUB OFFER. For a club of three one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, we will send you one of these fashionable high-grade panne satin petticoats free by Parcel Post prepaid. Be sure to mention what size and color you desire. Premium No. 7223.

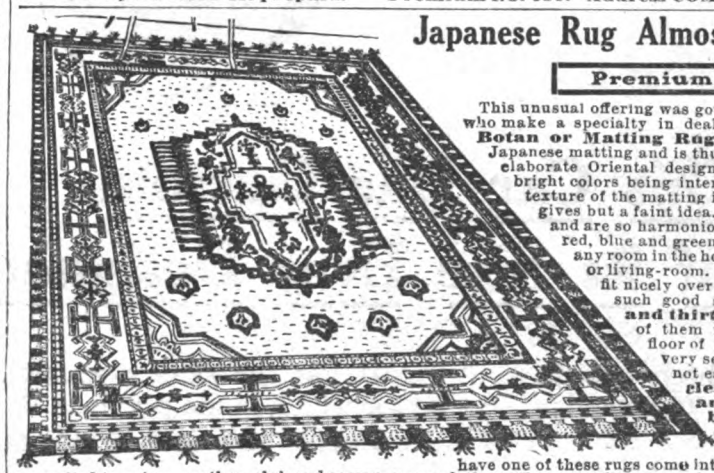
26-Piece Daisy Silver Set



Sent To You Prepaid For A Club of Six

WE have in the past made many fine premium offers of silverware to readers of COMFORT, but this is the first time we have ever been able to offer a complete silver set in return for such a small club of subscriptions. And please don't think because we are giving away this splendid set on such liberal terms that it is the ordinary cheap silverware which is plated on a brass base and consequently changes color and has that "brassy" look just as soon as the plating wears off. This Set which we offer you here is silver plated on a white metal base therefore each and every piece is the same color all the way through and will never show signs of tarnish or wear, even after years of constant use. As shown in the above illustration there are 26 pieces in this set—6 Knives, 6 Forks, 6 Teaspoons, 6 Tablespoons, Sugar Shell and Butter Knife. Each piece is full regulation size for family use, the handles are handsomely embossed and decorated with the beautiful Daisy design which is now so popular and the blades of the knives and bowls of the teaspoons and tablespoons are perfectly plain and bright polished. It is only because we buy this set in large quantities direct from the factory that we are able to secure it at a price that enables us to offer it as a premium for so few subscriptions. It is by far the greatest value we have ever offered, in fact we are so sure that it will please and satisfy all who accept our offer we are going to guarantee every Set sent out for a period of five years. We will send this beautiful 26-Piece Daisy Silver Set exactly as illustrated and described to any address upon the terms of the following special

Club Offer. For a club of six one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or three 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, you will receive this 26-Piece Daisy Silver Set Free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 680. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Japanese Rug Almost Six Feet Long

Premium No. 420

This unusual offering was gotten of a large importing house who make a specialty in dealing in big quantities of these Botan or Matting Rugs. It is closely woven of fine Japanese matting and is thus strong and durable. It has an elaborate Oriental design, which is brought out by the bright colors being interwoven with the finely shaded texture of the matting itself, of which our illustration gives but a faint idea. The colors are of such a blend and are so harmonious in the variegated shades of red, blue and green that it is appropriate to use in any room in the house, especially for the chambers or living-room. It will lay closely to the floor or fit nicely over a defaced carpet. They are of such good size, about 72 inches long and thirty-six inches wide, that two of them make a good covering for the floor of a fair sized room. They are a very serviceable rug to use as they do not easily soil and can be readily cleaned with a damp cloth and the color design thus be kept fresh and bright. It is guaranteed to give entire satisfaction and if you once have one of these rugs come into your home you will almost be compelled to get up another club and secure more of them, they are given on such easy terms and are so entirely wearable and give such a fine appearance.

Club Offer. For a club of only four one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or two 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you one of these Rugs free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 420.

Stylish Colored Petticoat

Premium No. 612

For A Club Of Two

King Blue, Tango, Kelley Green, Cerise Or Black

COLORED petticoats are now the style. King Blue, Tango, Kelley Green, Cerise or "American Beauty" and Black seem to be popular shades as they afford a striking contrast to most any dress. The petticoat offered here is made of handsome sateen or "farmer's satin" of good quality with finished seams and deep flounce and it comes in the popular colors above mentioned. Every woman to be in fashion now needs one or more of these petticoats which fit so nicely and hang so gracefully. Be sure to specify size and color wanted when ordering otherwise we cannot fill your order. We have them in lengths from 38 inches to 44 inches and will send you length and color desired, if you will accept the following Club Offer. For a club of only two one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or one 3-year subscription (not your own) at 50 cents, we will send you one of these petticoats free by Parcel Post prepaid. Be sure to mention size and color wanted. Premium No. 612.

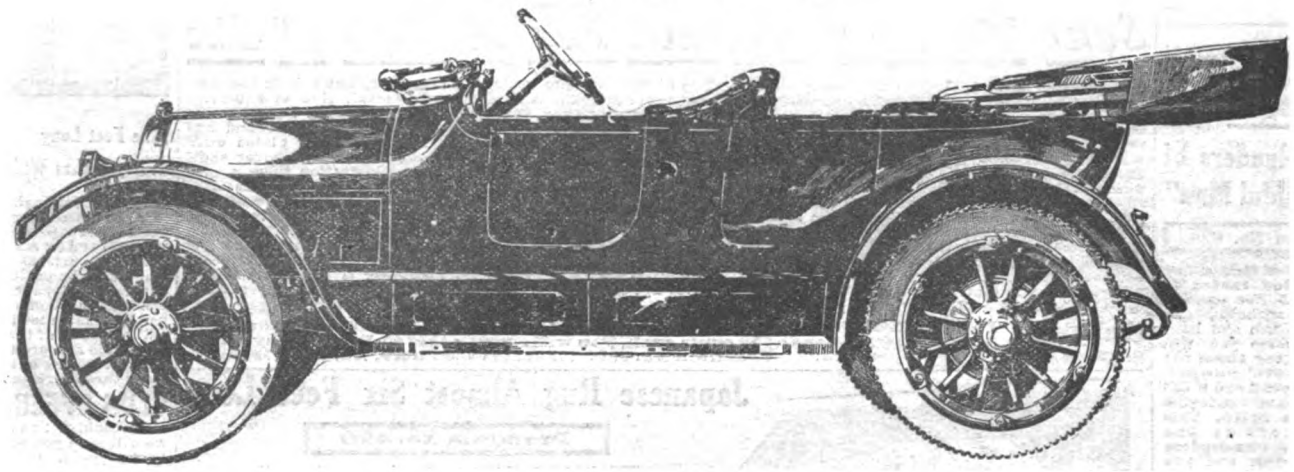
Lady's Watch

Prem. No. 691

For A Club Of Eight!

HERE IS a watch that we are proud to offer and one that any lady or girl should feel proud to own. It is known as the "Leonard Duchess" and is a perfect little beauty. We show both the front and the back of the watch so that you can gain some idea of its real appearance, especially the handsome engraving on the back. It is a thin model, 6 size, stem wind, pendant set, with antique bow and flat stem. The movement is damaskeed, quick train, hardened steel cut pinions, straight line escapement, every part carefully made and adjusted by skilled watchmakers in one of the best watch factories in the United States. The case of this watch has all the appearance of solid gold and it will wear like solid gold because it is made of solid composition gilt metal that is the same color all the way through so that it will never tarnish or change color, but the longer it is worn, the brighter and better it will look. This dainty little timepiece is refined and stylish enough to satisfy the most exacting taste. We guarantee that it will keep perfect time and otherwise prove satisfactory or it may be returned to us any time within one year and we will either repair free of charge or send you a new watch in exchange. The factory's guarantee will be sent to you along with the watch and in addition we ourselves guarantee that this watch will give you unlimited satisfaction. We have just added this elegant new watch to our list of premiums and are giving it away free on the terms of the following special



Club Offer. For a club of only eight one-year subscriptions to COMFORT at 25 cents each, or four 3-year subscriptions at 50 cents each, we will send you this handsome lady's watch exactly as described free by Parcel Post prepaid. Premium No. 691. Address COMFORT, Augusta, Maine.

Overland

$750

Model 83 f. o. b. Toledo
Roadster, - $725
This is the largest 4-cylinder Overland that will be produced this year

Why This Car Has Outsold Anything of its Size Ever Designed

Practically every feature of the car had been tested and proved in thousands upon thousands of Overlands which preceded it.

There was the experience to warrant larger production.

There was the reputation to assure larger sales.

This justified a production program calling for 75,000 cars—twice as many as had ever been built of any car so big as this.

Such enormous production and probable sales determined the price—$750.

The record value established by so low a price resulted in the greatest demand ever known for so big a car.

Sales have run constantly ahead even of the enormous production.

The car is the ideal family size—it carries five passengers in roomy comfort.

It has the same powerful, economical 35 horsepower motor which made previous Overlands famous.

But as this is a lighter car there is even more reserve power.

It has that certainty of ignition provided only by high tension magneto.

It has the comfort provided by long underslung rear springs and four-inch tires.

It has convenience of electrical control—switches are on the steering column. This arrangement is found only on the Overland and a few very much higher priced cars.

It has a full streamline body and a beautiful finish—you will have justifiable pride in its appearance.

Sales have forced a production even larger than originally planned.

Production is increasing steadily.
